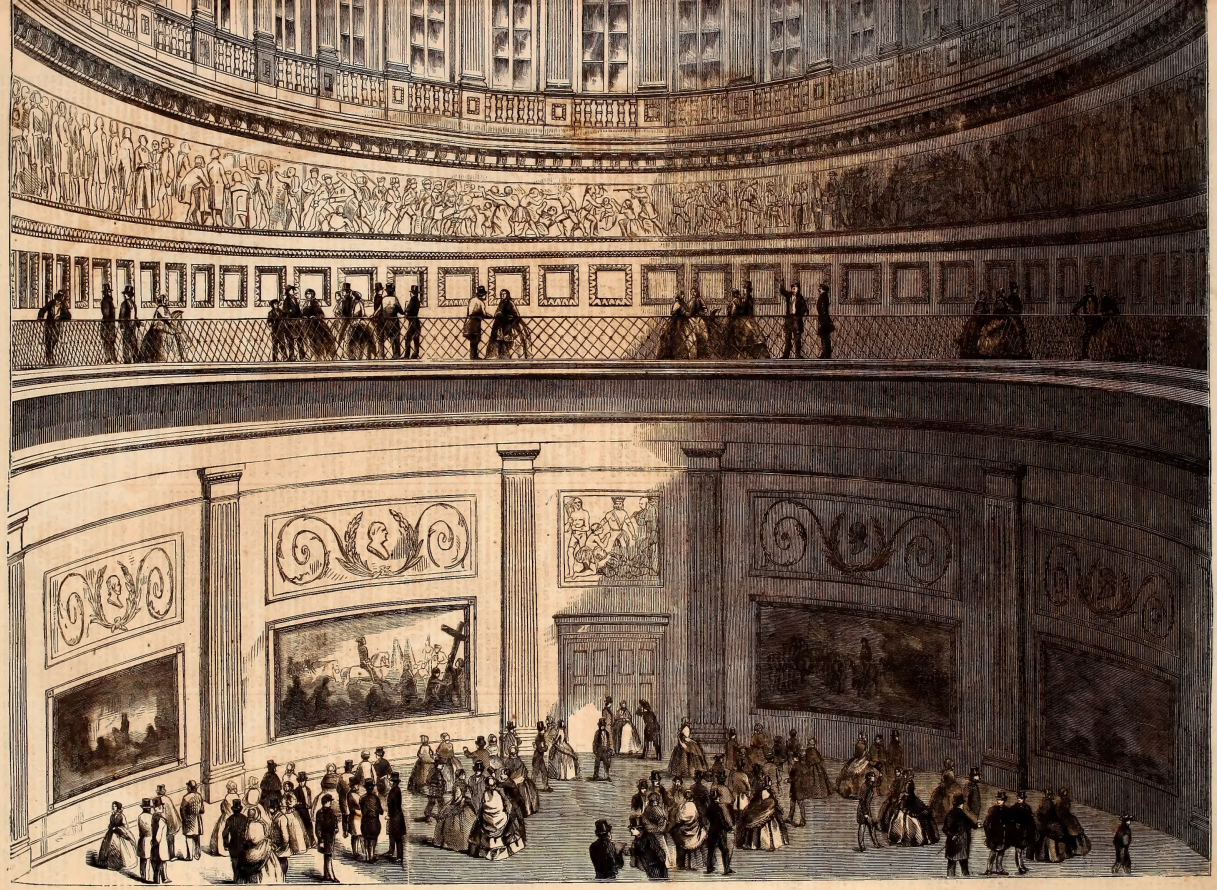
On Saturday, 23d, the Senate passed the Bill providing for the payment of expenses incurred in suppressing Indian hostilities in Washington and Oregon, and a clause providing for the expenses in Utah. The Post-roads Bill and Miscellaneous Appropriation Bill were discussed in the Senate. Among the amendments proposed to the latter was one offered by Senator Bayard, of Delaware, providing for the payment for marble for the Custom-house at Charleston, South Carolina. It was paid for, however, on a point of order.——In the House, the Tariff Bill occupied attention all day. Mr. Morrill, Whig, of the first Senate amendment, reducing the proposed $15,000,000 loan, was agreed to. During the debate Mr. Garnett, of Virginia, made an attack upon General Scott, for the efforts he was made to quiet the excitement in Baltimore. It was finally agreed [illegible] the House should meet on Monday at 10 o'clock, and continue the debate on the Tariff in Committee until 5 o'clock, when the amendments should be reported to the House and disposed of finally.

On Monday, 25th, the Senate, after the usual business of the morning hour, passed to the consideration of Mr. Collier's Bill providing for the discontinuance of the postal service in the seceded States. Various substitutes were offered but were rejected, and the Bill, with some slight modification, finally passed, by a vote of 34 to 12. The Senate then considered the Miscellaneous Appropriation Bill, and acted upon amendments agreed upon in Committee. Senator Green, of Missouri, made an attempt to tack on the Civilian amendment, but it failed, and the Bill, after some farther discussion, was passed. In the House, according to agreement on Saturday, the Senate's amendments to the Tariff Bill were disposed of. The amendment reducing a duty upon tea and coffee was disagreed to. Before the whole was finally voted upon, a motion was made to adjourn, the object being to prevent action on Mr. Sickles's Volunteer Bill, which was subsequently taken up. The attempt, however, failed, and the Senate's amendments to the Tariff Bill were agreed to, except the one mentioned above. A Committee of Conference was then ordered, with a similar one also to act upon the Deficiency Bill.

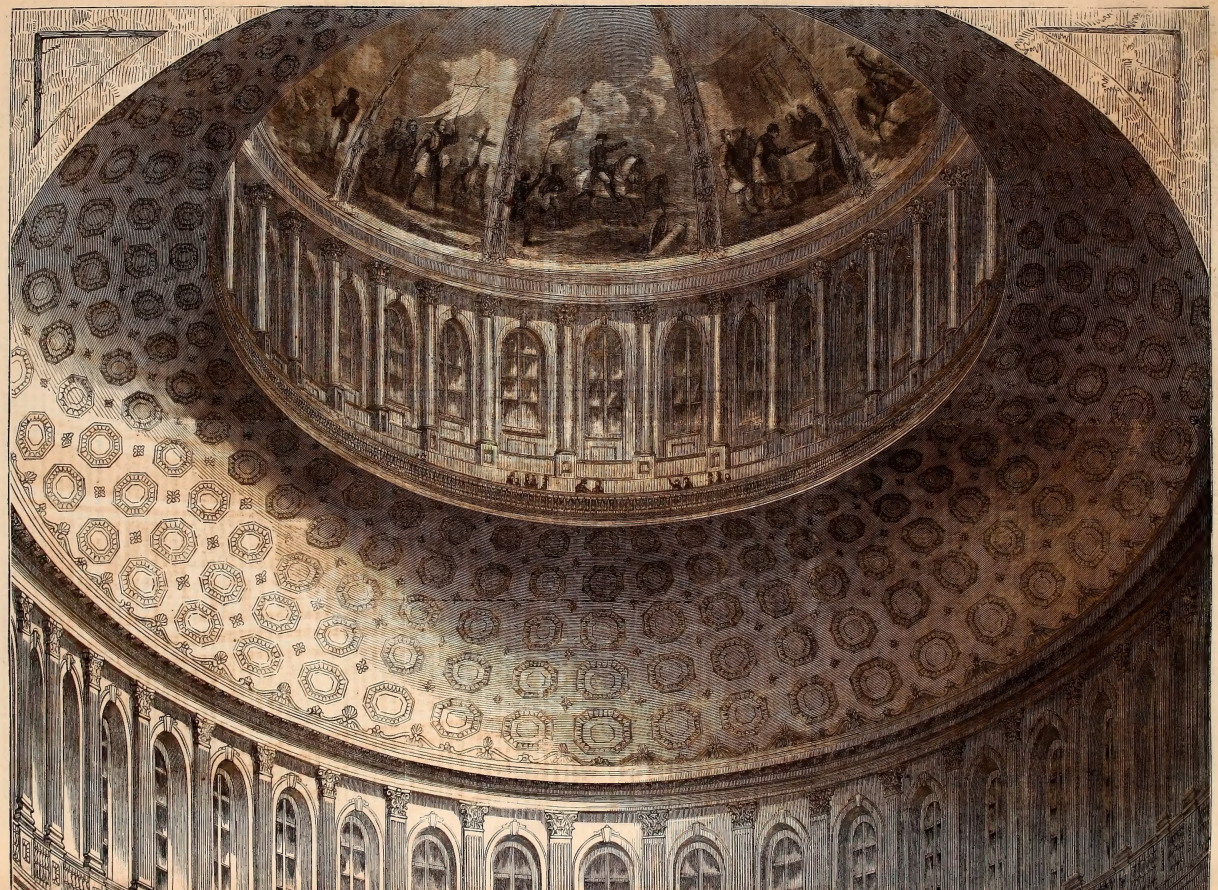
On Tuesday, 26th, the Senate appointed a Committee of Conference on the tea and coffee amendments to the Tariff Bill. The Post-Bank Bill was passed. A resolution organizing the Territories of Colorado, Nevada, and Dacotah. The Consular and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill was passed. The Army Appropriation Bill was discussed, and reported to the Senate.——In the House, after the consideration of a number of private measures relative to the trustees of the nation, the bill called the Force Bill, providing the President with the power to call out [illegible] of volunteers to aid in enforcing the laws, was taken up, and after considerable debate was passed. Mr. Corwin moved that its further consideration be postponed till Thursday next. The motion was carried by a vote of 97 to 81. This action is said to be a virtual defeat of the bill. The next business in order was the bill to amend the Judiciary Statutes of Thirty-three on the crisis. A scene of great confusion and excitement ensued, which lasted till after 6 o'clock in the evening, the Democrats resorting to all expedients to prevent a vote being taken, in which they were aided by the conservative Republicans. The House finally adjourned without taking any action on the bill.

On Wednesday, 27th, in the Senate, Senator Powell, of Kentucky, moved to postpone the regular order.——The Army Bill—adding to the Civilian amendment—was taken up as a measure that the Peace Conference were unlikely to agree upon any plan which would not include the Army. This motion was disagreed to—27 to 16. The report of the Committee of Conference on the Tariff Bill was presented, in accordance with the House in striking out the duty on tea and coffee, was agreed to. The Bill was then sent to the signature of the President to become a law. The Army Bill was then considered and passed. A resolution introduced by Senator Hale, of New Hampshire, proposing to reduce the force of officers, was discussed, and finally rejected.——In the House, the Senate's amendments to the Civilian Bill, with some slight modification, finally passed, by a vote of 94 to 82. The Senate then considered the Miscellaneous Appropriation Bill, and acted upon amendments agreed upon in Committee. Senator Green, of Missouri, made an attempt to tack on the Civilian amendment, but it failed, and the bill, after some farther discussion, was passed. The House, according to agreement on Saturday, the Senate's amendments to the Tariff Bill were disposed of. The amendment reducing a duty upon tea and coffee was disagreed to. Before the whole could be finally voted upon, a motion was made to adjourn, the object being to prevent action on Mr. Sickles's Volunteer Bill, which was subsequently taken up. The attempt, however, failed, and the Senate's amendments to the Tariff Bill were agreed to, except the one mentioned above. A Committee of Conference was then ordered, with a similar one also to act upon the Deficiency Bill.

On Thursday, 28th, the Senate appointed a Committee of Conference on the tea and coffee amendments to the Tariff Bill. The Post-Bank Bill was passed. A Bill reorgan



INTERIOR OF THE NEW DOME OF THE CAPITOL AT WASHINGTON.—[From the Designs of T. U. Walter, Architect.]



THE "VANDERLYN."

One of the most unfortunate failures resulting from the "panic" of 1836 was that of Stirling, Field, & Co., a leading house in the shipping interest. Long and bravely James Stirling bore up against the storm; day after day making forlorn sacrifices of private fortune, in hope of saving commercial credit; and when his last resources were exhausted, when his best efforts could not keep back the sea of troubles no longer, utter ruin overwhelmed him, ingulfing in an instant the hopes and interests of a lifetime. Not the least of his trials in this dark hour was the consciousness that, in his anxiety to preserve the credit of Stirling, Field, & Co., he had overstepped the bounds of honor; having converted to the use of the firm the fortune left in trust for an orphan son of his late partner, William Field. This was the last drop of bitterness which filled the cup to overflowing, and while crossing the water on his return home that fatal day he was haunted by the thought, 'twould be a mercy on him if the boat never reached shore.

On the south side of Staten Island Mr. Stirling had made him a pleasant home, and of all the property he had possessed yesterday claimed his own the last he could call his own. As he turned into the familiar path leading to Cedar Hill he felt that, in utter justice, even the old homestead ought to be given up and conveyed away to his injured ward.

Harry Field had long been an inmate of the pleasant household at Cedar Hill, and was ever a favorite there: but at this moment his guardian experienced the singular sense of exasperation and spite toward him with which we have regarded one we have wronged. While these unkindly reveries still occupied Mr. Stirling's mind, the very object of his thoughts sprang from a rustic bench under a tree, and stood before him.

Often he had met the boy in this way and returned his frank, hearty greetings with a cordial pleasure; but now Harry's face seemed like an accusation, and the merchant started back with an instinct of self-defense, as though an adder lay at his feet.

What terrible blunders humanity is capable of making! On that day, of all unfortunate days in his life, James Field, as he afterward declared, was sent to his marriage with Alice, his guardian's only child.

The ruined, broken, despairing man heard his first embarrassed sentences in silence, dismayed, astonished; but the youth only gained confidence from this, and with the natural and unnatural eloquence on the brilliant prospects, the certain happiness, and eminent suitability of the proposed alliance. At twenty, Harry Field was a man, characterized as "in love, too—that must be considered; but yet how could he so spread every sail to catch the full fury of a storm!

What must the bankrupt made—what flood of bitterness poured out, the gates being opened—concerns us not. The stunned and bewildered young man left the house at last. These words only he remembered—and they rang in his ears for many a day—"A beggar—a young pauper, and want to marry Alice! Why, you're a beggar, sir! Sir, go break stones on the road, go hang, if you will; but never think of marrying my daughter, Sir. Never!"

Utterly confused, and but half comprehending what had occurred, poor Harry wandered off through the grounds, and, meeting by accident, took the path to the shore. A walk on the sands served to clear his troubled brain somewhat, and he bethought him of the consolation and counsel from his old friend, Uncle George.

George Boynton—familiarly known as Uncle George—was a retired pilot; an old man, enjoying a well-earned competence, in a snug little cottage at the foot of Cedar Hill. He had taken a great fancy to the handsome boy on the hill, and in long winter evenings, over the bay or around the island, they had become fast friends; the artless old sailor finding a companion after his own heart in the frank, genial young yachtsman. Alice Stirling was also a favorite with Uncle George, and he was deep in the confidence of the youthful lovers. With every disposition to sympathize with Harry's troubles, he was, perhaps, still further moved against Mr. Stirling, because that gentleman had made urgent and threatening demands for certain payments on property, which the old pilot had not expected and was not prepared to meet. When he heard his young friend's grievous story his indignation and anger exceeded and even stimulated Harry's own.

After pacing the garden paths while in wrathful silence—the ruddy face growing redder and his whitened beard wagging portentously—he broke out in exclamations smacking strongly of the sea; his old skill of speech coming back to him as his blood stirred with passions mostly known to him in his sailor life.

"Why, dash it, man, what does the old lubber mean? Ain't you going to be an equal partner in the Stirling and Field concern, or first-mate aboard, eh? And supposin' the old craft does part from her moorings and drift ont' the rocks—as they say she will—your father had a snug thing stowed away for you out of the ship, as I know on—and old Jim Stirling knows it too."

"I always thought so, Uncle George; but he says it is all gone, my pretty, and he ought to know; he had whatever there was in his own hands."

"The dash he did! and that's what he bellowed out about beggar and pauper for, eh? Goes and robs you fust and then cusses you about it afterward. Tell you what, Harry, you never to inside that man's doors again. Just come live long with me; I got enough for both of us, and when my cruise is up you shall have the whole out. I owes him some money, too; but I'll never give him a dash cent. I'll pay it to you, Harry; dash me if I don't!"

Harry had much trouble to decline these rather too liberal propositions. The old man was disposed to feel hurt at the youngster's pride, but after all, was well pleased by the spirit with which he announced his determination to make his own way in the world.

"He told me to break stones on the road," said Harry. "I couldn't do much at that, but I could do some things, I know—at least I'm going to try. I can't come and live with you, Uncle George, but I'd like to stay here until I find some occupation; for I promise you I'll never step under his roof again or take from him a cent of a farthing. If he is wrongfully withholding my property, he can keep it: I'll never ask him to account for it."

"That's right, my boy! That's right! Cut loose! Take your own helm, and when you want help make signal to me; and if I can't help a man, by dash I won't come aboard and rob you nohow."

The particular route by which Harry should seek employment was then discussed, and as this would reward his exertions was the subject of much discussion, confined, on the part of the old pilot, to conversation after his own profession. As he had previously prejudiced the young man's mind in favor of his calling, 'twas the more easily decided that a pilot-boat should be the barge to bear him in search of the golden fleece.

Harry was anxious to see Alice, to tell her all that had happened, to inform her of all his plans for the future, to make vows of eternal fidelity; in a word, to enjoy the sweet sorrow of a farewell scene. What was the dismay of young George Boynton, when, in strongest terms, to any such proceeding.

"No rats to-night," argued age and experience, "and the morning we must be off to town by the first boat. Besides that, the less Alice knows about your plans the less her fatherin-law'll know, and the better for Alice, I'm sure. The best way is; belay sentiment if you mean to go to work. All this light canvass and these pretty colors is well enough while you're in port; but when you hay here 'long with her; but now you're going on a cruise alone outside, you better take in all your gimcrackery and get down to plain bunting duck. Just write her a nice little letter, and leave it long with me. Tell her you don't mean to give her up you'll stand by her, and all that sort o' thing; and what else she need to know I'll tell her myself. Now turn in, for you'll have me rapping on them ports to get early."

On the morrow the two were in New York betimes, and Harry was registered at the Commissioner's office as Henry Herbert.

Long and anxiously had he thought better to use it, in order to baffle any inquiries that might be made. By his new name he was introduced, with blushing embarrassment, to the pilots in the office, and right well pleased was he with the men who were to be his associates thenceforth.

The writer of this is reported to pause here and reader what tribute he may to the gallant men whose courage and skill are great creditors of our whole community. But there are those who would wish—to praise them we need but to name them.

Without troubling himself as to his authority, Uncle George, on the second day, and, indeed, for duly appointed for four years to the pilot-boat James Avery, No. 9. The remainder of the day was devoted to the purchase of "duds" for Uncle George, in his new capacity of guardian; insisted on providing.

Next morning at sunrise the Avery got under way, and stood off the hove to at the Quarantine, to set Uncle George ashore, Harry realized that he was fairly afloat on his first cruise, "alone, outside." Like a gull that occasionally dips down the Channel, he got out his fine ship's-glass — Uncle George's parting gift—to take a farewell look at Cedar Hill. The distance, however, was already swept across the field, until his eye rested on a little arbor he had erected that summer—a favorite resort of Alice and himself. Here Alice came, and Alice had told each other something they both knew long before.

Was it possible she was there even at the moment? That was surely her pretty blue dress, but he could not see the lovely little head, shining in a glory of sunny curls. No! Poor Alice, doubtless her face is hidden on her arms. Oh, how cruel to leave her without a single word!

He was startled by a thought of the consternation and distress her sudden disappearance from home must occasion. Something seemed to settle him like a strong grasp on his throat; and he dropped the glass on the deck, sprang to the side overboard and swim back to the weeping girl, while yet he might.

A sharp command from the senior pilot on board recalled him to a sense of present duty, and constant activity thereafter left but little time for further reverie.

Harry Herbert found his new life much to his liking. At first he greatly missed the pleasures and refinements of home; but he encountered new and adventures incident to his career he found a charm more than compensating for all that he had lost. Not all;—one sweet face was left, and to that his heart turned, and known to him from the sky. One dear companionship he still longed for unceasingly. His frequent letters to Alice were voluminous and evident, and answered as fully. Him were his living little replies—these priceless missives being forwarded through the hands of Uncle George.

Two years and more passed, not unhappily away. Harry sent to Alice his miniature. Expanded to the full proportions of manhood, his fine face deeply browned and bearded, like a pilot, he resembled but slightly the rosy-cheeked boy of old times. He received her dear likeness in return. She had not changed, except that the loveliness of maidenly beauty were being fulfilled in the full glow of lovely womanhood.

The occasion for this exchange of pictures was Harry's departure on a long voyage, all young pilots being required to take at least one cruise in a ship, for the purpose of becoming familiar with the management of square-rigged vessels. Uncle George thought it advisable that Harry should improve this opportunity to see something of the world; and accordingly arranged with his old friend Captain Steele, of the good ship Wellaway, to take the boy on a little excursion around the globe. The ship sailed from Boston to Calcutta, via Cape of Good Hope; thence to Hong Kong, and home around the Horn—the voyage occupying about twenty months.

Under the friendly mastership of Captain Steele Harry not only acquired a thorough knowledge of seamanship, but finding in him a competent and willing mentor, re-entered the course of study which had been interrupted by his sudden flight from home.

He wrote often, as opportunity occurred, to Alice and Uncle George, but received no letters from them until his arrival at Valparaiso, on the return trip. The latest of these had been awaiting him many months, and contained disheartening news of Uncle George. The old man mentioned that he had suffered from the attacks of his old enemy, rheumatism, but said his good health had returned with the warm weather, and at time of writing he was hearty as ever. Alice considered the matter more seriously, and seemed to think her old friend would hardly survive another winter of illness. At Rio Janeiro the voyager's anxiety was increased by later word from his guardian; and, in his impatience to see home again, the quick-heeled Wellaway seemed to drag but wearily on.

Calms and baffling winds long detained the Wellaway in the tropics, but at last they sighted the capes of Virginia; and on the same bright morning a New York pilot came down from the offing. At Harry's request the ship's name was run up to the main-truck. On making it out, the pilots ran down to the ship. "Ship ahoy! Ship ahoy!" Harry sprang into the rigging to answer, and his old comrades shouted a welcome home in chorus as the boys invited him on board the boat, proposing to put about and take him into New York. Though sorry to leave Captain Steele so suddenly, he was too anxious to be at home not to accept the generous offer. In half an hour his baggage was transferred, and the schooner bore away for Sandy Hook, while the Wellaway kept on her course for the Cape Cod.

Hardly had Harry returned the greetings of his friends when he noticed an appearance of restraint and constraint among them. Fearing the worst, he hardly dared to resolve his fears by inquiring, but looked from one to another in dread of—he knew not what. Shadows were evidently in consultation; and at length the senior took him aside, and, with more emotion than sailors often exhibit, told him that Uncle George had closed his log, and handed in his accounts to the owner.

As the old man had no relatives nor friends except in the Seamen's Friends' Association and laid his body to rest in Greenwood, and had taken charge of his affairs. The property, which was considerable, was left entirely by Harry, with the exception of a small legacy to the Association.

In a farewell letter, dictated during his last illness, George Boynton informed his protégé of the request he had made, and added, "Although this will afford you an income more than sufficient for modest wants, yet it is my advice and last request that you follow your present employment, and, secure to yourself an honorable profession, which will always be a better anchor, in case of storm, than ten times the amount of money to you."

Harry was quite content to comply with this desire, and returned to his old post in the Avery, only anxious to perform his duties as proper attention to his new interests demanded.

One trouble grieved and perplexed the young heir greatly. He knew that Alice he found among the papers of the deceased, together with several notes from her to the old pilot. These he felt at liberty to read, and contained her address in the South, where it appeared she had spent the winter with her father. The others were earnest petitions to "dear Uncle George" to tell her frankly and truly why she received no letters. "Pray do not keep me longer in suspense," she said. "Day after day, month after month, I have waited and hoped. You would be a relief to know the truth, however hard or sad it may be."

Poor girl! she could not know that "dear Uncle George's" eyes were closed forever—that his hand might never write to her again!

The last of these notes—written quite lately, and bearing a different superscription from the others—contained only these words: "Please give the inclosed to Henry Field, if he is living; burn it, if he is dead."

Her letter to Harry was as the last cry of a breaking heart. After a long year of watching and suffering she had received no tidings of her love, and, fully convinced that he had died or proved untrue to her. She prayed and believed that what she was writing might never be read by mortal eyes. But if he were living—if her girl had won his love from her, she yet wished him to know she could only be faithful to him until the end.

Hardly waiting to finish the reading, Harry hastened to Mr. Stirling's office, and in response to his eager inquiries, was informed that that gentleman had left for Europe in the Vanderlyn. The office register showed the Vanderlyn had been gone two weeks.

"Can you tell me," he asked the polite clerk, "if Alice—that is—did Mr. Stirling's family accompany him?"

"Yes, Sir. His daughter's health is declining. You know Miss Alice, Sir? She has been very ill. Friend of the family? Sorry to tell you sad news, Sir; strange world, Sir. Ah! here's the list. Miss Stirling has seemed to decline very fast lately. Physicians recommend the south of France. How long did you say, Sir? Several years, probably; though I believe she wishes to return with the ship, if not immediately benefited."

Harry was in despair. His first impulse was to set out for France by the next vessel; but afterthought convinced him 'twould be wiser to await the return of the Vanderlyn. He immediately wrote to Mr. Stirling, in care of his banker at Bordeaux; and after making arrangements to leave home at a moment's notice, if necessary, he entered upon the exercise of his profession and his patience.

After the "panic" of '36 subsided, James Stirling gathered the remnants of his fortune, and re-established his old business. Still under the name of Stirling & Field, the house was now once more the leading one in the trade. During his two years' travel our young pilot had seen their familiar burgee flying in half the ports of the world.

This bunting had ever been an object of great interest to him; but now, as the Vanderlyn became due, he watched for it with painful mingling of hope and fear. Each day brought only renewed disappointment; and so the time wore heavily on until the term of his apprenticeship expired, if passed examinations with all the honors, and admitted to the fraternity of licensed pilots.

Being a prize favorite with all the craft, it easily managed to be on station off Sandy Hook most of the time. Much to the surprise of ambitious youngsters, he neglected several opportunities to take vessels, always preferring to act as look-keeper. Among the older men, however, his story was now generally known, and they were willing to humor his expressed desire that his first ship should be one of Stirling & Field's.

The autumn of the year 1840 was now opening, serene and fair. Day followed day with not a cloud on the sky; but the wise ones discussed the signs, and foretold an equinoctial tempest, sudden and severe. Those who remember the terrible storm of that time will testify the truth of the prophecy.

On the 20th of September the Avery put to sea, on a cruise. One another the men took vessels, until, on the morning of the fourth day out, Harry left alone with the boys. There had been an unusual number of ships bound in, but the Vanderlyn was not among them. She was now nearly two weeks overdue, and many fears were entertained for her safety.

Harry's instructions from the senior were to run no risk of being caught in the expected storm, but be sure to anchor under the Hook before midnight. The boys awaited orders to put about with evident impatience, but still he held the boat on her course, still kept his eyes on the main rigging, his glass constantly sweeping the offing.

The Avery was now about a hundred miles out, when the look-out, Bob Shipley, jogging along under short sail, on the larboard tack, with a stiff breeze nearly abeam. At noon the young commander went below to the cabin to get some refreshing, was forced to conclude he could not stand on my longer. While sadly contemplating this new defeat of his hopes he was startled by a cry from the sharp-eyed youngster left on the look-out,

"Sail on the weather bow!"

In an instant all were on deck. Far down on the horizon, invisible to any but sailors' eyes, a little speck. Without thought of doubting, he knew 'twas the Vanderlyn.

"Down helm—hard down! Forward there and make that jib! Haul sheet—fore and main! sheet home! Now keep her away! Steady! so—rap full and steady!"

Close hauled, all taut and belay, the good boat walked up to windward at the rate of six knots. In an hour the stranger was plainly made out to be a large ship, going free, under a cloud of canvas. As she drew near the pilot signal was shown in her quarter-deck rigging, and a pilot-boat put from the port-bow—and ere the report reached the Avery, the tri-color was run up to the fore, and a blue swallow-tailed with the letters S. & F. on a white ground, fluttered out from the main-track.

Harry paced the schooner's narrow gangway side with excitement. His youthful ambitions, unsophisticated, thought they wouldn't look so white if their first ship was a big 'un. Preparing to leave them hardly room, he gave his last directions. "Run by on this tack; luff round, under her lee; and sheer off for home, best foot foremost."

In a moment more the young pilot was on the Vanderlyn's deck, where he was received by Captain Winslow with anxious scrutiny.

"Had look-out in the north'ard, Pilot. Shall we have weather to-day?"

"What way are you making?"

"About eight knots."

"And in the same the gale will be upon us. I should keep off the coast; not attempt to go in tonight."

Advice—strangely familiar—interrupted. "For Heaven's sake, gentlemen, don't keep the ship out in another storm. Is there no possibility of making harbor?"

James Stirling! How changed he seemed; old, haggard, and care-worn. Captain Winslow introduced him as "passenger," and answered: "Mr. Herbert thinks the chances are against our weathering the Hook, Sir, if it comes on to blow from this quarter."

Hurriedly and anxiously Mr. Stirling spoke. "Pilot, my only daughter is on board, an invalid, and I know she cannot long survive another storm. Take the ship in, Pilot, and I'll give any thing, every thing you may ask. You don't know, young Sir, what it is to have a daughter lying before your eyes, or you wouldn't let my poor girl perish for want of a little resolution. You need not fear for the ship; I'll risk that. Take us into New York harbor to-night, and I'll give you the ship, Sir."

'Twas pitiful to see the strong man so broken. Harry's heart was in his throat as he turned away to take a look at the weather, perhaps.

After consultation, 'twas decided to stand on a few hours, and if the gale became threatening, to run before it to the Delaware Breakwater. Mr. Stirling, with the unreasonableness of one too sorely tried, thought 'twould be the pilot's fault if the ship was not safe ere the storm came on. He could not perceive the imminence of danger, and demanded that more sail should be made, although the gusts were even then staggering under too much canvas. Harry was finally obliged to send him below, saying, "I command the ship, if you please, Sir, and must be allowed to manage her as I see fit."

With a freshening breeze the Vanderlyn sped on during the succeeding hours, until even the captain—cautious old sailor though he was—felt sure they would go safely in. But ominous great-coats were gathering darkly in the northeast, and Harry, still fearful, ordered all hands on deck in readiness to shorten sail at a moment's notice. His wisdom was too soon evident. The wind suddenly died away, returning in great, sullen-sounding puffs, careening the good ship till her yards almost touched the water; then pausing on, leaving the sails flapping against the mast.

The heat by among the crew felt the oppression of the coming trial, and not one on deck but drew a longer breath when the pilot's clear, firm voice broke the terrible stillness; ringing out commands sharp and strong. In less time than a landsman could think the Vanderlyn was stripped and laid in stays, under double reefed top-sails.

Not a moment too soon. A confused, rushing sound, a hurried clinging by the men to the nearest fastenings, and like a hungered lion springing on his prey, the tempest burst over them.

Down, down rolled the stricken craft, her lee rail deep buried in the flat, seething sea, and her strained weather rigging shrieking and howling in the blast, adding piercing discords to this dread chorus of the elements. As with a mighty hand she was forced still further over and down, until a cry of human anguish went up from the despairing souls on board.

Holding fast to belaying-pins and the rigging, the pilot crawled forward to the mainmast. After waiting long as he dared his axe was raised to cut away what was left of the ship's lofty and heavy canvas. Slowly she struggled up, slowly up, then righted with a suddenness that snapped the light spars, and her tops like hemlock crackling in the fire.

'Twas but little past sunset time, but the blackness of midnight was already upon the ocean. Nothing could be distinguished at arm's-length, but the useless helm told that every stitch of canvas must be torn away. The Vanderlyn drifted before the storm helpless as a log.

At last the rain came. Malignant lightnings lent their awful, ominous glare and terrific thunders to the appalling scene. 'Twas a change for the better, however. The descending sheets of water abated somewhat the fury of the wind, and the vivid flashes served to show the condition of the ship.

With infinite difficulty storm stay-sails were got out, and as they gave command to the helm 'twas once more a question what course to take. They had sure drift as far that can attempt to reach the Breakwater would probably end in a lee bow, on Squan Beach; so 'twas decided to try and weather Sandy Hook. The fore and main top-sails were bent and set with three reefs, and at day- held, the good packet looked up encouragingly. But the tremendous force of the gale obliged them to make it nearly abeam, and the pilot knew he must be going to leeward-fearfully fast. As he stood at the helm with Captain Winslow he was startled by the cry, "Land on the lee!" ahead!"

He half-hoped it might be the Light-ship; but as he clambered forward, the Revolver threw out its hail-white ray, and his heart sank. He recognized the Highlands. Soon the Hook lights were made out, ahead; and as he watched them slowly change, he felt the fearful truth settle upon him. The ship was drifting ashore. By no possibility could she make offing enough to clear that treacherous strand of sand, lengthening out, as if purposely to bar the way.

One will hope came to his thought, and though he put it down as the desperate fancy of a mind unwilling to look reality in the face, yet it would return to him again and again. At last, as if by instinct—almost out of the direction of reason—he ordered one watch to clear away the port-anchor, while the other stood by to man sheets and braces. All things under impulse, which would be obeyed, even though seeming utterly and fatally wrong, he put the helm up until the ship fell off two or three points, repeating to himself the while, "We might as well strike there as any where."

With a free wind the Vanderlyn dashed on at lightning speed, standing directly for the Highland lights. Changing the course created excitement and discontent among the crew. It looked like giving up hope, and hastening to meet their lamentable destruction. The men growled to the mates; the mates jeered their minds to the captain. The pilot, peering out into the darkness to leeward, heeded them not, until Captain Winslow approached, saying,

"If you're going to try your ground tackle, the sooner the better, I should say."

"Here!" The anchors wouldn't hold a moment in this soft sand. "No, Captain, there's but one possible chance of escape; and if that fails, we can only go on to the beach as I point where we shall be sure of assistance, and where the ship will not go to pieces the moment she strikes."

While speaking his eyes turned continually with anxious, strained glances over the larboard bow. What there? A faint line of phosphorescent light, rapidly lengthening and seeming to come nearer. Then a low murmur, strangely out of place above the howling of the storm. Louder it grew and louder, until the hollow, hungry roar of the breakers sent a thrill through his heart.

In a moment more the Vanderlyn pitched forward on the first ground-swell. The mate, in mortal terror, exclaimed, "We are lost! every man for himself!"

"To your duty, man, for your lives!" thundered the pilot, and the command had that quality which even then could secure obedience. Springing to the wheel, the spokes went flying through his hands.

"Let go weatherbraces, fore'n aft! let go!"

Still up went the helm, though the Captain wondered, thinking 'twould be far better to strike head on.

Fore-s'l haul! main top-s'l!" and almost in the edge of the surf they filled away on the larboard tack. What earthly use? They couldn't make a cable's length before she'd ground. No. Hardly had they gathered headway when down went the helm once more, and once more the ship came before the wind.

And now the pilot's commands had a ring like a shout of joy. And well they might; his inspired hope was realized.

The sea had broken over the beach and the old Shrewsbury inlet was open.

The Vanderlyn drove through, hardly grazing her keel, and in five minutes lay safe at anchor inside the Hook.

Glad hurrahs from the crew brought Mr. Stirling to the deck—clinging to his arm, a white, spirit-like figure. As they approached the helm Captain Winslow saw Harry shaking hands with the pilot. The old merchant did not at first understand what had occurred. When the Captain had explained to him the state of affairs, he too would congratulate and thank the hero of the hour. But the hero had suddenly disappeared, and with him the ethereal figure in white. After some search his attention was attracted by the flutter of light garments, and drawing near, he heard his daughter saying, "I knew you would, Harry; I recognized your dear voice hours ago."

Not caring to interrupt the conversation at this point, the old gentleman turned to the Captain Winslow with much wise nodding of the head, and "So so! Indeed! Is it possible?"

Reasonably soon he was joined by Harry and Alice, and that importunate young man immediately reminded him of a promise to grant any thing he might ask; "and so, Sir, I renew the request I made four years ago."

Which request was not denied on this occasion.

Alice's restoration to health was wonderfully rapid; but the marriage could not take place until late in the spring of '41. On the wedding-day James Stirling made a statement of account to his son-in-law, showing that he had used his authority as guardian to make Henry H. Field an equal partner in the firm of Stirling & Field, when that business had been reorganized.

The bridal tour began with a voyage to France in the Vanderlyn; and Harry's last professional act was to pilot her out of the harbor.

THE STORM OF MY LIFE.

My mother was a poet and a painter. Not noted as such, but as a woman in any sense of woman that ever lived. Of an intensely sensitive nature, which gave out tones as harps do; an insignificant, which sent forth none; a heart that as the eye does on its own retina; pure, sweet, tensive, she infused the essence of poetry into daily thoughts, and acted the painter with neither brush nor easel.

She gave me her sensitiveness of nature without its poetic genius and charm. The pain without the bliss. In my young heart of wild tendency, from which a brush of the hand would awaken sound—music, perhaps; but wild, inharmonious, fitful music. I could suffer but the thrill of joy came rarely.

When I was quite a child I jostled against rough natures in the child's world, and shrank more and more from the pain of contact—as the Brazilian mimosa shrinks from the hand that touches. I was not unready, and I think I was not timid. At any rate my child friends gave me to myself; making me, if not happier, at least more at peace and content.

At ten or eleven years of age some fault of arithmetician crept upon my speech. Whether it was a nervous derangement, or a habit originating in need by embarrassment and strengthened by habit, I never knew; but it grew upon me until it was most noticeable. And with it came pain. If I shrank from contact before, I threw out double defenses now. I built hedges of thorns about me, and neither did nor could any thing fall on me but thought.

One day at school, at recess—it was one of those October days which hang clouds in the sky like pictures, in which the very color of her breath till not a leaf is able to stir, and the whole day seems waiting for the smile of God to deepen to the serene peace and promise of night—I was alone. I was happy free and happy. A little of the sweet heat of summer had failed to scorch and the frosts of autumn had not yet reached, when a gleeful, unthought-of expression, bursting from my lips, was caught by Willie Day—my friend, if I had any—and repeated in the same stammering way. I looked at him once, was conscious of a mean thing in my whole being, as though blades had pierced me in every living fibre, and then laid my face in the grass. I never went to school again. Willie hung upon me, wept, and begged forgiveness; I said "Yes" in a stony way, looked at him with a fixed gaze, and then remembered no more. Days and days but not yet reached and the frosts of autumn had not yet reached, when a gleeful, unthought-of expression, bursting from my lips, was caught by Willie Day—my friend, if I had any—and repeated in the same stammering way. I looked at him once, was conscious of a mean thing in my whole being, as though blades had pierced me in every living fibre, and then laid my face in the grass. I never went to school again. Willie hung upon me, wept, and begged forgiveness; I said "Yes" in a stony way, looked at him with a fixed gaze, and then remembered no more. Days and days but not yet reached, when a gleeful, unthought-of expression, bursting from my lips, was caught by Willie Day—my friend, if I had any—and repeated in the same stammering way. I looked at him once, was conscious of a mean thing in my whole being, as though blades had pierced me in every living fibre, and then laid my face in the grass. I never went to school again. Willie hung upon me, wept, and begged forgiveness; I said "Yes" in a stony way, looked at him with a fixed gaze, and then remembered no more. Days and days but not yet reached and the frosts of autumn had

"3. Will the Governor of Arkansas, in his official capacity, guarantee to the United States forces now in charge thereof the right of marching away from said place, with all the honor due them as Federal officers and soldiers, who do not surrender their trust, but simply evacuate a post for want of instructions from their superiors in office, and in doubt as to the propriety of bringing on civil war among their fellow-countrymen?

"To these interrogatories Governor Rector answered as follows: After mature reflection, I propose to accept your first, second, and third propositions, with the following understanding: Thus, being informed your command brought no cannon, so none are to be taken away. You shall have a safe passage out of the State in any direction you may please, with your command, provided, however, you do not station yourself within the limits of the State of Arkansas or on the borders thereof.

"A memorandum was subsequently drawn up in which the Captain agreed to surrender the Arsenal, a part of which reads thus: And the said Captain Totten protests that he has thus acted because in the presence of a greatly superior armed force, and which he became satisfied would soon become overwhelming by reinforcements in case of resistance, involving the sacrifice of his command, without regard to the probable loss of life on the part of the assailants; because any defense of the Arsenal in the City of Little Rock, whether successful or unsuccessful, would necessarily involve to a greater or less extent the destruction of property in the city, and the loss of lives of the peaceful citizens and families dwelling therein; because, being without instructions from his Government, he took the responsibility of doing what he thought proper and best under all the circumstances, deciding to avoid cause of civil war in this Government, by the first instance of a hostile and bloody collision, yet protesting for himself and in the name of his Government against events beyond his control, which have actuted him to this course."

The city and garrison of Fort Smith, Arkansas, are situated on the Arkansas River, at the junction of the Poteau River, and immediately on the boundary of the Indian nations, the line running through the garrison. The city is the greatest business place in Arkansas, doing a large trade with the Indians and New Mexicans. It is next to Little Rock in size, if not its equal. The garrison is one of the largest and probably the best built on the frontier. Captain Sturgis, of the cavalry, commands the post; Captain Montgomery is Quarter-Master; Captain M'Intosh, Lieutenant Stanley, and Lieutenant Lomax are of the garrison. Vague telegraphic reports, which, however, are not generally credited, state that it has been seized.

PRESIDENT J. DAVIS'S INAUGURATION AT MONTGOMERY.

On page 157 we publish a picture of the Inauguration of President Davis, of the Southern Confederacy, at Montgomery, Alabama, on February 18, from a photograph obligingly placed at our disposal. We published part of the inaugural in our last number. A lady who witnessed the scene thus writes to a friend in this city:

"The President is a pleasant-looking old gentleman, of about fifty years of age; he was escorted to the Capitol by the military, he being in an elegant carriage drawn by six white horses. After he took his seat on the platform in front of the Capitol, and a short prayer had been offered, he read a very neat little speech, not making many promises, but hoping, by God's help, to be able to fulfill all expectations. He took the oath amidst the deepest silence; and when he raised his hand and his eyes to heaven, and said, 'So help me God!' I think I never saw any scene so solemn and impressive. He puts me much in mind of General Jackson in appearance and character, though he is much more of a gentleman in his manners than the old General ever wished to be. He had a reception last night, which I attended. I walked about and exchanged greetings with my friends, but would not shake hands with the President, for I thought I would not be recognized to-day, and so would rather wait for a more private introduction. The Vice-President is a constant visitor at the house where I stay; he is very slight and delicate-looking, has more the appearance of a dead man than a living one, until he begins to speak, when you forget entirely how ugly he is."

President Davis, at latest accounts, is traveling through his dominions. He has been to Charleston

GENERAL DAVID E. TWIGGS, LATE OF THE UNITED STATES ARMY.

THE SALLY-PORT AND FRONT VIEW OF FORT PICKENS.

WE publish herewith, from a sketch kindly sent us by an officer of Lieutenant Slemmer's command at Fort Pickens, Florida, a view of the front of that work, on the Pensacola side. The gate or Sally-port, seen in the centre, is the only one in the fort. On the left is seen the crest or upper portion of the glacis, terminated by a gallery whose loopholes are seen over the knoll on the left of the walk.

GENERAL TWIGGS.

WE publish herewith a portrait of General Twiggs, who has lately left the army of the United States and joined that of Georgia, surrendering to the secessionists some $1,300,000 worth of property intrusted to his safe keeping by the United States Government.

General David E. Twiggs was born in Richmond County, Georgia, in 1790. His father, General John Twiggs, served in Georgia during the Revolutionary war. In 1812, when the war with England broke out, the son, then twenty-two years of age, volunteered, and was appointed a captain in the Eighth Infantry on the 8th of March, 1812. Promoted to the rank of Major, he accompanied Generals Gaines and Jackson in their expeditions against the Spaniards and Indians of Florida.

He took part in the Black Hawk war, and when South Carolina threatened to involve herself in difficulty with the National Government in 1832, he was placed in command of the arsenal at Augusta, Georgia, at the instigation of President Jackson. On the 8th of June, 1836, he received a commission as Colonel of the Second Regiment of Dragoons.

The Second Dragoons formed a portion of the "Army of Occupation" commanded by General Taylor, and when that officer moved upon the Rio Grande, Colonel Twiggs, in command of the advanced-guard, seized upon Point Isabel.

For gallant conduct at Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma, he received the rank of Brevet Brigadier-General; and at Monterey had command of a division of the army. He remained in charge of Monterey until ordered to join Scott at Vera Cruz, which he did in time to join in the attack upon that city. At Cerro Gordo General Scott gave him command of the main attack. He subsequently served at Contreras, Cherubusco, Chapultepec, and the final contest at the gates of the Aztec capital.

After the peace he assumed the command of "the Department of the West," with head-quarters at St. Louis, where he remained until 1857, when he was ordered to command the "Department of Texas," with head-quarters at San Antonio.

A couple of years since General Twiggs was arraigned by order of Secretary Floyd on a charge of having transcended his duty, and was tried by court-martial. He was, however, acquitted, and his sword was returned to him by the President.

At the time General Twiggs abandoned the service of the United States, he was, next to General Scott, the senior officer in the army, and might, in the event of the death of the Lieutenant-General, have succeeded to the command. It is presumed now that his name will be stricken from the rolls of the army.

FRONT VIEW OF FORT PICKENS, PENSACOLA, SHOWING THE SALLY-PORT AND GLACIS.—[DRAWN BY AN OFFICER OF LIEUTENANT SLEMMER'S COMMAND.]

INAUGURATION OF PRESIDENT JEFFERSON DAVIS OF THE SOUTHERN CONFEDERACY, AT MONTGOMERY, ALABAMA, FEBRUARY 18, 1861.

A DAY'S RIDE:
A LIFE'S ROMANCE.

By CHARLES LEVER.

AUTHOR OF "CHARLES O'MALLEY," "HARRY LORREQUER," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XL.

BENUMBED, bedraggled, and bewildered, I entered Feldkirch late at night, my wrists cut with the cords, my clothes torn by frequent falls, my limbs aching with bruises, and my wet rags chafing my skin. No wonder was it that I was at once consigned from the charge of a jailer to the care of a doctor, and on the day broke I was in a raging fever.

I would not if I could preserve any memory of that gracious interval. Happily for me no clear traces remain on my mind—pangs of suffering are so mingled with little details of the locality, faces, words, fragments of songs of a wandering intellect, long hours of silent brooding, sound of church bells and such other tokens as cross the lives of busy men in the daily walk of life. All came and went within my brain, and still I lay there in fever.

In my rare return of consciousness I perceived I was the sole occupant of a long arched gallery, with a number of beds arranged along each side of it. In their uniform simplicity, and the severe air of the few articles of furniture, my old experiences at once recalled the hospital; not that I arrived at this conclusion without much labor and a considerable mental effort. It was a short journey, to be sure, but I was walking with swollen ankles. It was, however, a great joy and a great triumph to me to accomplish even this much. It was the recognition to myself that I was once more on the road to health, and again to feel the sympathies that make a brotherhood of this life of ours; and so happy was I with the prospect, that when I went to sleep at night my last thought was of the pleasure that morning was sure to bring me. And I was not disappointed; the next day, and the next, and several more that followed, were all passed in a calm and tranquil enjoyment. Looking back upon this period, I have often been disposed to imagine that the very life we lie in the convalescence that follows some severe illness, with no demands upon our bodily strength, no call made upon our mental energies, the very activity of digestion not evoked, as our nourishment is of the simplest and lightest, our brain must of necessity exercise its functions more freely, untrammelled by passing cares or the worries incident to daily life, and that at such times our intellect has probably a more uncontested action than at any other period of our existence. I do not want to pursue my theory, or endeavor to sustain it—my reader has been enough to indoze him to give his experience to my own, or reject the notion altogether.

I lay there, not impatiently, for above a fortnight. I regained strength very slowly; the least effort or exertion was sure to overcome me. But I watched for every sign as I lay there, gazing for whole days long at a great cost of arms over the end of the gallery, where a huge double-headed eagle seemed to me screaming in the agony of strangulation, but yet never to be choked outright, I raveled in many a strange rambling air with the fate of the land of which it was the emblem and the shield. Doubtless some remnant of my passionate assault on Austria lingered in my brain, and gave this turn to its operations.

My nurse was one of that sisterhood whose charities call down many a blessing on the Church that organizes their benevolence. She was what is called a "grave Schwester;" and of a truth she seemed the incarnation of grayness. It was not her dress alone, but her face and hands, her noiseless gait, her undemonstrative stare, her half-husky whisper, and her monotonous voice had all a sort of low-toned grayness that enveloped her, just as a cloud-mist wraps a landscape. There was besides a kind of fog-like indistinctness in the way she transfered words that seemed to form a fitting atmosphere for drowsy uniformity of the sick-room.

Her first care, on my recovery, was to supply me with a number of little religious books—lives of saints and martyrs, accounts of miracles, and narratives of holy pilgrimages—and I devoured them with all the zest of a devotee. They seemed to supply the very aliment of mind craved for, and the good soul little suspected how much more she was ministering to a love for the marvelous than to a spirit of piety. In the Flowers of St. Francis, for instance, I found an adventure seeker after my own heart. To be sure, his search was after sinners in need of a helping hand to rescue them, but as his contests with Satan were described as stand-up encounters, with very hard knocks on each side, they were just as exciting combats to mend of as any I had ever perused in stories of chivalry.

Mistaking my zest for these readings for something far more praiseworthy, the gray sister enjoined me very seriously to turn from the evil advisers I had formerly consorted with, and frequent the society of better-minded and wiser men. Out of these counsels, dark and dim at first, but gradually growing clearer, I learned that I was regarded as a member of some terrible secret society, banded together for the direst and blackest of objects; the subversion of thrones, overthrow of dynasties, and assassinations of sovereigns being all labors of love to us. She had a full catalogue of my colleagues, from Sand, who killed Kotzebue, to Orsini and seemed thoroughly persuaded that I was a very advanced member of the order. It was some time, a long time, and with great address on my part, that I obtained these revelations from her, and she owned that nothing had so unmeaning for her but intuities had influenced me would ever have induced her to make these avowals. As my convalescence progressed, and I was able to sit up for an hour or so in the day, she told me that I might very soon expect a visit from the Staats Procurator, a kind of district attorney-general, to examine me. So little able was I to carry my mind back to the by-gone events of my life, that I heard this as a sort of vague hope that the inquiry would strike out some clew by which I could connect myself with the past, for I was sorely puzzled to learn what and who I had been before I came there. Was I a prosecutor or was I a prisoner? Never was a knotty point more patiently investigated, but, alas! most fruitlessly. The intense interest of the inquiry, however, served totally to withdraw me from my previous readings, and the gray sister was shocked to see that for a day or two together my days long unchanged. She took courage at length to address me on the subject, and even went so far as to ask me if Satan had not of late taken occasional opportunity of her absence to some and sit beside my bed? I eagerly caught at the suggestion, and told it were all too simple a ed; that, in fact, he never gave me a moment's peace, now torturing me with menaces, now asking for explanations of how this event or that existed with that, and why such a thing should not have prevented such another?

Instead of my confessor's astonishment at my confession, she appeared to regard it as one of the most ordinary incidents, and referred me to the books, and especially to St. Francis, to see that these were usual and everyday means by us. She went further, and in her zeal actually gave me a touch of contempt for the evil one in his intellectual resources, that startled me; seeing how St. Jude always got the better of him, and that he was a mere child when opposed by the arch of St. Ignatius Loyola.

"It is the truth," said she, "always conquers him. Whenever, by any chance, he can catch the conceiving of error, either by the under reasons that are inconsistent, or affecting intentions that you had not, then he is your master."

There was such an air of matter of fact about all she said, that when—our first conversation on this theme—I was startled to see the sneering bow

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. V.—No. 220.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 16, 1861. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1861, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE INAUGURAL PROCESSION AT WASHINGTON PASSING THE GATE OF THE CAPITOL GROUNDS.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.—[SEE PAGE 165.]

☞ OFFICERS in the ARMY and NAVY serving in the SOUTH are respectfully informed that the proprietors of Harper's Weekly will be glad to receive sketches of FORTS and SCENES OF INTEREST at the present crisis, and to pay liberally for such as they may use. Any OFFICER in either service can obtain the Weekly gratuitously for six months by sending his address to this office.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MARCH 16, 1861.

TWO NIGHTS IN THE SENATE.

[EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.]

I SPENT the evening of Saturday, March 2, and the night intervening between March 2 and 4 in the Reporters' gallery of the Senate of the United States. The Senate adjourned at 1 A.M. on Sunday morning 3d, to meet again at 7 P.M. on the same day, and sat continuously till 4 A.M. on Monday morning, March 4. The business before it was the following Resolution, which had previously passed the House of Representatives by a two-thirds vote:

"That no amendment shall be made to the Constitution which will authorize or give Congress power to abolish or interfere within any State with the domestic institutions thereof, including that of persons held to labor or servitude by the laws of said State."

It had been for some time evident that the Senate would not adopt, even by a majority, the Crittenden Resolutions, or the Resolutions of the Peace Congress, or the Clark Resolutions, or Senator Doolittle's Resolution denying the right of secession. It was obvious, on Friday, March 1, that the utmost that could be extorted from Senators was the passage of the resolution above given. Even that was doubtful. Very few Senators were willing to place themselves on the record as affirming the right of Congress to interfere with slavery in the States. But at least three-fourths of the Senate were anxious to see it defeated—the Republicans because it smacked of compromise, the Southern secessionists because it showed a tendency to strengthen the Union sentiment in their States. These Senators, marshaled by SUMNER of Massachusetts on the one side, and by BIGLER of Virginia on the other, sought to defeat a vote by proposing a multiplicity of amendments, and consuming time by debate and divisions by ayes and noes.

Against this combination of Republicans and Secessionists stood Senator STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS, of Illinois. I don't think he had any genuine supporters in the Senate, with the exception of Senators Crittenden, Bigler, and Johnson of Tennessee. But he entered the lists on Saturday morning with the air of a man who is going to fight in earnest. And even in such bodies as the United States Senate pluck is apt to tell.

After a skirmish with SUMNER, in which the Massachusetts Senator had rather the best of the fight, the second reading passed, by 30 to 8. Its further progress was then arrested for a few hours' speech, delivered, if not composed, by General JO. LANE, of Oregon. When I think of that speech, and when I remember that General Lane was at one time a probable candidate for the Presidency, I can not find words to express my thanks to Divine Providence for our escape. Certainly, the speech had its advantage. It gave a rest to the wearied reporters for the press, and enabled Senators to write their letters undisturbed. When it was done, ANDREW JOHNSON, of Tennessee, rose to reply. Mr. Johnson is a self-made man. In his youth he was a tailor's apprentice, and he learned his letters from his wife. He is a natural orator, and as clever a man as lives. The author of General Lane's speech attacked, with sarcasm and sneer, the Homestead Bill with which Senator JOHNSON's name is connected. Johnson's reply was one of the most eloquent bursts ever heard in the Senate. I remember, he said in substance, when, after years of painful struggles, with the young wife I had brought from my native place in North Carolina, and the little family which in her arms I gave around us, I was enabled to purchase a small plot of ground in Tennessee and build a cabin upon it which I could call my own. And when, long years ago, I made up my mind that, if ever I had the power, every poor man, struggling as I was, should be enabled to obtain a home—should have one spot of earth, however small, one cabin, however rude and scanty, which, in the light of heaven and the face of man, he should be able to call his own.

An ominous hustle in the galleries followed this outburst, but subsided on a growl from Senator Mason. Senator Johnson continued, laying stripe after stripe scientifically on Mr. Lane's back for General Lane, and finally closing with a magnificent eulogium on the Union. On this the pent-up feelings of the spectators could no longer be restrained. A tremendous cheer arose. Senator Mason instantly moved that the galleries be cleared. A few of these were heard—but a stentorian voice shouted, "THREE CHEERS FOR THE UNION!" They were given with a will. Not only did the men's gallery shout, but the ladies screamed and waved their handkerchiefs. Never since the first meeting of the Senate did that body endure such an insult. For some moments the din was overpowering.

"The sergeant-at-arms will clear the galleries!" commanded the Chair, fiercely.

It was easier said than done. There were at least fifteen hundred excited men in the galleries. For some moments it was a question whether the Senate would clear the galleries, or the galleries the Senate. Senator TURVEYDROP, as the respected Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations is called by those who know and love him best, nearly fainted. Senator KENNEDY spluttered even more than usual. Senator DOUGLAS roared at the sergeant-at-arms. That functionary called the Capitol Police to his aid, and went forth to do or die. Happily, after the third cheese, the turbulent denizens of the galleries, obedient to American instincts, obeyed the command of the Senate, and retired sullenly. The doors were locked, and Senators were appeased.

Night had fallen, and the Senate, after some opposition from Senator MASON, resumed the debate on the Resolution. Senator PUGH moved to strike out the words "authorized by," on the ground that they were bad grammar.

I am enough of a grammarian to perceive by Senator Pugh's speech that he is himself no friend to Lindley Murray. Whether his amendment would have improved the grammar of the Resolution I really know the little to say. Mr. PUGH is the youngest member of the Senate in more senses than one. He has an invincible tendency to get upon his legs—which are short of their kind, like those of Mr. Douglas. But if his legs be short, his tongue is long. He generally speaks whenever the President will let him. Not that he has any thing to say. He seldom has. Perhaps the most useful office he ever performed in the Senate was to send extracts from Mr. Douglas's speech to the great speech on the Lecompton question. On this occasion words of sense proceeded from his mouth, and Senators listened. His amendment was therefore turned his head, and he has talked constantly ever since. On Saturday night he very nearly killed the Resolution with his amendment. But as the amendment been adopted the Resolution must have gone back to the House, which had adjourned to Monday at 12 A.M., and it could not have passed. Out of the members present, 19 voted for it, and VICE-PRESIDENT BRECKINRIDGE—an opponent of all settlements—giving a casting vote in the affirmative, the amendment was defeated.

Then DOUGLAS rose, and in his deep, bass voice, eloquently appealed to the Senate to reconsider the vote. CRITTENDEN, of Kentucky, BIGLER, of Virginia, and JOHNSON, of North Carolina—once a strong Douglas man, now, poor fellow! a secessionist in a Union State—followed in the same strain. Some of the reconsideration was carried, amidst gnashings of teeth by the extreme Republicans and Secessionists; and, in the end, Pugh's amendment was defeated. Senator PUGH then moved the Crittenden Resolutions as a second amendment. This motion was also defeated, and so pass. But the design was, as I stated above, to defeat action on the main resolution.

Senator WILKINSON, of Minnesota, got the floor, and proceeded to flagellate the Secessionists and the South generally. He was followed, in the same strain, by Senator CHANDLER, of Michigan. They were virulent, severe, and bitter. Both denied the right of secession, and railed angrily at the seizure of Government property at the South by the Secessionists. Both were for the forcible maintenance of the Union. Both were answered by WIGFALL, of Texas.

A Fresh gentleman, of large public experience, who heard this debate, remarked that Wilkinson and Chandler were fair types of Northern, while Wigfall was a fair type of Southern, eloquence. Without going so far as this, one must admit that there are superficial grounds for the assertion. Western men, as a class, are fluent and impetuous; they are nearly all alike—are very unpleasant orators to listen to. Their language is not well chosen, and their delivery is rapid. Instead of trying to address out-door audiences, they never overcome the habit of bawling; their tones alternate between a coarse and a shrill key—both equally abominable. When they become excited, the hearer's anxiety for the safety of their blood-vessels absorbs every other feeling. Of the men sitt ere in the Senate, Messrs. Lane and Jefferson and William H. Seward speak in ordinary tones, yet are heard throughout the Senate Chamber. But these Western men, as a class, are fluent in addressing some one who is three miles off. They appear to consider themselves oratorical Columbiads, warranted not to burst. Eastern men, after years per, too, is generally ill-digested. They take an hour to say what could be better said in ten minutes. Southern men are fluent, and have good memory, and they repeat themselves endlessly. On a prairie, with an audience scattered over several miles of country, they are perhaps the right men in the right place; in the United States Senate they are so faulty in respect of gesture, tone, delivery, and arrangement of matter, that even when they are right they seem wrong.

Senator WIGFALL, of Texas, is the exact opposite of these speakers. He is a finished orator—probably the most finished now in the Senate. His voice is clear, melodious, and sufficiently powerful to be heard every where. He speaks grammatically, elegantly, and with ease. He is a debater, too. He never screams. His delivery is perfect, and his action suitable. When to these merits I add that he is a handsome man, I have said every thing that can be said in his favor. For he has the misfortune of being almost always illogical, inaccurate, and utterly unfair. He is a duelist, and carries his life in his hand. When he was a young man he went to practice law in Ashmore's district, in his native State, Alabama. Ashmore wrote articles for the county paper, and made enemies. One of them challenged him. They fought, and Wigfall winged his foe. He was arrested for the cudgels, and was winged likewise. The leading men of the county notified the young stranger that he did not suit their temper, and must go. Wigfall replied that he preferred to stay. "I will shoot a regiment of you," he said, "but I won't go." He shot eight altogether, I believe, including the brother of the late Preston S. Brooks, who shot him too; the two belligerents lay seven or eight weeks side by side, on their beds, in a tavern, on an island in the Mississippi. At the end of the war was, that Brooks died, and Wigfall, notwithstanding his bravado, left the State, and migrated to Texas.

His reply to Wilkinson and Chandler was extremely smart. Mr. Chandler had abused Governor Floyd as a coward and a scoundrel. Wigfall twitted him with offering insults for which he would not respond in the field. "I will make a bargain with the Senator," he said. "I will not write a letter to Governor Floyd saying, 'Governor Floyd, you are a scoundrel, and I am a gentleman. He shall—— I mean, Mr. Chandler—sir, I beg pardon, 'Zachariah Chandler,' I will covenant that Governor Floyd's friends shall pay the whole amount which he is locked of stealing from the United States Treasury." The Northern troops had just arrived, and the gallery was full of Northern spectators. Waving his hand gracefully to them, Wigfall continued: "The difficulty between you and us, gentlemen, is, that you will not send the right sort of people here. Why will you not send either Christians or gentlemen? Either people who will not insult us with gross words, or people who will admit their personal responsibility for their language?" Chandler had said that he wanted to see whether we had a government; that if we had none he would leave the country; he would go to some country where they had one; he would go and live among the Comanches. Wigfall replied: "The Senator says that under certain conditions he will go and live among the Comanches. God forbid! The Comanches have already suffered much—too much—from contact with the white race. They will not reperate even overwhelmed his Northern opponents, even in the opinion of Northern hearers; though, on the main questions at issue, they were, as was obviously wrong and they were right. So much for a good delivery and well-chosen language.

An hour or more after midnight the Senate adjourned to meet on Sunday evening. When it met, Senator CRITTENDEN had the floor, and delivered a three hours' speech in favor of compromise. Senator CRITTENDEN is a gentleman, a scholar, a good man. He is pure, honest, and patriotic. He has served his country many years with credit. His Walk and Talk are Christian. When LINCOLN was elected, Crittenden, like a good citizen, was for unconditional submission. But Breckinridge and others, who were old men, and let themselves be guiled him to father the resolutions which they had contrived. In an evil moment he yielded, and has ever since regretted it both with words and with deeds. The Secessionists had to sit up with him at night to prevent his denouncing the "Crittenden Compromise" as a fraud. When the vote was taken, on Sunday, he voted against it. His speech was patriotic; but it was very long. Senators on both sides listened with respectful attention; but for all practical purposes the speech might as well have not been delivered.

When he had concluded, filibustering was renewed. Senator MASON declared that the resolution was a placebo, a sort of "bread-pill," such as doctors give to patients who are imaginary invalids. Senator BIGLER declared that the South was not what it was, in fact, an imaginary invalid, and needed precisely such a bread-pill. It was dangerous ground. The Republicans laughed at the "bread-pill" of the admission of the Senator from Illinois, and he was forced to qualify it by adding that, in his opinion, some Republicans did not desire to interfere with slavery in the States. This riding of two horses, you see, has its inconveniences. But Douglas has so much pluck that he will never hurt him.

An altercation between him and Mason arose. Douglas declared that he had overheard a conversation between Mason and Hunter on the subject of the defeat of the resolution by indirection. Mason sneered at people who repeated to the Senate "scraps of private conversation" which they overheard, and wound up in his inimitably insolent manner with the adage De quattuor, etc. Douglas fiercely retorted that he permitted no Senator to use terms of unparliamentary behavior. Mason took two steps hastily forward, and for an instant, the prospect looked warlike. But stopping midway after the first three moments, the haughty Senator from Virginia condescended to utter a half-apology. He was "hocked down."

Let me take this opportunity of saying that, with all his faults, Senator MASON is perhaps the nearest approach, in the present Senate, to the beau ideal of a Senator. He has no flowery, long speeches. What he has to say he says in good language, with a good manner, and in a parliamentary way. When he has done he sits down over the ground again, but sits down. This art of sitting down is the highest accomplishment of parliamentary science, and which our Northern men find it very difficult to acquire. Mr. Mason never rises needlessly, and never says foolish things. He speaks always to the point, never wearies. His knowledge of parliamentary tactics he is unrivaled. His defects are obvious. His manner and tone are unbearably insolent. He talks like a Pecksniff addressing menials. His every utterance is embittered by his Secessionist tendencies, which are not shared by the people of his State. He sees himself (optimizing over the full height of his political power to insignificant obscurity. He dies hard.

On the Republican side, speeches were made on Sunday evening and Monday morning by Senators TRUMBULL and WADE, and on the other side by Wigfall again. What I have said of Wilkinson and Chandler I said on Monday morning by Wade. The former was obviously bent on being heard in Georgetown. Neither had prepared their speeches beforehand. Republican reputations were in pleasant. "OLD BEN WADE," as his familiars call him, made some good points in opposition to Senator Douglas, who forgot his good manners in an attack upon him. But there was nothing new in either of the speeches. The calm dignity naturally expected in a Senatorial address, the true separation of principle and its logical application to current events, were wanting—or at all events were drowned in profuse verbiage.

The leader of the Senate, under the Republican régime, will be FESSENDEN, of Maine, the Chairman of the Committee on Finance. He seldom speaks. He is a tall, hard-faced man, with a gray chevelure round his bony intellectual forehead like the lawyers; cool as a mountain-top; and brave as lion. Next to him in influence, perhaps, may be ranked PRESTON KING, of New York. He, too, is rarely heard in the Senate. His voice is a shrill falsetto, which, coming from a man built like a rum-puncheon, sounds queer enough. But he is very sound in council, and perfectly brave. His temper is merry, and the normal condition of his face is a broad grin. CLARK, of New Hampshire, is a bold contrast to Mr. King, yet also a leader. He is a thin, tall man, of sallow complexion, with lantern jaws and black mustache. His voice is keen, his sentences crisp. When he speaks, it seems that a sharp knife is falling at the end of each period. SUMNER, of Massachusetts, Mr. Mason's successor as Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, acted, during the debate which I witnessed, as whipper in. He watched warily, and was ever ready to avail himself of all Parliamentary expedients to defeat the resolution. His voice is very deep, and his elocution admirable. Weight he has little, as he is known to be an abolitionist; and though he is probably the most learned man in the Senate, he is not an efficient Senator or debater. Probably the most efficient Republican Senator in debate will be found to be WILKINSON, of Minnesota. His peculiar merits are, first, that he speaks clearly, sensibly, and quietly; and, secondly, that he knows how and when to sit down. He is a thorough field of arts —the art of sitting down—he seems to have mastered. This probably a natural gift. At any rate he possesses it, and consequently he is always heard with attention.

Hour after hour had slipped away; it was six o'clock in the morning; and no vote had been taken on the Resolution. In six hours more the question was to take place. Senators began to look jaded. Half of them were asleep on the sofas, and some in the floor of the house. The galleries had out. Repeated motions for a recess were made.

But DOUGLAS, with bull dog tenacity, stuck to his point. At the mere mention of the word, he rose, his "I object, Mr. President," rose clearly above the din. His patience was beyond all praise. Not a sign of impatience escaped him. And by the most wearisome of the long speeches we ha consumed the precious hours of the waning sese an. But the instant the four was reached he pressed his point. To personal attacks, and they were many, his sole reply was—Let us vote. And so at last, half an hour or more before daylight, the ayes and noes were called for, and the Resolution passed by 24 to 12—just the necessary two-thirds.

It leaves a very Border feeling on one remember that the credit is due to STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS, of Illinois.

THE LOVAGER.

THE 4TH.

EVERY four years the earth of two months in the twelve is a very busy day in this country—the Fourth of March and the Fourth of July. The one is the yearly anniversary of our national origin, the other the quadrennial ceremony of our national renewal. This year it was peculiarly interesting, because of the unusual excitement in the country. Fortunately for our national peace and the character of our civilization, there was no trouble of any kind during the usual ceremonies. The sixteenth President of the United States was inaugurated under a soft sky and in the peaceful presence of thousands of his fellow-citizens. While he stood silently and modestly, his address, the words were speeding all over the land as they fell from his mouth. Along the telegraphic nerves they thrilled into the hearts of millions, and there is no that no words have ever been uttered in the world upon which hung more minds anxiously attentive than upon these.

I was curious to watch the scene in New York. From noon, the hour at which it was understood that the ceremony would begin, to the time when it was over, I noted with the consciousness that the great fundamental crisis through which our system passes every four years had arrived, and the whole Government was changing hands. It was the more momentous because not only the officers but the policy of the Government was also changing. And still more solemn because for the present not fact to which not even a Lounger could be blind and deaf, that there was such serious difficulty lying at the very threshold of the new Administration.

Yet people's faces were singularly cheerful. Any thing positive is very satisfactory. "Let us know the worst," is the instinctive wish of every man in the uncertainty of a great crisis. Any thing is preferable to widening and deepening doubt in imbecility. The condition of the prisoners in the French jails in '93, when they wondered from dawn till dark, and from dark to dawn, what they were going to be guillotined or not, was a hundred-fold more pitiable than that of those who were summoned to the axe. Upon the whole, Mr. Lincoln's face was probably the most uncomfortable person in history.

The throngs at the newspaper offices were more earnest than any crowds lately seen. They were perfectly good-humored, but the squeezing was suffocating. When a few sheets came up from the press the universal Hi! hi! of the boys within announced to the jammed candidates outside that there was a prize for somebody. Many an eager gentleman dashed gallantly into the stream, and after moving with the solid current a few steps, was caught and held fast for a quarter of an hour, perfectly motionless, and then struggled and strained, and with much cost of tumbled linen and ruffled broadcloth, emerged again into the street newspapers as he went in.

Then, when he was lucky enough, after patient waiting, to get a copy of the address, he leaned up against some friendly door, or, post, or corner, and rapidly scanned the words which were even then scarcely spoken. Of course he interpreted it according to his feelings, his apprehensions, his doubts, his wishes. There was never word spoken by human lips that was not susceptible of many interpretations. The color of the reflector determines the hue of the reflection.

And so our sixteenth President is inaugurated, and our seventy-fourth national year under the Constitution begins. God save the United States of America!

A LAY SERMON.

"My dear Henrietta," said Theologicus the other day, as they were quietly lounging down Broadway, "why does modern literature make so much fun of the clergy? You may take any six of the best modern novels, and you shall find plenty of sly digs at the cloth. It seems to me very unfair and unkind. Think, now, of Dickens's Chadband and Stiggins—of Thackeray's Lemuel Whey and Charles Honeyman—of Anthony Trollope's clerical society about the close of Barchester. What pictures they are! What do you think of it?"

"My dear Theologicus," replied Henrietta, "I think that where there is so much smoke there must be a good deal of fire. But you must not make the foolish mistake of supposing that satirical stings are body but the guilty. If you hold your hand to the fire, it is the burned part that suffers. So when you insist upon seeing all that is said of cassock, you must look at both sides. Certainly, Charles Kingsley is just to his own profession, and Tom Hughes is sympathizes with the clergy; and his ladies, almost without exception, are generous to the clerical calling. Kingsley and his friends do not take the ground that an invincible dyspepsia is proof of sound Christianity, nor do they hold that shabby muscles are identical with robust religion.

"No, Theologicus; half of modern literature is that hearty men don't like valetudinarians and whining sentimentalists. And why should they? What is more unlike muscular Christianity is simple the protest of men of positive manhood and heroic tendencies against debility in body and mind as evidence of spirituality. Come, come, say the muscular Christians, it doesn't follow that, because a man honestly tries to do his duty, he must be round-shouldered and narrow-breasted, and whoever with asthma, and cough with consumption, and go about the world so like the chief mourner at a funeral that you might justly suppose that the thing that ever happened was the Christian dispensation. Come, come, don't suppose that Christianity teaches that a man is fit for heaven because he is unfit for the earth. Sound lungs and liver—a deep chest voice—a ringing laugh—a smile like a sunrise—an arm like a crow-bar—a hand like a vice—a breast like a trumpet—these are not inconsistent with the truest religion. Disease is no more Christianity than anarchy is democracy. A brisk gallop every day in the wild alleys of the banks of the Connecticut—an hour every morning at woodsawing—a little more breathing the fresh air of heaven instead of the fumes of the study—actual and not theoretic familiarity with all the sweet and sour of human life around him, would have given good old Doctor Jonathan Edwards much more cheerful views of human life and destiny.

"No, Theologicus, no; Christianity is not a solemn black fir grove, so far north that the air is always cold and damp, but a spacious, sunny, and fruit unknown. It is a grove in the softest climate—a celestial tropic, full of music and sweetness, with fresh and pure breezes blowing over, and fruit—where sharp winds are tempered, hot sunshine mellowed, and life is a year-long festival."

"Why, Henrietta, you should have been a preacher—"

"Yes; but am I not? I preach as I walk with you in Broadway. I am an itinerant, you know."

OVER THE RIVER.

PROBABLY there is not a locality in the country who, as he crosses the Hudson River at Albany, has not wondered how soon the ordinary decencies of civilization will insist upon a bridge there to connect that a bridge will be built. In the wildest, bitterest winter the ferry-boat may arrive there at midnight, and be forced out upon the river in an open sleigh, or earlier and later in the season, and be put to his penurious way along boards and sticks, thanking divine Providence if he escape without a ducking. Not long since, when the passengers by a train were crossing there, the plank which bridged a gulf of uncertainty between two pieces of ice was too heavily crowded, and one began to sink in the river; but by a timely cry of warning and a rapid retreat the loss of life was avoided. This was the process of crossing at the most important point upon the great Western route from New York—the point of union of the New York Central and the Hudson River Railroad.

So on the night when the river broke up at Albany this winter, the stream of travel from the East and South and West reached the opposite shores. There was no possible crossing, and the whole crowd was driven to Troy, which overflowed with disappointed passengers. Yet there is not another railroad line in the land upon which travelers could be so annoyed.

As the matter now stands, the Lounger, who has experience, advises all "through" travelers to go and come by the way of Troy. You can keep your seat quietly in the front car from Chambers Street to Troy, and there, in a spacious and comfortable station, step across from one train to another, and push on without the slightest discomfort. There is nothing gained by crossing the river at Albany, except a general derangement. You scramble from the Hudson River cars to the ferry-boat. There you wait in the cold. Then you slide across to the city if you are not nipped in the ice. There you scramble into the Central R. R. yard, and rush for a seat in the cars already occupied. Then, after dueldlay, you roll out of town, and when you reach Schenectady you see the rosy faces of content belonging to your late fellow-passengers, who have come comfortably round by Troy, and who resume their connection with you at this point. The inconvenience of the Troy route is, that you must change cars both at Troy and Schenectady; but that is of slight importance compared with the river crossing.

Let the traveler, however, who is disposed to try the Trojan route, be sure that the train from the West or from New York connects at Troy. For he will understand that the two sisters who sit at the head of the river do not dwell together in perfect amity. He may, perchance, hear that Troy will under no circumstances cease to protest against the bridge at Albany. And he can not settle that question. But he may determine his route; and wanting the bridge, he will be a wise man if he passes through Troy.

THIS AND THAT.

"DEAR MR. LOUNGER,—Isn't it rather hard that one man should work hard every day of the year for a tolerable pittance, and another man, by a slight and brief exertion, gets perhaps in a week all that it costs the first to pay for a year? Answer me, Inquirer."

This is a question which perplexes a great many people: but really it is not so hard. Is it hard that some people are born beautiful, or with gracious and winning ways; that some are eloquent, and some dull; that some have genius and talent, and others none? Must there not be coals and geraniums, artificial and natural, and vulgivers, to make a pleasant world? As long as there are degrees of excellence and attraction, so long there must be the shades of disparity of employ. You may ask, indeed, why every body is not perfectly beautiful, perfectly well, and perfectly happy; but those are questions which you will not expect a serious answer. Yet, are you quite sure that your own question does not conceal the same kind of absurdity?

For instance, how many careful, conscientious, generous women work patiently in their vocation as actresses. It is a hard life and girt with risks. But there is one enormous reward—the love of Woman—not less careful, conscientious, and generous than any; but while the others toil and moil and have a desperate fight for it, Miss Cushman may make a tolerable fortune every year. Is it her fault? No. Is it the fault of the others? No. Is there any reason why the fault should be found by the others to earn the same reward that she earns? No. Where, then, is the difficulty? There is no difficulty. You can go and do likewise if you see one and pay for it that you have to see and reward the other. Tommy Tinker may be as pious and good a man as Gregory Nazianzen, and have twice as large a family; but you will willingly walk two miles and give a shilling to hear Whitefield speak, while you will not go across the street or give a groat to hear Tommy. Whitefield was clearly in the good men, both talking men, both men who live by bread and meat; but the words of the one drop dead into your mind, while the words of the other, those of the other kindle, inspire, enchant you into a rarer sense of life and a holier resolution of conduct. That is the gift of genius, the gift of tears of Sharon. They are both made by the same good Father—they are both parts of his perfect creation; but both have his gift, and the reward on earth is the instinct in you which finds the rose lovelier and sweeter than the weed.

If you look at the matter as precisely the counterpart of each other, it is strange that Adam should be paid five hundred dollars for talking an hour or two, while the clergyman gets only a hundred dollars for a whole year's talking. Mechanically, the talking of the two is the same thing, but spiritually it is precisely opposite. They are not paid according to the equal time and talk, but according to the spiritual food they furnish; and of that the public mind can be the only judge.

MELTING ICE.

BEFORE these lines can be printed the month of storms may have justified its name; but it began so softly that the whole continent seemed to have drifted away from winter. The change in the way came upon the most sudden and bewildering contrasts. In the beautiful Mohawk Valley, while the snow yet lay deep on the hills, lighting up the usual gloom of the woods, the May sun shone, and the tender haze of late October hung warm and dreamy among the pines. Huge congregations of crows chattered in the air and in the fields. And for and near that first happy song of spring, the trickling gurgle of melting snow, and eager brooks, poured out of the hill-sides, flowing across the roads, tumbling into the rivers, made the air musical, and filled the heart with that secret jubilee that rings like an inward echo to outer sounds of joy.

And the great river, which three weeks before had broken up with a roar and a crash that loaded the foolish buildings along the shore—foolish, because, although the river is sure to break loose and ravage the shore every year as it did this, and as it always does, yet the same buildings will forget it all, will be sure to plant themselves in the same spots; and because the ice-cream is delicious, and the plank ice-bridge floated away, and the ferry-boats began to ply as unconcerned as if ice were a dream of tropical posts.

But a little down the stream you could see the great scales of thin ice, occasionally broken with a lake of gleaming water, but generally water-logged and rotten. Great fissures like the crevasses upon a glacier, marked it across; out in the channel they widened, and as you came farther down the thin ice was almost wasted, and sunk gradually and slowly down the stream, many of them with queer freight of drift-wood, or remains of bridges, or a pile of ashes, or an old hat, or a broken stove.

Nothing seems so lazy and languid as the drifting ice sliding down the river. Yet if you stand upon some projecting point and watch it for an hour you will see that it has prodigious momentum. If the current set it toward a wharf or the shore, or upon a rock or a flat, it will grind and grind and crush; and large and small ice and the opposing pieces edgewise out of the river, piling itself over and over; breaking and pulverizing, and irresistibly advancing, with a great wedged mountain. There are three kinds of ice, as you soon see. First, the original deep-water, frozen pure at the beginning of the winter, and the last to go from the river. This is the lustrous, crystal, polar ice, which makes luster dazzle in July. Then there is the flat-ice, or the white ice, formed on the shallows; and last, the later, superficial ice, made up of snow and sleet and the elemental deposits upon the surface that the winter lies in forked. And spring advances, the constant friction of the stream below wears and wastes the crystal foundations, and then the water breaks through the upper surface, and makes the dirty, sodden, saturated ice, which falls a helpless prey in the collision with the diamond teeth of the fragments of early ice.

Over these wild, wandering, wasting acres you will see, at intervals, solitary men and boys pushing their way in boats, running the chance of a nip. They are fishermen, and their business is to pick up the estrays that are borne upon the ice. Sometimes they will find a prize of timber—sometimes they get a fish—sometimes a duck or gull—sometimes, too, they must be caught, rather than catch, and be lucky if their own boat does not become river-wood for the next generation.

At last you leave the ice region of the river behind. The birds that have been exiled since the cold began flock over you from the south, and the winds that blow from the equator. We are in the venturous placarons, and pluck a bird's sweet song from the drifting snow. That was a blue-bird. That a song-sparrow twittering in the thicket, where buds are swelling and glistening. And in the sheltered southern nooks of the Highlands, as if spring held them tenderly in his warm, open hand, a post dreams of "daffodils

That come before the swallow dares, and take
The winds of March with beauty: violets, dim,
But sweeter than the lids of June's eyes,
Or Cytherea's breath."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

On one occasion two or three friends of Hood came down for a day's shooting, and, as they often did, in the evening they moved out upon the lawn to the little lake in an old punt. They were full of spirits, and had played off one or two practical jokes on the host, which ended in getting out of the boat, leaving him last, one of them gave it a push, and the punt was launched on the water. Fortunately it was the landing-place, and the water was not deep, but he was not a swimmer. He got up to the edge, and took to venture on such tricks with him, and he quietly determined to take them in good humor. Presently, he pretended to complain of cramps and stitches, and then went in—before. His friends, nothing ashamed of their rough fun, pretended him to get out. He refused obstinately. And then groans and complaints increased so alarmingly that they were almost as much alarmed as he meant to do. My uncle had received a quiet hint, and was therefore not alarmed, but took his gift, and sat down to enjoy the various contortions of the repentant jokers. There was no doctor to be had in the village, so the groaning comedies were suggested and administered, my father shaking with laughter, while they thought him in pain. At last he got out, and came up with a tea-kettle of boiling water hanging on his arm. Another tea-kettle under a hot fire, and a third brought the mustard. My father at length, as well as he could speak, gave out, in a voice broken by fits of laughter, that he was dying, and detailed some most absurd directions for his burial, which they were to perform next to see the fun of. At last he could stand it no longer, and, after hearing for a few minutes their debates, forgive them for their unfortunate joke, and beseech him to believe in their remorse. Why, that was a perfect shout of laughing, which they thought at first was delirious agony, but which ultimately betrayed the joke.

EXTRACTS OF THE PRESS.—In Mr. Pycroft's "Ways and Words of Literary Letters" occurs a conversation with a printer: "Reality," said the printer, "gentlemen should not place much faith in the statements in the eyesight of our hard-worked and half-blinded reader of proofs; for I am sometimes so puzzled by the interpretation of a letter as to be indifferent whether it be a p or a b." "Indeed! and what was the unhappy line?" "Why, sir, I was intended to say, 'Let the pale martyr in a sheet,' instead of which we have, alas, my, 'See the pale martyr with his sheet on fire!'"

ECHOES.

What must be done to conduct a newspaper right?—Write.

What is necessary to a farmer to assist him?—System.

What would a sailor's ship be without any delights?—Light.

What is the best piece of counsel given by a justice of the peace?—Peace.

Who commits the greatest abominations?—Nations.

What is the greatest terrifier?—Fire.

"A story of a pulpit rebuke," says Dean Ramsay, "is traditionary in the East Neuk of Fife. An officer of a volunteer corps on the Lothian coast was very proud of his fresh uniform, had come to church, and walked about, looking for the best place. He had placed himself quietly on Mr. Shiera quietly remonstrating, 'Oh, man, will ye hearken to the sermon, and no see your braws when the kirk's done!'"

A SHARP TURN.—When asked how he got out of prison, a wag replied that he got out of an oil cell by ingenuity, ran up stairs with agility, crawled out of the back window in secrecy, slid down the lightning-rod with rapidity, walked out of the town with dignity, and am now basking in the sunshine of liberty!

"Father, I think you told a lie in the pulpit to-day." said a little son of a clergyman.

"Why, what do you mean?"

"Sir, you said you were very cool and I have done. Then you went on, and said a great many more words. The people expected you'd tell them the reverse you promised them. But you didn't, and kept on preaching a long while after the time was up."

Patrick MacGregan, with a wheelbarrow, ran a race with a locomotive. As the latter went out of sight, Mac observed, "Aff wid ye, ye rusty blaggard, or I'll be afther runnin' into ye!"

A gentleman was consoling a lady on the loss of her husband; but finding that she treated it with indifference, exclaimed, "Oh, very well, Madam, if that be the way you take it, I care no more about it than you do!"

WAVES ENDORSE.—A novelist tells of lovers who agree to wave their hands toward each other at a certain hour across the Atlantic Ocean. One might suppose there would be waves enough between them without trying to make any with their hands.

The mayor of a small village of France having occasion to give a passport to a distinguished personage in his neighborhood who was blind of an eye, was in great embarrassment in coming to the description of his person. Fertile of obeading the good man, he adopted the following happy expedient, by avoiding the mention of his deformity. He wrote, "black eyes, one of which is absent."

A respectable surgeon in London, making his daily round to see his patients, had occasion to call at a house at Charing Cross where he left his horse to the care of a boy, whom he usually employed to mind it. On coming out of the house he usually met with the same boy, and found servant ever trusting himself to a rider; but no—Monsieur Jehu was not to be caught by the value of money a little better—he was letting the horse to little boys in the street, a guinea a ride to the Horse Guards and back.

When George the Second got into a heat with his minister, and insisted on being shown the document relating to a certain subject the next morning, the minister obeyed; and when the King rose he saw three large wagons full of papers, neatly tied with red tapes, packed beneath the window.

"Come, don't be proud," said a couple of silly young gentlemen to a poor gentleman; "sit down and make yourselves our equals."

"We should have to blow our brains out to do that," replied one of them.

"The man who has raised a cabbage-head has done more good than all the metaphysicians in the world."

"How," replied the wag, "your another ought to have a premium."

The papers relate an anecdote of a beautiful young lady who had been married during breakfast, and after marriage. Whereupon Smoke wickedly observes that it is an unanswerable thing for people's eyes to be opened by matrimony.

Mr. Justice Page was renowned for his harshness and forcibly upon the bench. While going the circuit, a freehouse lawyer, by the name of Crowle, was asked by a waiter at dinner, "Will you have a roll?"

"I don't know," said Crowle, "but if he be, I am sure he never was a loaf before."

A country editor, speaking of a blind surveyor, says, "Although he can't see far, he can say."

A dog is counted mad when he won't "take something to drink," and a man insane when he takes too much. A bankrupt is respectable with a thousand pounds he don't belong to him, while a beggar becomes a criminal for purloining a piece of meat.

Lady Isabella Finch, daughter of the Earl of Winchelsea, was lady of the bedchamber to the Princess Amelia. Lord Bute, on presenting leaving an order, borrowed a halfcrown of her; he sent it next day, with a five-pound note in the room of it, and a crown. She replied that, though he could not give her a crown, he might give her a coronet, and she was very ready to accept it."

"Mother, I shouldn't be surprised if Susan gets choked some day."

"Why, my son?"

"Because when Wiggy twisted his arms round her neck the other night, and if she had not kissed to let him go, he would have choked her."

Lady Isabella Finch, daughter of the Earl of Winchelsea, was lady of the bedchamber to the Princess Amelia. Lord Bute, on presenting leaving an order, borrowed a halfcrown of her; he sent it next day, with a five-pound note in the room of it, and a crown. She replied that, though he could not give her a crown, he might give her a coronet, and she was very ready to accept it."

An attorney having died in poor circumstances, one of his friends observed that he had left but few effects. "Yes," said one, "he wondered at," said another, "for he had but few causes."

A tar, who had been boasting of the numerous foreign places he had visited, and of the bad ever seen Londiscans. "No," said Jack; "what cannot you shut in a letter?"

In a case which recently came before the Court of Queen's Bench, the following character was read:

"My ever dearest Mary,—I have received your Letter and Thine with all my thoughts are wholly with thee for believe me I have Long and Dearly Loved you for Loving thy-self. How would I give to clasp thee in my arms. But oh! how can I. Alas! I cannot. Imagine Thyself cold and solitary mountains Not one living thing is there to be seen save now I can see a large Sea Gull with its wild and Roaring Cry made me lift my eyes and Pause. (Laughter.) Oh! dearest Mary, what I wish but That I might be thee. I loften steal away to this Mountain to think on thee till to look on Your Heavenly Beauty. I have wandered through this wild and Solitary Glenn. To see the buty of nature round me to Admire the Grandeur Day Charming and to think of thee I start from my Seat and wisper a Prayer that we may Soon Meet Again Never Part. Oh none Can tell How misserible I Pass my days."

In all matters except a little matter of the tongue, a woman can generally hold her own.

Many complain that they are not appreciated properly simply because they are.

"Intemperance," said Mrs. Partington, solemnly, with a rich, emotion in her tone, "is like an after-dinner speech: it makes a man talk who has nothing to say." She smelt she had just brought from the box, down upon the bonnet. Then, with a violent sneeze, she went down to steamer part of the room. "Intemperance is a monster with a great many heads, and it is the ruin of scores of families like any castle or an alligator, and destroys its peace and happiness. But, thank heaven, a new brake has dawned upon the world, and soon the hydrenheaded monster will be annihilated." She knew that men will put enemies into their mouths to steal away their brains?

"Don't you regard taking snuff as a vice?" we asked, innocently.

"If it is," she replied, with the same old ornament, "it's so small a one that Providence won't take no notice of it; and besides, my old brother would take it if I didn't. An, kind old heart, it was a drunkard's argument!

"Your honor," said a lawyer to the judge, "every man who knows me knows that I am incapable of telling my self to a mean cause."

"Darn it," said his opponent; "the learned gentleman never lends himself to a mean cause; he always gets cash down."

A fellow of atrocious ugliness chanced to pick up a good looking glass on the road; but when he looked at it himself he flung it away in a rage, crying, "If you had been good for any thing you would not have been thrown away by your owner."

It would be hard to convince the magnetic needle that a lodestone isn't the most diverting thing in the world.

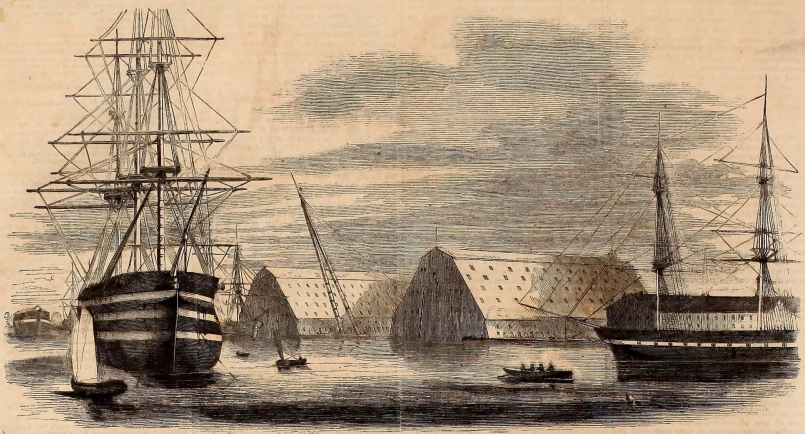
If a very rich old lady is dangerously ill, her dutiful relatives are generally anxious that age and disease entitle one to every possible attention.

"The times are hard, wife, and I find it difficult to keep my nose above water."

"You could easily keep your nose above water, husband, if you didn't keep it so often above brandy."

"Hast thou ever loved, Henrietta?" I sighed. "I should rather imagine I had," she replied. "Oh, did not my glances my feelings betray, when you helped me to pudding the third time to-day?"

"My dear Sir, you have used my half of our case of Champagne." "Oh, yes; you are my friend, and I always take your part."



THE NAVY-YARD AT NORFOLK, VIRGINIA.

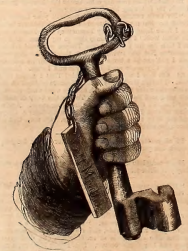
INTERIOR OF FORT SUMTER.

ONE of the officers of Major ANDERSON'S command in FORT SUMTER has kindly placed at our disposal some more sketches of the interior of that work, and we publish the accompanying engravings from them. They explain themselves, and we need say no more than refer to their titles.

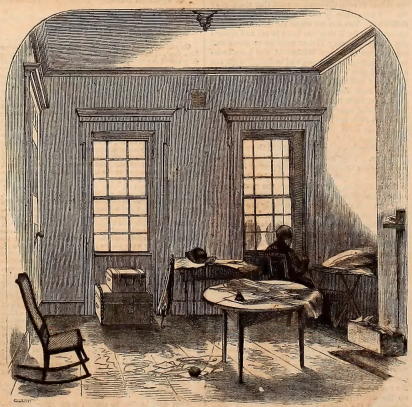
THE NORFOLK NAVY-YARD.

THE recent excitement in Virginia on the secession question renders the accompanying picture of the Norfolk Navy-yard appropriate at the present time. Viewed in conjunction with our recent pictures of Fort Monroe, it completes a series of pictures of Norfolk which is valuable and interesting.

The Norfolk Navy-yard is one of the best in the United States. It is provided with all the usual furniture of a navy-yard—ship-houses, store-houses, foundries, etc., and has, besides, a granite dock which cost a million of dollars. At this navy-yard is anchored, as receiving-ship, the old Pennsylvania, the largest line-of-battle ship in the world. She is shown in the fore-ground of our picture.



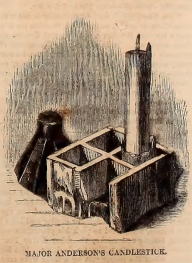
THE KEY OF THE FORT MOULTRIE MAGAZINE.—THE MAJOR'S SOUVENIR.



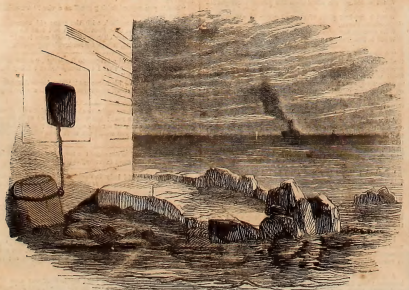
MAJOR ANDERSON'S QUARTERS AT FORT SUMTER.—[DRAWN BY AN OFFICER OF HIS COMMAND.]

THE UNITED STATES FRIGATE "SABINE" OFF FORT PICKENS.

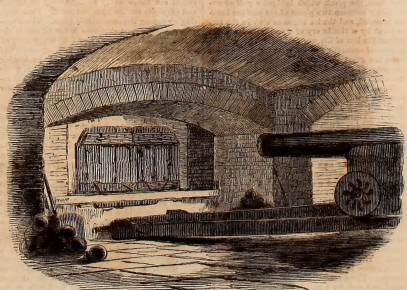
WE publish on page 165, from a sketch furnished us by a United States officer serving in Pensacola Harbor, a picture of the United States frigate Sabine, now lying off that harbor. The Sabine is an old vessel, built in the old style, but is still well considered by naval men. She was the flag-ship of the Paraguay expedition, and was at that time illustrated in our columns. She is now lying off Fort Pickens, so as to be ready to give aid to that fort in case it is attacked. Her commander is one of the most gallant officers in the Navy, and has expressed very fierce indignation at the treachery



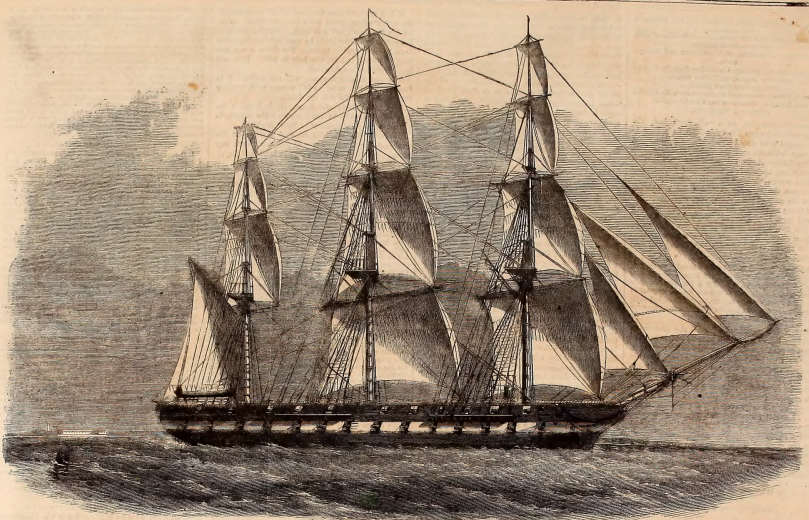
MAJOR ANDERSON'S CANDLESTICK.



AN EMBRASURE AT SUMTER—OUTSIDE.—[DRAWN BY AN OFFICER OF MAJOR ANDERSON'S COMMAND.]



AN EMBRASURE AT SUMTER—INSIDE.—[DRAWN BY AN OFFICER OF MAJOR ANDERSON'S COMMAND.]



THE UNITED STATES FRIGATE "SABINE," OFF FORT PICKENS.—[FROM A SKETCH BY A UNITED STATES OFFICER.]

of those officers who have resigned United States property into the hands of the Secessionists.

THE INAUGURATION.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN was duly inaugurated at Washington on 4th March. We devote a large portion of our space in this number to the illustration of this important event. On pages 168 and 169 will be found a large view of the INAUGURATION CEREMONY; on page 161 a picture of the INAUGURAL PROCESSION; and on this page an engraving depicting the ENTRANCE OF THE TWO PRESIDENTS INTO THE SENATE CHAMBER.

The procession began to form about nine o'clock on Pennsylvania Avenue. The centre of attraction was Willard's Hotel, where Mr. Lincoln was staying, and by 10 A.M. the Avenue at that point was blocked up. The day was fine and every body was in the street. Over twenty-five thousand strangers were in the city, many of whom had slept the night previous in the Capitol and in the streets—it being absolutely impossible to find rooms or beds any where.

According to custom, the Inaugural ceremonies should have begun at noon. But at that hour Mr. Buchanan was still in his chamber at the Capitol signing bills. It was not till ten minutes past twelve that he left the Capitol. He drove rapidly to the White House, entered an open barouche with servants in livery, and proceeded to Willard's. There the President-elect, and Senators Pearce and Baker of the Committee of Arrangements, entered the carriage, and a few minutes before one the procession began to move. The order of procession was as follows:

Aids. Marshal-in-Chief. Aids.

A National Flag with appropriate emblems.

The President of the United States, with the President-Elect and Suite, with Marshals on their left, and the Marshal of the United States for the District of Columbia (Colonel William Selden) and his Deputies on their right.

The Committee of Arrangements of the Senate.

Ex-Presidents of the United States.

The Republican Association.

The Judiciary.

The Clergy.

Foreign Ministers.

The Corps Diplomatique.

Members-elect. Members and ex-Members of Congress, and ex-Members of the Cabinet.

The Peace Congress.

Heads of Bureaus.

Governors and ex-Governors of States and Territories, and Members of the Legislatures of the same.

PRESIDENTS BUCHANAN AND LINCOLN ENTERING THE SENATE CHAMBER BEFORE THE INAUGURATION.—[FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.]

Officers of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Militia, in full uniform.
Officers and Soldiers of the Revolution, of the War of 1812, and subsequent periods.
The Corporate Authorities of Washington and Georgetown.
Other Political and Military Associations from the District and other parts of the United States.
All organized Civil Societies.
Professors, Schoolmasters, and Students within the District of Columbia; Citizens of the District, and of States not Territories.

The arrangements, as a rule, were bad, the throng pressing upon the Presidential carriage so as to compel it to stop frequently. But the sight was very brilliant, and the crowd enormous. A striking feature of the procession was a van labeled Constitution, upon which thirty-four young girls in white were seated. Our artist has selected for his picture the moment at which the procession passed the gate of the Capitol grounds.

Arriving at the private door leading, through a covered way, to the Capitol, the carriage stopped and the two Presidents alighted. It was about half past one when they entered the Senate arm-in-arm, as shown in our picture. A newspaper correspondent says of this:

"Mr. Buchanan and Mr. Lincoln entered, arm-in-arm, the former pale, and, nervous; the latter's face slightly flushed, with compressed lips. For a few minutes, while the oath was administered to Senator Pearce, they sat in front of the President's desk. Mr. Buchanan looked stiff-ly, and frequently. Mr. Lincoln was grave and impressive as an Indian martyr."

After a few moments of rest, the procession formed again and proceeded to the platform on the portico of the Capitol. There, the Supreme Court, the Senate, House of Representatives, Foreign Ministers, and a vast crowd of privileged persons quickly filled every seat: while the people—to the number of some 25,000—were gathered in a dense mass below. President Lincoln was introduced to the people by Senator Baker, of Oregon, and forthwith, in a clear, strong voice, proceeded to read his inaugural, which was frequently interrupted by bursts of applause.

At the close of the reading the oath was administered by Chief Justice Taney; and, after receiving the congratulations of his friends, the President, leaning on the arm of President Buchanan, passed within the building, and thence drove to the White House.

THE WORK OF WIND.

A STORM in December on a prairie in Wisconsin. Wind-swept, Nettie sat before the fire, the light of a flaming wood-fire. Without, a wild, sweeping wind driving the air full of whirling crystals. Clear; but perhaps the keenest, coldest night of the season—of any season.

Nettie and Martha are sisters. The roof that sheltered them in their hands by inheritance only a year ago; for when the mother died the father was lone, and being old and broken with care, laid him down to sleep by her side, as he had done for more than forty years. The home was lonely, but the farm is good. A brother—from home now—gathers gray and golden grains by vexing the smooth, rich prairie-mould, to keep them in food and comforts from summer to summer.

Nettie is little, playful, and waxen. Martha is older, fairer, and plain. More as she sits in her chair—not a high-backed one—her shoulders scarcely reach to its summit; and she seems to be little like a child. A pair of crutches stand against the corner.

Nettie, who, at seventeen, is not too old for kittens, and birds, and other light and playful creatures, sits like a Turk—a very sweet little feminine Turk, to be sure—the centre of a herd of feline pensilers, the middle of the flock, with most capacious independence of winter weather and all its suggestions, Nettie wears to-night a light summer shirt—as I guessed and pasty stuff—a pure, bright little thing of a print, which, setting down to her perfect figure, sweeps thence upon the carpet in billows of foam, flecked with purple verbenas. She has had a dozen kittens, this kitten-set of all imaginable sprites, in soft fur dresses of salmon and white, and coal color, are skipping about the floor in the most fantastic circles, while Mistress Tabby sits gravely in the corner in matronly contemplation; reveling, doubtless, in memories of those days long gone by, when she made great havoc of balls of yarn, and gave fruitless chase to the tip of her tail. In the frolic Nettie's mischief loses the air of a child. On the floor, wheeat the coal-color kitten whisks it off to a corner, and deposits it under a chair as gravely as men do votes of taxation.

"Ah, you robber! you shall have little peace with your plunder," and Nettie proceeds to dislodge the booty by sundry and vigorous discharges of balls of yarn.

Martha looks up from her book and speaks. Her voice, rich in tone and musical as Nettie's, though graver, and she says,

"Have we ever known so wild a wind as this, Nettie?"

"Never, sir. It has whistled and roared, and whirled the snow into heaps, and filled the air with feathers and broken branches of trees, and shaken the house all day," says Nettie, letting a whirling ball of yarn at the redoubtable coal-color kitten, unconquered, under the chair.

"I feel afraid. Perhaps brother has been on the lake to-day."

"Oh no! No boat would venture out in such a gale, and in winter too."

"I suppose not. But what time did this wind begin, and how, Nettie?"

"Let me think. Why, it came in a sudden gust at about ten this morning. But brother may not have reached the lake; we only look for him this week. There is no cause for uneasiness, Martha."

And yet the apprehension, once started, checks Nettie's exuberance of spirits and changes her mood. Her astonished kittens, finding no response to their bravest sallies, retire in evident disgust, wondering much at the fickleness of young women in general; and the "coal-color" under the chair sees Nettie, with utter surprise, come coolly to its fortress and take the collar without a caress. And then Nettie lies in her favorite nook of the lounge, pensive, her head on her hand, thinking of brother; of father and mother, under the snow; of the friend at the foot of mountains in New England whose letters, fraught with golden words, failed to come last week and even the week before. "The mails are so irregular here at the West!"

In brushing the miles upon miles of prairie through the livelong day, the fury wind had grown mad with the fury of freedom, and tossed now into the air with its invisible antlers; so that men, could they have looked upon the landscape, would have breathed ice notes. The whole atmosphere seemed powdered with diamond dust, floating crystals; and though the sky was cloudless, the earth was destitute of outline, earth and sky meeting in mist.

Now that night has come, and the moon is marching up the arc of the heavens, the wind is in less ruthless in its sweep, but tosses the snow, swaps the few lone trees, and drives the frost into crevices, plating the back wall with a coat of white, and curling mounds of snow within the threshold of closed doors.

Hall and door of Nettie's homestead is being unfolded. A path of light, of golden tint, streams up from the horizon, and, intersecting the moon, forms a spectacle about it. Then, from the north, streamers crossing the first that the moon stands against the sky as a clear brilliant pearl in a cross of gold. Then the light and the moon are lost, and Nettie finds in as brilliant colors as the rainbow of dry puts on; and near the south an arc of color, bending outward, matches another which is forming below. It is one of those rare and magnificent displays of the prairie, painted by frost-mist in the air, which a lifetime seldom finds repeated. The warmth and beauty of color in the Aurora Borealis fill the recesses of winter.

A sleigh, drawn by a pair of stout black horses in which a vigorous man and a fragile girl, had been winding all day among the forest trees which skirt the prairie like a broad brown fringe. The trees prevented the wind from being at times quite endurable. But at nightfall they shot out from under their covert upon the white bosom of the wild prairie, and the wind, with all its force, struck with its sting. Now, while light and warmth glow within, where are Nettie and Martha, and the moon is purging of its crystal, silver, crimson, orange, and gold, the wild night wind has chilled and stiffened the riders in the sleigh, and the horses are floundering through the deepening snow. The man has taken one after another of his garments and wrapped them about his companion, and stands, shelvered behind her, to keep off the driving wind urging the willing but failing horses. The wind, eddying and whirling, has piled the snow into hills. Sometimes it is quite impossible to force a passage through till the hand of the driver has broken the drift with his spade.

The keen wind bites his face and his hands, penetrates to the muscles and the bones, and would chill him but for the labor. The drifts grow deeper; the cold more intense; the strong horses reel now more slowly. At last the whole up the first cross-planined bluffery of cold. She thought she was freezing. But now she is quite warm—does not suffer at all. She is sleeping in the strong arms. He has parted with his last coat; he can do no more.

"Take this coat, George; I don't need it now," she says, in a faint, cheerful voice.

"For God's sake keep it on!"

"Why, George, you will suffer at all."

And still the horses move painfully on, and still the man wears its icy fingers mercilessly over the protective shoulder-blades of his wife.

"I am sleepy, George; wake me up when we reach a house. You must go in and warm, or you will freeze."

The horses stop; the snow is high before George opens the shawl by the face and kisses the lips. She is sleeping. A few minutes more, and the sleep will last forever. He puts his shoulder deep whence there is no waking. Once more, with the energy of despair, George strikes his spade into the mound of snow, and, with the strength the voice cubes, and they roll speedily to leeward. In the fitful energy of his exertion, perspiration starts upon his face, and, freezing, stings like needles and the drift is high. And what beyond? Only drifts—drifts—iterations of those he has battled for all day—and sleep. He pauses, and it is now almost a little beyond. Nor; he will make one other effort. The way is partially cleared; the whip is put to the horses, and, shivering always, they rise, plunge again, and fall with sheer exhaustion.

And now a light glimmers in the distance. Hope springs; and across the misty mass the grasps his unconscious wife, and hurries on through with the snow and the distance as well as he may.

"Oh, Martha! come to the window," says Nettie, "the prettiest display we ever saw. A great cross of gold, and rainbows all about the moon. Beautiful! beautiful!"

The sister reaches for her crutches; but little Nettie is little and strong, and before the crippled woman has moved Nettie has borne her in her arms to the window. Looking for the exceeding wonder and beauty they are silent long:

"Queen of Night!" says Martha, in audible accents.

"Where she walks she leaves golden footprints," adds Nettie.

"Her chambers hung with crimson, and orange, and blue."

"With a canopy of purple and violet."

"And a carpet of rainbow under her feet," says Nettie. "Wonderful are thy works, O—"

The form of a man, with a heavy burden in his arms, appears like an apparition before the window—the face terribly haggard, the step tottering. Nettie rushes to the door; but the man has fallen, and two bodies lie lifeless before her.

It is a mystery that two such girls, one helpless, the other slight, could have brought those bodies within the door; but it is done. Martha thinks it is brother with the bride he was to bring from the East to their prairie home. The dress is not unlike, the form is like, the hair is like. It is not he. Nettie is not deceived.

The girls live, pray, and will not wake. It is frail little May, come to Wisconsin with brother for life, and not for this icy death.

The two sisters live. It is Nettie's brother, from the brown house by the river-side within sight of mountains in New England.

He will live with Nettie and Martha on the prairie farm; for brother will not come back any more. No boat could live on the lake that day.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Friday, March 1, in the Senate, among the preliminary business was the passage of the Joint resolution allowing Alexander Pattison to locate a grant of land and a scrip from Nicaragua, amended so as to strike out the grant of land. The bill to reorganize the corps of engineers, which in its ranks brought against him by some of Walker's men was also passed. The report of the Select Committee on the Peace Conference proposition and the Crittenden resolutions was then taken up, when Senator Hunter, of Virginia, moved to strike out the first article of the former and insert the first article of the latter. The argument was continued at great length by Messrs. Bigler, Pugh, Sebastian, Baker, and others; Senator Mason taking the ground that the propositions of the Conference were worse than nothing for the South; and Senator Crittenden advocating them as the only means of preventing a civil war and saving his own proposition in their favor. No action was taken. On the 2d the Senate, in the forenoon session, in order to vex the report of the Committee of Thirty-three, and the Crittenden resolutions, and to make room for the case of Mr. Pearce, of Maryland, to take his seat, which was given to him by a vote of 33 to 7. The amendment to the Fugitive Slave Law, more clearly defining the duties of the marshals, was passed by a vote of 28 to 13. This amendment, after ineffectual attempts to table it, was finally passed. The next matter of any importance was the bill providing for the organization of Nevada and Dakota into territories. Nothing else of consequence was done.

In the Senate, March 2, the Senate devoted the day to the discussion of the subject of compromises, and adjourned at 5 P.M. on the Crittenden resolutions. The vote was 19 to 7. In the House, the Army appropriation bill was passed. The Senate bill for the relief of Commodore Isaac Hull, and the bill for the relief of Commodore Stewart, remaining Mr. Treasury, secretary of the Navy, for accepting the resignation of Commodore Paulding, and for the appointment of Captain Dupont to the vacancy thus created, were passed after considerable opposition—75 to 69. No other business of consequence was transacted. The House adjourned until 10 o'clock on this.

On Saturday, March 3, the House met at 9 P.M., and after a debate which lasted till 7 A.M. on Monday, adopted the Army appropriation bill, with its amendments.

On Monday, 4th, both Houses met at 10 A.M., but no business of consequence was transacted in the Senate. Senator Fitch, of Indiana, spoke against time to kill a gap company's charter. At 4 P.M. the session terminated.

THE INAUGURAL ADDRESS.

AT 1.30 P.M. on 4th, Mr. Lincoln, the new President, delivered the following inaugural address:

FELLOW-CITIZENS OF THE UNITED STATES.—In compliance with a custom as old as the Government itself, I appear before you to address you briefly, and to take by your presence the oath which the Constitution prescribes for the United States to be taken by the President before he enters on the execution of his office.

I do not consider it necessary at present for me to discuss those matters of administration about which there is no special anxiety or excitement.

NO GROUND FOR APPREHENSION AT THE SOUTH.

Apprehension seems to exist among the people of the Southern States that by the accession of a Republican administration their property and their peace and personal security are to be endangered. There has never been any reasonable cause for such apprehension. Indeed, the most ample evidence to the contrary has all along existed and been open to their inspection. It is found in nearly all the published speeches of him who now addresses you. I do not quote from one of those speeches when I declare that I have no purpose, directly or indirectly, to interfere with the institution of slavery in the States where it exists. I believe I have no lawful right to do so, and I have no inclination to do so." Those who nominated and elected me did so with full knowledge that I had made this and many similar declarations, and had never recanted them. And more than this, they placed in the platform for my acceptance, and as a law to themselves and to me, the clear and emphatic resolution which I now read:

"Resolved, That the maintenance inviolate of the rights of the States, and especially the right of each State to order and control its own domestic institutions according to its own judgment exclusively, is essential to that balance of power on which the perfection and endurance of our political fabric depends, and we denounce the lawless invasion by armed force of the soil of any State or Territory, no matter under what pretexts, as the gravest of crimes."

I now reiterate these sentiments, and in doing so I only press upon the public attention the most conclusive evidence of which the case admits—that evidence is the unanimous voice, declaration, and vow of the party to which I belong, that no such interference will be made or countenanced by me. And more than this, they have not only declared their opinions to this effect, but they have also, by their votes, given me the legal right to do so. And I may add to all this that I have taken no pledge, and made no promise, either directly or indirectly, to anybody, that should I gain the election I would pursue any course in regard to slavery or anything else, different from that which I have indicated. I believe I am entitled to the benefit of these declarations as much as any other man who has been placed in a similar position. Fellow-citizens, this is strictly true.

THE FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW.

There is much controversy about the delivering up of fugitives from service or labor. The clause I now read is as plainly written in the Constitution as any other of its provisions:

"No person held to service or labor in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due."

It is scarcely questioned that this provision was intended by those who made it for the reclaiming of what we call fugitive slaves; and the intention of the lawgiver is the law. All members of Congress swear their support to the whole Constitution—to this provision as much as to any other. To the proposition, then, that slaves whose cases come within the terms of this clause "shall be delivered up," their oaths are unanimous. Now, if they would make the effort in good temper, could they not, with nearly equal unanimity, frame and pass a law by means of which to keep good faith continuous oath? There is some difference of opinion whether this clause should be enforced by national or by State authority; but surely that difference is not a very material one. If the slave is to be surrendered, it can be only at the demand of him or to others to which authority it is done. And should any one, in any case, be content that this oath shall go unkept on a merely unsubstantial controversy as to how it shall be kept? Again, in any law upon this subject, ought not all the safeguards of liberty known in civilized and humane jurisprudence to be introduced, so that a free man be not, in any case, surrendered as a slave? And might it not be well at the same time to provide by law for the enforcement of that clause in the Constitution which guarantees that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States?" I take the official oath to-day with no mental reservations, and with no purpose to construe the Constitution or laws by any hypothetical or secret rule, and I desire to preserve, protect, and defend it to the best of my ability. I do not assume to do more than to the best of my ability. I do not assume to do more than to the best of my ability. I do not assume to do more than ests among the States to comprise a new Union as to produce harmony only and to prevent renewed secession. Plainly, the central idea of secession is the essence of anarchy.

A majority held in restraint by constitutional checks and limitations, and always changing easily with deliberate changes of popular opinions and sentiments, is the only true sovereign of a free people. Whoever rejects it does, of necessity, fly to anarchy or despotism. Unanimity is impossible. The rule of a minority, as a permanent arrangement, is wholly inadmissible. So that, rejecting the majority principle, anarchy or despotism in some form is all that is left.

THE DRED SCOTT CASE.

I do not forget the position assumed by some, that Constitutional questions are to be decided by the Supreme Court, nor do I deny that such decisions must be binding, in any case, upon the parties to a suit, as to the object of that suit, while they are also entitled to very high respect and consideration in all parallel cases by all other departments of the Government; and while it is obviously possible that such decision may be reversed in a proper suit, still the evil effect following it being limited to that particular case, with the chance that it may be overruled and never become a precedent for other cases, can better be borne than would the evils of a different practice. At the same time the candid citizen must confess that if the policy of the Government upon the vital questions affecting the whole people is to be irrevocably fixed by decisions rendered by the Supreme Court, the instant they are made in ordinary litigation between parties in personal actions the people will have ceased to be their own rulers, having to that extent practically resigned their government into the hands of that eminent tribunal. Nor is there in this view any assault upon the Court or the judges.

It is a duty from which they may not shrink to decide cases properly brought before them; and it is no fault in them if others seek to turn their decisions to political purposes.

SLAVERY.

One section of our country believes slavery is right, and ought to be extended, while the other believes it is wrong, and ought to be restricted. That is the only substantial dispute; and the fugitive slave clause of the Constitution, and the law for the suppression of the foreign slave trade, are each as well enforced, practically, in any section of the Union where the moral sense of the people imperfectly acquires the law. Both these cases of the people abide by the dry, legal obligation in both cases, and a few breaks resist it. During all this, which cannot be perfectly cured, and it would be worse in both cases after the separation of the sections than before, the foreign slave-trade, now imperfectly suppressed, would be substantially unopposed, while in the one section, the fugitive slave, now only partially surrendered, would not be surrendered at all by the other.

SEPARATION IMPOSSIBLE.

Physically speaking, we can not separate—we can not remove our respective sections from each other, nor build an impassable wall between them. A husband and wife may be divorced, and go separate ways forever, but they can not be put out of each other's reach. The different parts of our country are not to do this. They are bound to remain face to face, and intercourse, either amicable or hostile, must continue between them. Is it possible, then, to make that intercourse more advantageous or more satisfactory after separation than before? You can make treaties easier than friends can make love? Can treaties be more faithfully enforced between those who can make friends? Suppose you go to war; you can not fight always, and when, after much loss on both sides, and no gain on either, you cease fighting, the identical questions as to terms of intercourse are again upon you.

SECEDE ACCORDING TO THE CONSTITUTION.

This country, with its institutions, belongs to the people who inhabit it. Whenever they shall grow weary of the existing government they can exercise their constitutional right of amending, or their revolutionary right to dismember, or overthrow it. Local interests may lead to the fault that many worthy and patriotic citizens are desirous of having the national Constitution amended. While I make no recommendation of amendment, I freely recognize the full authority of the people over the whole subject, being unsolicited in either of the modes prescribed in the instrument itself; and I should, under existing circumstances, favor, rather than oppose a fair opportunity being afforded the people to act upon it. I will venture to add that to me the convention mode seems preferable, in that it allows amendments to originate with the people themselves, instead of only permitting them to take or reject propositions originated by others not agreeable to them. For the instance, and which might not be precisely such as they would wish themselves to accept or refuse. I understand a proposed amendment to the Constitution—which amendment, however, I have not seen—has passed Congress, to the effect that the Federal Government shall never interfere with the domestic institutions of states, including that of person held to service. To avoid misconstruction of what I have said, I depart from my purpose not to speak of particular amendments, so far as to say that holding such a provision to now be implied constitutional law, I have no objection to its being made expressly and irrevocable.

NOTHING GAINED BY HASTE.

The Chief Magistrate derives all his authority from the people, and they have conferred none upon him to fix the terms for the separation of the States. The people themselves also can do this if they choose; but the Executive, as such, has nothing to do with it. His duty is to administer the present government as it came to his hands, and to transmit it unimpaired by like hands to his successor. Why should there not be a patient waiting for that day? Why this precipitation? Is there any better or equal hope in the world? In your present action is there any reason to suppose it will result in a more perfect Union? Is it not plain that your object is to clear the existing obstacles, and then immediately to form a more perfect Union by soliciting the good will of your brethren? Is there not reason to believe that they will thus regard it favorably? Is it not probable that the transaction will be marked by a spirit of amity and good will to an extent never before known in the world's history? Is it not probable that more than a year's time of calm reflection will follow, during which the minds of men will become more and more calm and deliberate, and consequently more and more reasonable? Is it not probable that the restless masses will come to see that no possible change will better their condition? Is it not probable that the assembling of a convention will bring to it the best wisdom of the country? If we seek we shall find this wisdom, and shall secure its action in favor of the object sought. Is it not probable that such a convention will embody this wisdom in the form of such amendments to the Constitution as will secure entire confidence and hearty support for the Constitution and the Union in all parts of the country? Is it not probable that such amendments will be carefully and calmly considered by the States, and secure their ratification in quick time? Is it not probable that the peace of the country during the pendency of the proposed amendments will be preserved, and all danger of coercion or collision passed by? Is it not probable that by these means our present troubles will be adjusted in the best way, and the government saved forever? It is impossible to say that all this is not probable, and who shall say that any of it is not? Why shall we take the step which can not be retraced, and thus close the door against all these possibilities?

THE PATH OF DUTY.

Plainly, the dictates of prudence, as well as of duty, forbid the Executive to attempt to execute laws which the people have not given him the power to enforce. Unwilling to do this, I will not. Rather than violate a clear constitutional power, and the organic law upon which all rest, I prefer to abide the consequences, whatever they may be, with the free and resolute heart and spirit which become a freeman. A patient reliance upon the ultimate justice of the people is more than an anchor to the storm-tossed ship on the ocean. According to our political system, as a matter of choice, the people can, any day, through their representatives, amend their Constitution, or put it away altogether. But during their pleasure, the instrument itself requires that the officers of the government shall perform their functions within prescribed spheres of duty. And it often happens that obstacles arise to the performance of duty which are not in the power of the officer to remove. Of this class is the case of property destroyed by a mob, or by insurrection. In such cases the people, after making sufficient compensation to the sufferers, very generally require their representatives in Congress to make good the loss. In this case, to withhold the compensation, upon the ground that the Executive had power to prevent the destruction, would be to shift upon him responsibilities which others ought to bear, or divide with him. Perhaps a more common class of cases is that wherein the President, through the courts, fails to get his hands on persons who have violated the laws. Depredations committed by perhaps hundreds of persons, combined and organized, but individually eluding discovery, are matters of this class. In all these cases the President is to consider, and exercise a discretion. He is to consider whether the universal interest in the execution of the laws requires him to risk the general peace by undertaking to force the process of the courts and officers into the midst of an excited locality. It is easy to see that he may do this to the very verge of his power, and yet not beyond it. Similar reasons, and others still more imperative, press upon him in deciding whether he shall ask Congress to provide by law for paying for property destroyed by mobs or insurrections.

THE DUTY OF THE PRESIDENT.

It is my intention to perform my duty in accordance with the Constitution, and laws made in pursuance thereof, to the best of my ability; to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States. I shall not attempt to persuade you that I have no preference on the subjects of these laws. Nor would you believe me if I were to do so. But it is my duty to state, and I do state, that I have taken no oath, registered no vow, to which I am not willing, and shall not be unwilling, solemnly to add the words, "So help me God."

THE DRIED SCOTT CASE.

I do not forget the position assumed by some, that Constitutional questions are to be decided by the Supreme Court, nor do I deny that such decisions must be binding, in any case, upon the parties to a suit, as to the object of that suit, while they are also entitled to very high respect and consideration in all parallel cases by all other departments of the Government; and while it is obviously possible that such decision may be erroneous in any given case, still the evil effect following it being limited to that particular case, with the chance that it may be overruled and never become a precedent for other cases, can better be borne than would the evils of a different practice. At the same time the candid citizen must confess that if the policy of the Government upon the vital questions affecting the whole people is to be irrevocably fixed by decisions of the Supreme Court, the instant they are made in ordinary litigation between parties in personal actions the people will have ceased to be their own rulers, having to that extent practically resigned their government into the hands of that eminent tribunal. Nor is there in this view any assault upon the Court or the judges.

It is a duty from which they may not shrink to decide cases properly brought before them; and it is no fault in them if others seek to turn their decisions to political purposes.

SLAVERY.

One section of our country believes slavery is right, and ought to be extended, while the other believes it is wrong, and ought to be restricted. That is the only substantial dispute; and the fugitive slave clause of the Constitution, and the law for the suppression of the foreign slave trade, are each as well enforced, practically, in any section of the Union where the moral sense of the people imperfectly acquires the law. Both these cases of the people abide by the dry, legal obligation in both cases, and a few breaks resist it. During all this, which cannot be perfectly cured, and it would be worse in both cases after the separation of the sections than before, the foreign slave-trade, now imperfectly suppressed, would be substantially unopposed, while in the one section, the fugitive slave, now only partially surrendered, would not be surrendered at all by the other.

SEPARATION IMPOSSIBLE.

Physically speaking, we can not separate—we can not remove our respective sections from each other, nor build an impassable wall between them. A husband and wife may be divorced, and go separate ways forever, but they can not be put out of each other's reach. The different parts of our country are not to do this. They are bound to remain face to face, and intercourse, either amicable or hostile, must continue between them. Is it possible, then, to make that intercourse more advantageous or more satisfactory after separation than before? You can make treaties easier than friends can make love? Can treaties be more faithfully enforced between those who can make friends? Suppose you go to war; you can not fight always, and when, after much loss on both sides, and no gain on either, you cease fighting, the identical questions as to terms of intercourse are again upon you.

SECEDE ACCORDING TO THE CONSTITUTION.

This country, with its institutions, belongs to the people who inhabit it. Whenever they shall grow weary of the existing government they can exercise their constitutional right of amending, or their revolutionary right to dismember, or overthrow it. Local interests may lead to the fault that many worthy and patriotic citizens are desirous of having the national Constitution amended. While I make no recommendation of amendment, I freely recognize the full authority of the people over the whole subject, being unsolicited in either of the modes prescribed in the instrument itself; and I should, under existing circumstances, favor, rather than oppose a fair opportunity being afforded the people to act upon it. I will venture to add that to me the convention mode seems preferable, in that it allows amendments to originate with the people themselves, instead of only permitting them to take or reject propositions originated by others not agreeable to them. For the instance, and which might not be precisely such as they would wish themselves to accept or refuse. I understand a proposed amendment to the Constitution—which amendment, however, I have not seen—has passed Congress, to the effect that the Federal Government shall never interfere with the domestic institutions of states, including that of person held to service. To avoid misconstruction of what I have said, I depart from my purpose not to speak of particular amendments, so far as to say that holding such a provision to now be implied constitutional law, I have no objection to its being made expressly and irrevocable.

NOTHING GAINED BY HASTE.

The Chief Magistrate derives all his authority from the people, and they have conferred none upon him to fix the terms for the separation of the States. The people themselves also can do this if they choose; but the Executive, as such, has nothing to do with it. His duty is to administer the present government as it came to his hands, and to transmit it unimpaired by like hands to his successor. Why should there not be a patient waiting for that day? Why this precipitation? Is there any better or equal hope in the world? In your present action is there any reason to suppose it will result in a more perfect Union? Is it not plain that your object is to clear the existing obstacles, and then immediately to form a more perfect Union by soliciting the good will of your brethren? Is there not reason to believe that they will thus regard it favorably? Is it not probable that the transaction will be marked by a spirit of amity and good will to an extent never before known in the world's history? Is it not probable that more than a year's time of calm reflection will follow, during which the minds of men will become more and more calm and deliberate, and consequently more and more reasonable? Is it not probable that the restless masses will come to see that no possible change will better their condition? Is it not probable that the assembling of a convention will bring to it the best wisdom of the country? If we seek we shall find this wisdom, and shall secure its action in favor of the object sought. Is it not probable that such a convention will embody this wisdom in the form of such amendments to the Constitution as will secure entire confidence and hearty support for the Constitution and the Union in all parts of the country? Is it not probable that such amendments will be carefully and calmly considered by the States, and secure their ratification in quick time? Is it not probable that the peace of the country during the pendency of the proposed amendments will be preserved, and all danger of coercion or collision passed by? Is it not probable that by these means our present troubles will be adjusted in the best way, and the government saved forever? It is impossible to say that all this is not probable, and who shall say that any of it is not? Why shall we take the step which can not be retraced, and thus close the door against all these possibilities?

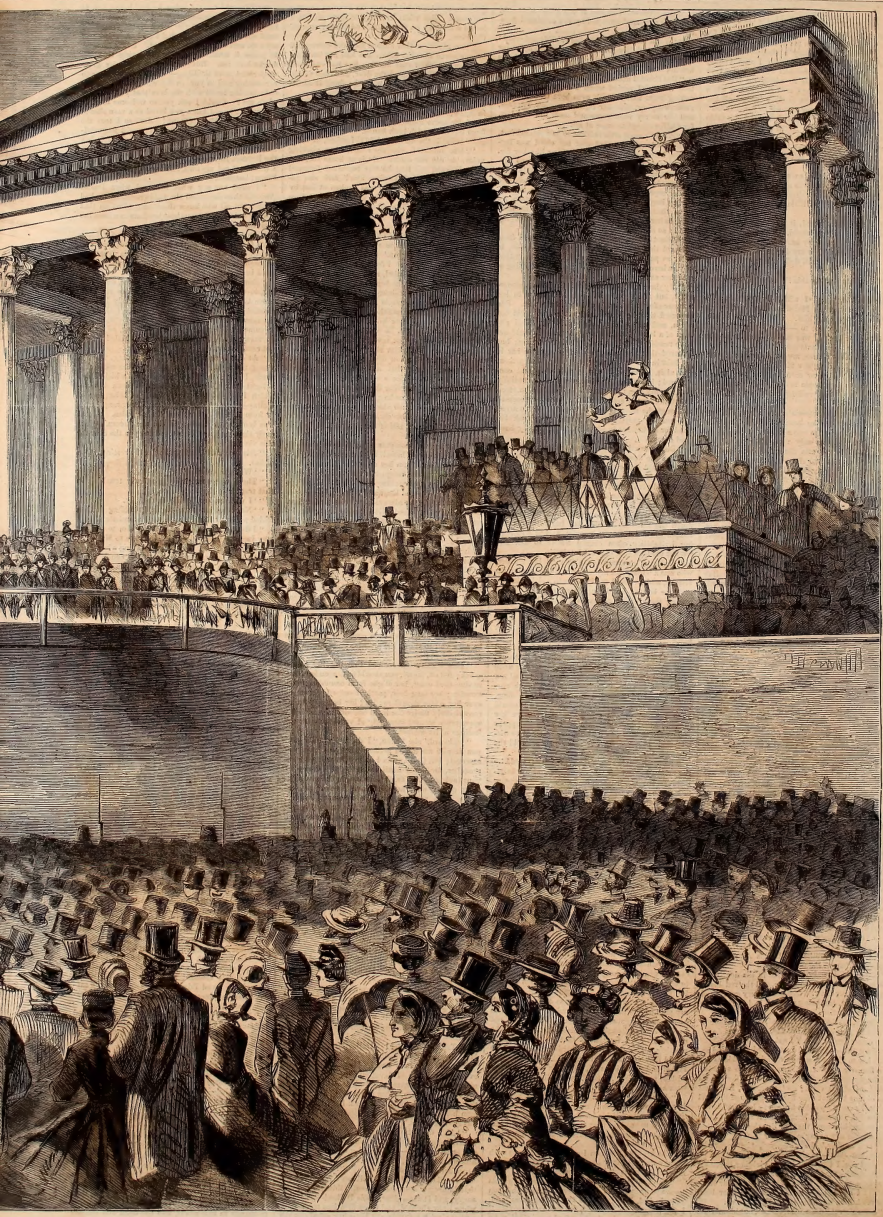
THE PATH OF DUTY.

Plainly, the dictates of prudence, as well as of duty, forbid the Executive to attempt to execute laws which the people have not given him the power to enforce. Unwilling to do this, I will not. Rather than violate a clear constitutional power, and the organic law upon which all rest, I prefer to abide the consequences, whatever they may be, with the free and resolute heart and spirit which become a freeman. A patient reliance upon the ultimate justice of the people is more than an anchor to the storm-tossed ship on the ocean. According to our political system, as a matter of choice, the people can, any day, through their representatives, amend their Constitution, or put it away altogether. But during their pleasure, the instrument itself requires that the officers of the government shall perform their functions within prescribed spheres of duty. And it often happens that obstacles arise to the performance of duty which are not in the power of the officer to remove. Of this class is the case of property destroyed by a mob, or by insurrection. In such cases the people, after making sufficient compensation to the sufferers, very generally require their representatives in Congress to make good the loss. In this case, to withhold the compensation, upon the ground that the Executive had power to prevent the destruction, would be to shift upon him responsibilities which others ought to bear, or divide with him. Perhaps a more common class of cases is that wherein the President, through the courts, fails to get his hands on persons who have violated the laws. Depredations committed by perhaps hundreds of persons, combined and organized, but individually eluding discovery, are matters of this class. In all these cases the President is to consider, and exercise a discretion. He is to consider whether the universal interest in the execution of the laws requires him to risk the general peace by undertaking to force the process of the courts and officers into the midst of an excited locality. It is easy to see that he may do this to the very verge of his power, and yet not beyond it. Similar reasons, and others still more imperative, press upon him in deciding whether he shall ask Congress to provide by law for paying for property destroyed by mobs or insurrections.

THE DUTY OF THE PRESIDENT.

It is my intention to perform my duty in accordance with the Constitution, and laws made in pursuance thereof, to the best of my ability; to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States. I shall not attempt to persuade you that I have no preference on the subjects of these laws. Nor would you believe me if I were to do so. But it is my duty to state, and I do state, that I have taken no oath, registered no vow, to which I am not willing, and shall not be unwilling, solemnly to add the words, "So help me God."

THE INAUGURATION OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN AS PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED S



TES, AT THE CAPITOL, WASHINGTON, MARCH 4, 1861.—[From a Drawing made on the Spot.]

THE LOVER'S SACRIFICE.

"Yes, make the fire burn brighter, Maud, for when Nettie returns from her ride she will be very cold, I know. Ah! many a sleigh-ride have I taken on a Christmas-Eve when I was young. How pleased the children will be with the toys which we have arranged so nicely on the table over their little stockings, and Nettie, too, when she finds out that we have so slyly invited all her friends here for to-morrow evening to surprise her! Ah me! it is just four years since I did the same for Mabel, then eighteen, Nettie's age, and a sad evening it was for her, poor child! If I were a bit superstitious I would never have done so again;" and a shade of thought settled upon Mrs. Frost's peaceful face.

"Why do you look so sad, Aunt Jeanette? Surely you have no cause to sigh for Cousin Mabel; for with such a noble husband as hers, and such a sweet, darling child as little Eddie Annesly, she must be happy."

"You are right, Maud, it would be strange if my Mabel were not contented. The trouble whose remembrance clouded my brow was transitory, for it pleased God to deliver my darling out of her power, as I believe He will deliver us all if we bide His time."

"What was her trouble?" asked little Maud Ross, timidly.

"Listen, child, and I will tell you. It will show you how much Mabel's husband deserves the esteem we bear him. I will begin at the time when I first came to ——, to live, and Mabel was then your age. I was much pleased with the place, and the pleasant society in which I found myself. I made was Mrs. Wilson, my next door neighbor, and through her daughter Kate, a young girl of Mabel's age, in her sons' names, I became acquainted with all the young people in ——, and was before long, what her beauty entitled her to be, the belle of the place.

"Among her first acquaintances among the gentlemen of —— were the brothers Dallas and Edward Annesly. Dallas was a lawyer in good practice, but Edward was only a clerk in his uncle's store. But Edward was the gayest of the two, and always was among the pleasure-seekers than his brother. Many considered him the handsomest too; but I always admired most the more intellectual though less regular beauty of Dallas's thoughtful countenance, and, as I soon perceived, my little Mabel agreed with me in this. Edward came oftenest to visit Mabel, and frequently escorted her to the evening parties, which were not few, and also took her out many times in the light sleigh, drawn by a spirited horse, which he always drove when he came for her.

"She met Edward some time before she became acquainted with his brother; but after that Dallas sought after her almost as much as Edward, I say almost, for he did not seek her as frequently as his brother; for, as I said before, he did not often participate in the amusements so familiar to Edward.

"But Mabel did not guess how deep an interest Edward felt in her, or she soon would have encouraged him as she did. To her he was only a dear friend, and Dallas's brother.

"Well, the winter passed in this way, and spring and summer too, both brothers continuing to pay her every attention that affection could dictate, when, one afternoon late in September, when Mabel and I were walking in the garden, Edward entered our little gate, and hastily approached us.

"'I have come to bid you good-by,' he said, smiling; 'I go to A—— to-night.'

"'You seem very glad to leave us,' said Mabel, playfully.

"'I can only sorry on that account,' he answered, 'although I trust to be here again ere long; for if my mission does not fail, I shall return with bright prospects; and there is no joy like a long desired.'

"Mabel was unconscious of his meaning, but the passionate glance that accompanied these words spoke volumes to me. He was going to plead his errand long to obtain a lucrative situation in A—— offered him by an old friend, provided he should prove capable of holding it.

"During his absence Dallas was much oftener with Mabel than formerly, and I thought that I perceived a shade of deeper interest in those dark eyes, while her manner grew quieter, gentler, and more loving each day. But I was always jealous of my child's happiness, and could not ripen the idea of being excluded from sharing her every thought. It was this feeling that caused me to say to her in a sharp tone, one evening when she returned home a delighted child from a visit, 'Mabel Frost, are you betrothed to Dallas Annesly and keeping it from me?'

"She stood directly before me in the door-way, with her dark eyes fixed on me, and the red blood mounting to her brow. She looked very gentle and lovely I knew, but being angry, I had the heart to repeat the question.

"'Why, mother?' she faltered, coming closer to me and laid one little hand for love in the curtain of the window beside which I sat.

"'Why, indeed! Had I not heart him as he assisted her to alight from the vehicle, to address her by a familiar title of endearment, which sounded thrillingly musical when uttered in the deep tones of that melodious voice; and, moreover, had I not seen him as he bent over her to disengage the curl that had caught upon his button as he lifted her to the ground, to press a hasty, and I believed to me, a tremulous kiss upon the rosy lips that now pouted half rebelliously at my question?

"'Oh, mother,' she whispered, 'he never did before, but—but—he always talks so to me.'

"And could I blame him for yielding to such a temptation? Or her? Ah me, all know the power of love upon the heart of woman. Dear little Mabel! I stroked the soft curls of the dear head now resting on my knee and said no more.

"Soon after this Edward returned, but his mission was not accomplished; he had failed to secure the situation in A——.

"The brothers often met at our house after this, but each appeared annoyed by the continual presence of the other.

"When has Dallas been here?' Edward would often ask; and though Dallas never asked a similar question he looked troubled when he found his brother with Mabel.

"But this did not continue long, for soon followed that mournful period when I daily saw with an aching heart that Mabel's young, fresh spirit pined, and her merry voice more and more and low, for Dallas ceased to come at all.

"Weeks passed after this got to be a settled fact, and I no longer doubted that my child was forsaken, before she regained any thing like her accustomed cheerfulness. Mabel possessed one particle of that art which is termed 'a woman's face' this would not have lasted long. A few words of tender regret, a reproachful glance, or a look of loving inquiry, would have melted the stern resolve that he had made, and brought him once more to her side; but she was only a simple, loving child; so she suffered on in proud silence.

"About the last of November we learned from Edward that his brother was going to A——, to enter as partner in a long-established firm in that city, where he would have fair prospect of rising to a higher calling in his profession.

"My daughter grew very pale at this announcement, but there was a feverish excitement in her manner that I did not like, and could not trust. She expected that he would at least come to bid her adieu, and she was not disappointed. Had she known of a letter which accompanied Dallas's, she have remained present during this interview; but I feared that her feelings would overcome her if not held in check by the presence of a third person. His visit, short as it was, was formal and constrained; but when he bid us adieu, after cordially pressing my hand, he turned to Mabel, who stood beside me, and held out her hand for a moment it seemed as though he were about to clasp her in his arms, but quickly mastering his emotion, he took her hand for an instant in his own, and abruptly hastened away.

"Days passed on, and I grew anxious him in my heart of hearts for my child's happiness, for Mabel could not conceal from me that her heart was breaking.

"In Edward's society she seemed to find a kind of solace, perhaps on account of his occasional resemblance to his brother. She did not exclude herself from his society, but very rarely showed much the same as before; but her former sweet temper grew daily more unevenness, and this increasing irritability caused her mother to ask me, 'What made Mabel so cross lately?'

"Dallas often came home to visit his mother, who was a widow like myself, but I was always distant, and he could easily come in a sleigh in two or three hours; but he never came to our house during these visits, although I knew that Maud expected that, for never she heard that he was there she would dress herself with more than usual care, and start and blush at every ring at the door-bell.

"Toward Christmas I conceived the idea of giving to Mabel, at home, on the evening of that day, a surprise party, in honor of her birth-day and the Christmas-Day, cautioning all whom I invited not to disclose it to her, so that she was much surprised when her friends began to fill the parlors. Her dress I had prepared myself, so that she would have but to perform her toilet and receive her guests; but I did not be unable to see Dallas among them, much as I would have wished to witness their pleasure, having taken a severe cold the previous week.

"I felt perfectly recompensed for my trouble by the bright smile with which she greeted my invitilgence—the brightest I had seen on that young face for many days.

"I wondered at this after she left me; for although I had hoped to please her, I was totally unprepared for the delight which she evinced.

"While I was pondering on this, little Allie entered the room, and commenced prattling to me of Miss Christmas.

"'Oh, mother!' she said, at last, 'I think Christmas as such a nice day. How can people grow so Christmas.'

"'Who cries on Christmas?' I asked, smiling at her eagerness.

"'Mabel cries,' she said. 'I saw her cry today. Don't you know to-day, when nobody was down stairs but me and Mabel? Well, I saw that Mabel cried. I was looking out of the sly in a sleigh, and Mabel saw him too, and she bowed her head to him, and he did this way with his hat—look, mother—and then he went away.' She looked out the window a long time after he passed, trying to see his pretty horse, I guess; and then she sat by the fire and cried.'

"Dallas was why Mabel was so pleased with my plan. She had seen him, and expected him to be among the guests that night. But I had not invited him, never allowing that he would be at home; for I thought it best to prevent their meeting, and knew that both his brother and he would look upon it as a slight. I knew that Mabel had seen him, and, beyond a doubt, expected to him to be there. I must rectify the omission as soon as possible.

"Accordingly, I sent Alice for Mabel, and told her to dispatch a note immediately to Edward, requiring his presence that evening. Also, that we expected to see him that evening also. This she did with alacrity, but seemed surprised that I had not done so before.

"As evening came on I arranged her dress with great care; and very beautiful she appeared in the airy white robes and delicate wreath.

"Soon after she descended the stairs the guests began to arrive; and having seen that the children were in bed, I retired into the sitting-room, and, lying down upon a lounge, fell fast asleep.

"When I awoke the sound of music fell upon my ear, mingled with the light laugh of the dancers, and I concluded that the evening was far advanced. But while listening to these sounds, I heard a footstep on the stairs, and Mabel entered the room.

"One glance at that flushed face and corrugated brow showed me that enjoyment had not been the source of my child that night. She put one hand to her head as she closed the door, and then catching the wreath from her hair, she flung it across the room.

"'It annoys me so,' she said, half apologetically, in answer to my look of surprise, and then she paced for some moments, pressing back the curls from her brow with both hands.

"'What is the matter, child?' I asked, at last.

"'Oh, nothing,' she answered, in a choking voice, 'he did not come. He is at home too, and bade Edward say that he was too much fatigued to attend. Oh God forgive him!' and she relapsed into a silence which was broken at last by a tap at the door, which she answered, and then said, 'Mother, it is Edward. May he come in?'

"'Certainly,' I said. 'Oh! good-evening, Mr. Annesly.'

"'I am sorry to see you ill, Mrs. Frost,' he rejoined; 'I—I wanted to speak to you, and took the liberty of coming up.'

"I did not answer. I feared what was coming; but he, misunderstanding me, taking one of her hands in each of his, he began: 'Mabel, I have at last succeeded in obtaining in A—— a situation which will give me that I did not dare to maintain in comfort myself and another. Mabel, you must know how long I have loved you. Will you, if I may another name for you, be my wife?'

"She did not answer, my poor child, but snatching her hands from him she pressed them to her head, exclaiming in a tone of—oh! such a cry of agony and despair that it thrilled through and through my brain like a sudden knell of mortal fear. Edward, startled by her strange amazement depicted upon his face as he gazed on her like one bereft of his senses, until she threw herself into my arms and sobbed upon my bosom as she sank upon a couch at the other end of the room and buried his face in the cushions.

"After several moments of horrible suspense to all Mabel withdrew herself from my embrace, and, wiping the tears from her eyes, she paused a moment as though to conquer every vestige of emotion, and then approaching me, she laid her little hand upon his bowed head and faltered,

"'Edward, I have always loved you as a brother. I—I mean as a friend, and knows that you deserve my deepest love, for you [and here her voice trembled excessively] have ever been the same to me—always kind, a true friend of my slightest wish; and I thank you, Edward, and if God had given us the power to control our own affections I would gladly bestow my hand on you.'

"Mabel,' he said, rising before her, 'after this I will never trust in a human being again! O God! that you should thus ruin an angel to me should be but a heartless coquette after all! One who would lead one on with every appearance of love until he gave his whole soul to you with all the power of his heart, and then cast him aside when he asks you to fulfill the promise your encouragement implied?'

"Up to this position seemed to sting her to the quick; and oh, Maud, you should have seen her then, as she stood erect, her slight form trembling with proud anger, her dark eyes lit up, and streaming over her white shoulders; and her bosom panting convulsively under the light ball-dress, whose gay appearance was so strangely at variance with the feelings of its wearer.

"'Edward,' she began, 'I do not wonder that you despise me for the part that you have just asserted; but God knows I do not deserve your reproaches, for never until to-night did I dream of your love for me. Yet, believe me, in the abandonment of my own hopeless love I never marked yours. Oh, yes, mother,' she continued, wildly, 'rather than that I should have to despise me, I will confess what I had not thought the rack could have wrung from me. Edward Annesly, better a thousand love me, better than life, better than anything on earth besides, I love your brother.'

"A deep groan was the only answer, and I sprang forward in time to catch the fainting form of my child in my arms.

"'You are killing her!' I cried. 'O God, that I had never heard the name of Annesly!'

"He gently placed her on the couch that he had quitted, and while I bathed her pallid brow I implored him not to repeat the unguarded confession my daughter had made in a moment of excitement.

"But he would not promise.

"'She shall be happy with him,' he groaned forth. 'He can not help loving her. I will ask him if he does not.'

"Love her, I cried, leaning over my unconscious child. 'No, he never loved her, although he used every means to win her young heart, that he might triumph in it for a few days, but to throw it aside, as he has doubtless done many another.'

"'Trifled with her! Dallas Annesly! Oh, Mrs. Frost, it is impossible!'

"'I tell you it is true! He sought her with every appearance of devotion; he called her by every endearing name; did all but ask her to be his wife; and then, when one would have thought that would come next, he forsook her; and I have seen her dressing before the glass like the sweet flower that she is.'

"'Ah! I do not wonder. Surely you are wrong. Dallas is honor itself. See! she opens her eyes—she breathes now—and I will go to him and tell him what you say, and if he can not disprove it, henceforth we are strangers.'

"He did go to him, and well can I imagine what that interview must have been. Edward hot and angry, and Dallas—dear, noble Dallas!—with that white brow clouded, and those firm lips trembling, perhaps, with emotion, yet listening calmly to the passionate appeal.

"'Edward,' he said, when he had heard him to the end of his accusation, 'did you not tell me, three months ago, that you loved Mabel Frost?'

"'I need not tell you how much I love her. God and my own soul can alone know that. I once thought to prove it some day to her, believing that she might love me. But'—and here his voice grew deeper and more thrilling—'could I bring home to my mother and to you, as my wife, one whom my only brother has loved with the love that you confessed to me? Could I ask you to welcome as your sister one whom I knew you loved as a man should love but his wife? Oh no! And so I tore the sweet dream from my heart, and sought forgetfulness in absence, and—found it not. Break her heart, you said? Dallas, I rather than bring down the lightest sorrow upon the heart of Maud Frost I would cut out my own, and lay it, quivering with life, at her feet.'

"I need not say what followed when Dallas Annesly thus described the noble sacrifice he had made; but all who knew the strong affection that always existed between those brothers can imagine their mutual grief.

"Two weeks after Edward left home for some town farther West, where he had friends residing, and where he now lives; but before his departure he came to me, and told me what I have just related in regard to his brother's conduct.

"Soon after he had gone Dallas came, one evening, to our house, but Mabel refused to see him. Since Christmas night she had scarcely left her room, and seldom spoke to any one. Dallas did not remain long. He appeared ill at ease. But he came again the following evening, at the end of many succeeding ones, and still Mabel would not receive him.

"At last, one clear night in January, when a young moon shed its clear rays over the snow-clad roads, I saw, from the window beside which I sat, a light sleigh driven by a small dark figure, which I immediately recognized as belonging to Dallas—stop before our gate, and he sprang lightly from it, and entered our little garden. Mabel was lying upon the bed in the next room, apparently sleeping; and I hastened to open the door for this visitor.

"His first words, after the usual greeting, were of her.

"'Will she see me?'

"There was something peculiarly touching in that tremor in the deep voice.

"'I will ask her,' I said, doubtfully.

"'No, take her this,' he said, holding forth a folded paper; 'that is, with your permission.'

"I did not answer; but leaving him to find his way into the parlor, I carried the note to Mabel.

"I clearly heard her quick breathing when I entered the room, and going up to the couch I laid my hand upon her shoulder. She did not start or move.

"'Mabel, Dallas is here.'

"'Yes, mother.'

"'He has sent you this letter. Will you read it?'

"She grasped it eagerly, and placed it in her bosom.

"'Read it now, Mabel—he is waiting;' I said; and arranging the light upon a table, I went into the next room and closed the door of communication between the two apartments.

"She must have read it many times, for it was long before she came to me; but there was a glad smile on her lip, and a blush, stealing up even to her downcast eyes, when she re-opened the door and entered the room with me.

"She did not say that she intended to go to Dallas, but I read it in her face, and silently assisted her to change the simple gown which she wore for a more becoming dress, and smooth the tangled curls; but still she lingered, after this was done, and appeared so nervous and tremulous that I was obliged to accompany her to the foot of the staircase.

"I know not, Maud, the contents of that letter, nor what passed during the interview that followed; but Mabel came forth from the room leaning upon the arm of Dallas Annesly, who begged her mother's blessing upon their union.

"Did she give it? Was she unspeakably happy and thankful to her God? Oh! ye who have seen a shadow settle upon your household as the cloud that it seemed to threaten to overwhelm all in its blackness; so gloomy that none have thought of following it—and then the development of sunshine; so dark that even the youngest have ceased their sport as they looked on your saddened countenance, and have seen this dark cloud suddenly lifted from your hearts and homes, and the bright sunlight pour down with more than pristine glory, you, you can tell my feelings on that night!

"Do not think I was mindful of my brother's disappointment and exile,' he said, imagining that he read this thought in my face. 'Edward has never been loved Edward, and I were cruel to sacrifice her happiness and mine to such a consideration now.'

"My little Mabel sank at my feet and buried her face in my lap; and gracefully, and with manly dignity, he knelt beside her, and bowed his head with hers.

"Oh, I could have cried aloud with joy! To see those two, now alike dear to me, united in their love—one simple and beautiful, perhaps, as Mabel, whom he has forgotten—as, it may be, Dallas would have forgotten her had she married Edward.

"Oh no!" cried Maud, with enthusiasm; "he never would, I am sure. He would have loved on for ever and ever. Besides, what would they be disunited? Mabel would not be Mabel if she were not Dallas's wife, nor Dallas Dallas if he were not Mabel's husband."

"They are very devoted, I am aware; but then we can not tell, you know. Every thing is liable to change in this world, and the dead and the living are alike forgotten." But listen, Maude! do you not hear sleigh-bells?—it must be Nettie. Ran and open the door, child, while I brighten up the fire!"

A DAY'S RIDE:

A LIFE'S ROMANCE.

By CHARLES LEVER.

AUTHOR OF "CHARLES O'MALLEY," "HARRY LORREQUER," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XLI.

IF there be any thing in our English habits upon which no difference of opinion can exist, it is our evanescence to extend to a foreigner a degree of sympathy and an amount of interest that we obstinately deny to our own people. The English artiste struggling all but hopelessly against the most ominous influences, has but to displace the consonants or multiply the vowels of his name to be a fashion and a success.

I traveled in a sort of covered cart, with a mounted gendarme at either side of me. Indeed, the one faintly alleviating circumstance of my captivity was the style of those two lively-equipped giants, armed to the teeth, who were supposed to be essential to my safe-conduct. It was such an acknowledgment of what they had to apprehend from my well-known prowess and daring, so palpable a confession that every precaution was necessary against the daring intrepidity of a man of my stamp. At times, I almost wished they had put chains upon me. I thought how well it would look in my Memoirs; how I was "heavily manacled"—a great word that—orders being given to the escort to shoot me if I showed the slightest intention to escape. It was an intense pleasure to me to imagine myself a sort of Nana Sahib, and whenever we halted at some way-side public, and the idle loungers would draw aside the canvas covering and stare in at me, I did my utmost to call up an expression of fear and horror and wildness, and it was with a thrill of ecstasy I saw a little child clasp its mother by the neck, and scream out to come away as it beheld me.

On the second night of our journey we halted at a little village at the foot of the Ariberg, called Steinbruck, where, in default of a regular prison, they lodged me in an old tower, the lower part of which was used for a stable. It stood in the very centre of the town, and from its narrow barred window I could catch glimpses of the little world that moved about in happy freedom beneath me. I could see the Marktplatz, on which the fruits were now being taken down, and could mark that preparations for some approaching ceremony were going on. Of what nature I could not guess. A large space was neatly swept out, and at last strewn with saw-dust—signs unerring of some exhibition of swordsmanship or conjuring, of which the Tyrolese are warm admirers. The arrangements were somewhat more pretentious than are usually observed in open-air representations, for I saw seats prepared for the dignitaries of the village, and an evident design to mark the entertainment in under the most distinguished protection. The crowd—now considerable—observed all the decorous bearing of citizens in presence of their authorities.

I nestled myself snugly in the deep recess of the window to watch the proceedings, nor had I long to wait—some half dozen gayly-dressed individuals having now pierced their way through the throng, and commenced those peculiar gambols which bespeak backbones of gristle and legs of pasteboard. It is a class of performance I enjoy vastly. The two fellows who lap over each other like the links of a chain, and the creature who rolls himself about like a ball, and the licensed freedoms of that man of the world—the clown—never weary me, and I believe I laugh at them with all the more zest that I have so often laughed at them before. It was plain, after a while, that a more brilliant part of the spectacle was yet to come; for a large, bluff-looking man, in cocked-hat and buck-boots, now entered the ring, and indignantly ejected the clown by a most unceremonious kick—which, which I perceived were not merely make-believes.

"Ah, here he comes! here he is!" was now uttered in accents of eager interest, and an avenue was quickly made through the crowd for the new performer. There was delay after this, and though doubtless the crowd below could satisfy their curiosity, I was so highly perched and so secluded in my attendant that I ought to wait, with what patience I might, the new arrival. I was deep in my guesses what sort of "artist" he might prove, when I saw the head of a horse peering over the shoulders of the audience, and then the entire figure of the quadruped at the emergence into the circle, all sheeted and shrouded from gaze. With one dexterous sweep the groom removed all the clothing, and there stood before me my own lost treasure—Blondel himself! I would have known him among ten thousand. He was thinner, perhaps, certainly thinner; but in all other respects the same; his silky mane and his tassel of a tail hung just as gracefully as of yore, and as he ambled round he moved his head with a courteous inclination, as though to acknowledge the plaudits he met with.

There was in his air the dignity that said, "I am one who has seen better days. It was not always thus with me. Applaud if you must, and if you will; but remember that I accept your plaudits with reserve, and with infinite reluctance." Poor fellow, my heart bled for him! I felt as though I saw a cathedral canon cutting consommés, and all this while, by some strange inconsistency, I had not a sympathy to [illegible] for the human actors in the scene. "As for them," thought I, "they have accepted this degradation of their own free-will. If they had not shirked honest labor they need never have been clowns or pantaloons; but Blondel—Blondel, whom fate had stamped as the palfrey of some high-born maiden, or at least as the favorite steed of one who would know how to lavish care on an object of such perfection—Blondel, who had borne himself so proudly in high places, and who even in his declining fortunes had been the friend and fellow-traveler of ——. Yes, why should I refuse to say it? Posterity will speak of Potts without the detracting malice and envious rancor of contemporaries, and when in some future age a great philanthropist or statesman shall claim the credit of some marvelous discovery, some wondrous scarce by which humanity may be bettered, a learned critic will tell the world how this great invention was evidently known to Potts, how at such a time, or such a page, we shall find that Potts knew it all.

The wild cheering of the crowd beneath cut short these speculations, and I saw the actors in the mantering gayly round the circle, with a handkerchief in his mouth. If in sportive levity it chanced to fall, he would immediately kneel down and seize it, and then, whisking his tail and shaking his long forelock, resume his course again. It was fine, too, to mark the haughty indifference he manifested toward that wild, cracking monster who stood in the centre and affected to direct his motions. Not alone did he neglect his requirements, but absolutely in defiance did he canter up behind him, and alight with his fore-legs on the fellow's shoulders. I am not sure whether this was not the crowning act of the tableau as I did; but to me it seemed an allegorical representation of man and his master.

The hard looking fellow in buck-boots and the now made me turn my head, and I saw the jailer, who had come with my supper. A thoughtful-looking personage he was, too, down to those mountebanks and ask if they will sell that cream-colored pony," said I. "Bargain as though you were going for yourself—you look old and of little value, and you may perhaps secure him for eighty or ninety florins, and if so, you shall have ten more for your trouble. It is a rare price of mine, nothing more; but help me to gratify it."

He leered me out with evident astonishment, and then gravely asked if I had forgotten the circumstance that I was a prisoner, and likely to remain so for some time.

"Do as I bade you," said I, "and leave the result to me. There, lose no more time about it; for see the performance is drawing to a close."

"Nay, nay," said he, "I shall wait and get to come. The pretty Moorish girl has not yet appeared. Ha! here she is."

As he spoke I crept up into the window beside me, not less eager for the spectacle than myself. A vigorous cheer and a loud clapping of hands before announced that the fair one was in sight long before she was visible to our eyes.

"What can she do?" asked I, pensively perhaps, for I was a little annoyed at being thus had eclipsed poor Blondel in public favor. "What can she do? Is she a rope-dancer, or does she ride in the games of the circus?"

"There, there! Look at her—yonder she goes! and there's the young prince—they call him a prince, at least—who follows her everywhere."

I could not but smile at the poor jailer's simplicity, and would willingly have explained to him that we have outlived the age of Cinderellas. Indeed, I had half turned toward him with this object, when a perfect roar of the crowd beneath drew off my attention from him to what was going on below. I soon saw what it was that entranced the public: it was the young girl, who, standing on Blondel's back, was careering round the circle at full speed. It is an exercise in which neither the horse nor the rider can be said to surpass; the heavy monotonous tramp of the beast, cramped by the narrow limits, becomes a stilty, wooden gallop. The girl, too, more from habit of her balance than intent upon graceful action, restricts herself to a few, and by no means picturesque, attitudes. But the fact that the girl now before me seemed herself so intensely to enter into the enjoyment of the scene that all her gestures appeared the result of irrepressible delight. Far from unsteadying her foot, or limiting her action, the speed of the horse appeared to assist her in the performance of her graceful figure, as now, dropping on one knee, she would lean over to caress him, or now, standing erect, with folded arms and leg advanced, appear to dare him to dispute her. Faultlessly graceful as she was, there was that in her own evident enjoyment that imparted a strange pleasure to the beholder, and gave to the spectacle the sort of magnetism by which pleasure finds its way from heart to heart throughout a crowd. At last, I supposed this must have been so, for in the joyous cheering of that crowd there was a ring of wild delight of which I myself felt unconscious.

At last, poor Blondel, blown and wearied, turned abruptly into the middle of the ring, and with panting sides and head hung low stood a dead halt. The girl, with a graceful slide, seated herself on his back and patted him playfully. And no one thing so far the most graceful movement of the whole.

It was really a picture, and so natural and so easy withal, that one forgot all about her spangles and tinsel, the golden fillet of her hair, and the tawdry fringe of her sandals; and, what was even more odd, heard not the boisterous mouthed enthusiasm that greeted her. At length, a tall man, well dressed and of striking appearance, pushed his way into the ring, and apparently presented her with a bouquet, at which piece of courtesy the audience, nowise jealous, again redoubled their applause. She now looked round her with an air of triumphant pleasure, and while, with a playful gesture, she flung back the ringlets on her neck, she lifted her face full to my view, and it was Tintenfleck! With all my might I cried out, "Catinka! Catinka!" I know not why, but the impulse never waited to arrange the question. Though I screamed my loudest, the great laugh at which I was placed, and the humming din of the crowd, totally drowned my words. Again and again I called it, but to no purpose. There she sat, slowly making the round of the circus, while the stranger walked at her side, to all seeming conversing as though no busy and paying multitude stood watching and observing them. Wearied with my failure to attract notice, I turned to address the jailer, but he had already gone and I was alone. I next endeavored by a signal to call attention to me, and, at last, saw how two or three of them noticed my waving my handkerchief and were pointing it out to others. Doubtless they wondered how a poor captive could ever be in communication of any kind with whose commonest joys he was to be so sharer, and still greater was their astonishment as I flung forth a piece of money—a gold Napoleon it was—which they eagerly picked up and gave to Catinka. How I watched her as she took it and showed it to the stranger! He, by his gesture, appeared to direct her attention to me, though asking her to throw it away; and then there seemed some discussion between them, until his countenance changed also, too, grew passionate, and, leaping from the horse, strode haughtily across the circus and disappeared. At this moment there was confusion, the mob shouting madly for the Moorish girl to come back, and many much disposed to revenge the absence of the favorite. And for him, he pushed the crowd haughtily aside and went his way, and though for a while the crowd continued to pour its impatient clamor and noisy disappointment, the performance soon concluded, and all went their several roads homeward; and when I looked into the empty Platz, over which the dusky shadows of the old houses were now stealing to mingle together, and into which, from the unusual excitement saw a few lingering townsfolk moody and purposeless, I asked myself if the whole incidents were not my own mind-drawn and invented. There was not one single clew by which I could brace it to reality.

Through the barred window of my cell I could see the clear blue sky, the great constellations, and there was Orion slowly sloping to the west, and actually throwing a sheet of glittering light on the tapering chimneys of the houses. "Are there worlds up there," thought I, "human lives of work, and toil, and care, and sorrow, like our own? Or is it all myself at last croning like a ballad in this wise:

I wish I knew in the stars above
What sort of life I'm born to live,
Whether they know the pangs of love,
What are the books they read.

Can any one tell the aching lump
Is revolving upon an axis?
What kind of thing is a lunar swamp?
Do the people up there pay taxes?

Have they their tides to ebb and flow,
Salt seas to wash their shores?
And whenever out to dine they go
Are they jolted like us in horses?

When for a tall they open their hooses,
How do the Siderials caper?
Who performs the Star Promises?
Have they a Times new-paper?

I conclude they have their own aches and ills,
And I feel a sympathizing lump
That even they have their Holloway's pills
And a share of woe for a' that.

I feel, if I looked through a telescope,
Volcanic remains to see,
That my heart would thrill with a secret hope
Some Lunar was looking at me.

And whence does the telegraph bring them the news?
Who is the lightning conductor?
Do they worry themselves on the fate of the Jews,
Or the state of the tenor-voice?

Do they speculate, too, how old we are,
Whether we're square or round?
I'd like to know if they care
Whether we'll be buried or drowned?

"Here's your breakfast," said the jailer, as he stopped the coarse fare before me. "And the brigadier hopes you'll be speedy with it, for you must reach Malta by nightfall."

"Tell me," said I, eagerly, "was there a circus company in the town yesterday evening? Did they exhibit on the Platz there?"

"You are a deep one, you are!" muttered he, softly to himself, and left the cell.

CHAPTER XLII.

I NOBE up admirably on my journey. I felt I was doing a very heroic thing. By my persuasion of Harper I was securing that poor fellow's escape, and was about the time to get over the Austrian frontier, and many a mile away from the banks of the Double Eagle. I had read of such things, and knew that I should be I would not derogate from the proudest records of such self-devotion. Had I not remembered how heroes had suffered, and how simply have easily seen that Harper could by this time have arrived at Calcutta, but, unfortunately for me, I had not yet learned to feel cool and complete-ly forgot the long interval of my fever.

On reaching Innspruck I was sent on to an old château some ten miles away, called the Ambras Schloss, and being consigned to the charge of a retired artillery officer there, they seemed to have totally forgotten all about me. I lived with my old jailer just as if I were his friend: we worked together in the garden, pruned and raked and hoed and weeded; we smoked and fished, and mended our nets on wet days, and read, living exactly as might any two people in a remote out-of-the-world spot, but at length, what from habit and the absence of any thing to suggest a change, I ceased to wish for another existence than such as I led there.

There is a sort of armory at the Ambras, chiefly of old Tyrolese weapons of an early period—maces and halberds, double-headed swords and such-like—and one of our pastimes was arranging and settling them, and cataloguing them, for which, in the ancient records of the Schloss, there was ample material. This was an occupation that amused me vastly, and I took to it with great zeal, and with such success that old Hirsch, the jailer, at last consigned the whole to my charge, along with the task of exhibiting the collection to strangers—a source from which the honest veteran derived the better part of his means of life.

At first, I scarcely liked my function as showman, but like all my other experiences in life, habit sufficed to reconcile me, and I took to the occupation as though I had been born to it. If now and then some rude or vulgar traveler would ruffle my temper by some illiterate remark or stupid question, I was well repaid by intercourse with a different stamp. They were to me such peeps as the world as a monk might have from the narrow loop-holes of his cloister, tempting, perhaps, but always blended with the sense of the security that encompassed him and defended him from the snares of existence.

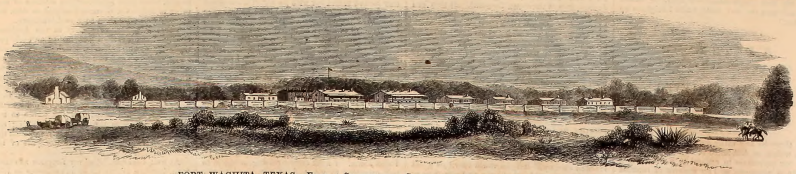
Perhaps the consciousness that I could assert my innocence and procure my freedom at any moment had more to do with few monks reconciled to this strange life; but certainly after a while I ceased to care for any other existence, and never turned my head either another past or future. I had, in fact, arrived at the great monastic elevation, in which a man, ceasing to be human, reaches the dignity of a vegetable.

I had begun, as I have said, by an act of heroism, in accepting all the penalties of another, and from that moment I ceased to revert to this sacrifice, the impulse it had once given still continued to move me. If Hirsch never alluded to my political crime to me, I was equally reserved toward him.

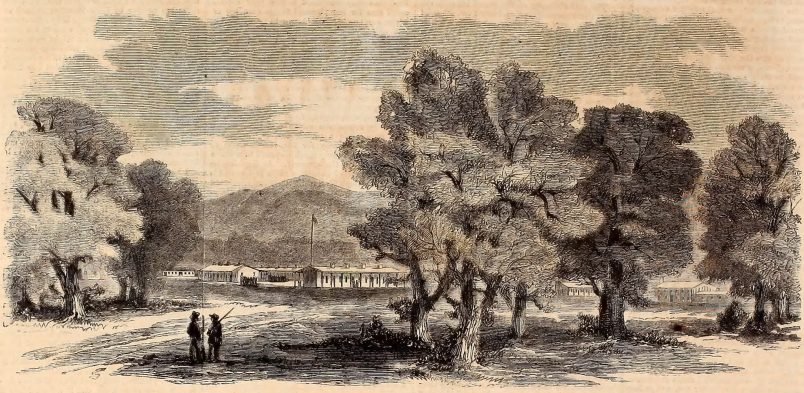
From time to time, a couple of grave, judicial-looking men would arrive and pass the forenoon in reading out certain documents to me. I never paid the slightest attention to their contents, for I asked for no change of life nor any other existence than the present one. At rare at moments would catch the strangest possible allegations as to my exalted political opinions, the dangerous principles I was known to hold, and the secret societies I belonged to. I heard once, too, and by a mere accident, how, at Stein, I had left the jailer to ride home on a horse, and thrown gold in handfuls from the windows of my prison to bribe the townsfolk to my escape, so hampered was my effort to show a deal of pleading and proof it would take to rebut all these allegations, and how little likely it was I could succeed in such a task as that.

By long dwelling on the thought of my noble devotion, and how it would read when I was dead and gone, the extinguished within my heart all desire for other distinction, calculating only on what strange and ingenious theories men would spin for his secret close to my motives. "True," they would say, "Potts never cared for Harpur. He was not a man to wh would have attached himself under any circumstances; they were, as individuals, totally unlike and unsympathetic. How, then, explain this extraordinary act of self-sacrifice? Was he prompted in the hope that the ignorance of the Austrian police system would receive the death-blow from his story, and that the mound that covered Harpur in the church-yard would be the altar of Liberty to thousands? or was Potts one of those enthusiastic creatures only too eager to carry the love of a friend to the pitch of a life?"

While I used thus to reason and speculate, I little knew that I had become a sort of European wonder. Like Baron Trenck and others, however, some vagrant tourist, had put me in her book as the half-witted creature who showed the coins and curiosities at Ambras, and mentioned how, for I know not how many years, I was never heard to utter a syllable except on questions of the coinage and antiquities. In consequence, I was always asked for by my traveling countrymen, and my peculiarities treated with all that mirthful good taste for which tourists are famous. I remember one day having refused to perform the showman to a British family, I had a headache, or was sulky, or a fit of rebellion had got hold of me, but I sauntered out into the grounds, and would not see them. In my walk through a close alley of laurels I chanced to overhear the strange conversing with Hirsch, and making myself the subject of her inquiries; and as I listened, I heard Hirsch say that one entire room of the château was devoted to the papers and documents in my case, and that probably it would occupy a month or more to read over merely to peruse them. He added, that as I made no application for a trial myself, nor any of my friends appeared to interest themselves in behalf of one now, the government would very probably leave me to live and die where I was. Thereupon, the Herrn broke out into a worship of my intelligent eloquence. He denounced the Hapsburgs and praised the Habsen Corpus; he raved of the power of the press, and, perhaps, quite forgot, our new friezes. He said he would make Europe ring with the case. It was as bad, it was worse than Caspar Hauser; for he was an idiot outright, and I appeared to have the enjoyment of certain faculties. He said it should appear in the Times, and he mentioned in the House; and as I listened, the strangest glow ran through me—a mild and pleasurable enthusiasm, to think that all the might, majesty, and power of Great Britain was about to interest itself in behalf of Potts!



FORT WACHITA, TEXAS.—FROM A SKETCH BY A GOVERNMENT DRAUGHTSMAN.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]



FORT ARBUCKLE, TEXAS.—FROM A SKETCH BY A GOVERNMENT DRAUGHTSMAN.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

FORT DAVIS, TEXAS, HEAD-QUARTERS OF THE EIGHTH INFANTRY.—FROM A SKETCH BY A GOVERNMENT DRAUGHTSMAN.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

THE WASHINGTON ARSENAL.

THE FORTS IN TEXAS.

WE publish on page 172, from views furnished by a draughtsman in the employ of the General Government, pictures of the three principal forts in Texas, which, according to the latest advices, have just been surrendered by General Twiggs to the secessionists. In connection with the event, we may mention that one of the last acts of the late Administration was the dismissal of General Twiggs from the army for treason.

FORT DAVIS, the head-quarters of the Eighth Infantry, is on the San Antonio and San Diego mail route. It is situated in a cañon of the Lyonpia Mountains, 120 miles from the City of Presidio del Norte, on the Rio Grande, and about 500 miles from San Antonio, TEXAS. It is in the midst of the country of the Mescalaro Apaches; and the garrison at different times has done good service in checking the Comanches in their plundering expeditions into Mexico, and chastising the Apaches for their thieving propensities. The scenery here is very beautiful; the immense rocks which form the sides of the cañon tower up 500 or 600 feet. It is not known yet whether the Texan troops have made any demonstration on this post.

FORT ARBUCKLE, which is said to have been recently seized by the Texan troops, protects the northern frontier of that State from the forays of the Comanches. It is situated on the Indian Reserve, and is, or was, garrisoned by detachments from the First Cavalry and one company First Infantry regiments. It is named after the late General Arbuckle, of the army. Captain Prince commands the post; Captain Sacket, Captain Beal, First-Lieutenants Stockton, Crittenden, and Powell, Second-Lieutenants Offley and Fish compose the Staff.

FORT WACHITA, situated on the Reserve, sixty miles southeasterly from Arbuckle, at latest dates was also said to have been seized by the Texan troops. It was, or is, garrisoned by two companies First Cavalry, Captain Carr; commander, Captain Wood. It was near here, in October, 1858, that Major Earl Van Dorn encountered and utterly routed the Comanches in a pitched battle.

ARSENAL AT WASHINGTON.

IN connection with the military movements now proceeding at Washington we publish herewith a view of the Arsenal at that city. It stands on the junction of the eastern branch with the Potomac, and is surrounded on three sides by water. Here are foundries, work-shops, magazines, laboratories, and every thing necessary for the manufacture of implements and materials of war. At the present time the Arsenal is a scene of great activity. In front of the Arsenal stand a collection of foreign brass cannon, some of which are trophies taken in battle at Saratoga, Yorktown, Niagara, and Vera Cruz.

GREAT EXPECTATIONS.

A NOVEL.

BY CHARLES DICKENS.

CHAPTER XXIV.

BENTLEY DRUMMLE, who was so sulky a fellow that he even took up a book as if its writer had done him an injury, did not take up an acquaintance in a more agreeable spirit. Heavy in figure, movement, and comprehension—in the sluggish complexion of his face, and in the large, awkward tongue that seemed to loll about in his mouth as he himself lolled about in a room—he was idle, proud, niggardly, reserved, and suspicious. He came of rich people down in Somersetshire, who had nursed this combination of qualities until they made the discovery that it was just of age and a blockhead. Thus Bentley Drummle had come to Mr. Pocket when he was a head taller than that gentleman, and half a dozen heads thicker than most gentlemen.

Startop had been spoiled by a weak mother and kept at home when he ought to have been at school; but he was devotedly attached to her, and admired her beyond measure. He had a woman's delicacy of feature, and was—"as you may see, though you never saw her," said Herbert to me—exactly like his mother. It was but natural that I should take to him much more kindly than to Drummle, and that even in the earliest evening of our boating he and I should pull homeward abreast of one another, conversing from boat to boat, while Bentley Drummle came up in our wake alone, under the overhanging banks and among rushes. He would always creep in shore like some uncomfortable amphibious creature, even when the tide would have sent him fast upon his way, and I always think of him as coming after us in the dark or by the back-water, when our own two boats were breaking the sunset or the moonlight in mid-stream.

Herbert was my most intimate companion and friend. I presented him with a half-share in my boat, which was the occasion of his often coming down to Hammersmith; and my possession of a half-share in his chambers often took me up to London. We used to walk between the two places at all hours, and I have an affection for the road yet (though it is not so pleasant a road as it was then), formed in the impressibility of untried youth and hope.

When I had been in Mr. Pocket's family a month or two Mr. and Mrs. Camilla turned up. Camilla was Mr. Pocket's sister. Georgiana, whom I had seen at Miss Havisham's on the same occasion, also turned up. She was a cousin—an indigestive single woman, who called her rigidity religion, and her liver love. These people hated me with the hatred of cupidity and disappointment. As a matter of course, they fawned upon me in my prosperity with the basest meanness. Toward Mr. Pocket, as a sort of grown-up infant with no notion of his own interests, they showed the complacent forbearance I had heard them express. Mrs. Pocket they held in contempt; but they allowed the poor dear soul to have been heavily disappointed in life, because that shed a full reflected light upon themselves.

These were the surroundings among which I settled down, and applied myself to my education. I soon contracted expensive habits, and began to spend an amount of money that within a few short months I should have thought almost fabulous; but, through good and evil, I stuck to my books. There was no other merit in this than my having sense enough to feel my deficiencies. Between Mr. Pocket and Herbert I got on fast, and with one or the other always at my elbow to give me the directions I wanted, and clear obstructions out of my road, I must have been as great a dolt as Drummle if I had done less.

I had not seen Mr. Wemmick for some weeks, when I thought I would write him a note and propose to go home with him on a certain evening. He replied that it would give him much pleasure, and that he would expect me at the office at six o'clock. Thither I went, and there I found him putting the key of his safe down his back as the clock struck.

"Did you think of walking down to Walworth?" said he.

"Certainly," said I, "if you approve."

"Very much," was Wemmick's reply, "for I have had my legs under the desk all day, and shall be glad to stretch 'em. Now I'll tell you what I have got for supper, Mr. Pip. I have got a stewed steak—which is of home preparation—and a cold roast fowl—which is from the cook-shop. I think it's tender, because the master of the shop was a juryman in some cases of ours the other day, and we let him down easy. I reminded him of that when I bought the fowl, and I said, 'Pick us out a good one, old fellow, because if we had chosen to keep you in the box another day or two we could easily have done it.' He said to that, 'Let me make you a present of the best fowl in the shop.' I let him, of course. As far as it goes, it's property and portable. You don't object to an aged parent, I hope?"

I really thought he was still speaking of the fowl, until he added, "Because I have got an aged parent at my place." I then said what politeness required.

"So you haven't dined with Mr. Jaggers yet?" he pursued, as we walked along.

"Not yet."

He told me so this afternoon when he heard you were coming to see me. I expect you'll have an invitation to-morrow. He's going to ask your pals, too. Three of 'em, ain't there?"

Although I was not in the habit of counting Drummle as one of my intimate associates, I said "Yes."

"Well, he's going to ask the whole gang"—I hardly felt complimented by the word—"and whatever he gives you, he'll give you good. Don't look forward to variety, but you'll have excellence. And there's another fish thing in his house," proceeded Wemmick, after a moment's pause, as if the remark bestowed on the housekeeper was understood; "he never lets a door or window be fastened at night."

"Is he never robbed?"

"That's it," returned Wemmick. "He says, and gives it out publicly, 'I want to see the man who'll rob me.' Lord bless you, I have heard him a hundred times if I have heard him

"MOLLY, LET THEM SEE BOTH YOUR WRISTS. SHOW THEM. COME!"

once, say to regular cracksmen in our front office, 'You know where I live; now no bolt is ever drawn there; why don't you do a stroke of business with me? Come, can't I tempt you?' Not a man of 'em, Sir, would be bold enough to try it on for love or money."

"They dread him so much," said I.

"Dread him?" said Wemmick. "Ah! I believe you, they dread him. Not but what he's artful, even in his defiance of 'em. No silver, Sir. Britannia metal, every spoon."

So they wouldn't have much, I observed, "even if they—"

"Ah! but he would have much," said Wemmick, cutting me short, "and they know it. He'd have their lives, and the lives of scores of 'em. He'd have all he could get. And it's impossible to say what he couldn't get, if he gave his mind to it."

I was falling into meditation on my guardian's greatness, when Wemmick roused me:

"As to the absence of plate, that's only his natural depth. A viver's its natural depth, and he's his natural depth. Look at his watch-chain. That's real enough."

"'Tis very massive," said I.

"Massive it is," repeated Wemmick. "I think so. And his watch is a gold repeater, and worth a hundred pounds if it's worth a penny, Mr. Pip! I have seen five hundred blunt notes in one room who know all about that watch; there's not a man, a woman, or a child among 'em who wouldn't identify the smallest link in that chain, and drop it as if it was red-hot if inveigled into touching it."

At first with such discourse, and afterward with conversation of a more general nature, did Mr. Wemmick and I beguile the time and the road until he gave me to understand that we had arrived in the district of Walworth.

It appeared to be a collection of back lanes, ditches, and little gardens, and to present the aspect of a mighty dull retirement. Wemmick's house was a little wooden cottage in the midst of plots of garden, and the top of it was cut out and painted like a battery mounted with guns.

"My own doing," said Wemmick. "Looks pretty; don't it?"

I highly commended it. I think it was the smallest house I ever saw; with the queerest Gothic windows (by far the greater part of them sham), and a Gothic door, almost too small to get in at.

"There's a real flag-staff, you see," said Wemmick, "and when Sunday I run up a real flag. Then look here. After I have crossed this bridge, I hoist it up—so—and cut off the communication."

The bridge was a plank, and it crossed a chasm about four feet wide and two deep. But it was very pleasant to see the pride with which he hoisted it up and made it fast; smiling as he did so with a relish, and not merely mechanically.

"At nine o'clock every night, Greenwich time," said Wemmick, "the gun fires. There he is, you see; and when you hear him go, I think you'll say he's a Stinger."

The piece of ordnance referred to was mounted in a separate fortress, lightly constructed of lattice-work. It was protected from the weather by an ingenious little tarpaulin contrivance in the nature of an umbrella.

"Then, at back," said Wemmick, "out of sight, so as not to impede the idea of fortifications—for it's a principle with me, if you have an idea, carry it out and keep it up. I don't know whether that's your opinion—"

I said, decidedly.

"At the back, there's a pig, and there are fowls and rabbits; then I devote together my own little farm, you see, and grow cucumbers; and you'll judge at supper what sort of a salad I can raise. So, Sir," said Wemmick, smiling again, but rather seriously too, "if you can suppose the little place besieged, it would hold out a devil of a time in point of provisions."

Then he conducted me to a bower about a dozen yards off, but which was approached by such inquiring twists of path that it took quite a long time to get at; and in this retreat our glasses were already set forth. Our punch was cooling in a fountain-shell, in whose margin the bower was raised. This piece of water (with an island in the middle which might have been the salad for supper) was of a circular form, and he had contrived a fountain in it, which, when you set a little mill going and took a cork out of a pipe, played to that powerful extent that it made the back of your hand quite wet.

"I am my own engineer, and my own carpenter, and my own plumber, and my own gardener, and my own Jack of all Trades," said Wemmick, in acknowledging my compliments. "Well, it's a good thing, you know. It brushes the Blue Devils sideways, and pleases the Aged. You wouldn't mind being at once introduced to the Aged, would you? It wouldn't put you out?"

I expressed the readiness I felt, and we went into the Castle. There we found, sitting by a fire, a very old man in a flannel coat; clean, cheerful, comfortable, and well cared for, but intensely deaf.

"Well, aged parent," said Wemmick, shaking hands with him in a cordial and jocose way, "how are you?"

"All right, John; all right!" replied the old man.

"Here's Mr. Pip, aged parent," said Wemmick, "and I wish you could hear his name. Nod away at him, Mr. Pip; that's what he likes. Nod away at him, like winking!"

"This is a fine piece of my son's, Sir," piped the old man, while I nodded as hard as I possibly could. "This is a pretty pleasure-ground, Sir. This spot and these beautiful works upon it ought to be kept together by the Nation after my son's time, for the people's enjoyment."

"You're as proud of it as Punch; ain't you, aged parent?" said Wemmick, contemplating the old man with his hard face really softened; "there's a nod for you," giving him a tremendous one; "there's another for you," giving him a still more tremendous one; "you like that, don't you? If you're not tired, Mr. Pip—though I know it's tiring to strangers—tell him one more. You can't think how it pleases him."

I tipped him several more, and he was in great spirits. While Wemmick brought out and fed the fowls, and sat down to our punch in the arbor; where Wemmick told me as he smoked a pipe that it had taken him a good many years to bring the property up to its present point of perfection.

"Is it your own, Mr. Wemmick?"

"Oh yes," said Wemmick; "I have got hold of it, a bit at a time. It's a freehold, by George!"

"Is it, indeed? I hope Mr. Jaggers admires it?"

"Never seen it," said Wemmick. "Never heard of it. Never seen the Aged. Never heard of him. Not his sort. Nothing is his sort, private life is another. When I go into the office I leave the Castle behind me, and when I come into the Castle I leave office behind me. If it's not in any way disagreeable to you, you'll oblige me by doing the same. I don't wish it professionally mentioned. Here it is."

Of course I felt my good faith to be involved in the observance of his request. The punch being very weak, we sent to the Aged, as it did talking until it was almost nine o'clock. "Getting near gun-fire," said Wemmick then, as he laid down his pipe, "and the Aged always fires me. If it's not in any way disagreeable to you, you'll oblige me by doing the same. I don't wish it professionally mentioned. Here it is."

Of course I felt my good faith to be involved in the observance of his request. The punch being very weak, we sent to the Aged. Never heard of him. Not his sort. Nothing is his sort, private life is another. When I go into the office I leave the Castle behind me, and when I come into the Castle I leave office behind

"Come, Mr. Drummle, since we are on the subject, I'll tell you what passed between Herbert here and me when you borrowed that money."

"I don't want to know what passed between Herbert there and you," growled Drummle. And I think he added, in a lower growl, that we might go to the devil and shake ourselves.

"I'll tell you, however," said I, "whether you want to know or not. We said that as you put it in your pocket, you seemed to be immensely amused at his being such an ass as to lend it."

Drummle laughed outright, and sat laughing in our faces, with his hands in his pockets and his round shoulders raised, plainly signifying that it was quite true, and that he despised us as asses all.

Hercupon Startop took him in hand, though with a much better grace than I had shown, and exhorted him to be a little more agreeable. Startop being a lively, bright young fellow, and Drummle being the exact opposite, the latter was always disposed to resent him as a direct personal affront. He now retorted in a coarse, lumpish way, and Startop tried to turn the discussion aside with some small pleasantry that made us all laugh. Resenting this little success more than any thing, Drummle, without any threat or warning, pulled his hands out of his pockets, dropped his round shoulders, swore an oath, took up a large glass, and would infallibly have flung it at his adversary's head, but for our entertainer's dexterously seizing it at the instant when it was raised for that purpose.

"Gentlemen," said Mr. Pocket, very deliberately putting down the glass, and hauling out his gold repeater by its massive chain, "I am sorry to announce that it's half past nine."

On this hint we all rose to depart. Before we got to the street-door Startop was cheerfully calling Drummle "old fellow," as if nothing had happened. But the old fellow was so far from responding that he would not even walk to Hammersmith on the same side of the way: so Herbert and I, who remained faithful, saw them going down the street on opposite sides; Startop leading, and Drummle lagging on behind in the shadow of the houses, much as he was wont to follow in his boat.

As the door was not yet shut I thought I would say Herbert there for a moment, and run up stairs again to say a word of apology to my guardian. I found him in his dressing-room, surrounded by his books, already hard at it washing his hands of us.

I told him that I had come up again to say how sorry we were that any thing disagreeable should have occurred, and that I hoped he would not blame me very much.

"Tush, tush, sharing his face, and speaking through the water-drops; "it's nothing. Pip. I like that Spider though."

He had turned towards me now, and was shaking his head, and blowing, and toweling himself.

"I am glad you like him, Sir," said I; "but I don't."

"No, no," my guardian assented; "don't have too much to do with him. Keep as clear of him as may be. Mind I like the fellow, Pip; he is one of the true sort; I have not been disappointed in him. Why, if I were a fortune-teller—"

Looking out of the towel, he caught my eye.

"But I am not a fortune-teller," he said, letting his head drop into a fortcon of towel, and toweling away at his two ears. You know what I am. Good-night, Sir."

"Good-night, Sir."

In about a month after that the Spider's time with Mr. Pocket was up for good, and to the great relief of the house but Mrs. Pocket, he went home to the family hole. He called the Blacksmith when he went away, qualified to be an indifferent hoster or a bad gamekeeper.

A BEGGAR'S LOVE.

I'm wan and thin, and worse for the wear;
My clothes are old, and tattered, and torn;
And there is not a man in all the town
That looks so thoroughly sad and forlorn.
I wander about the streets all day;
I sleep wherever I can at night;
I'm an idle, haggerly fellow, they say,
And what they say says, I suppose, is right.

She is fresh and bright as a new-blown rose,
And sweet as the twilight her pensive face:
And round her undulant shape there flows
A cloud of silver and a mist of lace.
Flowers cling fondly about her head,
Drinking the sunlight that makes in her hair;
Her beauty would almost awake the dead:
Can you wonder that I—the beggar—should dare?

I love her—yes, I, with my shocken feet,
With my ragged coat, and my ragged coat;
Dismally looking shag the street,
The haggerd fellow they say's I suggest.
I can not help—am I not a man?—
Loving this beauty that gilds the earth.
The beggar is no more under a ban,
In this respect, than the man of birth.

At night, when the city is rife with the roll
Of carriages speeding to ball, and ball,
I am on the spot, with an eager soul,
To see her flash through the crowded hall.
Feathers and roses she others see,
Solitiant diamonds, and downy lace;
While there is but a single sight for me—
The sight of that sweet angelic face.

Every day, when the clock strikes four,
She comes in her beauty down Broadway;
Sometimes she stops at some gaudy store,
And buys a ribbon or trinket gay.
I view the reason—I watch her well;
I see her coloring, erm in, erm.
With a handsome, kid-gloved, well-dressed swell—
But I wish him no harm—I wish him no harm!

If I had his money and well-cut clothes,
And his waxed mustache, and his ruby face,
Instead of this haggard mask, who knows
But I might be quite as well in her grace?
But, bah! what use in my thinking thus,
When such hopeless thoughts I can drown in a glass?
My only pleasure—poor beggarly cuss!—
Is to stand at a corner and see her pass.

I blush to say it—yes, I blush—I do—
I ask her for alms, with tremulous lips!
But cowards—you know the use reason why—
'Tis to feel the touch of her finger-tips.
Though the coin that they drop in my hand degrades,
The kindly word that she gives redeems;
And though my exertions might garner no grades,
She fills my vigils with pleasant dreams.

I am a beggar, I know full well—
I will die in a gutter, the people say;
But the handsome, kid-gloved, inlaid swell
Will splendidly marry her some fine day.
Well, let him do it, with ring and with flowers;
But he can not take from me, I guess, the right
To bless her with all the boundless hours,
And tell the tale of a pauper dead.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

REYNOLD'S SPECIFIC FOR GOUT AND RHEUMATISM.
This justly celebrated medicine, shipped from England by the proprietor alone to CARLE & STRONG, No. 153 Water St., corner of Maiden Lane, New York, urgently recommends all who are afflicted with Gout and Rheumatism to give it a trial. A single dose relieves the most agonizing pains; and, repeated a few times, restores the use of the limbs, and leaves the patient in perfect ease and quiet. Price one dollar.

WEDDINGS for the UNION — Supplied with Cards, Notes, Satin Ties, Envelopes, &c., of the latest styles, at fair prices, by A. DEMAREST, Engraver, No. 183 Broadway, cor. John St., N. Y. Samples by mail.

Premature Loss of the Hair,

Which is so common now-a-days, may be entirely prevented by the use of Burnett's Cocoaine. It has been used in thousands of cases where the hair was coming out in handfuls, and has never failed to arrest its decay, and to promote a healthy and vigorous growth. It is, at the same time, unrivalled as a dressing for the hair. A single application will render it soft and glossy for several days.

Agents Wanted.

A $3 MAP FOR 25 CENTS; USEAL PRICE FOR such a Map $3 and $5. Mitchell's United States Railroad Map is now ready for the people for 25 cents, colored in States. It is four feet square, printed on an entire sheet of fine white paper, and can be mailed anywhere in strong wrappers for one cent postage. It exhibits the whole country, from MAINE to TEXAS, and every railroad finished up to the first day of February, 1861. Every station is laid down, every river and lake, every mountain in America. 30,000 towns, stations, and cities are marked on the map. Over 1,000 names will be sold by fifty copies a day, and clear $6. Sole rights in counties given. Apply for Private Circulars, Terms, &c., to S. AUGUSTUS MITCHELL, No. 23 South Eighth St., Philadelphia. Refers to all railroad companies, North and South, as to correctness of Lloyd's United States Map.

T. T. LLOYD, Agent, 304 Broadway, New York.
No stamps taken.

Coughs.

The administration of medicinal preparations in the form of a Lozenge, is of course objectionable, when more simple and convenient, more especially as regards a remedy for Coughs. Brown's Bronchial Troches, or Cough Lozenges, allay Irritation which induces Coughing, having a direct influence to the affected parts.

ARTIFICIAL LIMBS.—A. A. MARKS, 307 Broadway, N.Y. City, makes the best in the world, at reduced prices and with additional improvements.

Spasmodic Asthma.

The most severe cases of this dreadful complaint have been cured by a few doses of Jones Wistonwin's Remedy for Asthma, and in no instance has it failed to give immediate relief. Prepared only by JOSEPH BURNETT & CO., Boston. For sale by all Druggists at $1 00 per bottle.

New Edition now Ready—
THE HAND-BOOK OF ARTILLERY, for the Instruction of Officers and Cadets of the United States (Army and Militia). By Capt. JOSEPH ROBERTS, 4th Regiment Artillery, U. S. Army.
Second edition, revised and enlarged.
One vol. 18mo, flexible cloth, 75 cents.
Sent free by mail on receipt of price.
D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher, No. 192 BROADWAY.

THE BEST SPRING AND FALL MEDICINE.—Delicate Ladies and Young Children will find the curative and invigorating properties of SANDS' SARSAPARILLA effect the most surprising results, purifying the whole system, and thoroughly renovating the system. For sale by A. B. & D. SANDS & CO., 141 Fulton St., New York.

LE BON TON—THE BEST LADIES' FASHION BOOK in the World. Specimen pages with two valuable patterns, postpaid for 13 cents.
S. T. TAYLOR, 371, 307 Broadway, N. Y.

'No Chimney'

Burns, will fit any Coal Oil Lamp.

We have perfected a burner for burning Coal Oil without a chimney, so as applied to any Coal Oil Lamp. We will send the burner by mail to any address, on the receipt of $1 25. Please register letters.

CALLENDER'S GARBO-AIR GAS LAMP burns pure Coal Oil in the shape of gas without a chimney. Price $3 for a single Lamp. Enclose stamp and send for Circulars.
Address, CALLENDER & PRICE, Dealers in Oil and Lamps, 178 Broadway, and No. 9 Courtlandt St., New York.

Trusses.—Dr. Riggs' Waterproof Multipad Trusses has lately become hitherto unknown. Warranted perfect for five years. Young subjects invariably cured. Send for a Pamphlet. 7 Barclay St., N. Y. Also Varicocele Truss.

The Working Farmer,

A large Agricultural Monthly Magazine,
(Regular Subscription price $1 00 per annum).
For $2 40 a Year.
Both Papers for less than the Subscription Price of One.
The Working Farmer
Is Edited by PROF. J. J. MAPES assisted by a Corps of Scientific and Practical writers, who are practically engaged in conducting the several departments upon which they write.
Vol. 13 COMMENCES WITH JAN. 1ST, 1861.
Specimen copies free on application.
Remit subscription to
CHAS. V. MAPES,
126 and 128 Nassau, and 11 Beekman Street,
New York.

H. WORCESTER'S
IMPROVED PIANO FORTES;
Manufactory & Salesrooms,
14th St., cor. 3d Av., N. Y.

The Right Place to Buy Jewelry.

W. A. HAYWARD,
MANUFACTURING JEWELER,
209 Broadway, New York.
No one purchasing Jewelry of any description, should fail to call at W. A. HAYWARD before purchasing, or send him an order for samples.
Any one wishing samples to order from, can have the same sent with the privilege of returning any thing they may not want.
N.B. FULL ASSORTMENT of Goods for the $1 00 STORES and JEWELRY ENVELOPES.

WEDDING CARDS.
Specimens by Mail on receipt of postage stamps.
EVERDELL & BROTHER, 302 Broadway, N. Y.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—My Onguent will force them in a few months, or in six weeks upon the smooth face, or no pay. Sent by mail, free, to any address, on receipt of an order. E. FRANKLIN, No. 199 Fulton Street, N. Y.

WANTED—MEN, WOMEN, AND BOYS in every Town, City, and Village in the United States, to act as Agents for the sale of Sherman & Co.'s Gift Jewelry Envelopes. Agents can make from 3 to 8 dollars a day. Being the only house in the manufacture of a superior quality of Jewelry, we are enabled to offer to Agents inducements to engage in the most valuable Gift-Enterprise ever offered. Send for circulars, SHERMAN & CO., 229 Broadway, corner of Barclay Street, New York.

DISEASES OF THE THROAT AND LUNGS.
BY R. T. TRALL, M.D.
There is no doubt that the author has clearly traced this very prevalent and popularly perplexing class of diseases to their true origin, and pointed out the best, and the only natural, plan of prevention or cure. The wide-spread distribution, therefore, of the little book can hardly fail to save hundreds of valuable lives, while Bronchitis, if generally adopted by society, would at once arrest the fearful ravages of Consumption, and its pulmonic maladies, which now threaten, ere long, to ruin, if not extirpate, the human race.
Its Contents embrace: Preliminary Remarks — Forms of Consumption — Latent Affection of the Throat and Lungs — Geography of Consumption in the United States — Causes of Consumption — Predisposed Liable to Consumption—Stages of Consumption—Prognosis—Treatment of Consumption—Bronchitis and Catarrh—Clothing—Diet—Drink—Bathing—"Throat-Ail"—Quinsy—Croup—Lung Hæmorrhage—Influenza—Bronchocele.
Copies sent, post-paid, for 25 cents.
FOWLER AND WELLS,
308 Broadway, New York.

A GREAT CURE.—De Leland's ANTI-RHEUMATIC BAND permanently cures Rheumatism, Gout, and Neuralgia, and all Spiritual Diseases. Price $2. Sent per mail or express. Descriptive circulars sent free. Agents wanted everywhere. G. SMITH & CO., Proprietors, office, 491 Broadway, N.Y.

Constitution Water.

The only Known Remedy for Diabetes, Irritation of the Neck of the Bladder, Inflammation of the Kidneys, and Catarrh of the Bladder, Stravgury, Gravel, Calculus, Brick Dust Deposit, and all Diseases of the Urinary Organs. Prepared only by DR. HOLLICK, 376 Broadway, New York. Sold by all Druggists. Price $1 00. Wm. H. GYGER & Co., Proprietors, Philadelphia, Pa. Agents, General Agents, No. 40 Chatham Street, New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.
Have just Published:
THE LAKE REGIONS OF CENTRAL AFRICA. A Narrative. By RICHARD F. BURTON, Capt. H.M.I. Indian Army; Fellow and Gold Medallist of the Royal Geographical Society. With Maps and Engravings on Wood. 8vo, Muslin, $3 00; Half Calf, $5 00. (Now Ready.) Illustrated Londonized.
HARPER'S GREEK AND LATIN TEXTS. Cheap, Accurate, and Convenient Editions of the Classics for the use of Schools and Students. Superior to other editions in mechanical execution, and more convenient in form.
Now Ready:
ÆSCHYLUS. Ex Novissima Recensione Frederici Augusti Paleyi. Accessit Verborum quæ punctione notanda sunt et Nominum Propriorum Index. 32mo, Flexible Binding, 40 cents.
HORATIUS. Quintii Horatii Flacci Opera Omnia. Ex Recensione A. J. MACLEANE. 18mo, Muslin, Flexible Binding, 40 cents.
EURIPIDES. Ex Recensione FREDERICI A. PALEY. Accessit Verborum et Nominum Index. 3 vols. 18mo, Flexible Binding, $1 20.
HERODOTUS. Recensuit Josephus Williams Blakesley, S.T.B., Coll. ss. Trin. apud Cantabr. Quotidian Section. 2 vols. 18mo, Muslin, Flexible Binding, 80 cents.
THUCYDIDES. Recensuit JOANNES GUILIELMUS DONALDSON, S.T.P., Coll. ss. Trin. apud Cantabr. Quotidian Section. 2 vols. 18mo, Muslin, Flexible Binding, 80 cents.
Others in Preparation.
☞ Any of the above Works sent by Mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of price.

History of the United Netherlands.

From the Death of William the Silent to the Synod of Dort. With a Full View of the English-Dutch Struggle against Spain: and of the Origin and Destruction of the Spanish Armada. By JOHN LOTHROP MOTLEY, LL.D., D.C.L., Corresponding Member of the Institute of France, Author of "The Rise of the Dutch Republic." With Portraits and Maps. 2 vols. 8vo, Muslin, $4 00; Sheep, $4 50; Half Calf, $5 00.
THE RISE OF THE DUTCH REPUBLIC. By the same. An elaborate history of the United Netherlands — we owe him English homage. — LONDON ATHENÆUM.
His lasting and truthful picture of events. — QUARTERLY REVIEW (London), Jan., 1861.
For the time the present one has been in historical works of the highest merit, many of them can be ranked with these volumes in the grand qualities of subject, accuracy, and vivid interest. — EDINBURGH QUARTERLY REVIEW, Jan., 1861.
This noble work. — THE PRESS (Philadelphia).
One of the most fascinating as well as important histories of the century. — Col. N. Y. EVENING POST.
A book which abounds in heroism, and which every body should read. — Judge JOHN CAMPBELL, LONDON ATHENÆUM.
Already takes a rank among standard works of history. — LONDON CRITIC.
Mr. Motley's prose epic. — LONDON SPECTATOR.
Its pages are pregnant with instruction. — LONDON LITERARY GAZETTE.
We may greet its advent every page of his narrative. But the Spanish Armada and the Siege of Leyden are splendidly presented in this History of the United Netherlands. — NEW YORK TIMES.
PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States not exceeding 3000 miles, on receipt of the Money.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
For April, 1861.

CONTENTS.
THREE MONTHS AT LABRADOR. By CHARLES HALLOCK.—First Paper.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Leaving the Eclipse.—I told you so.—On Deck.—A Day's Shooting.—An Artist's Table.—Iceberg.—Sabine.—Ashore.—Indian Light-House.—Henley Harbor.—Pulpit Cave.—Dressing Fish.—Cupid.—The Island.—Cape Harrison.—Total Eclipse.
MUSIC AT NIGHT.
A DISH OF CAPON.
ILLUSTRATION.—Capon Springs.—Colonel Davy Maddox.—Aunt Leah.—Bob Myers.—Isaac Hershey.—The Baby.—Adam Rudolph.
A CHAPTER ON MITTS.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Seeing Domestication.—Cheese Mite.—Milk Mite.—Rose Mite.—Acarus Crista.—Acarus Scabiei.—Acarus Marginatus.—Louse Mucedin.—Acarus Coniger.—Hydrachna Geographica.—Hydrachna Globosa.—Gamasus Coleoptratorum.
BAREY, THE HORSE TAMER. By T. B. THORPE.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Cruiser Untamed.—Cruiser Tamed.—Taming a Groom.—Groom Bridled.—Cruiser's Debut.—Untamed Groom.—Gentlemanly Horse.—The Swedish Mode.—The English Mode.
TWELVE YEARS OF MY LIFE.
THE CHILD'S FIRST EASTER EGGS. By FITZ JAMES O'BRIEN.
MOTLEY'S HISTORY OF THE UNITED NETHERLANDS.
CATTLE OF THE LAST CENTURY.
THE OFFICE OF RELIEVING.
MINOT'S LEDGE.
LOST ON A RAILWAY.
THE ADVENTURES OF PHILIP. By W. M. THACKERAY.
CHAPTER VI. Brandon's.
CHAPTER VII. Implorter veteris Bardi.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Good Society.—Mr. Frog and Prince Oc.—The Old Fogies.—In Waiting.
THE CHILD THAT LOVED A GRAVE.
THE THREE KINGS.
MRS. GRUNDY'S AT FORTY.
MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.
LITERARY NOTICES.
EDITOR'S TABLE.
EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.
DRAWER [CONTINUED].
EDITOR'S DRAWER.
LEAVES FROM LITTLE DAUGHTER'S LIFE.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Fussy's Affliction.—In Powder.—Dreamland.—Her Beau.—sitting up.—Abstinency.—Dolly's Baby.—Dressed up.—At Night.—The Doll in Disgrace.
PASSIONS FOR APRIL.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Spring Pelisse.—Morning Negligee.

The Publishers of HARPER'S MAGAZINE have the pleasure of announcing that the NEW NOVEL by the Author of "Adam Bede" and the "Mill on the Floss" is nearly completed, and that its publication will be commenced in an early Number of the Magazine.

The present Number contains an opening paper on "Labrador." The Illustrations are from Photographs taken expressly for the Magazine. Those in the present Number relate to the Labrador coast. The succeeding paper will contain Illustrations of Scenery and Incidents in the Interior. They are probably the first accurate pictures ever given of that interesting region. The next two papers will be followed by others, describing the most interesting portions of the Fisheries in America. The "Chapter on Mites" is a continuation of the series of Entomology which have attracted no little attention among scientific men in Europe and America. This paper, as well as the previous ones on "Destructive Insects," shows the great importance, in a multitude of commercial points of view, of a thorough investigation into the structure and habits of the minute insect world. The article on the "Horse Tamer" was written by a gentleman and illustrated from data obtained directly from Mr. BAREY, and furnishes the most authentic account of his career that has been given to the public.

The other articles in this Number will be found fully to sustain the character of the Magazine in all its departments.

Any Number will be sent by Mail, post-paid, for Twenty-five Cents. Any Volume, comprising Six Numbers, neatly bound in Cloth, will be sent by Mail, to any part of the United States within 3000 miles of New York, post-paid, for Two Dollars per Volume. Complete Sets will be sent by Express, the freight or the charge of the purchaser, at a Discount of Twenty-five per Cent. from the above rate. Twenty-Two Volumes, now ready, extending from June, 1850, to November, 1860, are now ready.

HARPER'S WEEKLY will be sent gratuitously for one month — as a specimen — to any one who applies for it. Specimen Numbers of the MAGAZINE will also be sent gratuitously.

TERMS.
One Copy for one Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) . 2 00
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Thirty Subscribers.
As HARPER'S WEEKLY is Stereotyped, Numbers can be supplied from the commencement.
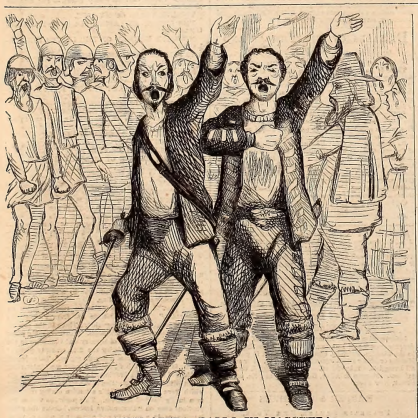
HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

OFFICE-SEEKERS AT WASHINGTON DURING THE INAUGURATION.

These Gentlemen, who are ready, like good Patriots, to serve their Country, are all ORIGINAL LINCOLN MEN. 'Tis true, they voted for PIERCE and BUCHANAN; but this was a deep game to insure the Election of LINCOLN in 1860.



THE NEW OPERA, BALLO IN MASCHERA.

Ye Manners and Customes of ye Solid Men of Boston in ye Year of Grace 1765, as related by Mr. VERDI, and illustrated by ye Artist's Association of ye Academia of Musick.

A DUST-STORM IN BROADWAY.

Sudden disappearance of half of your Friend and the whole of your Eyesight.

HARPER & BROTHERS, FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK, have just Published:

CHILDREN'S PICTURE-BOOKS. Square 4to, about 300 pages each, beautifully printed on tinted paper, embellished with many Engravings, bound in Muslin gilt, 75 cents per Volume; or, the Series complete in neat case, Price $3 00.

THE CHILDREN'S BIBLE PICTURE-BOOK. Illustrated by Eighty Engravings, from Designs by STEINLE, OVERBECK, VEIT, SCHNORR, &c.

THE CHILDREN'S PICTURE FABLE-BOOK. Containing One Hundred and Sixty Fables. With Sixty Illustrations by HARRISON WEIR.

THE CHILDREN'S PICTURE-BOOK OF BIRDS. Illustrated with Sixty-one Engravings by W. HARVEY.

THE CHILDREN'S PICTURE-BOOK OF QUADRUPEDS and other Mammalia. Illustrated with Sixty-one Engravings by W. HARVEY.

ONE OF THEM. By CHARLES LEVER, Author of "Charles O'Malley," "Gerald Fitzgerald," "The Dodd Family," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE WITS AND BEAUX OF SOCIETY. By GRACE and PHILIP WHARTON, Authors of "The Queens of Society." With Sixteen Illustrations by H. K. BROWNE and JAMES GODWIN, engraved by the Brothers DALZIEL. 12mo, Muslin, $1 50.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Dr. Brown's Patent Baby-Tender.

THIS ARTICLE OF NURSERY FURNITURE is different from, superior to, and supplies the place of everything heretofore used for that purpose. It combines, by simple changes, which may be instantly made, A BABY, COMFORTABLE SLEEPING COUCH, A DELIGHTFUL BABY-JUMPER, A ROCKING-HORSE, NURSERY, HEDDING AND ROCKING-CHAIR, A SWING, A STYLISH CARRIAGE AND PERAMBULATOR, A PLAY AND WORK STAND. It is unprovided from the ceiling, or a graceful standard, by a steel spring; is cushioned so as to require no bedding, and is handsomely trimmed in various styles, at prices ranging from $8 to $20. Sent by express everywhere.

It will save in washing, in bringing up one child, more than its cost, and much of the time and attention of mother and nurse.

It gives the child entire freedom of action for body and limbs, incures a healthy action of the stomach and bowels, promotes and strengthens the natural motion and develops vigor of the system, preserving it from injury of the possibility of danger.

It is compact, strong, and durable, and to those having the care of infants it is indispensable.

N. B.—"The exercise obtained by our nursery children in one of your baby-tenders very much aids in their proper physical development, and enables us to dispense with the services of one assistant nurse."—Matron of the Home for the Friendless.

J. S. BROWN & Co., Warerooms, No. 659 Broadway, N. Y., between Bond and Bleecker Sts. (Send for our circular.

John B. Dunham.

Overstrung Grand Square and Upright Pianos.

Established in 1834.

Are pronounced to be the best Pianos manufactured. Forth Instruments warranted 5 years. Send for Circular. Warerooms and Manufactory, 75 to 85 East 12th Street, near Broadway, N. Y.

Thorley's Food for Cattle

Converts the poorest of hay or straw into a superior Provender. A pamphlet sent free. Depot for U. S., 21 Broadway, N. Y.

Agents wanted in every City and Town.

WARD'S PERFECT FITTING SHIRTS.

Made to Measure at $18 per doz, OR SIX FOR NINE DOLLARS.

Printed directions sent free everywhere, and so easy to understand, that any one can take their own measure for shirts. I warrant a good fit. The cash to be paid to the Express Company on receipt of goods.

S. W. H. WARD, from London, 387 Broadway, N. Y., up Stairs.

BACK NUMBERS and BOUND VOLUMES of HARPER'S WEEKLY and MONTHLY MAGAZINES on sleazy in half or A. WINCH, 20 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

Simplified, Low Pressure, Self-Regulating, Steam Warming and Ventilating Apparatus

For Private Dwellings, &c.

Please call and examine, or send for a pamphlet.

BAKER, SMITH, & CO.,
139 and 193 Centre Street, New York.

Harper's Weekly.

PRICE FIVE CENTS.

TERMS.

One Copy for Twenty Weeks	$1 00
One Copy for One Year	2 50
One Copy for Two Years	4 00
Five Copies for One Year	9 50
Twelve Copies for One Year	20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year	40 00

Harper's Weekly and Harper's Magazine, one year, $4 00.

Volumes I., II., III., and IV. of HARPER'S WEEKLY, handsomely bound in Cloth extra, Price $3 50 each, are now ready.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. V.—No. 221.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 23, 1861. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1861, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

SUMTER.

MAJOR ANDERSON'S COMMAND AT FORT SUMTER.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH TAKEN IN THE FORT.—[SEE PAGE 190.]

PAUL MORGAN'S CHOICE.

"Here is the choice, and now the time, oh chooser!"

MARIAN ARMS and Jeannette Randall sat in their room, looking out over the misty, turbulent sea—looking out, and thinking of Paul Morgan. The sea-side cottage where they were staying was full, and they were obliged to room together. Indeed, they had chosen the set first, for they had been friends six weeks before. They called themselves so now; but they felt a spirit like Cain's in their hearts as they looked at each other with stealthy eyes. In fact they hated each other—as girls, even very good girls, not unfrequently do when both love the same man. God help us! How little it means when we say we are friends! How weak we are!

Which did Paul Morgan love? Both were pretty, at times really handsome. Both had fair hair and blue eyes, peach-blossom cheeks and lips meant for kisses; but there were plenty of points of difference. Marian was a year older, and taller. Her eyes were deeper, her lips smiled more rarely. Jeannette was merry as a summer bird. It had always been summer with her life.

What had Paul Morgan done to make them both love him? Nothing, consciously; for, to all all the truth, neither of them, fair and sweet as they were, had ever quickened a pulse of his heart. He was selfish, like the rest, and he had his own plans to serve.

There were more than these two girls at Siasconset Beach. Agatha Churchill was there also. It was no mystery to any one, a man, why all the men admired Agatha, haughty and indifferent to them as she was. The women all wondered at it. But she was not at all pretty. What was better, though, she was wonderfully beautiful at times. Her color of his life had faded in a week. What should he do? The future seemed strangely objectless.

Last of all, Agatha! She had a trick of leaving her hands idle in her lap, and her brain thinking. She untwisted her gauzy turban and folded it carefully. She took off her brilliant dress, and hung it on one of the nails which were driven in all round her little box of a room. She put away the serpents with their gleaming eyes, prayed herself for bed, and then kneeled in a low chair at the drapier, at the window, and threw it wide open. She felt feverish, and she welcomed the strong wind which blew into her face. Her soft hair almost saturated the thin drapery about her shoulders. There was so much fire in her nature that she never took cold, fresh as it was.

"God help me!" she thought, "my heart is gone out from me. I shall never be young again though I am so strong. I shall live for many years. Poor silly moth! Why did I go near enough to the candle to burn my wings? Could I not see what Paul Morgan was, in knowledge, indeed, but with just that same fascination in his manner toward every woman? His voice was always low, and so tender in its modulations. The touch of his hand was different from any other person's. Nature had made him so, how could he help it? And I, what a fool I have been! I had persuaded myself that he was to be his wife—he has said to me to watch with him!"

No matter how late Agatha kept watch that night. She did not appear on the next morning. When Paul Morgan met her at breakfast her cheek was as cool, her eye as clear as ever. She was just as carefully dressed. She looked, indeed, as a man of the world too long to hang out a flag of distress at his mast head.

It was full tide the last day at eleven, and at half past ten they all went to bathe. There was a long line of them, as they stood upon the beach, preparatory to walking down the steps. Three were arranged, gentlemen and ladies alternately, with a gentleman at one end of the line and Agatha Churchill at the other. Next to her was Jeannette Randell and Marian Arms. They went on gayly, breasting billow after billow.

At last came a tenth wave, higher than all. In desperation, curiosity, excitement, or carelessness of life—I know not what—Agatha drew her hand from her companion's, and, with a shriek, not from her lips though. The undertow had caught her and was bearing her outward. Morgan saw her scarlet bathing-dress flashing once more. He snatched his hands from the frightened girls who clung to him. He pushed out after Agatha. He was a bold, strong swimmer, and gave his mightiest strokes. He caught her by her long black hair. Then he drew his arm round her lithe, slender waist, and pushed landward her valiantly. It was a task for such sinews and muscles as his. A strength less Herculean could not have achieved it. He laid her on the beach, and knelt by her in reach of the waves, and sank himself utterly exhausted beside her. Had Agatha heard, when she thought she was drowning, any voice saying,

"Agatha, soul of my soul, I must save you or perish!"

At any rate, when she came back to consciousness she knew that he loved her.

That afternoon he was admitted to the little sitting-room which she had taken for herself alone. All the women but Agatha left breaking their fast together into her great sky eyes, and the strong lines of feeling quivering round her flexible mouth. She had never before seemed so charming, even to him. All the trifling, all the assumed indifference, all the hauteur was gone from his manner now; all the coldness from hers. They had stood that day in the presence of death. All that was false and conventional had been rent away. Only the true and the real remained. The imperious Miss Churchill was gentle as a little child. Morgan bent over her and kissed the hand she gave him.

"You have saved my life," she said. "How can I thank you?"

"By giving me what I most want."

"And that is?"

"Yourself, Agatha—the only woman I ever loved—without whom life is not worth the price of living."

"But I have a great many faults."

"I know it. So have I. We have both lived too long in an artificial atmosphere to have kept ourselves wholly unspotted from the world. We will begin our reform together, to-day."

"And you love me as I am, faults and all?"

"As I love my own soul. Do you love me, Agatha?"

"Let my life tell you."

"The life which you give me; do you not?"

"You have saved it," she answered softly; "it is yours, to keep or to reject."

"Beloved! may God deal with me as I with you."

That night their engagement was made known to the dwellers at Seaside Head. There were congratulations, and comments, and pleasant prophecies. Only Jeannette Randall and Marian Arms had such a secret to keep. But the touch of pain had tried them as gold is tried by fire. The growing hatred was transmuted to a tenderness neither of them had ever felt for each other before. The sorrow they bore together and in silence was a bond neither could care to break.

The experience would not hurt them. The love they brought to real had only stirred the outer surface of their hearts. Its blighting but made their natures deeper and truer. Their day would come for them too, by-and-by, with its full radiance.

Agatha Churchill's was, when she married Paul Morgan.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MARCH 23, 1861.

A PLEA FOR THE CITY OF NEW YORK.

MARCH winises apace, and the annual budget of plundering schemes begins to be faintly discerned in the proceedings of the Legislature at Albany. Early in April the power of the Legislature for mischief ceases, and mischief-makers and representative rogues are trying to improve the interval between this and then.

The members of the Legislature which sat in the year 1860 were, by unanimous consent, pronounced to be a remarkably honest body, and several crew ever gathered together for legislative purposes in the State of New York. Nothing so shameless as the city railroad bills, which last year gave up the hour over the Governor's veto, was ever before inscribed on our statute-book. Nothing more barefaced than their endeavors to levy black-mail on the railroads of the State was ever attempted in this meridian before.

We have it on good authority that the present Legislature is of a purer stamp. There are single members in the Assembly; many more of these, we are told, are men of character; others are novices in corruption, and do not know enough to make sale of their votes. It is just possible, too, that the storm of indignation which greeted members on their return home in April last may have operated as a warning to them in the future. At any rate, people who have at all a vital interest in the subject among us. At least, Mr. Jarves has given us a classic in our literature of art; and if the people of this country knew how much appreciation this work could only know of it, the edition would go at once. Nor could any body who means to travel in Europe, or who will be sure to better prepare himself for the journey and the benefit of his Italian tour than by a careful study of Mr. Jarves's "Art-Thoughts" and constant observation of the Gallery he has collected.

The house of Lippincott in Philadelphia has commenced the publication of a work which is a cyclopedia for the People." It is based upon the famous German "Conversations-Lexicon," the most comprehensive of Cyclopedias, and is to be an encyclopedia something about every thing for fifteen cents a number! Probably nobody reads an Encyclopedia through, but a reader might be well tempted by the attractive form of publication. It has many illustrations, and is essentially a popular and useful hand-book. Among publishers the name of Lippincott is to be prized for its remembered, for it is identified with the popularization of knowledge; and the present issue is a faithful reproduction of the Edinburgh edition.

And here, as this almost as a single number of the "Cyclopedia," is a slim volume of dainty verses by Winthrop, daintily printed by Rudd & Carleton. There are very few of them, and they are very smooth and sweet; but they seem to be rather the reproduction of a fine mood than of a fine verse than of actual personal life and emotion. The little volume is a lunch, as one of the poems is called by a poet which describes them all, but not, Poet Ahlrich?

"A porcelain dish, o'er which in many a cluster
Plump grapes hung down, dead-ripe and without taste,
A melon cut in thin delicious slices—
A cake that seemed moist-work in spices:
Two china cups with golden tube and rim,
And rich inside with chocolate like honey:
And she and I the banquet-scene completing
With dreamy words—and very dainty eating."

Some time ago the Lounger was asked who wrote the "Two Villages," a poem. He could not answer; but the book called "Poems," by Rose Terry, unaware, as Miss Mulock's poems answered who wrote "Philip, my King." Miss Terry's poems have now been published by Ticknor some two or three months. Had the times been more quiet, they would have been already much more widely Commission has reflected honor, not disgrace, on the city: had the members been appointed by the Common Council or the Mayor, the Commission would have been a sink of corruption. The Metropolitan Police are a vast improvement upon their Municipal predecessors. The Commissioners of Charities are infinitely preferable to the old Governors of the Alms-house. Every office which has been taken out of the control of the city, and placed at the disposal of the Legislature or the Governor, has been improved by the transfer.

Let there be no squeamishness, then, among country members in interfering in our municipal affairs. All honest men in the city want and expect them to interfere. Political demoralization—proceeding from various causes—has reached such a pitch in this city that it would be a gain, and not a loss, for the city to be actually disfranchised. If, however, the country members will do their duty, and set their faces sternly against any city railroad, or other city scheme which smacks of plunder, we may escape for another year.

THE LOUNGER.

SOME NEW BOOKS.

It is said that for ten years there were never so few vessels in the port of New Orleans as during the last month; and it is certainly true that in that time there have not been so few books upon the publishers' counters all over the country. Current literature is almost a luxury. When "the times" threaten, it disappears. When peace and confidence return, the harvests are weekly the sowing of books of all kinds. Oh! the famous Saturdays, four and five years ago, when so many immortal works were to be born!

Motley's History is the chief book of the season; but even of that there have not yet been twenty thousand sold. It is a work which is going to have written, like Mr. Motley, a book which every body must like. Then there is the new work by the author of "The Queens of Society," called "The Wits and Beaux of Society." It is a series of flashing, gossipy, lively sketches of men of the world, as they are called, such as Beau Brummell, De Grammont, Rochester, Beau Nash, Chesterfield, George Selwyn, Sheridan, Brummell, and—the Reverend Sydney Smith, perhaps the most droll company. It is a book, of course, made to amuse, and abounds in anecdotes illustrating life and manners. It has neither the dignity nor solidity of real history, but it is a good club and watering-place vade mecum.

Of a different kind is Mr. Jarves's "Art-Studies," which is one of the handsomest of American books: itself an illustration of our skill in the typographic art. The work treats in an aesthetic and historic sketch of the progress of painting in Italy, from the rise out of the Byzantine school down to its decline in that of Bologna. The illustrations, most faithfully and exquisitely drawn in Rudd & Carleton, are admirably reproduced, and as you turn the beautiful pages and refresh your acquaintance with the names of great men and the schools that have made Italian painting supreme, you can not help wondering whether the author is, after all, mistaken in believing that it is possible, by an exhibition of the old paintings and accomplished discourse of the old painters and their significance and style, to create such a vital interest in the subject among us. At least, Mr. Jarves has given us a classic in our literature of art; and if the people of this country knew how much appreciation this work could only know of it, the edition would go at once. Nor could any body who means to travel in Europe, or who will be sure to better prepare himself for the journey and the benefit of his Italian tour than by a careful study of Mr. Jarves's "Art-Thoughts" and constant observation of the Gallery he has collected.

The house of Lippincott in Philadelphia has commenced the publication of a work which is a cyclopedia for the People." It is based upon the famous German "Conversations-Lexicon," the most comprehensive of Cyclopedias, and is to be an encyclopedia something about every thing for fifteen cents a number! Probably nobody reads an Encyclopedia through, but a reader might be well tempted by the attractive form of publication. It has many illustrations, and is essentially a popular and useful hand-book. Among publishers the name of Lippincott is to be prized for its remembered, for it is identified with the popularization of knowledge; and the present issue is a faithful reproduction of the Edinburgh edition.

And here, as this almost as a single number of the "Cyclopedia," is a slim volume of dainty verses by Winthrop, daintily printed by Rudd & Carleton. There are very few of them, and they are very smooth and sweet; but they seem to be rather the reproduction of a fine mood than of a fine verse than of actual personal life and emotion. The little volume is a lunch, as one of the poems is called by a poet which describes them all, but not, Poet Ahlrich?

"A porcelain dish, o'er which in many a cluster
Plump grapes hung down, dead-ripe and without taste,
A melon cut in thin delicious slices—
A cake that seemed moist-work in spices:
Two china cups with golden tube and rim,
And rich inside with chocolate like honey:
And she and I the banquet-scene completing
With dreamy words—and very dainty eating."

Some time ago the Lounger was asked who wrote the "Two Villages," a poem. He could not answer; but the book called "Poems," by Rose Terry, unaware, as Miss Mulock's poems answered who wrote "Philip, my King." Miss Terry's poems have now been published by Ticknor some two or three months. Had the times been more quiet, they would have been already much more widely known. But in a high wind the wood-thrush is not heard. She had followed Sidney's advice—she has looked into her heart and written. If the song is sad, it is not the artificial elegiac strain to which so many women tune their lyres, but it is a true and searching pathos. An exquisite ear, a taste as delicate, a rare sympathy with nature, the profoundest poetical feeling, a nameless feminine refinement, and perfect intellectual sincerity mark all these poems. If the Lounger had several pages to fill he would quote several; but since he ought to take but one, let it be this:

"I give thee treasures hour by hour
That old-time princes naked in vain,
And piled for their sullen power,
Or died of passion's eager pain.

"I give thee love as God gives light,
Aside from merit or from prayer,
Rejoicing in its own delight,
And freer than the lavish air.

"I give my verses like jewels strung
On golden threads of hope and fear,
And tenderer thoughts than ever hung
In wind and light together here.

"As earth pours freely to the sea
Its thousand streams of wealth untold,
So from my shrine life to thee,
Glad that its very sands are gold.

"What care I for thy carelessness?
Or vaguer thanks that overfly?
Regardless that their power to bless
Thy spirit can not sound or know.

"For, lingering on a distant dawn,
My voice shall sing, more sweet than late,
When, from these mortal mists withdrawn,
Thine heart shall know me—I can wait."

BET, BETTER, BEST.

IT is a pity that Mr. Weston, who walked from Boston to Washington to see the inauguration, in fulfillment of a wager, did not arrive in time. Perhaps, however, his late coming will cast a slight shade on the upon that kind of feat. When Mr. Genin bid two hundred and fifty dollars for the first ticket to the first concert of Jenny Lind, he did a wise thing, because at that comparatively small sum he made a universal and most profitable advertisement. But when somebody else in a smaller town paid extravagantly for the same ticket there, he was merely even notoriety. So when Mr. Poore, after the election of Buchanan, wheeled a barrow of apples from Newburyport to Boston, the thing was simply just, and if he wished for any purpose to make his name conspicuous, he did so. But when somebody else agreed to saw a load of wood under similar circumstances, he had his labor and some derision for his pains.

Since, however, such bets are still likely to be laid, they are useful as that if your candidate is defeated, you will smoke only one cigar a day for four years; or that you will send a load of wood to every poor man you meet for two years, or months, or days; or that you will found a public library in your native village; or get up a subscription to support an organ in the village church; or buy one great picture or statue for free public exhibition; or give ten dollars to an eye and ear infirmary; or not swear for a year or two, or week, or a day; or go to bed at ten o'clock for six months; or not to speak cross at home for an indefinite period; or—in fact there is no end of respectable wagers.

If we must bet, isn't it best to better something?

WHO IS A GENTLEMAN?

JULIA writhes to know if the Lounger thinks that Aaron Burr was a gentleman.

What is a gentleman, Miss Julia? Louis Fourteenth of France called the Duke of Buckingham—who was the paramour of the Countess of Shrewsbury, who held the Duke's horse while he killed the Duke—the only English gentleman he had ever seen. In Kentucky the test of a gentleman is that he looks out of the window while you pour out your whisky. Do you think Charles Second a gentleman,

"Whose word no friend relies on;
Who never said a foolish thing,
And never did a wise one?"

Was Louis Fourteenth himself a gentleman? Was George Fourth? Was Brummell? Was Napoleon Bonaparte, who said that his bastards should infamously slander their loyal wives to gratify his own ambition, and who did not hesitate to injure Josephine?

What is a gentleman? If to dress in the fashion; to be witty, accomplished, and full of tact; to be graceful in bow and fascinating; to hold the popular current opinions upon all topics; to understand perfectly the details of social etiquette; to acknowledge the necessity of occasionally fighting a duel; to gamble; to know horses, and be interested in them; to treat women with the utmost external courtesy, while you constantly insult them in thought, and take care not to be too flagrant and conspicuous a rake; if to know fine wines, and mingle easily and brilliantly in fine society—if all this makes a gentleman, Miss Julia, then Aaron Burr was one, and Buckingham, and Charles, and Louis.

But if to be a gentleman it is necessary to be an honest, simple, modest man; conscious of your own fallibility, and therefore very charitable to others; prodigal of respecting nobility wherever you find it, and as sincerely detesting meanness however polished and graceful; easily dispensing with conventional elegance of manner for the sake of an earnest and humane intention; and not caring that a man shall wear the finest cloth, nor shudder-ing at his bad grammar, so long as you feel that he is honorable at heart—not according to the "code of honor," but according to moral principle—if all this is essential to a gentleman, Miss Julia, what shall we call Aaron Burr and the rest?

That a man may be mean, proud, inhuman, false, dishonorable toward God and country, and totally unprincipled; yet wear proper clothes, be of nimble, calm, and attractive address, graceful in action, and of that indescribable manner which we call high-bred, is a fact of every day's experience. If the word gentleman is to be properly applied to manner only, or to the external conduct altogether, Aaron Burr was a gentleman, and plenty of the greatest scamps in the world are gentlemen. A traitor—Benedict Arnold, for instance—may be a man of the courtliest possible manner; but can a traitor be a gentleman? A rebel may be, for Washington was a rebel. But a traitor is a man who betrays a special trust given him by his country.

If the word gentleman implies, first of all, high moral principle, then, of course, the gentry who usually lay claim to the name are trading under false pretenses. But this knowledge as well as the Lounger that the word we are discussing does not imply honorable character. It is practically an affair of the tailor and the dancing-master. "He is a great scamp, but then he is such a gentleman," is a remark which every body hears. It means that he is a person who talks low and respectfully, dresses with propriety, and is familiar with the usages of good society. The word gentleman is as grievously treated as the expression "a man of honor." You think it means an honorable man? Not at all; it means a man who will coolly murder a friend at the request of a friend. Honor is the keeping of nobody else. Another man may throw a glass of wine in your face—may give you the lie—may spit at you—what then? How, in Heaven's name, is your honor touched? Is your shirt-bosom your honor? Are you a liar because an angry fool says so? Honor is your own manhood. Who can stain or betray that but he himself? If you tell a lie, if you ruin a woman, if you cherish cruelty or malice, your honor is dishonored. Alack! these are the peculiar performances of "men of honor."

No, Miss Julia, the word "gentleman" is used vaguely; but generally it means, not God's work, but that of the tailor, the dancing-master, and "good society." In the current sense of the word Burr was a gentleman, as in the same current sense many of the noblest people living are fools and fanatics. But if the word shall be taken to mean the lover of manly character, a man more manly, then Washington, and Philip Sidney, and Nathan Hale, and John Howard, and a thousand unknown and unsung as, were also gentlemen; and Rochester, and Charles, and the Louises, and the Georges of England, and Aaron Burr were not.

Is the Lounger right, Miss Julia?

THE BONAPARTE-PATTERSON CASE.

THE case has gone against the Baltimore Bonapartes. The result can surprise nobody. Before the Prince Imperial was born, the Bonaparte-Patterson case was the subject of the Plon-Plon his son were the heirs-apparent of the French imperial throne. Suppose the Baltimore Bonapartes had established their claim, then it would have appeared that an illegitimate scion of the house had been accepted as heir of the throne; and if the Prince Imperial had died of measles, instead of Plon-Plon every would have fallen from the brow of the Emperor upon the head of Mr. Bonaparte of Baltimore—that is, if such a thing as a crown in the United States had counted, despite the rank of the mother. Yes, and if you come to the matter of blood, the brother of Napoleon Bonaparte was hardly as royally blooded as his nephew; and if the nephew's son by an unroyal spouse is yet royal enough to succeed, why not his brother's in similar action?

Probably if France were to decide the question of succession, the Baltimore Jerome would have quite as good a chance as the Westphalian Plon-Plon.

The decision is purely technical. Despite the romantic passion, nobody could regard Miss Patterson as otherwise than honorably and lawfully married, and her son as well born as any son in the world. The whole case is a singular illustration of the absurdity of the entire machinery of monarchy. Royal blood is a stupendous fiction which must be sustained at all hazards. Kings are the most debauched and dissolute class of men in history, and yet there is probably not a crowned head in the world that does not especially pride itself upon legitimacy. Plantagenet, Tudor, Stuart, Orange, Brunswick, all claim to continue substantially the same line. What if they do? What line it was? Preserving the line is the honest men? And that is the very question the age is answering.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

TWO ENTRANCES AND TWO EXITS.

THE ENTRANCES.

THERE were two Kings, where of Italy's host,
The first the leg it tacked to,
The one he was a-de Fere Jacko,
The other a King de facto.
Whitest hide by color of King Victor,
That blade so red and keen, oh—
Garibaldi was the Fere Jacko,
The de jure was Bombalino.

King Garibaldi to never a crown
Or royal robe was born,
He marched to his throne in an old red shirt,
And a pair of trowsers torn.
No priest at his coronation stood,
'Twixt him and the throne above,
His sceptre was a sharp steel sword,
And his chrism was the people's love.
In a pair of rickety steamers he faced
A fleet that scoured the seas,
And landed with one thousand men,
'Gainst thousands thirty-three.

King Bombalino was palace-born,
And swaddled in purple and gold;
There were bishops to bless him, princes to dress him,
And a queen his surgeon to hold:
And when King Bombo, the Dumb,
Was numbered with the dead,
And Bombalino by right divine
Reigned in his father's stead,
He was soberly crowned and anointed and oiled,
By the Cardinals duly appointed,
And joy-bells were rung, and Te Deums were sung,
Round the throne of the Lord's anointed.

Hard by that throne, you might hear the groan
Of those that lay in chains,
In Little-Isaac, where the sea-lamps freeze,
Or the sea-coasts boil the brains.
But stifled still—for groans no more shrill,
Or tongues that dare to wag,
There were Cavalier Arnold,
And Manicolo's gang,
So Liberty's prisons with fetter and lash
From the people's heart he purges,
And where Alps' links towered up with whips,
Bombalino with corpicous scourges.

And where was King Garibaldi then?
He was sailing his Tuscan sea,
In a merchant-vessel of sixty tons,
For a merchant-captain's fee;
Or his shirt rolled up to the elbows,
And his tar-bucket and brush,
He was moulding the dips and twisting the wicks,
At a New York chandler's,
Or planting early potatoes,
And minding his own affairs.
Where steer to the deep runs the barren steep
Of Caprera's little lake.

So enter our Kings—on Sicily's stage—
Be warned, Utopian dreamers—
The one to a man is very complete,
The other two merchant-steamers;
This leads a ship, a thousand men
That, troops by thousands thirty.
The one wears royal purple,
The other a sailor's shirt;
Let the crack-brained fool, an if he may,
Upon his throne be crowned,
The odds they run a thousand to one,
For de jure against de facto.

THE EXITS.

I see a crowd acclaiming loud
In Naples' sunny palace;
Not woman alone, but bearded men,
Are tearful of their praises.
Their throats rain blessings, their hands rain flowers,
And bells in cheerful chime
As they crowd about a worn gray man,
In a suit of sailor's clothes wearing.
They clasp his hands, they clutch his knees,
They line his path with cheers!
They bring their babes that he may lay
His hands on them as he passes.

And this is the man that a few months since
At Marsala dared a battle,
In the face of odds that had never been faced
By a man of the least resolution!
Unscathed by sword, untouched by shot,
As if on his life's charm,
King Bombalino's navies are his,
And King Bombalino's army!
And now his foot's on the base of a throne,
And his head is on fire,
And behold he takes his hand away,
And from the throne steps down.

And simple and shabby as he came,
So shabby and simple goes!
Back to Caprera's solitude,
And early potato-rows.
No pomp and state on his exit wait,
But this no power can buy—
The love that glows in every heart,
And the joy that lights the eye!

I see a rock-basted fortress town,
With batteries girdled round;
There's a sulphurous smoke in the stifling air,
And corpses strew the ground.
The cannon's roar, blood, through the trampled mud,
Crush't gallion and rent fascine,
Where the cannon's blaze from the embrasure,
And the gunners shrink and scream:
And hasty sigh of "Bombalino's gone!"
The crack of the fusillade,
Is blent with the thrill of shattered wall,
Or hurtled prostrate laid.

For months and months the lengured town
Hath sat in vast and woe—
With her within still Bombalino,
And Death on creeping doe:
Till food is spent, and Love comes,
And strikes its victims down;
And drug fiend's vows from the King,
For whom they hold the town:
And evening, midnight, at the door
Fling down their babies dead;
And weakened children lay the blood
Of fathers on his head.

And mutiny foils stubborn arms,
Nor grow back blows for love;
And so perforce he strikes the flag
Of his dastard reign above,
And through the blast and through the wreck,
His vengeful curses hiss,
The last Italian Bourbon goes
In sullen, scowling price.
Unblessed, unwept, and hated by all,
No heart laments his fall!
Sic Eunt Tyrants all!

THE GENIUS OF RELIGION.

Genius (says Madame de Stael) is the breath of heaven. Religion, also says Monsieur de Polichinelle, would be all the better if, like Genius, it had no sects.

A DAILY INTERVIEW AT THE PARIS EMBASSY.

CUPID OF CUPIDS.—"Shall what is the cost for the dinner of to-day? Have you any preference?"

THE AMBASSADOR.—"Ah! fais, the same as before—carte blanche. Vous savez bien, je ne vous donne jamais rien relativement rien que ça."

GOOD FOR TAKES.—We see advertised a Reaping Machine. Of course it is intended to come directly after the Sewing Machine?

A GOOD PLACE FOR A COOK.—The Dripping-Well of Saratoga.

STRONGLY RECOMMENDED BEFORE DINNER.
(By a Vulgar Illiterate Cookney.)

Why is a lucky cigarette like Absinthe?—Because it's a happy-liker (appetizer).

LICENSED WITTLERS.—The YORKERS.

A CONSERVING EXTRAVAGANCE.—We know a friend of ours, a continued young Raleigh, who, like Vesuvius, has always got either fire or smoke at his mouth; but he complains fearfully of the expense. He says smoking will burn a hole in a bank-note in no time: his only regret is, that a cigar does not, as soon as it is consumed, rise again like a Phœnix from its own ashes!

PROCRASTINATION IS THE THIEF OF TALENT.—INSCRIPTION FOR THE REVERSE OF CERTAIN INDIAN PEACE-MONEY.—Delibi are Dangerous.

MOTTO FOR THE GENERAL CONVENANCE AMALGAMATED CORDITE COMPANY.—"A Diversibus Unum."

THE BEAUTY OF EARLY RISING.

FAMILY PHYSICIAN (who is in bit of an Abernethy in his way).—"You may laugh at me as you like, Miss, but I tell you it is a positive fact, which you are at liberty to disprove if you can—that, when Venus rose from the sea, the rising took place the very first tiffing in the morning, or else she never would have been the beauty she was!"

BLANCMANGE.—Whitebait.

THE MODERN CHESTERFIELD.—What would you with a tobacconist on his birth-day? Why, you enough, what could you wish him but "Many happy returns!"

Two men were disputing about their powers of endurance. "Why, nothing to the other," I'll bet you that I can hold my right leg in boiling water longer than you can." "Done," said the other, and the smoking, bubbling water was brought. In went the liger number one with an air of defiance; number two stood an edifying serenity. Number one began to whine; number two called calmly for the newspaper. Number one began to find it intolerable; number two smiled at the humor of the paper. "In Heaven's name!" at last exclaimed number one, exasperated by the heat of the water and the coolness of his antagonist, "what is your leg made of?" "Wood," sententiously replied the other.

Mrs. Brougham, the mother of the ex-Chancellor, was a most excellent and liberal housewife. On one occasion she was much troubled with a servant addicted to debauching, and who used to allege, in extenuation of her fault, "it was cruckit before." One morning this Harry tumbled down stairs, when the fond mother, running after him, exclaimed, "Oh, boy! have you broken your head?" "No, ma," said the future Chancellor, "it was cruckit before."

The Rev. Dr. G——, of I——, was some years minister of the queer sacra chapel at H——n. By working occasionally in the mines gained the latter appellation for his public duties. While he was on recreating himself one of the shepherds came to preach to pen, and in familiar statistics addressed him: "Weel, Mr. G——, what are you doing?" "Why, John," said the minister, who was fathoming some celery beds, "I am doing what you should have done long ago—I am hoeing my celery." The manager was not long in waiting on his colleagues, with the intelligence that the minister was examining of his salary. An augmentation was immediately granted.

We were amused at hearing the story of an old lady whose only recreation was the hearing of the execution of a man who had once lived in the neighborhood, was, "Well, I know'd him when he was a child, and I'll be bound he had his handkerchief was always slipping round under his left ear."

A Cockney, who went out rabbit-shooting, observing a donkey peeping over a hedge, immediately leveled his piece, exclaiming: "By Jove! that must be the father of all rabbits."

Mr. James Ballantyne, the celebrated printer, was dining with Mr. Creech, the publisher, when the latter happened to quote a line from the excellent Dr. Blair, especially his bark. Perceiving that the latter was not on the table, Mr. Ballantyne suggested that bark should be pie.

An attorney, on being called to account for having acted unprofessionally in taking less than the usual fees from his client, pleaded that he had taken all the man had. He was therupon honorably acquitted.

The late Lord Robertson, a Senator of the College of Justice, possessed considerable talents as a punster.

"Pray, Lord Robertson," said a lady, "can you tell me what sort of a time Mr. Dundas is?"

"I suppose," replied the humorous judge, "it is the male of the coo coo cuckoo."

How many currents are there? Three—red, white, and black; a black current in the Black Sea, a white current in the White Sea, and a red current in the Red Sea.

A red-nosed gentleman asked a wit whether he believed in spirits?—"No, Sir," replied he, looking him full in the face, "I see much evidence before me to doubt it."

ANECDOTES OF ERSKINE.

The Hon. Henry Erskine was celebrated as a punster. Meeting on the street one morning an old lady returning from St. Bernard's Well, he exclaimed, "Oh, S——, I see you have been at the well-doing."

Mr. Robert Haldane, of Airthrey, had informed Mr. Erskine of his having purchased a piece of land, the dangerous stumble on the steep banks of the Ochils, by raising bold on the shaded side of a tree. "It had been a pair for life," said the humorist.

Meeting in Edinburgh a country friend, Erskine asked him to come to his house. The friend excused himself by pleading hasty business. "I only came for a cast." "A cast," said the lawyer, "I had much rather that it had been a suit."

At a dinner party, Erskine was seated near Miss Hamilton——, concerning whom Miss Hamilton——, had been celebrated for her beauty, but was then somewhat past the meridian of life. "Miss Hamilton are you not a great man for making puns," said Miss Hamilton to the wit; "could you make a pun on me?" "Ah, Hamilton," was the cool rejoinder, "you are my whole lot."

Mr. Dunbarn, of Largo, was an intimate friend of Erskine, and in the course of time should his person a honor. They met accidentally in the capital, when Erskine remarked that he was sorry to see his friend in town, as he was pending (painting) his house for the reception of a second wife. "Well, well," said Dunbarn, "ye may spend awa, Harry, and ye may also re-pent."

"Sure," said a Frenchman, wishing to display his knowledge of the English language, "what is the screwtow?"—"Yes, Sare," was the equally bombastic reply! "Then, Sare, let 'em."

The Rev. Dr. F—— of N——, applied to his brethren to provide a better fence to his garden. One of them proposed a fence of Palings. "Palings and railing!" said the indignant incumbent, who had been keenly opposed by his brethren on previous occasions, "I have had nothing else since I came among you."

"My son, you must start up from your lethargy."—"Would you have me an upstart, father?"

A distinguished counsel, being employed for the defence in a trial for murder, found it necessary, in the course of his speech, to comment with some severity on the testimony of a witness for the prosecution. In the midst of a most searching and logical sentence, wherein he was comparing the jury's duty with the witness' oath to speak the truth, he was interrupted by a juryman, a tall, lank fellow, evidently from the backwoods, who, rising, thus addressed him:

"See here, Mr. Lawyer, I don't want yer to go on that way abusing me; I won't stand it; I'll break up the court if you do; I won't come to be abused."

"My dear Sir," replied the barrister, in his politest manner, "I was alluding to the witness, not to you; my remarks were not intended to apply to any of the jurors."

"Well, then," said the juror, "just quit a pinting your finger at me when you talk that way."

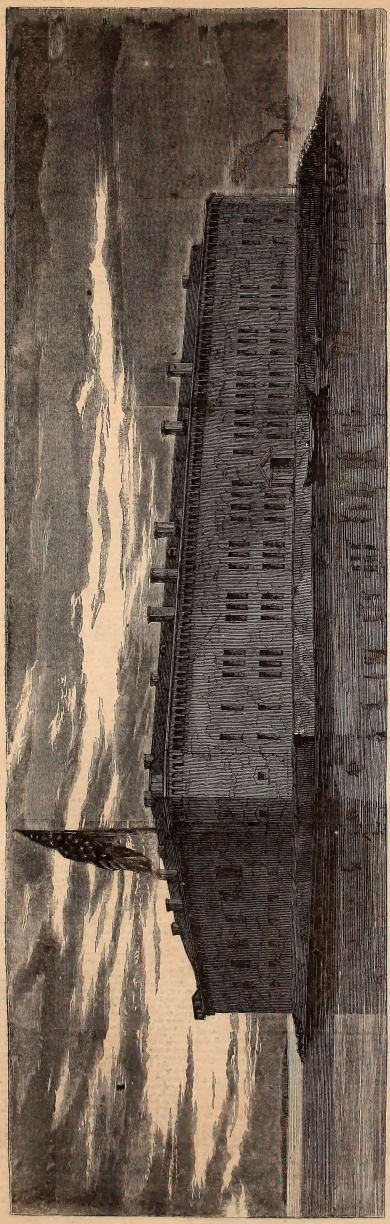
Young lovers are called turtles, and they are generally green turtles.

If parents are shameless, the conduct of children will generally be shameful.

Words are but poor fig-leaves to cover the nakedness of deeds.

The least praiseworthy are generally the most covetous of praise.

Ladies, please be sweet, but don't be too formal. Be rose, but don't be spiny rose.



FORT SUMTER, CHARLESTON HARBOR, SOUTH CAROLINA.—[DRAWN BY AN OFFICER OF MAJOR ANDERSON'S COMMAND.]

UNSPOKEN DIALOGUE.

Above the trailing mignonnette
That deck'd the window-sill,
A lady sat, with lips firm-set,
And looks of earnest will:
Four decades o'er her life had met,
And left her lovely still.

Not to the radiant firmament,
Not to the garden's grace,
The courses of her mind were bent,
But where, with sweetest face,
Forth from the other window leant
The daughter of the place.

Thus ran her thoughts: "O wretched day!
When She was born so fair:
Well could I let my charms decay,
If she were not their heir;
I loathe the sunbeams as they play
About her golden hair.

"Yet why? she is too good, too mild,
So madly to aspire;
He is no boy to be beguil'd
By sparks of color'd fire:
I will not dream a pretty child
Can mar my deep desire.

"Her fatherless and lonely days
Are sere before their time:
In scenes of gayety and praise
She will regain her prime,
And cease to haunt these wooded ways
With sentimental rhyme."

On to the conscious maiden pass'd
Those words without the tongue;
Half petulantly back she cast
The glist'ning curls that hung
About her neck, and answer'd fast:
"Yes, I am young—too young:

"Yet am I graver than my wont,
Gravest when he is here;
Beneath the glory of his front
I tremble—not with fear:
But as I read, Bethesda's font
Felt with the Angel near.

"Must I mate only with my kind,
With something as unwise
As my poor self; and never find
Affection I can prize
At once with an adoring mind,
And with admiring eyes?

"My mother trusts to drag me down
To some low range of life,
By pleasures of the clam'rous town,
And vanity's mean strife;
And in such selfish tumult drown
My hope to be his wife."

Then darker round the lady grew
The meditative cloud—
And stormy thoughts began to brew
She dar'd not speak aloud;
For then without disguise she knew
That rivalry avow'd.

"What is my being if I lose
My love's last stake? while she
Has the fair future where to choose
Her woman's destiny—
Free scope those means and powers to use,
Which time denies to me.

"Was it for this her baby arms
About my neck were flung?
Was it for this I found such charms
In her uncertain tongue?
Was it for this those vain alarms
My mother-soul unstrung?

"Oh, horrible! to wish my child—
My sole one left—unborn,
And, seeing her so meek and mild,
To hold such gifts in scorn;
My nature is grown waste and wild,
My heart with fury torn!"

Speechless—enchanted to the spot—
The girl could scarce divine
The whole disaster of her lot—
But without sound or sign
She cried, "O Mother! love him not—
Oh! let his love be mine!

"You have had years of full delight,
Your girlhood's passion-dream
Was realized to touch and sight
As bright as it could seem—
And now you interpose, like Night,
Before my life's first gleam.

"Yet you were once what I am now—
You were your maiden prize;
You told me of my Father, how
You lived but in his eyes—
You spoke of the perpetual vow,
The truth that never dies.

"Dear Mother! dearer, kinder far,
If by my childhood's bed
Your care had never stood to bar
Misfortune from my head—
But laid me where my brothers are,
Among the quiet dead.

"Ah! why not die? This cruel strife,
Can this—this only—cease?
Deny God! take home this erring life—
This struggling soul release:
From Heaven, perchance, upon his wife
I might look down in peace."

That prayer—like some electric flame,
Struck with resistless force
The lady's agitated frame—
Nor halted in its course,
Till her hard pride was turn'd to shame,
Her passion to remorse.

She spoke—her words were very low,
But resolute in tone—
"Dear child! he comes.—Nay, blush not so
To have your secret known:
'Tis best, 'tis best, that I should go—
And leave you here alone."

Then, as his steps grew near and fast,
Her hand was on the door,
Her heart by holy grace had cast
The demon from its core—
And on the threshold calm she pass'd
The man she loved no more.

TAKE WARNING.

ONCE lived a comely maid who, proud
Of charms before which all men bow'd,
Wax'd over-scornful;
'Twas in those good old ages when
Our grandsires were but grandchildren,
But human nature now as then
Of pride is born full.

Although this maid to lovers' prayer,
To lady-killer's deep-laid snare,
Bade bold defiance,
She ne'er intended to remain
A votary in Diana's train,
But form with some well-favor'd swain
A fit alliance.

Years glided by; full many a chime
Told new-year's eve when ruthless time
Her charms invaded,
But thought she not of tell-tale streak
Which scarr'd her brow, of sunken cheek,
Of pallid lip, of voice grown weak,
Attractions faded.

At length still fewer and more few,
Behold! aspiring suitors grew;
At festive meeting
No more did youth on youth advance,
To claim her hand for distant dance,
Nor combat for one witching glance,
With heart high-beating.

"Alas!" quoth she, "I'm sore perplex'd,
My beaux desert; the very next
Whose means are ample
Woos not in vain:" but ah! no more
Did anxious lover seek her door.
Young ladies, in your bosoms store
This sad example.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1860, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.]

GREAT EXPECTATIONS.

A NOVEL.

By CHARLES DICKENS.

Splendidly Illustrated by John McLenan.

☞ Printed from the Manuscript and early Proof-sheets purchased from the Author by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."

CHAPTER XXVI.

"MY DEAR MR. PIP,—I write this by request of Mr. Gargery, for to let you know that he is going to London in company with Mr. Wopsle, and would be glad if agreeable to be allowed to see you. He would call at Barnard's Hotel Tuesday morning 9 o'clock, when if not agreeable please leave word. Your fine sister is much the same as when you left. We talk of you in the kitchen every night, and wonder what you are saying and doing. If new considered in the light of a liberty, excuse it for the love of poor old days. No more, dear Mr. Pip, from your ever obliged and affectionate Servant, BIDDY.

"P.S.—If wishes me most particular to write what larks. He says you will understand. I hope it do not doubt it will be agreeable to see him even though a gentleman, for you had ever a good heart and is a worthy worthy man. I have read him all, excepting only the last little sentence, and he wishes me most particular to write again what larks."

I received this letter by the post on Monday morning, and therefore its appointment was for next day. Let me confess exactly with what feelings I looked forward to Joe's coming.

Not with pleasure, though I was fond to him by so many ties; no; with considerable disturbance, some mortification, and a keen sense of incongruity. If I could have had him away by paying money, I certainly would have paid money. My greatest reassurance was that he was coming to Barnard's Inn, not to Hammersmith, and consequently would not fall in Bentley Drummle's way. I had little objection to his being seen by Herbert or his father, for both of whom I had a respect; but I had a very sharpened sensitiveness as to his being seen by Drummle, whom I held in contempt. So, throughout life, our worst weaknesses and meannesses are usually committed for the sake of the people whom we most despise.

I had begun to be always decorating the chambers in some quite unnecessary and inappropriate way or other, and very expensive those wretches with Barnard proved to be. By this time the rooms were vastly different from what I had found them, and I enjoyed the honor of occupying a few presentment pages in the books of a neighboring upholsterer. I had got on so fast of late that I had even started a boy in boots—top boots—in bondage and slavery to whom I might have been said to pass my days. For after I had made my monster (out of the refuse of my washerwoman's family), and had clothed him with a blue coat, canary waistcoat, white cravat, creamy breeches, and the boots already mentioned, I had to find him a little to do and a great deal to eat; and with both of those horrible requirements he haunted my existence.

This avenging phantom was ordered to be on duty at eight on Tuesday morning in the hall (it was two feet square, as charged for floor-cloth), and Herbert suggested certain things for breakfast that he thought Joe would like. As I felt sincerely obliged to him for being so interested and considerate, I had an odd, half-provoked sense of suspicion upon me that if Joe had been coming to see him he wouldn't have been quite so brisk.

However, I came into town on the Monday night to be ready for Joe, and I got up early in the morning, and caused the sitting-room and breakfast-table to assume their most splendid appearance. Unfortunately the morning was foggy, and an angel could not have concealed the fact that Barnard was shedding sooty tears outside the window, like some weak giant of a Sweep.

As the time approached I should have liked to run away, but the Avenger, pursuant to orders, was in the hall, and presently I heard Joe on the staircase. I knew it was Joe by his clumsy manner of coming up stairs—his state boots being always too big for him—and by the time it took him to read the names on the other floors in the course of his ascent. When at last he stopped outside our door, I could hear his finger tracing over the painted letters of my name, and I afterward distinctly heard him breathing in at the keyhole. Finally he gave a faint single rap, and Pepper—such was the name of the avenging boy—announced "Mr. Gargery!" I thought he never would have done wiping his feet, and that I must have gone out to lift him off the mat, but at last he came in.

"Joe, how are you, Joe?"

"Pip, how ARE you, Pip?"

With his good honest face all glowing and shining, and his hat put down on the floor between us, he caught both my hands and worked them straight up and down, as if I had been the last-patented Pump.

"I am delighted to see you, Joe. Give me your hat."

But Joe, taking it up with both hands like a birdsnest with eggs in it, wouldn't hear of parting with that piece of property, and persisted in standing talking over it in a most uncomfortable way.

"Which you have that growed," said Joe, "and that swelled out, and that genteelofied;" Joe considered a little before he discovered this word; "as to be sure you are a honor to your kin' and country."

"And you, Joe, look wonderfully well."

"Thank God," said Joe, "I'm cleverly to most. And your sister, she's no worse than she were. And Biddy, she's ever right and ready. And all friends is no backerder, if not no forarder. 'Cept-in' Wopsle; he's had a drop."

All this time (still with both hands taking great care of the birdsnest) Joe was rolling his eyes round and round the room, and round and round the flowered pattern of my dressing-gown.

"Had a drop, Joe?"

"Why, yes," said Joe, lowering his voice, "he's left the Church, and went into the playacting. Which the playacting have likeways brought him to London along with me. And his wish were," said Joe, getting the birdsnest under his left arm for the moment and greying in it for an egg with his right; "if no offense, as I would 'and you that."

I took what Joe gave me, and found it to be the crumpled play-bill of a small metropolitan theatre, announcing the first appearance on the evening Monday of "the celebrated Provincial Amateur of Roscian renown, whose unique performance in the highest tragic walk of one Nicodemus Boffin has lately occasioned so great a sensation in local dramatic circles."

"Were you at his performance, Joe?" I inquired.

"I were," said Joe, with solemnity.

"Was there a great sensation?"

"Why," said Joe, "yes, there certainly were a peck of orange-peel. Partickler, where he see the ghost. Though I put it to yourself, Sir, whether it were calculated to keep a man up to his work with a good 'art, to be continually cutting in betwixt him and the Ghost with 'Amen!' A man may have had a misfortune and been in the Church," said Joe, lowering his voice to an argumentative and feeling tone, "but that is no reason why you should put him out at such a time. Which I meantersay, if the ghost of a man's own father can not be allowed to ockipy his attention, what can, Sir? Still more, when his mourning at is unfortunately made so small as that the weight of the black feathers brings it off, try to keep it on how you may."

A ghost-seeing effect in Joe's own countenance informed me that Herbert had entered the room. So I presented Joe to Herbert, who held out his hand; but Joe backed from it, and held on by the birdsnest.

"Your servant, Sir," said Joe, "which I hope as you and Pip"—here his eye fell on the Avenger, who was putting some eggs on the table, and so plainly denoted an intention to make that young gentleman one of the family, that I frowned it down and confused him—"I meantersay, you two gentlemen—which I hope as you get your eiths in this close spot? For the present may be a werry good inn, according to London opinions," said Joe, persuasively, "and I believe its character do stand it; but I wouldn't keep a pig in it myself—not in the case that I wished him to fatten wholesome and to eat short with a meller flavor on him."

Having borne this flattering testimony to the merits of our dwelling-place, and having incidentally shown this tendency to call me "Sir," Joe, being invited to sit down to table, looked all round the room for a suitable spot on which to deposit his hat—as if it were only on some very few rare substances in nature that it could find a resting-place—and ultimately stood it on an extreme corner of the chimney-piece, from which it ever afterward fell off at intervals.

"Do you take tea, or coffee, Mr. Gargery?" asked Herbert, who always presided of a morning.

"Thankee, Sir," said Joe, stiff from head to foot, "I'll take whichever is most agreeable to yourself."

"What do you say to coffee?"

"Thankee, Sir," returned Joe, evidently dispirited by the proposal, "since you are so kind as put that name to it, I will not run contrairy to your own opinions. But don't you never find it a little 'eating?"

"Say tea, then," said Herbert, pouring it out.

Here Joe's hat tumbled off the mantle-piece, and he started and picked it up, and fitted it to the same exact spot. As if it were an absolute point of good-breeding that it should tumble off again soon.

"When did you come to town, Mr. Gargery?"

"Were it yesterday afternoon?" said Joe, after coughing, as if he had caught the whooping-cough since he came. "No it were not. Yes it were. Yes. It were yesterday afternoon" (with an appearance of mingled wisdom, relief, and strict impartiality).

"Have you seen any thing of London yet?"

"Why, yes, Sir," said Joe, "me and Wopsle went off to look at the Blacking Warehus. But we didn't find that it come up to its likeness in the red lamps at the shop-doors; which I meantersay," added Joe, in an explanatory manner, "as it's drawed too architectooralooveral."

I really believe Joe would have prolonged this word (mightily expressive to my mind of some architecture that I know) into a perfect Chorus, but for his attention being providentially attracted by his hat, which was toppling. Indeed it demanded from him a constant attention and a quickness of eye and hand very like that exacted by cup-and-ball-keeping. He made the most extraordinary play with it, and showed the greatest skill; now, rushing at it and catching it neatly as it dropped; now, merely stopping it midway, beating it up, and humoring it in various parts of the room and against a good deal of the pattern of the paper on the wall, before he felt it safe to close with it; finally sighing it into the slop-basin, where I took the liberty of laying hands upon it.

As to his shirt-collar and his coat-collar, they were perplexing to reflect upon—insoluble mysteries. Why should a man scrape himself to that extent before he could consider himself full dressed? Why should he suppose it necessary to be purified by suffering for his holiday clothes? Then he fell into such unaccountable fits of meditation, with his fork midway between his plate and his mouth, had his eyes attracted in such strange directions; was afflicted with such remarkable coughs; sat so far from the table, and dropped so much more than he ate, and pretended that he hadn't dropped it; that I was heartily glad when Herbert left us for the City.

I had neither the good sense nor the good feeling to know that this was all my fault, and that if I had been easier with Joe, Joe would have been easier with me. I felt impatient of him and ashamed of him; and this is the right condition he heped coals of fire on my head.

"Us two being now alone, Sir"—began Joe.

"Joe," I interrupted, pettishly, "how can you call me Sir?"

Joe looked at me for a single instant with something faintly like reproach. Utterly preposterous as his cravat was, and as his collars were, I was conscious of a sort of dignity in the look too.

"Us two being now alone," resumed Joe, "and me having the intentions and abilities to stay not many minutes more, I will now conclude—lengthways begin—to mention what kind led to my having had the present honor. For was it not," said Joe, with his old air of lucid exposition, "that my only wish were to be useful to you, I should not have had the honor of breaking wittles in the company and abode of gentlefolk."

I was so unwilling to see the look again that I made no remonstrance against this tone.

"Well, Sir," pursued Joe, "this is how it were. I were at the Bargemen t'other night, Pip;" whenever he subsided into affection, he called me Pip, and whenever he relapsed into politeness he called me Sir; "when there come up in his shay-cart Pumblechook. Which that same identical," said Joe, going down a row of trees, "do comb my 'air the wrong way sometimes, by giving out up and down town as it were him which ever had had your infant companion and were hooked upon as a playfellow by yourself."

"PIP, HOW ARE YOU, PIP?"

"Nonsense. It was you, Joe."

"Which I fully believed it were, Pip," said Joe, slightly tossing his head, "though it signify little now, Sir. Well, Pip; this same identical, which his manners is given to blusterous, come to me at the Bargemen (wot a pipe and a pint of beer do give refreshment to the working man, Sir, and do not over stimulate), and his word were, 'Joseph, Miss Havisham she wish to speak to you.'"

"Miss Havisham, Joe?"

"'She wish,' were Pumblechook's word, 'to speak to you.'" Joe sat and rolled his eyes at the ceiling.

"Yes, Joe? Go on, please."

"Next day, Sir," said Joe, looking at me as if I were a long way off, "having cleaned myself, I go and I see Miss A."

"Miss A., Joe? Miss Havisham?"

"Which I say, Sir," replied Joe, "Miss A., or Havisham. Her expression air then as following: 'Mr. Gargery. You air in correspondence with Mr. Pip?' Having had a letter from you, I were able to say 'I am.' (When I married your sister, Sir, I said 'I will;' and when I answered your friend, Pip, I said 'I am.') 'Would you tell him, then,' said she, 'that which Estella has come home and would be glad to see him?'"

I felt my face fire up as I looked at Joe. I hope one remote cause of its firing may have been my consciousness that if I had known his errand I should have given him more encouragement.

"Biddy," pursued Joe, "when I got home and asked her fur to write the message to you, a little hung back. Biddy says, 'I know he will be very glad to have it by word of mouth, it is holiday time, you were to see him, go.' I have now concluded, Sir," said Joe, rising from his chair, "and, Pip, I wish you ever well and ever prospering to a greater and greater height."

"But you are not going now, Joe?"

"Yes I am," said Joe.

"But you are coming back to dinner, Joe?"

"No, I am not," said Joe.

Our eyes met, and all the "Sir" melted out of that honest open heart as he gave me his hand.

"Pip, dear old chap, life is made of ever so many partings welded together, as I may say, and mine was a blacksmith, and one's a whitesmith, and one's a goldsmith, and one's a coppersmith. Diwisions among such must come, and must be met as they come. If there's been any fault at all to-day, it's mine. You and me is not two figures to be together in London; nor yet anywheres else but what is private, and beknowed, and understood among friends. It ain't that I am proud, but that I want to be right, as you shall never see no more in these clothes. I'm wrong in these clothes. I'm wrong out of the forge, the kitchen, or off the meshes. You won't find half so much fault in me if you think of me in my forge-dress, with my hammer in my hand, or even my pipe. You won't find half so much fault in me if, supposing as you should ever wish to see me, you come and put your head in at the forge-window and see Joe the blacksmith there at the old anvil, in the old place, and a master of his old work, as he used to be when he first carried you about. I'm awful dull, but I hope I've beat out something nigh the lights of this at present. And so God bless you, dear old Pip; old chap, God bless you!"

I had not been mistaken in my fancy that there was a simple dignity in him. The fashion of his dress could no more come in its way when he spoke these words than it could come in its way in heaven. He took it as gayly on the forehead and went out. As soon as I could recover myself sufficiently I ran out after him and looked for him in the neighboring streets; but he was gone.

CHAPTER XXVII.

IT was clear that I must repair to our town next day, and in the first flow of my repentance it was equally clear that I must stay at Joe's. But when I had secured a place for the box-tax to-morrow's coach and had been down to Mr. Pocket's and back, I was not by any means convinced on the last point, and began to invent reasons and make excuses for putting up at the Blue Boar. I should be an inconvenience at Joe's; it was not expected, Joe would by no would not be ready; I should be too far from Miss Havisham's, and she was exacting and mightn't like it. All other swindlers upon earth are as nothing to the self-swindlers, and with such pretenses did I cheat myself. Surely a curious thing. That I should innocently take a bad half-crown of somebody else's manufacture is reasonable enough; but that I should knowingly pocket the spurious coin of my own make as good money! An obliging stranger, under pretense of compactly folding up my bank-notes for security's sake, abstracts the notes and gives me matchballs; but what is his sleight of hand to mine, when I fold up my own nut-shells and pass them on myself as notes!

Having settled that I must go to the Blue Boar, my mind was much disturbed by indecision whether or no to take the Avenger. It was tempting to think of that expensive Mercury airing his boots in the arch-way of the Blue Boar's posting-yard: it was almost solemn to imagine him casually produced in the tailor's shop and confounding the disrespectful senses of Trabb's boy. On the other hand, Trabb's boy might worm himself into his intimacy and tell him things; or reckless and desperate wretch as I knew he could be, might hoot him in the High Street. My patroness, too, might hear of him, and not approve of him. On the whole, I resolved to leave the Avenger behind.

It was the afternoon coach by which I had taken my place, and, as winter had now come round, I should not arrive at my destination until two or three hours after dark. Our time of starting from the Cross Keys was two o'clock. I arrived on the ground with a quarter of an hour to spare, attended by the Avenger—if a may counter that expression with one who never attended on me if he could possibly help it.

At that time it was customary to carry Convicts down to the dock-yards by stage-coach. As I had often heard of them in the capacity of outside-passengers, and had more than once seen them on the high-road dangling their ironed legs over the coach roof, I had no cause to be surprised when Herbert, meeting me in the yard, came up and told me there were two convicts going down with me. But I had a reason that was an old reason now, for constitutionally faltering whenever I heard the word convict.

"You don't mind them, Handel?" said Herbert.

"Oh no!"

"I thought you seemed as if you didn't like them?"

"I can't pretend that I do like them, and I suppose you don't particularly. But I don't mind them."

"See! There they are," said Herbert, "coming out of the Tap. What a degraded and vile sight it is!"

They had been treating their guard, I suppose, for they had a bottle with them, and all three came out wiping their mouths on their hands. The two convicts were handcuffed together, and had irons on their legs, fashioned in a pattern that I knew very well. They wore the dress that I likewise knew very well. Their keeper had a brace of pistols, and carried a thick-knobbed bludgeon under his arm; but he was on terms of good understanding with them, and stood, with them beside him, looking on at the putting-to of their fetters. We were not an air as if they were an interesting Exhibition not formally open at the moment, and be the Curator. One was a taller and stouter man than the other, and appeared, as a matter of course, according to the mysterious ways of the world both convicts and free, to have got into his power his own smallest suit of clothes. His arms and legs were like great pin-cushions of those shapes, and his entire figure hung about him as if his clothes, his half-closed eye at one glance. There stood the man whom I had seen on the settle at the Three Jolly Bargemen, on a memorable day that was had brought me down with his invisible gun!

It was easy to make sure that as yet he knew me no more than my fellow-creatures do of his life. He looked across at me, and his eye appraised my watch-chain, and then he incidentally spat and said something to the other convict, and they laughed, and directly afterward joined with a clink of their coupling manacle, and looked at something else. The great numbers on their backs, as if they were street-doors; their coarse, mangy, ungainly outer surface, as if they were lower animals; their ironed legs, apologetically garlanded like unfortunate Monarchies; and the way in which all present looked at them and kept from them, made them (as Herbert had said) a most disagreeable and degraded spectacle.

But this was not the worst of it. It came out that the whole of the back of the coach had been taken by a family removing from London, and that there were no places for the two prisoners but on the seat in front behind the coachman. Hereupon a choleric gentleman, who had taken the fourth place on that seat, flew into a most violent passion, and said that it was a breach of contract to be asked to sit up with such company, and that it was poisonous, and pernicious, and infamous, and shameful, and I don't know what else. At this time the coach was ready and the coachman impatient, and we were all preparing to get up, and the prisoners had come over with their keeper—bringing with them that curious flavor of bread-pudding, baize, ropeyarn, and hearth-stone which attends the convict presence.

"Don't take it so much amiss, Sir," said the keeper to the angry passenger; "I'll sit next myself, and I'll put 'em on the step-plate by row. They won't interfere with you, Sir. You needn't know they're there."

"And I won't!" said the one," growled the convict I had recognized. "I don't want to go. I am quite ready to stay behind. As far as I am concerned any one's welcome to my place."

"Or mine," said the other, gruffly. "I wouldn't have inconvenienced none of you, if I'd a had my way."

Then they both laughed, and began cracking nuts, and throwing the shells about.—As I really think I should have liked to do myself, if I had been in their place and so despised.

At length it was voted that there was no help for the angry gentleman, and that he must either go in his chance company or remain behind. So he got into his place, still making complaints, and the keeper got into the place next him, and the convicts were handed up as well as they could, and the convict I had recognized sat behind me with his breath on the hair of my head.

"Good-by, Handel!" Herbert called out, as we started. I thought what a blessed fortune it was that he had found another name for me than Pip.

It is impossible to express with what acuteness I felt the convict's breathing, not only on the back of my head, but all along my spine. The sensation was like being touched with some pungent and searching acid, and it set my very teeth on edge. He seemed to have more breathing to do than another man, and to make more noise in doing it; and I was conscious of growing high-shouldered on that side in my shrinking endeavors to fend him off.

The weather was miserably raw, and the two raised the cold. It made us all lethargic before we had gone far, and when we had left the Half-way House behind, we habitually dozed and wkened and were silent. I dozed off myself in considering the question whether I ought to restore a couple of pounds to this creature before losing sight of him, and how it could best be done. In the act of dipping forward, as if I were going to bathe among the horses, I woke in a flash and took the question up again.

But I must have lost it longer than I had thought for, since, although I could recognize nothing in the darkness and the fitful lights and shadows of the road, I traced much country in the cold damp wind that blew at us. Cowering forward for warmth, and to make me a screen against the wind, the convicts were very closer to me than before. The very first words I heard them interchange as I became conscious were the words of my own thought, "Two One-Pound notes."

"How did he get 'em?" said the convict I had never seen.

"How should I know?" returned the other. "He had 'em stowed away somehows. Giv him by friends, I expect."

"I wish," said the other, with a bitter curse upon the cold, "that I had 'em here."

"Two one-pound notes to your friends?"

"Two one-pound notes. I'd sell all the friends I ever had for one. Well? So he says—I"

"So he says," resumed the convict I had recognized—it was all said and done in half a minute before you could look round—"he says—" you're going to be discharged?' Yes, I was. Would I find out that boy that had fed him and fill his secret, and give him these two one-pound notes? I said, 'Rather!'"

"More fool you," growled the other. "I'd have spent 'em on a Man in wittles and drink. He must have been a innocent one. Mean to say he knowed nothing of you?"

"Not a ha'porth. Different gangs and different ships. I was put on board in a passage to breaking, and got made a Lifer. That's what he took by his motion, and that's all I know of him."

"And was that—Honor!—the only time you worked out in this part of the country?"

"The only time."

"What might have been your opinion of the place?"

"A most inferior place. Mudbank, mist, swamp, and work; work, swamp, mist, and mudbank."

They both excecrated the place in very strong language, and gradually growled themselves out and had nothing left to say.

After overhearing this dialogue, I should assuredly have got down and been left in the solitude and darkness of the highway, but for feeling certain that the man had no suspicion of my identity. And yet, I was not at all so changed in the course of nature, but so differently dressed and so differently circumstanced, that it was not at all likely he would have known me without accidental help. Still, the coincidence of our being together on the coach was sufficiently strange to lead to the end that some other coincidence might at any moment connect me, in his hearing, with my name. For this reason I steadied myself, and looked out at where we touched the town, and put myself beyond his hearing. This device I executed successfully. My little portmanteau was on the seat before my feet; I had but to turn a hinge to get it out; I threw it down before me, got down after it, and was left in the flare of a lamp on the stones of the town pavement. As to the convicts, they went their way with the coach, and I knew at what point they would be spirited across the river. In my misery I saw the coast with its convict crew waiting for them at the slime-washed stairs—again heard the grim "Give way, you!" like an order to dogs—again saw the wicked Noah's Ark lying out in the black water.

I could not have said what I was afraid of, for my fear was altogether undefined and vague, but there was fear upon me. As I walked on to the hotel, I felt that a dread, exceeding the more apparent fear of a pursuit for discovery and recognition, made me tremble. I am confident that it took no distinctness of shape, and that it was the reversal for a few minutes of the terror of childhood.

The coffee-room at the Blue Boar was empty, and I had some cold meat served my dinner there, but had sat down to it, before the waiter knew me. As soon as ever he had apologized for the remissness of his establishment, he set me if he should send Boots for Mr. Pumblechook!

"No," said I, "certainly not."

The waiter (it was he who had brought up the Great Expectations from the Commercials on the day when I was bound) appeared surprised, and took the earliest opportunity of putting a dirty old copy of a local newspaper, directly in my way, that I took it up and read this paragraph:

"Our readers will learn, not altogether without interest, in reference to the recent romantic rise in fortune of a young artificer in iron of this neighborhood (what a theme, by-the-way, for the magic pen of us as yet not universally acknowledged townsman Toony, the poet of our columns!), that the youth's earliest patron, companion, and friend, was a highly-respected individual not entirely unconnected with the corn and seed trade, and whose eminently convenient and commodious business premises are situate within a hundred miles of the High Street. It is not wholly irrespective of our personal feelings that we record Him as the Mentor of our young Telemachus, for it is good to know that our town produced the founder of the latter's fortunes. Does the thought-contracted brow of the local Sage or the luminous eye of local Beauty inquire whose fortunes? We believe that Quentin Matsys was the BLACKSMITH of ANTWERP. VERB. SAP."

I entertain a conviction, based upon large experience, that if in the days of my prosperity I had gone to the North Pole, I should have met somebody there, either wandering Esquimaux or civilized man, who would have told me that Pumblechook was my earliest patron and the founder of my fortunes.

GENERAL TWIGGS'S SURRENDER TO THE TEXANS.

WE publish on page 184 a fine picture, from drawings by a Government draughtsman, of the surrender of General Twiggs, lately dismissed from the United States Army, to the Texan authorities, on the Gran Plaza of San Antonio, Texas. Also a view of the Alamo at San Antonio, the head-quarters of the Military Department of Texas.

The Galveston News of the 22d February gives details in regard to the surrender of the United States property by General Twiggs. The account refers to the proceedings at San Antonio, General Twiggs's head-quarters:

"It seems that the famous Texan Ranger, General Ben McCulloch, was instructed by the Secession Convention (in whose hands the whole subject had been placed) with the duty of obtaining possession of the Federal forts and other military property in and near San Antonio and on that frontier—he being prepared to act in conjunction with Messrs. Devine and Maverick, Commissioners appointed to represent the State.

"General McCulloch, who was stationed at Seguin, received a dispatch from the Commissioners on the 9th, and he immediately mustered forward in consequence of its having become known that General Twiggs had been relieved by order of the Secretary of War, and was to be succeeded by Colonel Carlos A. Waite, U.S.A., temporarily stationed at Camp Verde, in Kerr County, about 90 miles northwest of San Antonio. Colonel Waite is a Northerner by birth, but his political views are unknown."

What followed is thus given by the News:

"On Friday evening the San Antonio K. G. C.'s, 200 in number—well armed and equipped—marched out from to meet the coming troops under M'Culloch, from the Salado, four miles off. At 9 o'clock on Saturday 900 of them—picked men—marched into San Antonio on horseback in advance-guard. Later, 500 more marched in. Guards were at once stationed around the arsenal, over the artillery-park, and all the Government buildings.

"A letter to a gentleman, who has kindly placed it at our disposal, says that the city organized a military possession of the Alamo, General Twiggs, accompanied by Major Nichols, and Ben. M'Culloch in the Plaza Mayor. The horsemen paraded around them, and there was a burst of cheers as the three officers met. A demand was made for the surrender of Federal property, and the immediate evacuation of the place by the United States soldiers, without their arms. They reply was, that new soldier would be shot down are submitting to that disgrace.

"At half past 12 o'clock, however, terms were agreed upon. The soldiers leave town immediately, taking their side-arms, and a sufficient supply of stores to enable them to leave the State. They are getting ready to leave. They will camp at the San Pedro Springs, awaiting the arrival of Colonel Waite. The stores, horses, and ships are closed; the streets are cleared of spectators, except the Rangers and the K. G. C. The Alamo and Military Plaza present a busy martial appearance. The Government property is now in charge of the citizen soldiers of the place. The volunteers are all well-armed. They are plainly dressed, some in hunting-shirts, a fine-looking body of men, with a determined air."

The Main Plaza is a large vacant square in the centre of the city. On one side of it is the Alamo, an old dilapidated edifice, built by the Spaniards after the invasion of Mexico by Cortés. The other sides are occupied by stores and hotels. A quarter of a mile from the Plaza is the Alamo, the headquarters of General Twiggs. This also is a very old building, with a church, and afterward transformed to a fortress. It was here that Colonel David Crockett and Colonel Bowie—the inventor of the famous knife which bears his name—died in the massacre by the Mexicans, under Santa Anna, in 1836. But three persons escaped. It is now occupied by the Texan troops.

FORT LANCASTER.

THIS post, included in the United States property lately surrendered to the State of Texas by General Twiggs, is situated on the Rio Grande and San Diego mail route, near the junction of Live Oak Creek and the Rio Pecos. It is surrounded by the finest country, that extends to the capital and topographical feature of Western Texas. A remarkable characteristic of these lands is, that they slope from the base to the horizon almost universally at an angle of 45°. Near the summit are horizontal strata of rocks resembling, in appearance, huge parapets, and on gaining the base the eye wanders over vast plains, the only vegetation being grass, mezquit bushes, and cacti. The absence of water prevents any exploration over them; but the quantity of fossils found in that region renders it evident that they are the result of some great convulsion of nature.

The fort is quite an important one on account of the protection it gives to the ford of the Pecos, which is but a few miles from it, and where nearly all the trains from Texas to California cross.

FORT BROWN, TEXAS.

FORT BROWN, Texas, of which we give an illustration on page 185, is situated on the Rio Grande, about thirty miles in a straight line from the coast, and about seventy miles following the meandering of the river. It was laid out as a town in 1848—about the time of the evacuation of Matamoras, on the opposite side of the river. It has now a population of about four thousand, and a trade of about eight millions of dollars annually, principally with Mexico.

The mouth of the Rio Grande has only from two to four and a half feet of water on its bar; therefore no sea-going vessel of a size safe to navigate the Gulf can cross its tar.

All shipments for Brownsville and other points on the Rio Grande are made to Point Isabel by sea—which has from eight to ten feet water on its bar and is ten miles in a straight line from the Rio Grande—where there the freight is reshipped in light-draught steamboats and up the Rio Grande, or sent by lighters to Point Isabel, three miles distant from the anchorage, and from Point Isabel transported to Brownsville by land.

From the time of the first settlement of the country by the Spaniards Brazos and Point Isabel have been the harbor and place of safety for the sea trade of nearly the whole Rio Grande Valley. Point Isabel is situate on the main land, about ten miles in a straight line from the Rio Grande, and twenty-eight miles from Brownsville.

The coast for a long distance, and even Brazos Island, is very low, during heavy gales, the sea and for this reason the Government has been obliged to place her light-house for the entrance to Brazos harbor on the land at Point Isabel, which land is elevated about twenty feet above the water of the harbor.

At the commencement of the Mexican War Point Isabel was selected for a military depôt, and Fort Polk erected there.

The Rio Grande is navigated by steamboats to Rio Grande city, about three hundred miles above Brownsville. During the Mexican War a United States Government steamer navigated the river to Laredo, about six hundred miles above Brownsville.

Brazos harbor is the only anchorage and harbor south or west of Aransas.

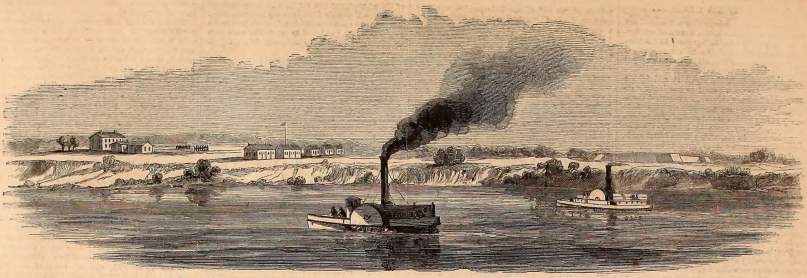
DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

EXTRA SESSION OF THE SENATE.

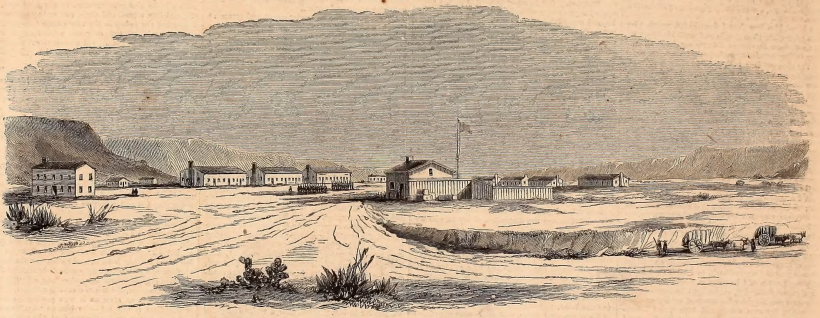
THE Senate is still in session, for the purpose of confirming appointments. A motion was made on Friday by Senator Houston of Texas, which, we declared that he was a foreigner and owed no allegiance to the United States. After some debate it was referred to the Judiciary Committee. This question has made a great deal of excitement, he regards the insurgent as a mere document. On 18th he offered the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to inform the Senate what forts, arsenals, navy yards, or other public works within the limits of the States of South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas, are now within the actual possession and occupation of the United States, and by what number of men each is garrisoned and held, and whether reinforcements are necessary to retain the same, and if so, whether the Government has the power and means under existing laws to supply such reinforcements within such time as the exigencies and necessities of the service demand, and whether the defence and protection of the United States and their property do not require the use of such

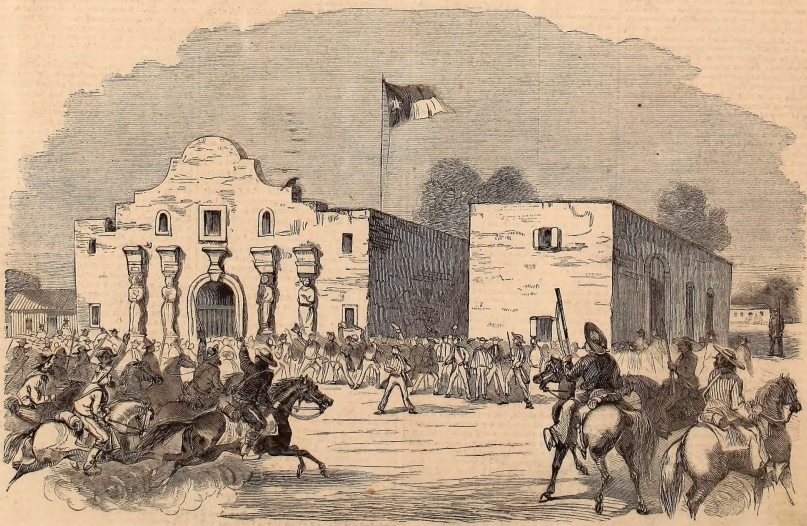
SURRENDER OF EX-GENERAL TWIGGS, LATE OF THE UNITED STATES ARMY, TO THE TEXAN TROOPS IN THE GRAN PLAZA, SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS, FEBRUARY 16, 1861.—[SEE PAGE 182.]



FORT BROWN, TEXAS.—FROM A SKETCH BY A GOVERNMENT DRAUGHTSMAN.—[SEE PAGE 182.]



FORT LANCASTER, TEXAS.—FROM A SKETCH BY A GOVERNMENT DRAUGHTSMAN.—[SEE PAGE 182.]



THE ALAMO, SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS, LATE HEAD-QUARTERS OF EX-GENERAL TWIGGS.—FROM A SKETCH BY A GOVERNMENT DRAUGHTSMAN.—[SEE PAGE 182.]

MY FATHER'S SECRET.

STRANGE how the merest trifles will sometimes call up, in the most vivid colors, a train of recollections we had fancied were so laid away in the lumber-room we all have in some back recess of our brains that they have lost all distinct form and reality!

To-night, a sound in the street at midnight, a cry, perhaps from some houseless wanderer, awakened in terror from her shivering, shelterless slumbers, thrilled through my very soul with the startled agony of fear such a sound excited in my childish mind—how many years ago? fifty, at least—and brought back to me, with a tumultuous rush, all the series of circumstances that then so oppressed my life with a vague, nameless, unspeakable horror; and when, in later life, those circumstances were explained, the explanation only substituted real for imaginary terrors.

An only child, my early days were spent in the old place that had been in our family for upward of three centuries. It was situated in Cornwall, near the sea, far from any town of the least importance, and it and our lives—my father's and mine, for I was motherless—were so isolated that often months, nay, I may say years, passed without our ever seeing a new face.

In those days of which I speak my father must have been still a young and handsome man; but children commonly have such incorrect ideas as to ages and appearances of their elders, and of their parents especially, that the memory of my father always presents itself as that of a middle-aged, sombre, silent, not generally pleasing or attractive man.

I loved him less than I feared him, not that he was ever other than gentle and most kind to me; but somehow there was, I believe, in hour, an uneasy feeling subsisting between us: we never were on the terms of fond protection on the one side, of clinging confidence on the other, that alone constitute the natural and healthy relations between father and child.

What were all caused this uneasy sensation on my part, was the consciousness—I can not say when it first came, but come it did, gradually growing on me in a way I was oppressed. I can not now recall without a return of its weight—that my father was constantly—furtively and secretly, but constantly—watching me. Watching me, as with a set of anxious, fearful expectancy, as if there was about me something alarming or unnatural; as if he were under the perpetual impression that I was about to display some terrible peculiarity; to say or do something that should stamp me as a creature apart from the rest of my species.

From this thought came the intense humiliation, one, that such a feeling on his part might have a real foundation I knew not of. I can perfectly remember carefully studying my face and figure in the large cheval glass that stood in an unused dressing-room (my mother's, as I afterward learned), to discover if I had any personal peculiarity or sign, or deformity, that might in any way account for this singular demeanor of my father's, and watching my own words, looks, gestures, and behavior, to test if in them lay the cause thereof. But I could myself discover nothing. The mirror only showed me a pale, large-eyed, delicate-looking boy, tall and slight beyond his years, with a particularly grave, reflective cast of countenance (those particulars, my recollection of my own image, rather than my then view of it, informs me), and loose, dark, curling hair, hanging over the forehead, and giving additional shade and solemnity to the eyes. And when I turned my thoughts inward, to study, as well as I could, my moral characteristics, I could in them detect no incongruities calculated to justify uneasiness.

At last—never shall I forget the months of watchful terror that followed that supposed explanation of the mystery—I fancied I had found a clew to the awful secret.

Sometimes, weary with wandering about alone, I used to roam into the library, and, taking down a book by chance, try to find some amusement therein; few of the volumes were in any way calculated to suit the taste and comprehension of a child, being chiefly of a grave character: but at last I hit upon a collection of old legendary poems and ballads, and herein found ample food for interest. Among these was the Breton legend of Bisdavaret, the tale of the knight who, owing to some fearful but unexplained fatality, was compelled at certain times to assume the shape and nature of a wolf.

Could I be a Bisdavaret? was the question that instantly addressed itself to my mind. Did my father know that at some time I was destined to undergo that fearful transformation? Was he acquainted with the indications that announced the change? Had he yet perceived any of them?

Such were the questions that now haunted my waking thoughts and my dreaming hours, and, as no doubt, these terrible anxieties produced a visible effect on my looks and manner, my father, full of an uneasy terror whose nature I mistook, increased his painful surveillance, and, by it, my racking alarms.

Less the moment when I should myself perceive the commencement of the transformation. I pictured the manner of it in fifty ways. Sometimes I fancied it would be gradual, and I should see and feel the slow blending of the human and bestial natures, till the former should be swallowed up in the latter, and I should become, for the time being, at all events, a real wolf. At others, I fancied the change would be instantaneous, that from a boy, I should suddenly spring into a raging ravening monster, fall—who could tell?—on those around me?—my father, my nurse, my favorite animals, pony, dog, or bird, and then, with bloody fangs, rush howling, an object of hatred and terror to all, into the dark woods that extended for miles around the house, ending, perhaps, by falling into the black abyss of one of the worn-out mines that were not rare in the district.

Our house, which was a very large one, had been built and added to at different periods, and my father and I only occupied a comparatively small portion of one end of it. This portion was shut out from the east by a door at the termination of a passage, which was kept so entirely closed up that I had never seen it opened, and the unused part of the house I had never once entered. Often, with intense curiosity, I had looked up at the shuttered windows, wondering what manner of rooms they were that daylight never visited, longing, yet half dreading, to explore them. Another object of curious and unsatisfied interest to me was a walled inclosure extending from the extreme end of the deserted part of the house, and covering a space of perhaps about half an acre. The wall was very high, much higher than an ordinary garden wall, and the door of it, which led into a dark shrubbery-walk, now almost blocked up with tangled undergrowth, was kept constantly locked, and, indeed, had no appearance of having been opened for any number of years. Of course, for years I had never able to learn. I had asked the question of my nurse—a resident in the house since before my birth—but she had replied evasively that she supposed the key was lost, and at any rate there was no gardens enough and to spare without using that one, adding an injunction to me not to go near there, as the shrubbery was damp and full of briers and nettles, and I should hurt myself and get my clothes torn. The result of her caution was, that the next day I was to be seen peering through the tangled underwood in the direction of the closed door that so excited my curiosity. For some time the mass of briers and nettles kept from me the knowledge that I was not alone in my progress. But pausing to take breath, I suddenly became aware of a rustling close by my round, I found myself face to face with my father. In a voice of severity, very unusual when addressed to me, he asked me what I was doing there, and, on a prohibition ever to return, as I should be sure to hurt myself, and he would not have it.

From that moment I entertained a conviction that within the inclosure of those walls lay the secret of the mystery of our existence and of my father's strange watchfulness of me. And I resolved, come what might, to strive to solve it.

But two days later was commenced the erection of a high, strong fence round the kitchen-garden, and not being tall or strong enough to scale it, independent of the risk of being detected in the attempt to do so, I was baffled.

I was, I suppose, at this time about seven or eight years old, but no notice ever being taken of my birthday, I did not exactly know my age. I was, and now I can only guess approximatively what it might have been.

One thing I gained by this inkling of a discovery, and that was the dispersion of my terrors on the Bisdavaret grounds.

No, I felt assured that not in myself, alone and individually, lay the cause of my father's conduct toward me. There, behind that shrubbery, within those walls, was hidden the true explanation, and I only needed to find it out to acquire some how connected with that impenetrable mystery.

That such was the fact, and how it was so, I had to learn later.

Months passed away, perhaps a year may have gone by, when one night I went to bed about my usual hour, half-past 8, and fell asleep at once.

It had been a hot summer's day, and a long ride had fatigued me, so that I slept unusually sound. I was, for me, a heavy sleeper (I forget in general), when—I can describe the sensation in no other way than as that of being wrenched instantaneously from profound slumber to full wakefulness. I was roused by a scream, so loud, so long, so agonized, that I sprang up shivering with a ghastly horror that made the cold sweat burst out over my quivering limbs.

In an instant my father—I slept in a little room opening from his—rushed in, with a face I shall never forget, a look whose anxious terror was all directed to me—as if excited far less by that hideous sound than by the fear of its influence on me.

Bursting into hysterical sobs, I stretched my arms to him, and almost for the first time I could remember, he took me in his, and, clasping me close, kissing, soothing, and reassuring me like a woman; yet I had a consciousness, at the same time, distinct and unmistakable, of the restless, intense anxiety as to the circumstance that had caused it, mingled with a dread of a recurrence of the alarm—an anxiety that he manifested as the matter, of which, however, he attempted no explanation, being, I suppose, too shaken by his emotion to invent a false one.

While he still held me thus my nurse entered. This seemed to relieve him. I observed that they exchanged looks of mutual intelligence, and my father, placing me in her arms, once more kissed me, telling me to fear nothing, and taking a light, he left my room by the opposite door from that by which he had entered it.

"What was it, nurse?" I whispered, when I had become a little composed. She hesitated.

"It must have been Jane, frightened by a rat; or perhaps she had the nightmare. But it was nothing that could hurt you, dear."

I knew this was not the true explanation; but I also knew I was not likely to get another; so I was silent, and, I suppose, she thought, satisfied.

More than once, after that night, did the same harrowing sound disturb me, and sometimes the shrieks were not single, but iterated with fearful energy. On such occasions I was the undisputed the same intense disturbance and anxiety, though he endeavored to conceal it from me, and invented some plausible explanation, which I was forced to appear to accept, though my life was rendered miserable by the terrors with which this state of things beset it.

One morning, after the shrieks had been more than usually terrific, my father, apparently driven into a desperate resolution, announced to me that we were going away for a time; that he would accompany me to our destination, and, leaving me with my nurse, he would come often to see me.

I had never been from home before, and the idea of the change, yet less for its own sake than for the escape it promised me from my terror-haunted life, afforded me unspeakable relief. Whether the evidence of this awakened in my father more pain or pleasure I can hardly tell; certainly the feelings were mingled.

In a week it was fixed we should go into Devonshire, where, in a village known to my nurse, we were to take up our abode, but for no specified time.

I counted the days with eager impatience, and already five of the seven had departed. At night I had gone to bed, and fallen asleep with a pleasant dreamy sense of approaching escape, and had slept, I suppose several hours, when I suddenly awakened by the sound of the splashing of water in my room. Looking toward the washing-stand (a night-light, without which my terrors would not allow me to sleep, had lighted the chamber), I descried the figure of a woman, whose back was toward me, washing her hands.

At the moment I felt no fear, of that I was quite certain, nor any thing the least like her.

She was tall and thin, dressed in a loose, shapeless garment, and her hair, which was dark, was cropped short to her head.

Apparently unconscious of my presence, there she stood, washing her hands, with an energy and intensity of purpose unlike any ordinary an occupation; rubbing and wringing them, as if she would take the skin off, pausing to examine them, then with the same vehement and patient disappointment—sometimes a sort of shudder—plunging them back into the water, splashing, rubbing, and wringing them again and again.

So extreme were my amazement and terror at this extraordinary apparition that for some minutes I could neither move nor cry out. As I lay I heard the clock strike three, and as it was summer, I knew daylight was near; this was some slight relief. If I could but keep myself till sunrise, I thought I might then summon courage to address my wondrous visitor, or perhaps she might then retire. So I tried to regulate my breathing so as not to attract her attention, and lay still, my eyes riveted on her with a fearful fascination, waiting for what might follow.

For what did come I was little prepared. After long scouring and rubbing her hands, but apparently with no satisfactory result, she turned and I saw her face.

Child as I was, I felt that it had in it a sorrow, a grief, placed it on a level in some order of all other faces. Not without traces of beauty, even in its haggard pallor and sunken eyes, it yet wore the stamp of something that seemed to me not to belong to humanity. There was a sort of mingled wildness and vacancy in the expression of the pale lips, of the troubled eyes, unnaturally and gloomily bright in their dark and hollow orbits, like sullen fires in airless caves; and the thick, cropped, dark hair, coming in ridge straight across the forehead, added not a little to the singular effect of the countenance.

At first her eye seemed to wander vacantly about the room, as though it had unconscious that it was unfamiliar to her. Then, after a while it lighted on me.

She came quickly up to the bed, gazed at me with eager, startled scrutiny, then with hasty hand drawing down the bed-clothes a little way, she began feeling my throat.

Feeling it, not graspingly or clutchingly, or as though intending it any harm, but as if to satisfy some intense curiosity—to assure herself of some peculiarity respecting it.

All this I could not tell; for with her hand, loudly cold and wet on my throat, I became insensible.

A brain fever was the result of this night's adventure. And then came a dark period—I have never tried to inquire into the particulars of it, or even how long it lasted—of overshadowed consciousness, from which I awoke but gradually, and with occasional relapses.

That the period must have been considerable I know; for when I recovered I had arrived at another stage of life, and was no longer a child but a youth; and my father's hair was sprinkled with gray, and his face marked with lines I did not remember.

We were in France when I awoke from that long mental slumber, of whose very dreams I had no recollection. Where we were, I, in a listless manner as we had lived at the old house in Cornwall.

Then we traveled for some years, and so I grew to manhood. Quite sane, and in full possession of my mental faculties, but always with a lingering sense of something in the background, a dread of ought that might tend to shock or shake them, and a shy unwillingness to join in the society of those of my own age, which kept me at all into a world which had never been other than alien and unknown to me.

So I continued to the age of three-and-twenty, when my father died; died, taking with him the secret that had so terribly influenced my life. But years afterward, when time and the necessity of action had blunted the edge of solitary results, and that living life other men, I had become as other men, my uncle, my father's only brother, revealed to me the mystery.

My father, at eight-and-twenty, had married my mother, then barely seventeen.

She was very pretty, very childish, fond of pleasure and the amusements of her age, and having been one of a large and happy and well-united family, the change from her own gay home and circle to the lonely old house in Cornwall, and my father's grave, studious habits, fell heavily on her, and soon she pined in secret for what she had lost. My father saw it, and though deeply pained and disappointed, he was the first to propose what she was longing for, a visit to her family.

This was some three months before the expected period of my birth; he took her to her home, and it was settled that there he should leave her till her confinement should take place, at which period he was to rejoin her, and, in due time, to conduct her back to Cornwall.

But ere she had been more than a month away news came to her that my father had been attacked with a pleurisy of the most dangerous kind, and she, smitten with grief and something like self-reproach, would listen to no persuasions that could keep her from him, and the next day, attended by her maid, set out, traveling post, to join him.

Early in the morning they had started, intending to sleep that night at a town of some importance on the way. But the roads were heavy, and the horses so jaded that it was evident they could not reach their destination till far on in the night, even supposing it possible to achieve that much, and already fatigue and anxiety were beginning to tell strongly on my mother.

So there was nothing for it but to take the first tolerable shelter they could reach, and at ten o'clock they were in bed and themselves in a rural, but really not uncomfortable road-side inn.

Supper dispatched, my mother was fain to retire to bed. The room, though small and poorly furnished, was clean, and the bed looked not uninviting, and the only serious drawback to its convenience was, that my mother's maid had to sleep in a room above, there being none other unoccupied on that floor. However, as Wilson's chamber was the one immediately over my mother's, and that she was a light sleeper, it would be easy, by tapping with the point of an umbrella on the low ceiling, at any moment to summon her, in case of there being occasion to do so.

And so, in a short time, my mother, worn out with all she had gone through in the long day, dropped into a profound sleep, and one by one the lights and the noises in the house sank into darkness and silence, and only the rain held their nightly orgies behind the old wainscoting.

Only in one room a light was still burning at two o'clock in the morning.

About that time my mother awoke, but in such ghastly terror and horror that it seemed not like waking from profound sleep, but like waking from death in the place of outer darkness—where evil keeping ble to speak, had sought to call my mother's attention in the way described.

But all came too late, and in a few minutes later he expired, involving in his own fate those innocent sufferers.

A DAY'S RIDE:

A LIFE'S ROMANCE.

By CHARLES LEVER.

AUTHOR OF "CHARLES O'MALLEY," "HARRY LORREQUER," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XLIII.

THE Briton kept his word; the time, too, favored him. It was a moment when wandering Englishmen were exhuming grievances throughout every land of Europe; and while one had discovered some case of religious intolerance in Norway, another beat him out of the field with the cold-blooded atrocities of Naples. My Englishman chanced to be an M.P., and therefore he asked, in his place, if the Foreign Secretary had any information to afford him about the case with respect to the case of the man called Harper, or Harpar, he was not certain which, and who had been confined for upward of three months in a dungeon in Austria, on allegations of which the accused knew nothing whatever, and attested by witnesses with whom he had never been confronted.

In the absence of his chief, the under-secretary rose to assure the right honorable gentleman that the case was one which had for a considerable time engaged the attention of the department he represented, and that he must requesting exertions of her Majesty's envoy at Vienna were now being devoted to obtain the fullest information as to the charges imputed to Harpar, and he hoped in a few days to be able to lay the result of his inquiry on the table of the House.

It was in about a week after this that Hirsch came to tell me that a member of her Majesty's legation at Vienna had arrived in Paris, investigate my case, and interrogate me in person. The envoy came like a "thief in the night," and was already at the stairs when he was announced.

"Oh! this is his den, is it?" cried he from without, as he slowly ascended the stairs. "Egad! he hasn't much to complain of in the matter of a lodging. I only wish our fellows were as well off at Vienna." And with these words there entered into my room a tall young fellow, with a light brown moustache, dressed in a loose traveling suit, and with the lounging of a man sauntering into a café. He did not remove his hat as he came in, or take the cigar from his mouth; the latter circumstance imparting a certain confusion to his speech that made him occasionally unintelligible. On only deigning to bestow a passing look on me, he moved toward the window, and looked out on the grand panorama of the Tyrol Alps, as they inclose the valley of Innspruck.

"Well," said he to himself, "all this ain't so bad for a dungeon."

The tone startled me. I looked again at him, I rallied myself to an effort of memory, and at once revealed the young fellow I had met on the Southwestern line, and from whom I had accidentally carried away the dispatch-bag. "To my benefit, and for a considerable amount, I trusted for not being recognized, and I sat patiently awaiting my examination.

"An Englishman, I suppose?" asked he, turning hastily round. "And of English parents?"

"Yes," was my reply, for I determined on brevity wherever possible.

"What brought you into this scrape?—I mean, why did you come here at all?"

"I was traveling."

"Traveling? Stuff and nonsense! Why should fellows like you travel? What's your rank in life?"

"A gentleman."

"Ah! but whose gentleman, my worthy friend? Ain't you a flunky? There, it's out! I say, have you got a match to light my cigar? Thanks—all right. Look here, now—don't let us be beating about the bush all the day here—I believe the government here is just as sick of you as you are of them. You've been here two months, ain't it so?"

"Ten and upward."

"Well, ten months. And you want to get away?"

I made no answer; indeed, his free-and-easy manner so disconcerted me that I could not speak, and he went on:

"I suppose they haven't got much against you, or that they don't care about it; and, besides, they are civil to us just now. At all events, it can be done—you understand?—it can be done."

"Indeed," said I, half superciliously.

"Yes," resumed he, "I think so; not but you'd have managed better in leaving the thing to us. That stupid notion you all have of writing letters to newspapers, and getting some troublesome fellow to ask questions in the House—that's what spoils every thing! How can we negotiate when the whole story is in the Times or the Daily News?"

"I opine, Sir, that you are ascribing to me an activity and energy I have no claim to."

"Well, if you didn't write those letters, somebody else did. I don't care a rush for the difference. You see, here's how the matter stands. This Mr. Briggs, or Riggs, has gone off, and doesn't care to prosecute, and all his allegations against you fall to the ground. Well, these people fancy they could carry on the thing themselves, you understand; we think not. They say they have got a strong case; perhaps they have; but we ask, 'What's the use of it? Sending that poor beggar to Spielberg won't save you, will it? And so we put it to them this way: 'Draw stakes, let him off, and both can cry quits.' There, give me another light. Isn't that the common-sense view of it?"

"I scarcely dare to say that I understand you aright."

"Oh, I can guess why. I have had dealings with fellows of your sort before. You don't fancy my not alluding to compensation, eh? You want to hear about the money part of the matter?"

"Perhaps not; but a great deal too much for me to tell you. The contents of papers would fill a cart, and that's the reason I say, cut your stick, my man, and get away." Again he turned to the window, and looking out, asked, "Any shooting about here? There ought to be cocks in that wood yonder?" and without caring for reply, went on: "After all, you know what both it is to talk about chains and dungeons, and bread-and-water, and the rest of it. You've been living in clover here. That old fellow below tells me what you dine with him every day; that you might have gone into Innspruck, to the theatre if you liked it—all I'll swear there are copies in that of the Danube the river.—Think it over, Riggs, think it over."

"I am not Riggs."

"Oh, I beg pardon! you're the other fellow. Well, think it over, Harpar."

"My name is not Harpar, Sir."

"What do you call it, then? some vowel or two? Maybe you call yourself Harpar or Harpèr? It's all the same to us."

"It's not the goods of a vowel or two, Sir; and I desire you to remark it is the graver one of a mistaken identity!" I said this with a self-sustaining consciousness that I thought must astound him, but his light and frivolous nature was imperious to rebuke.

"We have got the vowel to that," replied he, carelessly. "You may be Noakes or Styles. I believe they are the names of any fellows who are supposed to be making a fortune. Here, all, and it's all alike to us. What I have to observe to you is this: nobody cares very much whether you are detained here or not; nobody wants to detain you. Just reflect, therefore, if it's not the best thing you can do to slope off, and make no more fuss about it. Eh?"

"Once for all," said I, still more imperiously, "I am not the person against whom this charge is made. The authorities have all along mistaken me for Harpar."

"Well, what if they have? Does it signify one kreutzer? We have had trouble enough about the matter already, and do not embroil us any further."

"May I ask, Sir, just for information, who are the 'we' you so persistently allude to?"

Had I asked him in what division of the globe he understood us to be then conversing, he would not have regarded me with a look of more blank astonishment.

"Who are we?" repeated he. "Did you ask who are we?"

"Yes, Sir, that was what I had dared to ask?"

"Cool, certainly; what might be called an common cool. To what line of life were you brought up to, my worthy guest? I have rather a strong curiosity about antecedents."

"That same curiosity cost you a trifle once before," said I, no longer able to control myself, and dying with indignation, "although I remember, once upon a time, meeting you on a railroad, and you were so eager to exhibit the skill with which you could read a man's calling that you bet with a sovereign you would guess mine. You did so, and lost."

"You can't be—no, it's impossible. Are you really the simple-minded fellow that walked off with the bag for Kalbbratenstadt?"

"I did, by mistake, carry away a bag on that occasion, and I am sorry to add I repay my error, that I traveled the whole journey to convey those dispatches to their destination."

"I know all about it, by Jove! a frank, gay manner. 'Dobleton told me the whole story. You dined with him and pretended you were Lord Cloncurry's nephew, and that you sold old Mamma Keates off to Como, and made her believe you were Louis Philippe, and you made three livres by the transaction, and you have fool enough to like you. By Jove! what a rig you must have run! We have all laughed over it a score of times."

"If I knew who 'we' were, I am certain I should feel flattered by any amusement I afforded; and then, notwithstanding how much more than ever indebted to fiction than fact regarding me, I never assumed to be Louis Philippe, nor affected to be any person of distinction. A flighty old lady was foolish enough to imagine me a prince of the Orleans family—"

"You!—a prince! Oh, this is too absurd!"

"I confess, Sir, I can not see the matter in this light. I presume the mistake to be one by no means difficult to have occurred. Mrs. Keates had seen a deal of life and the world—"

"Not so much as you fancy," broke he in. "She was a long time in that private asylum up at Brompton, and then down in Staffordshire; altogether she must have passed five-and-twenty or thirty years in a rather restricted circle."

"Mad! Wasshe mad?"

"Not what one would call mad, but queer. They were all queer. Hargrave, the second brother, was the fellow that made that shindy in the Mauritius, and our friend Stratty isn't a conjuror. And we thought you were lurking the old lady. I assure you we did."

"I should be hopeless of any attempt to explain my motives, Sir; so pray excuse me."

"You were right, at all events," said he, not heeding the sarcasm of my manner. "There's no chance for the knaves now, with the telegraph system. As it was, there were orders flying through Europe to arrest Pottinger—I can't forget the name. We used to have it every day in the Chancellerie: Pottinger, five feet nine, weak-looking and vulgar, low forehead, light hair and eyes, slight lisp, talks German fluently, but ill. I have copied that portrait of you twenty, ay, thirty times."

"And yet, Sir, neither the name nor the description apply. I am no more Pottinger than I am ignoble-looking and vulgar."

"What's he—he? Not Harpar—not Harpar, not Pottinger? But who cares a rush for the name of fellows like you? You change them just as you do the cards at whist."

"May I take the liberty of asking, Sir, just for information, as you said a while ago, how you would wish me to make as free with you as you have been pleased to do with me? To give a mock inventory of your external characteristics, and finish off with yourself?"

"Laugh, probably, if I were amused; throw you out of the window if you offended me."

"What! in the first case, to which you this moment if I was strong enough," said I, resolutely. And he flung himself into a chair, and laughed as I had not believed him capable.

"Well," cried he, at last, "as this room is about fifty feet or so from the ground, it's just as well as it is. But I'll tell you in a word up this affair. You want to get away from this, I suppose; and as nobody wants to detain you the thing is easy enough. You couldn't make a fuss about compensation, for they'll not give a kreutzer, and you'd better not write a book about it, because 'we' don't stand fellows who write books; so just take a flight, and go off without military honors of any kind."

"I neither acknowledge the friendship nor accept the advice, Sir, nor the motives which induced me to suffer imprisonment for another are quite sufficient to raise me above any desire to make a profit by them."

"I think I understand you," said he, with a cunning expression in his half-closed eyes. "You go in for martyrdom, eh? Haven't a bit it? You want to be thought a strange, eccentric sort of fellow. Now, there was a time in the world that I had a kind of thing. Romeo, Coates, and Brummel, and that Irish fellow that walked to Jerusalem, and half a dozen others, were the town in those days; but it's all as much by-gone now as starched neck-cloths and Hessian boots. Ours is an age of plain sense, and the fellow who goes in for trying to revive what our grandfathers discarded and got rid of. It won't do, Pottinger, it will not."

"I am not Pottinger; my name is Algernon Sydney Potts."

"Ah! there's the mischief all out at last. What could come of such a collection of names but a life of incongruity and absurdity! You owe all your griefs to your godfathers, Potts. If they'd known what a fellow you'd have been a well-conducted poor creature. Well, I'm to give you a passport. Where do you wish to go?"

"I wish, first of all, to see Como."

"I think I know why. But you're on a wrong east there. They have left that long since."

"Indeed, and for what reason?"

"They've gone to pass the winter at Malta. Mamma Keates required a dry, warm climate, and you'll find them at the Auberge de Provence about a mile from Valetta: the Carmines, I think it's called. I have a brother quartered in the island, but I've not been over myself."

"What atrocious tobacco this is of yours, Butler," said I, taking a cigar from his case as I lay on the sofa. "I suppose that you small fry of diplomacy can not get things in duty free, eh?"

"Try this cheroot; you'll find it better," said he, opening a secret pocket in the case.

"Nothing to boast of," said I, puffing away, while he continued to fill up the blanks in my passport.

"Would you like an introduction to my brother? He's on the government staff there, and knows every one. He's a jolly sort of fellow, besides, and you'd get on well together."

"I don't care if I do," said I, carelessly, though, in truth, the proposal was very bad style—flippant without smartness and familiar without ease."

"Seven, Potts, but not altogether unjust; but you'll find George above the average of his class, and I think you'll like him."

"Down I go, then, into the mess," said I, with an insolent drawl. "That's an amount of boredom I could not submit to. Caution him to make no allusion of that kind."

He looked up at me with a strange twinkle in his eyes, which I could not interpret. He was either in admiration of my assurances, or Heaven knows what other sentiment then moved him. At all events, I was in ecstasy at the success of my own well-conceived vein, and walked the room, humming a tune, as he wrote the letter that was to present me to his brother.

"Why had I never hit upon this plan before?" thought I. "How was it that it had not occurred that the maxim of homeopathy is equally true in morals as in medicine, and that 'similis similibus curantur?' So long as I was meek, humble, and submissive, Butler's impertinent presumption only increased at every moment. With every fresh concession of mine he continued to encroach, and now that I had adopted his own strategy, and attacked, he fell back at once." I was proud, very proud of my discovery. It is a new contribution to that knowledge of life of which, notwithstanding all my disasters, I believed to be essentially my gift.

At last he finished his note, folded, sealed, and directed it.—"The Hon. George Butler, A.D.C., Government House, Malta, favored by Algernon Sydney Potts, Esq."

"Isn't that all right?" asked he, pointing to my name. "I was within an ace of writing Hampden-Russell too." And he laughed at his own very meagre jest.

"I hope you have merely made this an introduction?" said I.

"Nothing more; but why so?"

"Because it's just as likely that I never present it! I am the slave of the humor I find myself in, and I rarely get any thing that costs me the slightest effort." I said this with a close, and, indeed, a servile imitation of Charles Matthews in "Used Up;" but it was a grand success, and Butler was palpably vanquished.

"Well, for George's sake, I hope your mood may be the favorable one. Is there any thing more I can do for you? Can you think of nothing wherein I may be serviceable?"

"Nothing. Stay, I rather think on people at home might wish property where my old friend Hirsch here some mark of attention for his constant regard me. I don't know whether they give a C.B. at that sort of thing, but a sure—a handsome sum—something to mark the service, and the man to whom it was rendered. Don't you think I've could manage that?"

"I'll see what can be done. I don't despair of success."

As for our share in the affair, Buller, I'll take care that it shall be mentioned in the proper quarter. If I have a characteristic—my friends say I have many—but if I have one it is that I never forget the most trifling service of the humblest of those who have aided me. You are young, and will have your way to make in life. Go back, therefore, and carry with you the reflection that Potts is your friend."

I saw as he deflected at this, for he covered his face with his handkerchief and turned away, and for some seconds his shoulders moved convulsively.

"Yes," said I, with a struggle to become humble, "there are richer men, there are men more influential by family ties and connections, there are men who occupy a more conspicuous position before the public eye, there are men in the entrance of their way in the world in politics and party; but this I will say, that there is not one—no, not one—individual in the British dominions who, when you come to consider either the difficulties he has overcome, the strength of those prejudices he has conquered, the totally unassisted and unbefriended struggle he has had to maintain against not alone the errors, for errors are human, but, still worse, the ungenerous misconceptions, the wilful misrepresentations of those who, from education and rank and condition, might be naturally supposed, indeed confidently affirmed, to be—to be—"

"I am certain of it!" cried he, grasping my hand, and rescuing me from a situation very like smotherings—"I am certain of it!" And with a hurried salutation, for his feelings were evidently overcoming him, he burst away, and descended the stairs four steps at a time, and although I was sorry he had not waited till I finished my peroration, I was really glad that the act had ended and my triumph been full.

"What a deal of bad money passes current in this world," said I, as I was alone; "and what a damper it is upon human ingenuity to think how easy it is to eke out life with a forgery!"

"What do you say to a dinner with me at the Swan in Innspruck, Potts?" cried out Buller, from the court-yard.

"Excuse me, I mean to eat my last cutlet here, with my friend Hirsch. It will be an event for the poor fellow as long as he lives. Good-by, and a safe journey to you!"

WASHINGTON AS A MEDIATOR.

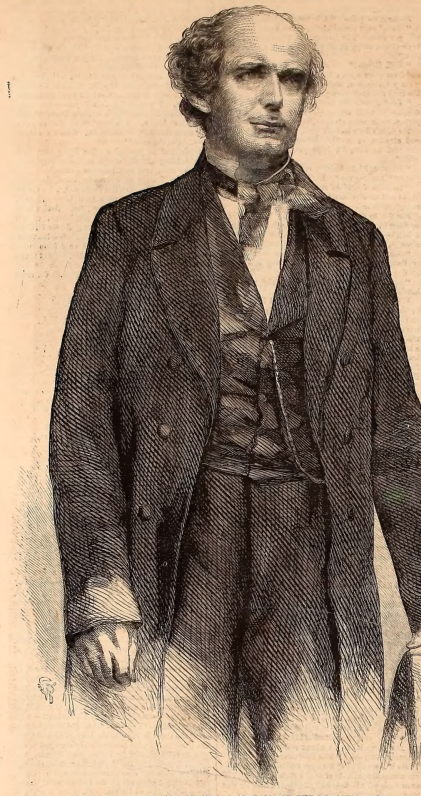
WE publish on page 188 AN ILLUSTRATION OF A SCENE IN THE REVOLUTIONARY WAR, which is described in Washington Irving's "Life of Washington," vol. ii., p. 116, as follows:

"A large party of Virginia riflemen, who had recently joined the army, had straggled into Philadelphia, and viewing the collegiate buildings, now turned into barracks, their tall figures, wild appearance, and fringed and tufted hunting garb, provoked the merriment of some troops from Maryland, who, vainly fashioned after the Indian, thought nothing equal to the round jacket and trousers. A bantering ensued between them. There was snow upon the ground, and snow-balls began to fly when jokes were exhausted. The Virginians were warm with their retort. They closed and came to blows; both sides were reinforced, and in a little while all the combatants were at fisticuffs, and there was a tumult in the camp worthy of the days of Homer. 'Such is this juncture,' writes an ensign, 'Washington made his appearance, whether by accident or design I never knew, but he came in time to put with him: his black servant just behind him, mounted. He threw the bridle of his own horse into his servant's hand, sprang from his seat, rushed into the thickest of the melee, seized one with each hand, heaved them by the breast, dashing them at arm's-length, talking to, and shaking them.'

"As the ensign says, his own presence he may have felt a powerful reprimand for their good conduct; they were engaged, too, in fighting those whose boards which was their social adherence: his reprimands must therefore have been a vehement one. He was commanding in a manner to which he was unaccustomed in his capacity of mediation. On the present occasion, we are told, his appearance and strength created a shade of astonishment and a tumult. The combatants dispersed in all directions, and in less than three minutes none remained on the ground but the two he had collared.

"The veteran who records this exercise of military authority seems at a loss which most to admire—the simplicity of the process or the vigor with which it was administered. 'Here,' writes he, 'bloodshed, imprisonments, trials by court-martial, revengeful feelings between the different corps of the army, were happily prevented by the physical and mental energies of a single person, and the only damage resulting from the fierce encounter was a few torn hunting frocks and rent jackets.'"

WASHINGTON THE MEDIATOR.—[See Page 187.]



HON. SALMON P. CHASE, OF OHIO, SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

HON. SALMON P. CHASE, SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

SALMON PORTLAND CHASE, present Secretary of the Treasury, was born at Cornish, New Hampshire, January 13, 1808. His father died when he was nine years of age; and, three years later, Salmon was sent to Worthington, Ohio, where he lived with his uncle, Philander Chase, then Episcopal Bishop of that State. The Bishop having accepted the Presidency of Cincinnati College, young Chase became a resident of that city. He had been a studious boy both in New Hampshire and in Ohio, and he was soon promoted to the Sophomore class of the college over which his uncle presided. He remained, however, not more than a year in Cincinnati, when he returned to his mother's home, then at Keene, New Hampshire, and in 1824 entered the Junior Class of Dartmouth College. He was known as an industrious student, of exemplary character, and in 1826 graduated with distinguished reputation. Soon after he opened a classical school in Washington, and gave instruction to the sons of Henry Clay, William Wirt, and other men then distinguished. While conducting his school he pursued the study of the law, under the direction of William Wirt; and in 1829 was admitted to the bar of the District of Columbia.

In the spring of 1830 Mr. Chase returned to Cincinnati, and has ever since been a resident of Ohio. While a young attorney, with good prospects, but without a pressure of business, Mr. Chase prepared for publication, in three octavo volumes, an edition of the Statutes of Ohio, with full annotations and references, and a preliminary sketch of the history of the State, which is now received as authority in the Courts. Through the reputation acquired by this work, and by close and successful attention to business, Mr. Chase soon gained a valuable practice. In 1837, as counsel for a colored woman arrested as a fugitive from slavery, he disputed the power of Congress to impose any duties or confer any powers on State magistrates in fugitive slave cases—a position which a decision of the United States Supreme Court afterward sustained. The same year, having been employed as counsel for James G. Birney, who was arrested for harboring a negro slave, Mr. Chase argued before the Supreme Court of Ohio that slavery is local, dependent on State law for existence and maintenance, and, therefore, that the person alleged to have been harbored having been brought into the State of Ohio by the individual claiming to be her master, was of right and in fact free. In 1840 Mr. Chase, associated with William H. Seward, was defendant's counsel in the well-known Van Zandt case, before the Supreme Court of the United States. In an elaborate argument, which was published, and attracted much attention, he then contended that, by the ordinance of 1787, no fugitive from service could be reclaimed from Ohio unless there had been an escape from one of the original States; that it was the clear understanding of the framers of the Constitution, and of the people who adopted it, that slavery was to be left exclusively to the disposal of the several States, without sanction or support from the National Government; and that the clause in the Constitution relating to persons held to service was one of compact, and conferred no power of legislation on Congress. In other efforts at the bar, and by his position in the political movements of the country, Mr. Chase rendered his political status evident. Previous to 1841 he had not been particularly identified with any political party. He supported General Harrison for the Presidency; but disapproving of his inaugural, and of the course of the Tyler administration in regard to the subject of slavery, he united in a call, made in 1841, for a Convention of the opponents of slavery and of slavery extension, which assembled at Columbus, in December of that year, and organized the Liberty party of Ohio. It nominated a candidate for Governor, and adopted an address to the people, written by Mr. Chase, which was among the first expositions of the political movement against slavery extension, and which argued doctrines that are now recognized as the basis of the Republican party. When, in 1843, a National Liberty Convention was assembled at Buffalo, Mr. Chase was an active and influential member; and having been subsequently, on several occasions, the public exponent of the views and objects of the party, was led, in 1845, to call a Western and Southern Convention at Cincinnati of all persons who were "resolved to use all constitutional and honorable means to effect the extinction of slavery within their respective States, and its reduction to its constitutional limits in the United States." The address, read to the Convention of 4000 persons, prepared by Mr. Chase, as Chairman of the Committee, argued the necessity of a political party opposed to the nationalization and extension of slavery, and exhibited what he regarded as the necessary hostility of slaveholding interests to all liberal measures. In 1847, at the second National Liberty Convention, Mr. Chase opposed the making of nominations, believing that the agitation of the Wilmot Proviso and the action of Congress would furnish a basis for a wider and more general movement against slavery extension; and in 1848, anticipating that the Conventions of the Whigs and Democrats would refuse to give that movement any effective support, he prepared a call for a Free Territory Convention, at Columbus, Ohio, which was largely attended, and which invited the National Convention that assembled at Buffalo in August of that year, and nominated Martin Van Buren for the Presidency. The platform there adopted bore decided evidences of the influence of Mr. Chase.

By resolutions at its State Conventions the Democratic party of Ohio had declared slavery an evil, and had asserted the duty of exercising all constitutional measures to prevent its increase, to mitigate, and finally eradicate it. Concurring generally in political opinions with the Democrats, and especially in the opposition declared by their resolutions to the nationalization of slavery, Mr. Chase was put forward as a candidate for election to the United States Senate, and in February, 1849, was chosen a Senator from Ohio by the votes of all the Democratic members of the Legislature and of the Free-Soil members with Democratic sympathies.

In 1850–51 Mr. Chase gave his support to the Democratic party in Ohio; but when, in 1852, the Baltimore Convention, which nominated Mr. Pierce for the Presidency, adopted a platform approving the Compromise acts of 1850, and denouncing the further agitation of the slavery question, and the Democratic party of Ohio accepted that platform, Mr. Chase addressed a letter to the Hon. Benj. F. Butler, of New York, announcing his determination to endeavor to secure the organization of an independent Democratic party. He prepared a platform, which was, in the main, adopted by the Independent Democratic Convention at Pittsburgh, in 1852, and gave energetic support to the nominees of that Convention. When the Nebraska Bill gave rise to new political relations among leading men in Congress and in all the States, Mr. Chase, who had been prominent and influential among the opponents of that measure, united actively and earnestly in the popular movement against slavery extension which grew out of it.

In July, 1855, Mr. Chase was nominated for Governor of Ohio. Before the expiration of his senatorial term leading public men had zealously urged his fitness for that position, as a representative of the public sentiment of Ohio. His election vindicated the justness of their views. He was inaugurated in January, 1856. The canvass had been strenuous and heated; and Mr. Chase, while zealously supported by the great majority of the Anti-Nebraska voters, had received but a cold and reluctant support from many who, on other questions, feared that he might prove an unsafe leader. These fears were greatly allayed by the inaugural of the new Governor; and when the Legislature adjourned in April, 1856, there was neither anxiety nor doubt in any quarter respecting the discretion or ability of Mr. Chase as an executive officer.

Governor Chase's political friends insisted that he should be a candidate for re-nomination as Governor; and a peculiar condition of public affairs, growing out of a defalcation of over $500,000 in the Treasury, forbade him to withhold his consent. This defalcation was discovered a few days before the semi-annual interest on the State debt fell due. Promptness on the part of Governor Chase compelled the resignation of the Treasurer, who had concealed the defalcation; secured a thorough investigation; and led to the adoption of a line of policy which enabled the Board of Commissioners to meet punctually all pecuniary obligations, and fortunately avert a large pecuniary loss.

A few months since Mr. Chase was elected United States Senator from Ohio; but having accepted the office of Secretary of the Treasury, he resigned his seat.

THE PARISH CLERK'S STORY.

For twenty miles round Bentholme there was nothing but talk about Squire Sigister's quarrel with his son and heir, young Mr. Robert, such a jolly young gentleman as you don't meet every day. He was quite the life of the neighborhood. It was understood that it might be partly the young gentleman's fault, but before any body knew any thing of the case, every body agreed that the Squire had been hard on him. And we couldn't be far wrong either, knowing what a choleric, easily-put-up, sort of a rough old fe llow. Se the news of the split between the old and the young one caused plenty of conversation, you may be sure; and will Mr. Robert go down on his marrow-bones? and what has he done? was till the question. When we heard what he had done, we decided it would be the best for him if he did go down on his marrow-bones, but it was pretty certain that he wouldn't. For Mr. Robert, he also could be stiff when he pleased, as was seen a chip! The fact was, Mr. Robert, as was generally known, had for a very long time been what is called sweet upon Susan Dawson, and she was something to be sweet upon: a plump, open-faced, young lass, not ever-vain, and sensible, though, of course, we couldn't think that, with her talking of one day marrying young Mr. Robert, which she did, till her father, being one of the Squire's tenants, properly stopped it, not before it came to the Squire's ear, though. So the Squire, who wanted Mr. Robert to marry one of his own class, he on with his top boots and his round hat, and down he goes to Farmer Dawson.

"YOU ARE GOING AFTER MARTHA, SUSAN, ARE YOU?"—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

"Dawson," says he, "I hear that boy of mine hangs about your doors a good bit. You'd better see to the locks and bolts. He's a sharp fellow, and don't give his time for nothing."

"Squire," says the farmer, "if he chooses to act scarecrow outside there, I've no help for it; but I'll take care he don't get to be a fixture inside."

"Keep a sharp eye on your daughter, Dawson," says the Squire.

"One in a family's enough, Squire," says the farmer. And he must have spoken heavily, for his niece, Martha Green, had gone away in a bad manner out of that very house where he sat. Some said it was Mr. Robert himself who had beguiled the poor girl, and was now at the same game with her cousin: others thought better of him as to that, and were sure it was his college friend Mr. Danby, who had been seen about with her during his visits at the Squire's. She left Farmer Dawson's house after one of these visits. Mr. Robert was away at the time, and that gave a color to what was said against him. But his friends didn't believe it, if his enemies did.

Now, when Mr. Robert found the farmer's doorbanged in his face no wonder he was mad with the Squire having been down there on particular business. What does he do but go straight to the Squire and ask him what he meant. The Squire retorts by asking him what he means. That's how the split began. The servants said that Mr. Robert burst out of the library, swearing he would go and marry Susan Dawson in spite of all. He didn't do that, but he managed to appoint to meet her by night. She went, as she'd have gone before the end of the world, if he asked her to go off with him to London to be married. While she was debating about it—for I suppose she hadn't enough cause Will Green, her cousin, Martha's brother. Will was whistling, and stood with his hands in his pockets, looking at them. He was an idle, indifferent fellow—some who made you believe that nothing affected him. "Don't think you'll astonish me," was his customary expression. So, he says, "You're going after Martha, are you, Susan? Make my compliments to her." And then he turned on his heel and sauntered off. Susan had a mind to look at the memory of Martha. The upshot was, that she went home and so did Mr. Robert, and the next morning the great quarrel took place, for the Squire somehow had heard of Mr. Robert's meeting with Susan. They got to high words. The Squire threatened to kick him out of the house, and as Mr. Robert had enough of that he said he would, and not return till he was asked. He went in a huff with us all. We heard of him spending money like dirt. He was away two years just, when we heard he was in prison for debt, and one morning Miss Susan was missing. Didn't the gossips fly about. Farmer Dawson lay his head a while, and then he woke up again and was cheerfuller than could be expected. By-and-by Susan returns. The farmer took her in, which he was much praised for, and he was kind to her, and wouldn't let the vicar rebuke her, which rather went against his character, in our minds. However, things passed like of old. The Squire seemed to have forgotten Mr. Robert; Susan was mum, Will Green did his farmwork, and seemed away at his supporters.

You must know that we had five roads round Bentholme. It lay just between two market-towns, and was not such a distance from a tolerable sized city. The roads were lonely, and people used often to say they wondered more bad work wasn't done. They even gave up wondering. The vicar rode home one night cleaned out, and, saving my respect for his memory, in as awful a fright as man can be. A highwayman had stopped him. A pretty commotion there was in Bentholme. Within a month we had as many as twelve bold open robberies—these to a week! There was a meeting of magistrates—constables were moved about, and all the farmers said they'd be cautious. But farmers never are cautious after market-days. Besides, this was a terrible fellow. He not only knew who they were, and where they were going to know always exactly how much money their purses contained, and used to name the sum! That was what unmanned them more than any thing. They gave up at that. It didn't look human. How we came to know this was through Farmer Burmess. He was riding home from Ockham market one night—plenty of ale in him, and up trots my gentleman.

"Good-night, Farmer Burmess," says he.

"Good-night," answers the farmer, looking at him queerly, for he had a veil on his face.

"I am rather in want of cash to-night," says the other. "Can you accommodate me?"

"It's an awful request civilly put," says Farmer Burmess. "No, I can't—so good-night again."

"I'm sorry to have to enforce it," says the other; "but I'm only a borrower. You'll have it again some day, which you can't say for your brains, if they go."

With that he outs with a pistol. The farmer stopped short. He was a cool hand, but he had no weapons. Says he:

"You seem pretty clever. Now, if you'll tell me what money I've got about me, to a shilling, I'll hand it out. If not, we'll part as we are. Is that fair?"

"Quite," says the highwayman.

"Then it's a bargain!—how much is it?" says Farmer Burmess.

"Hand out £22 18s. 6d. and I am satisfied."

The farmer started—he didn't think he knew how much he had. He and the highwayman parted. The highwayman called out to him: "Mind! it's only borrowed," and rode his way. Farmer Burmess told the story, and from that time the terrible highwayman was called the Borrower.

Suspicion somehow fell upon Will Green. He dressed better—got a watch, and other things costing money. Will didn't mind a bit. "Wait till I'm caught at it," he said. But he began to badger poor Susan. He wanted the girl to marry him. Once he was heard to say he could make her wretched for life if she chose. Then suddenly she began to grow thin and miserable as a starved kitten. She couldn't put her hand to a thing—she that used to be the freshest servicableest creature in all the country. People said it was because of Will's nightwork, and that she had begun to care for him.

One night the Squire had been dining in or about Ockham. He ordered his horse to be saddled, and while he was in the hall one of the gentlemen said to him: "I don't see that you don't have to lend your money to-night, Squire!"

"How much do you want?" says the Squire, where fit was to be supposed to a friend.

"Oh, I'm not the Borrower," says the gentleman, laughing—that set them talking about the robberies on the roads.

"Well," says the Squire, "I'll wager you the fellow doesn't borrow a penny from me."

He took two of the gentlemen at a bet of fifty pounds apiece. He set out, and shortly after they mounted to follow, and so fair play. The night was fine, the moon was one of those pleasant summer nights when you'd rather be awake than asleep. The Squire trotted on merrily. He turned when he came to the road which leads to Bentholme river, and stood up under a hedge, and presently he heard the two gentlemen trot past. He suspected a trick by-and-by, and then he saw one of them turn into a gate some way down the road, to make a short cut, thinks he: "I know what they're up to, but I'll be even with 'em. So he drew his hat low down over his head, and on he went. Bentholme Meads is a lonely place. You're a good couple of miles from the nearest house you have the river on one side of you, and Spenth Woods on the other. Just as the Squire was riding round the bridge, he thought he'd have a gallop on the grass, a man on horseback leaps in front of him. The Squire pulled back into the shadow, and, disguising his voice to have a moment's fun, "Hallos!" he sings out gruffly, "be you Mr. Borrower?"

"I am," says the other.

The Squire was expecting the voice of his friend. Not hearing that, he saw that it was no joke. Keeping still in the shadow, he drew his pistol as he was peppery—and he was, and pulled. And The highwayman's right arm fell, and he gave a groan. His hat dropped off, his face was bare.

"Good God!" cried the Squire.

Just then he heard his friends coming up behind the hedge.

"Here it is," the Squire sang out in his assumed voice, and thrust his purse out for the highwayman to take. He seemed surprised, but hearing voices, he turned right round, leaped his horse, and fled.

When the other two gentlemen had managed to push through the hedge, they could hardly believe their senses to see the Squire alive in a death, trembling like a child. They told him he had lost the bet, and he said they should be paid next day. The story flew like wildfire. Will Green shook their heads. They couldn't believe the Squire a coward. But what were they to think? The Squire had paid the money, and produced it.

After that, Squire Squire shut himself up. He was aged twenty years by that night. He walked to church like a man in a dream. Nothing more was heard of the Borrower, and the roads got safe again. One day Susan was sent for to come to the hall. She put on her best bonnet dress, and went. She looked flurry, not knowing what to think of it. When she came back she looked brisker. The truth was, the Squire couldn't be hers," fired off, as he never could be may-be: fetch him here alive, and I'll marry you both within a week, so help me Heaven!" We only heard this after, for Susan herself never could tell.

Susan knew that Will Green was aware of Mr. Robert's whereabouts. I needn't tell you what women are when they've been wronged to do when they want to worm any thing out of a man. Susan began her cajoleries with Mr. Will. He seem d confident that she had dropped all her fancy she made him think, in some wonderful woman's way, that she cared no more for Mr. Robert, and that particular month was commencing to water for Will Green. At any rate, by Will's aid, she managed to light upon Mr. Robert in a cottage some miles off. She wrote to him, before to the Squire, with his arm in a sling: father and son were reconciled: and then came the extraordinary thing. Susan refused to marry Mr. Robert!

This caused her, of course, to be very much observed and spoken about. She was called a number of names; and she didn't seem care for it. And this was vexation to one of our gossips, Mrs. Gillott, the grocer's wife. She put on her bonnet, one evening, and proceeded to pay Farmer Dawson a visit. The farmer was out, but she hit upon Susan alone.

"Well, Susan," says she, after rounding about the business, "so you're to be married at last!"

"I?" cries Susan, "you're mistaken, ma'am."

"Not at all," replies the old lady. "And now that he's reclaimed from the error of his ways, it's very proper you should."

Susan grew pale. "What ways?" she gasped.

"Well," says the old lady, "you know how the whisper goes. The robber doesn't rob now, and Will Green stops at home. I make no accusation."

"Will Green!" Susan pronounced the name, and from close upon a faint she burst into a laugh. "Do you suppose, ma'am, I am going to marry him? Pray undeceive yourself instantly!"

"Yes I must undeceive you to that. Pray, undeceive yourself instantly," says Will Green, in person, as he marches into the room.

He didn't look so delighted, but he was jaunty and careless, as usual. When they were alone, she said to him, "I hope you're not offended, Will."

"What at?" he shouts, savagely. "Because you won't marry me? Lord bless you!"

"Because I won't marry Hardesty," Susan put in, as soft as she could. "You know, Will, I'm not going to marry at all."

She felt trembling, as she spoke. Will stepped up from his chair. I must tell you that he wasn't a black-looking, or a black-hearted fellow: only strange, and loose, uncertain and full of his moods.

"Susan," says he, "it's better you should marry Robert Spigiter than keep pumping salt-water all day long."

"Marry him, and ruin him" says she, pumping harder,

Will was fond of Susan, and he had Mr. Robert in his power. The sight of her tears gave him a sort of melting feeling, and the knowing what they were shed for pricked him like poison. Between the two sensations, Will was wrought upon to say a kind thing and mean a black one. Or, perhaps, he meant nothing but circumstances were too much for him. However, he said to her, "Marry Mr. Robert, Susan."

Oh no! She wouldn't. And then she would.

"Will you be at the wedding?" she asked.

"I'll be at the wedding," says he.

The Squiress were all married quietly—walking from the hall to the church, and back again from the church to the hall. Children strewed flowers along the way, the bells pealed, there was feasting and fun for the whole body. It was given out that Mr. Robert was going to be married to Susan Dawson by consent of the Squire: the day was named, and all arrangements made. Just three days before the wedding a lady and gentleman came to the Gold Stag, our village inn, and put up there. The gentleman inquired to be a friend of Mr. Robert's, and, after Mr. Robert had seen him, he sent word round that he wanted to speak to Will Green. But Will was not to be found. He had unnoticed away with his hands in his pockets, apparently caring for nobody. When the marriage-bells were ringing, Will was missing. This did not make Susan happier, for the poor girl feared he had done himself a harm. However, she was obliged to look as happy as she could for Mr. Robert.

The wedding was quite a splendid affair. Will's disappearing, as in duty bound. The whole village had turned out for a holiday, and lots had promised themselves to get tipsy—reasoned before duty, as poor fellows will, when they haven't a chance every day—and we mustn't be too hard on them.

On the little bit of common in front of the church an old coach stood. The trunk is hollow, but the branches were in leaf. Leaning against the bark, with his back to the procession, a man was seen, but not very plainly. He wasn't noticed till he came near, and then people began to ask who he was, and talked of his manners. When he got close to the bride and bridegroom, Farmer Burmess sung out: "The Borrower!"

He had a veil over his eyes and nose. Mr. Robert was pale as the face of a ghost of him. The man took off his hat, and discovered that he was no other than the missing Will Green.

"Stop!" he cried. "I've a word to say to this."

There was a dead halt. Susan made an effort to go forward to him, but one of the handsome young bridesmaids ran up to hold her.

"What's the matter, Will?" said Mr. Robert, trying to be calm and easy.

"Hush!" Susan answered. "I swore I'd have you, and now's the time. Don't you think me a fool, Sir? But you'll find I'm not a woman. You're going to be married, Sir, you know, publicly: I say you shall be married in your Borrower's uniform, or not at all. That's my word."

Every body was staring at the old Squire walking between Will and his son, and put out his hand.

"A hundred pounds," he whispered.

Will waved him off. "Not for a thousand!"

"Will," said Mr. Robert, huskily, "what have I done to you to deserve this? Is it because I'm going to marry Susan?"

"I think I speak Will, "I never cared for a girl so much as that. Will you take it or not?" And he held out the highwayman's mask.

Mr. Robert took it, and seeing his bride's condition attempted to laugh it off.

"It won't do!" cried Will. "You're in my hands. What do you think I took this trouble for? Because you're a gentleman, and I'm a poor devil, whose sister's to be played with like a toy?"

"Stand aside!" said Mr. Robert, sharply.

"You won't submit to the terms? Good!" cried Will, and, stepping close up in front of them all, so as to block the way, he shouted: "Lisco!"

But what he said was unintelligible, when a lady, the same that was stopping at the Gold Stag with the gentleman, rushed out, threw her arms round Will's neck, and called him "dear brother!"

Will looked stupefied, but presently thrusting her out at arm's-length: "Aren't you ashamed to appear here?" he said.

"No, Will; not when my husband is by me," said Martha.

Mr. Danby, Mr. Robert's friend, now came up to Will. They talked to him hastily, and seemed to be turning his head this way and that, and round and round. Then Will, with a dash of the back of his hand across his eyes, got from them, stood out before Mr. Robert, and said, in a low tone, "I've judged you wrong, Sir. I've been a black villain to you; I led you into evil on purpose to ruin you, and revenge myself. That's my fault—I can't forget an injury. Do you forgive me?"

Mr. Robert shook his hand.

"And you, Susan?" She faltered a kind word.

Then Will, collecting himself, called in a strong voice: "People of Bentholme! I was interrupted just now. I was going to tell you something. You've been troubled by a certain Borrower for some time lately. You may rest quiet in your beds from this day. Stand back. Give me a clear start. I'm the man!"

With that he jumped on his horse that he'd been holding all the while, and, nodding once, away he went, and we all breathed deep.

You don't want to hear any more, do you? Why, your curiosity's up, I suppose. Whether he went, paid back the moneys he'd borrowed to a fraction, and with tidy interest, too. And what's more, he did it through a legal gentleman, and had his acknowledgment for the same. As for Will, he never appeared in our parts again. We heard of him over in America, doing well on a farm twice as large as the Squire's estate. Mr. Robert spoke of him forever after as the finest fellow he had known in the course of his life. But he had a twist in his character, that I declare.

THE DROWNED AT SEA.

Never bronze or slab of stone
May their sepulchre denote;
O'er their lonely graves alone
Shall the shifting sea-weed float.
Not for them the quiet grave
Underneath the church-yard tree;
They rest where the ocean wave,
They sleep below the sleepless surf.

O'er them shall the waters wrestle
With the whirlwind from the land,
But their bones will only nestle
Closer down into the sand;
And for every sea-bird's screech,
Loud or low, shall be their dirge;
And each idle wave that breaks
Henceforth upon any shore,
Shall be chanted for their sakes,
Shall be holy evermore.

MAJOR ANDERSON'S COMMAND AT FORT SUMTER.

We publish on page 177 a group of portraits of the officers of the garrison at Fort Sumter. Our picture was taken from a photograph recently made by a Charleston photographer.

Of the Commander, MAJOR ANDERSON, and of the Chief-Engineer, CAPTAIN FOSTER, we published portraits and biographical sketches in Nos. 181 and 182, respectively, of Harper's Weekly, and refer our readers to those numbers.

ASSISTANT-SURGEON S. WYLIE CRAWFORD, of the United States Medical Staff, at present the senior officer of Major Anderson's Staff, and medical officer of Fort Sumter, is a native of Philadelphia. Dr. Crawford is a son of the Rev. Dr. Crawford, so long and so favorably known in his connection with the University of Pennsylvania. Dr. Crawford entered the army in July, 1851, at the head of his class, and has since that period been actively engaged in distant frontier service in Texas, New Mexico, and Nebraska. Dr. Crawford accompanied Fremont to Mexico, with his own conveyance and servants, and ascended successfully the Popocatapetl, carrying a barometer to the top. He spent a night in the crater, which he thoroughly explored; and for his daring exploration was honored with membership by the Geographical Society of Mexico. He has been bearer of dispatches by Mr. Forsyth to the President at Washington. In September last Dr. Crawford was assigned to duty with the Sixth Regiment of Infantry at Fort Moultrie, and was one of the last to leave that work on the night of 26th December. The entire hospital department was created with his direction at Fort Sumter, pecularly well adapted when Fort Moultrie was occupied by State troops.

CAPTAIN TRUMAN SEYMOUR belongs to Major Anderson's regiment, the First Artillery. He is a native of Vermont, and was appointed from that State to the Military Academy on 1st July, 1846. He served throughout the Mexican war, and distinguished himself by his gallantry in so marked a manner that, on 30th August, 1847, he was brevetted Captain. He is not only an excellent soldier and a prudent officer, but is an accomplished scholar and artist.

CAPTAIN ABNER DOUBLEDAY also belongs to the First Regiment of Artillery. He hails from New York, and entered the army as Second Lieutenant in the Third Artillery, on 1st July, 1842. Another officer of the First Regiment of Artillery, serving in Fort Sumter, is FIRST-LIEUTENANT JEFFERSON C. DAVIS, of Indiana. He entered the army, as Second-Lieutenant in his present regiment, on 27th June, 1848. And yet another is FIRST-LIEUTENANT THEODORE TALBOT, of Kentucky, who was appointed Second-Lieutenant in that regiment on 29th May, 1847.

Under Captain Foster are serving two Lieutenants of Engineers, FIRST-LIEUTENANT GEORGE W. SNYDER, of New York, whose commission dates from 1st July, 1856; and RICHARD K. MEADE, Jun., of Virginia, who was appointed from that State on 1st July, 1857. He is a Second-Lieutenant.

On page 180 the reader will find a picture of Fort Sumter, with which the names of these gallant officers will always be connected.

AGRICULTURAL.—The Agricultural Gleaner and The Illustrated Farmers' Almanac, published by Joseph Thorley, London, England, and 21 Broadway, N. Y., are full of interest to Farmers, and particularly Breeders of Stock. They, however, especially advocate the use of "Thorley's Food for Cattle," which seems to have met with great success in Great Britain, as well as in this country.

Seventy-six prizes were last year awarded to Cattle fed on this Food. And at its exhibition at the Pennsylvanian and New Jersey State Agricultural Shows, obtained Diplomas. The Gold Medal was also awarded by the Keighley Agricultural Society.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

(This day Published)

VIELE'S HAND-BOOK FOR ACTIVE SERVICE, containing PRACTICAL INSTRUCTION IN CAMPAIGN DUTIES. For the use of Volunteers. By EGBERT L. VIELE, late U. S. A., Captain Engineers, Seventh Regiment, N. G. 1 vol. 12mo, cloth, $1 00.

KING ON STEAM. LESSONS AND PRACTICAL NOTES ON STEAM, THE STEAM ENGINE, PROPELLERS, &c. For young Marine Engineers, Sea-boys, and others. By the late W. H. KING, U. S. N.; revised by Chief Engineer J. W. KING, U. S. N. Second Edition, enlarged: one vol. 8vo, cloth, $1 50. Either of the above books sent free by mail on receipt of the price. D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher, 192 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

First-Class Prize Medal, Paris Exhibition, 1855.

LAWSON & CO.,
Printing Ink Manufacturers,
LONDON (ENGLAND) AND NEW YORK.
Furnish to the principal Offices in Central Europe and America, and also till the principal Illustrated Papers on both Continents.
New York Depot, 56 Gold St., New York.

Now is the Time to Subscribe!

$2 00 worth of Books Free.

To any one who will send

Two Dollars

For one year's Subscription to the

New York Weekly,

Shall receive $2 00 worth of beautiful Bound Books, free, as a Premium.

Specimen Numbers sent free.

STREET & SMITH,
Proprietors N. Y. Weekly,
22 Beekman Street, N. Y.

WEDDINGS for the UNION.—Superb Gilt Edged Cards, Notes, Satin Ties, Envelopes, &c., of the latest styles, at fair prices, by A. DEMAREST, Engraver, No. 152 Broadway, N. Y. Samples by mail.

AGENTS WANTED.—$5 MAP FOR 25 CENTS, COLORED IN STATES NICELY. LLOYD'S UNITED STATES RAILROAD MAP OF AMERICA IS NOW READY. The usual price of a Map of this size is from $5 to $8. It is FOUR FEET SQUARE, printed on extra sheet of strong white linen paper, and shows to the reader at one glance, from CANADA to TEXAS, and is acknowledged by rail-road men to be the most CORRECT MAP ever offered to the people of this country. As there is so much a cry in particular as the public now-a-days, we have thought it advisable to submit evidence of the correctness of this advertisement.

NEWARK, N. J., 1861.
J. T. LLOYD—Indeed is $3. I consider your Railroad Map alone worth that amount. JOHN S. DARLY,
President New Jersey Railroad Company.
OFFICE VIRGINIA AND TENNESSEE RR. CO.,
LYNCHBURG, Feb. 1, 1861.
J. T. LLOYD, 164 Broadway, N. Y.:—DEAR SIR—I think highly of your Map, and will be glad to inclose you $20 in order to aid in keeping it up. Yours truly,
H. H. GILL, General Superintendent.
Sent by mail anywhere. Terms taken. Send for a circular. Address J. T. Lloyd, Publisher, 164 Broadway, New York City.

AGENTS WANTED IN EVERY TOWN and Village in the U. S. and Canada to sell a new article needed in every family. Enclose stamp for a Circular, to Box 5704, N. Y. Postoffice.

SOIRE COINS and BUNIONS are really CURED by the use of SWISS CORN PLASTER. For sale by DURYEA, Druggist, No. 809 Broadway. Sent by mail on receipt of 30 cents.

TO PRACTICAL TAILORS.—E. L. BRISTOL'S SYSTEM FOR CUTTING COATS TO FIT all the variations of forms by actual measurement, any style. PANT, or Fashion may dictate, with the use of inch measure only; no instruments required, or division, to produce a perfect fitting Garment, will be furnished on mail, on the below devices of making and using their mode of cutting. Also a correct method for Cutting Vests and Pants. Also, Rules for Measuring, Explanations, with extra full-sized Drafts, &c., will be sent by express, free of extra charge, on receipt of the following established prices: Coat System, with extra Drafts, &c., $10; Pants System, with Drafts, &c., $5; Vest System, Drafts, &c., $5. No Deviation from the above prices. Address E. L. BRISTOL, care Haney and Bethel, No. 415 Broadway, N. Y.

JUST PUBLISHED—A PAMPHLET giving an ACCOUNT OF the DISCOVERY of the MAKORA ARABICA by a Missionary and Physician of Mocha, Arabia. Published for the benefit of those suffering from Consumption, Bronchitis, Coughs, and Colds. The Pamphlet will be sent free to all who may desire it. Address or apply to LEEDS, GILMORE & Co., No. 61 Liberty Street, N. Y.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—The Subscriber will prove them to grow heavily in six weeks upon the smoothest face without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of an order. R. G. GRAHAM, No. 100 Nassau Street, N. Y.

FOWLER & WELLS'S
American and Foreign Patent Agency,
308 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.
All business pertaining to the Patent Office done in the most prompt and satisfactory manner on reasonable terms.

Mantillas! Mantillas!

BRODIE
Will make his Great
Spring Opening
on Thursday, the 21st inst.,
at his
Palace of Fashion,
Under the 5th Avenue Hotel,
Corner 23d Street,
and at the
Old Celebrated Stand,
300 Canal Street.
The richest Display of
MANTILLAS
in
Silk and Fancy Cloth
Ever made in New York.
To Public Speakers and Singers.

"Brown's Bronchial Troches," or Cough Lozenges. From Prof. M. Stacy Johnson, Teacher of Music, S. Female Coll. La Grange, Ga. "I have found their use very efficacious in removing that irritation of the Throat so common with Speakers and Singers. I have enlisted several persons in their favor, among whom are Professor Wilkes, Principal Brownwood University, and Rev. M. Tucker, all of this place. The Troches have only to be tried to recommend themselves."

No Chimney!

Burners that will fit any Coal Oil Lamp, and burn Coal Oil or Kerosene without a chimney. Burner sent by mail on receipt of $1 25. Salesmen's Carbi-Air Gas Lamp burns pure Coal Oil, Camphene, &c., without wick or chimney. Sample lamp $3 00. Enclose stamp for Circulars. Address CALLENDER & PERCE, Dealers in Lamps, Oils, &c., 175 Broadway, New York.

BOOKSELLERS, AGENTS, NEWSMEN, and others, who wish to "do good," and "make money," should obtain a stock of those valuable and rapid-selling books, "How to Write," "How to Talk," "How to Behave," and "How to Do Business." Only 30 cents each, or $1 for the four in paper, and $1 50 in one large gilt volume. Published by FOWLER AND WELLS, 308 Broadway, New York.

The Working Farmer,
A large Agricultural Monthly Magazine,
(Regular Subscription price $1 00 per annum),
AND
Harper's Weekly,
For $2 40 a Year.
Both Papers for less than the Subscription Price of One.
The Working Farmer
Is Edited by PROF. J. J. MAPES, assisted by a Corps of Gentlemen who are practically engaged in conducting the several departments of Farming and Gardening.
VOL. 13 COMMENCES WITH JAN. 1ST, 1861.
Specimen copies sent free on application.
Remit subscription to
CHAS. JV. MAPES,
132 and 134 Nassau, and 11 Beekman Street, New York.

W. A. HAYWARD,
MANUFACTURING JEWELER,
208 Broadway, New York.
N.B. FULL ASSORTMENT OF GOODS for the $1 00 STORES and PEDDLERS.

Muller's Piano Method—In English and German.
REVISED BY JULIUS KNORR.
An elaborate, thorough, and unique course of study, embracing every requisite for acquiring the art of tuning and practice. Two Parts. Price of each, $2. Complete, $3. Published by OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston.

WEDDING CARDS, Specimens by Mail on receipt of 2 postage stamps.
EVERDELL, 302 Broadway, N. Y.

WANTED—MEN, WOMEN, AND BOYS in every County, City, and Village in the United States, to act as Agents for the sale of Sherman & Co.'s Gold Pens and Pencils. Agents can make from 1 to 5 dollars a day. Being largely engaged in the manufacture of a superior quality of Gold Pens, we are enabled to offer to our customers a greater variety and more valuable Gifts than any other similar establishment. For further particulars enclose a stamp, and address, SHERMAN & CO., 239 Broadway, corner of Barclay Street, New York.

A GREAT CURE.—Dr. Leland's ANTI-BILIOUS-ARIX Bath permanently cures Rheumatism, Gout, and Neuralgia, and all Mercurial Diseases. Price $2. Sent per mail or express. Descriptive circulars sent free. Agents wanted everywhere. G. Smith & Co., Proprietors, office 407 Broadway, N. Y.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA.
A few bottles will generally disperse all Scrofulous tendency, while it improves the appetite and invigorates the Constitution. Prepared by
A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists, No. 141 William St., N. Y.

$45. A WHEELER & WILSON SEWING MACHINE. A GEM. Send stamp for Circular to Box 3764, N. Y. Postoffice.

The Great
Toilet Requisite
Now Ready.

In Large Bottles!
DENSLOW'S
Richly Perfumed
Hair Tonic.
Only 25 Cents a Bottle.

FEATURES.
I.
The largest Bottles ever sold for 25 cts.
II.
The most Richly-Perfumed Article.
III.
Put up in Elegant Toilet Bottles.
IV.
In Composition, Harmless;—as a Tonic for the Hair, Unequaled.
V.
The Price is just Right!

REMARKS.
Denslow, Chemist & Perfumer,
Broadway, New York.
Originator, in 1859, of those two immensely popular articles,
The Shilling Hair Tonic
and
The Shilling Benzine.
Now offers for public approbation a HAIR TONIC, RESTORATIVE, and DRESSING,
At 25 Cents per Bottle,
Which will bear favorable comparison with any of the Dollar articles in use.

The Bottles hold over Eight ounces (Half-a-Pint), which is considerably more than in the most popular Dollar articles contain. The Quality is unsurpassed. The Experience gained by the producer in the manufacture of the favorite SHILLING HAIR TONIC (nearly 30,000 dozen of which have been sold during the past year), enables him to present a Compound of the most delicate Character, containing nothing injurious, but, on the contrary, all the ingredients known for years to be best adapted to foster the growth of the Hair and beautify it.

The special cheapness of this article, and its elegance, will cause it to Sell Immediately

The favorite Thing,
Superseding all the old-fashioned, mon-enjoyed preparations, which the public have become tired of, both on account of their expensiveness, and their inferior style and quality.

Denslow's Hair Tonic
Will be the favorite and only quick-selling kind, as soon as the public have seen it.

Card to Dealers.
Provide yourselves at once with a half gross or a gross of this new and taking article. You will find it to sell beyond any preparation you ever placed upon your counter, because it is

Unequaled in the Two Essentials,
Quality and Cheapness.

The most striking large Show Card got up this year is ready, and will be given out freely. Dealers ordering a gross will be entitled to a copy in

An Elegant Frame,
Splendidly got up, at a cost of several dollars each—a great ornament to a store, and very influential in attracting purchasers.

Orders may be made through any Wholesale Drug, Patent Medicine, or Fancy Goods House in New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and other large cities, or direct to the Proprietors, Wholesale Depot, 152 Broadway, New York.

Price uniform in the Trade. A Card of rates upon application, sold for Cash only. None consigned or given away. It will go without.

The Public want such a preparation, and will try it liberally.

Immediate Application
Will be necessary to ensure a supply of any magnitude, as the entire production, so far, is ordered in advance several days.

The General get up of
DENSLOW'S HAIR TONIC
Is a Model in every Detail.
The Public will appreciate it!

Thunder and Lightning
May startle you; but the silent influences of electricity when writing with steel pens is now known to be the frequent cause of paralysis, weakness, and exhaustion. The CHAMPION PENHOLDER was designed expressly to avert all danger. Endorsed by the highest authority. For sale by A. D. BILL, 94 Tremont Street, Boston. J. A. SWASEY, Agent for New York, Belmont Hotel, 175 Fulton Street.

The Photographic Visiting
Card.
CHARLES D. FREDRICKS & CO., 785 and 587 Broadway, were the first to introduce this very beautiful and popular picture in the United States, and from the success which has followed its introduction, various styles of frames, passe-partouts, and other articles adapted to the picture, have been manufactured by us in Europe and in this country. With a view to make our establishment the depot for all the articles required in both wholesale and retail, we respectfully call the attention of the public to the following:—

ALBUMS holding 280 Visiting Cards,
ALBUMS holding 100 Visiting Cards,
ALBUMS holding 50 Visiting Cards,
ALBUMS holding 30 Visiting Cards,
ALBUMS holding 20 Visiting Cards,
VELVET Frames for Visiting Cards,
Jet Enamelled Frames for Visiting Cards,
Turkey Morocco Frames for Visiting Cards,
Velvet Frames, for 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 Visiting Cards,
Composition Frames, richly ornamented, for Visiting Cards
Black Walnut and Ebony Frames for Visiting Cards,
Feather Fans, holding 6 Visiting Cards,

And many other articles exclusively adapted to the Photographic Visiting Card. Ladies having fine miniatures and other pictures for which they desire rich and appropriate frames and cases, are invited to examine our varied assortment of Velvet, Turkey Morocco, and Enamelled Frames, adapted to almost any sized picture.

Photographs colored in oil, pastel, or water-colors. Prices reduced to conform to the times.

C. D. FREDRICKS & CO.,
Photographers and Dealers, 785 Broadway.

LE BON TON—THE BEST LADIES' FASHION BOOK in the World. Specimen copies, with two splendid Colored Patterns, post free, 25 cents.
S. T. TAYLOR & SON, 407 Broadway, N. Y.

BACK NUMBERS and BOUND VOLUMES of HARPER'S WEEKLY and MONTHLY MAGAZINE can always be had of
A. WINCH, 808 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

Trusses.—Dr. Rigg's Watertight Multipedal Truss has had a success hitherto unknown. Warranted to effect a free cure. Pamphlets invariably cured. Send for a Pamphlet. 2 Barclay St., N. Y. Also a Varicocele Truss.

Constitution Water.
The only Known Remedy for Diabetes,
Irritation of the Neck of the Bladder,
Inflammation of the Kidneys, and Calarrh of the Bladder, Strangury and Incontinence of Urine, Stone in the Bladder, Calculus, Gravel, Brick Dust Deposits, and Mucous or Bloody Urine, and other Urinating. For sale by all Druggists. Price $1 00. Wm. B. Lyon & Co., Proprietors, Morgan & Allen, General Agents, No. 46 Cliff Street, New York.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
For April, 1861.

CONTENTS.

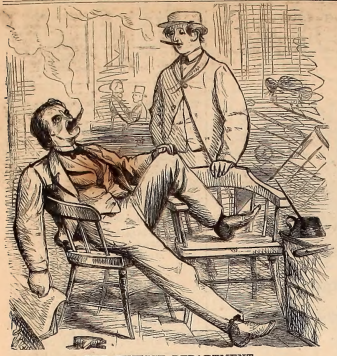
THREE MONTHS IN THE LEVANT. By CHARLES HALLECK.—First Paper.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Leaving the Eclipse.—I told you so.—On Deck.—A Day's Shooting.—An Artist's Trick.—Leaping.—Dinner.—Mail Steamer Homeward.—Valley Harbor.—Pulpit Cave.—Dressing Fish.—Caplin.—Tail-board.—Ice-Bound.—Total Eclipse.
MUSIC AT NIGHT.
A DISH OF CAPON.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Capon Springs.—Colonel Davy Waddle.—Aunt Leah.—Bob Myers.—Ice Mountain.—The Dairy.—Adam Rinehart.—Meddle.
A CHAPTER ON MITES.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Acarus Domesticus.—Cheese Mite.—Milk Mite.—Rose Mite.—Acarus Canus Mediflora.—Acarus Megbertus.—Acarus Siro.—Acarus Longicornis.—Hydrachna Geographica.—Hydrachna Globum.—Hydrachna Picata.
RAREY, THE HORSE TAMER. By T. B. THORPE.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Cruiser Untamed.—Cruiser Tamed.—Taming a Groom.—Cruiser Bridled.—Cruiser Ridden.—Untamed Groom.—Gentlemanly Horse.—The Swedish Medal.—The Gold Medal.
TWELVE YEARS OF MY LIFE.
THE LEGEND OF EASTER LOGS. By FITZ JAMES O'BRIEN.
MOTLEY'S HISTORY OF THE UNITED NETHERLANDS.
TATTLE OF THE LAST CENTURY.
THE COUNTESS MELUSINE.
MINOT'S LEDGE.
LOST ON BROADWAY.
THE ADVENTURES OF PHILIP. By W. M. THACKERAY.
CHAPTER VI. Brandon's.
CHAPTER VII. Our Neighbor Bacchi.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Jean Jaques.—Mr. Frog and Prince Otto.—The Old Fogey.—Mr. Wiggins.
THE CHILD THAT LOVED A GRAVE.
THE THREE KINGS.
MRS. CLUMMEY AT FORTY.
MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.
LITERARY NOTICES.
EDITOR'S TABLE.
EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.
EDITOR'S DRAWER.
EDITOR'S DRAWER.
THE ANNOYANCES OF A LITTLE DAUGHTER'S LIFE.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Fussy's Failure.—In Powder.—Dressing-table.—Her Boots.—Sitting up.—Astonishment.—Dolly's Bath.—Dressed up.—At Night.—The Doll in Disgrace.
FASHIONS FOR APRIL.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Spring Fellies.—Morning Negligee.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) . 2 00
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of EIGHT SUBSCRIBERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MAGAZINE, together, one year, $4 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.



THE FINESSE DEPARTMENT.

YOUNG MERCHANT. "What do I do? Why, I attend to the Finesse Department—do all the Finessing, you know!"
FRIEND. "Finessing! What cuthunder's that?"
Y. MERCHANT. "Why, when any Feller owes the Concern Money and won't Pay, I go and make him, or Knock his Darned Old Head off his Shoulders!"

IRISH HOUSEKEEPING.

BACHELOR "Mary, I should like that piece of Bacon I left at Dinner yesterday."
IRISH SERVANT. "Is it the bit o' Bhacon thin? Shure I took it to Loight the Fhoires!"

FREDERICK (who, we are sorry to say, is rather fond of Chaffing his Brother-in-Law). "Oh! look here, ROBERT, will you have this with you in the Car, or shall I have it Checked through?"

CONSIDERATE!

YOUNG FUDGE (mysteriously.) "Ahem! Captain—it strikes me there's something on between you and the Fairhaired Party with the Coronet? If so, between Friends, you know. Eh? As I had some thoughts, eh?—don't you know?"
CAPTAIN (facetiously). "Oh! ah! I see—very delicate of you—quite takes a load off my mind, 'sure you!"

A NEW TIE EVERY DAY.
THE FAPER NECK-TIE.
SMITH & BROUWER,
No. 56 Warren Street, New York.

John B. Dunham.

Overstrung Grand Square and Upright Pianos.

Established in 1834.

Are pronounced to be the best Pianos manufactured. Each Instrument warranted 5 years. Send for Circular. Warerooms and Manufactory, 75 to 85 East 13th Street, near Broadway, N. Y.

Thorley's Food for Cattle

Converts the poorest of hay or straw into a superior provender. A pamphlet mailed free. Depot for U. S., 21 Broadway, N. Y.
Agents wanted in every City and Town.

WARD'S PERFECT FITTING SHIRTS.

Made to Measure at $18 per doz. OR SIX FOR NINE DOLLARS.

MADE OF NEW YORK MILLS MUSLIN,
With fine Linen Bosoms, and warranted as good a Shirt as sold in the retail stores at $2.50 each.
ALSO, THE VERY BEST SHIRTS THAT CAN BE MADE AT $3 EACH.

P. S.—Those who think I can not make a good Shirt for $18 per dozen are mistaken. Here's the cost of one dozen $18 fine Shirts.

30 yards of New York Mills muslin at 14¢. per yd..	$4 25
7 yards of fine Linen, at 50¢. per yard.....	3 50
Making and cutting.....	6 00
Laundry, $1; buttons and cotton, 50¢.....	1 50
Profit.....	2 05
Total.....	$18 00

Self Measurement for Shirts.

Printed directions sent free everywhere, and so easy to understand, that any one can take their own measure for shirts. I warrant a good fit. The cash to be paid to the Express Company on receipt of goods.

S. W. H. WARD, from London,
387 Broadway, N. Y., up Stairs.

H. WORCESTER'S
IMPROVED PIANO FORTES,
Manufactory & Salesrooms,
14th St., cor. 3d Av., N. Y.

Harper's Weekly.
PRICE FIVE CENTS.

TERMS.

One Copy for Twenty Weeks	$1 00
One Copy for One Year	2 50
One Copy for Two Years	4 00
Five Copies for One Year	9 00
Twelve Copies for One Year	20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year	40 00

Harper's Weekly and Harper's Magazine, one year, $4 00.

Volumes I., II., III., and IV. of HARPER'S WEEKLY, handsomely bound in Cloth extra, Price $3 50 each, are now ready.

Muslin Covers are furnished to those who wish their Numbers bound, at Fifty Cents each. TWENTY-FIVE PER CENT. DISCOUNT allowed to Bookbinders and the Trade.

* * To postmasters getting up a Club of Twelve or Twenty-five, a Copy will be sent gratis. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. Specimen Numbers gratuitously supplied.

☞ Clergymen and Teachers supplied at the lowest CLUB RATES.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. V.—No. 222.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 30, 1861. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1861, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

APRIL-FOOL'S DAY IN NEW YORK, OPPOSITE THE ASTOR HOUSE.

APRIL-FOOL'S DAY.

We publish on the preceding page a picture of the morning of the 1st April, opposite the Astor House, on the Park, in New York City. Some of the personages in the picture are enjoying the usual frolics of the day.

The origin of this fool-making custom, like that of ma..y other of our oldest customs, is involved in considerable doubt and uncertainty. It prevails, besides in this country, in Scotland, Germany, Sweden, and France—in which latter place the victims of the jokes are styled poissons d'Avril, or April fishes. But in none of these countries is its origin reasonably explained. Some suppose it to be derived from the abduction of the Sabine women by the Romans under Romulus, at the feast in honor of Neptune, which occurred on the 1st of April; others trace it from the mockery of our Saviour by the Jews; while still others ascribe it to the act of old father Noah, in sending out the dove from the ark before the waters of the deluge had subsided.

The following extract from an old poem will certify to the antiquity of the custom:

> "The first of April some do say
> Is set apart for All-Fools' Day;
> But why the people call it so
> Nor I nor they themselves do know.
> But on this day we people sent
> On purpose for pure merriment.
> And though the day is known before,
> Yet frequently there is great store
> Of those forgetfuls to be found,
> Who're sent to dance Moll Dixon's round;
> And having tried each step and stall,
> And disappointed at them all,
> At last come tell them of the cheat,
> And then they hurry from the street,
> And mumblingly hum with shame they run,
> And others laugh at what is done.
> But 'tis a thing to be dispised,
> Which is the greater fool reputed,
> The man that innocently went,
> Or he that him design'dly sent."

A city reporter says

"The number of tricks and hard practical jokes played upon unsophisticated persons, such as sending Jimmy for a bottle of 'stirrup oil,' dispatching Betty in search of a pint and a half of 'pigeon's milk,' or requesting your likewise friend to buy you a copy of the 'Life and Adventures of Dick Muldoon' in the Arrow style, require several volumes for their description. The most common methods of doing people practiced in this city consist in pinning endless tag-rags to ladies' dresses, fastening paper appendages to the coat skirts, persuading some one to get excited about the arrival of rich cousins from California with bags of virgin native metal, and sending people extraordinary letters, containing extraordinary intelligence, and asking the most extraordinary things. Sometimes these nonsensical jokes result in the most serious consequences, and we have known 'gobbets of raging bull' to be the not unfrequent denouement. Latterly the sport of fool making is confined principally to little boys and girls, who indulge in a regular carnival of merriment. Those whose mammas and pappa allow them 'the freedom of the city' kick up a most beautiful excitement among their grown-up superiors, while > "——the boor young ones club their wicked wits,

> And almost frighten servants into fits."

In Memoriam.

REV. NICHOLAS MURRAY, D.D.

DIED FEBRUARY 4, 1861.

Oh, wistful eyes! that will not cease
From saying sadly after me
Who went out in the dark, alone—
Although ye say, "He is at peace!"

Oh, hearts! that will not turn away,
But questioning, linger at the door;
He passeth through it—never more!
For he hath reached the perfect day.

Even when we thought him most our own
His crown was ready for his brow;
And he redeemed his early vow,
And passed, with all his armor on.

He bent to clasp a shadowy hand—
Unreal to our dulleer eyes;
He saw the gleams of glory fade
Break through the twilight of the land!

His gain o'ermeasureth our loss;
We linger on these barren sands—
He is a dweller in the lands
Bequeathed the followers of the cross!

ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI, March, 1861. L. C. P.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MARCH 30, 1861.

THE TWO CONSTITUTIONS.

THE Constitution of the Southern Confederacy has been published. It is a copy of the original Constitution of the United States, with some variations. The principal variations are:

1. In the preamble, the words "We, the people of the Confederate States, each State acting in its sovereign and independent character," etc., are substituted for the old words, "We, the people of the United States," etc. The object of this change is to assert separate State sovereignty, which involves the right of secession at will.

2. In the article on the House of Representatives, it is stated that "no person of foreign birth, not a citizen of the Confederate States, shall be allowed to vote for any officer, civil or political, State or Federal." No such provision is found in the old Constitution, and owing to its omission the States of Michigan, Wisconsin, and others have granted the suffrage to foreigners before naturalization. It was to guard against this abuse that the new proviso was adopted. If the Confederate States do not extend their borders the proviso will prove unnecessary.

3. In the section on the apportionment of Representatives, the word "slaves" is substituted for the old expression, "other persons;" and it is stated that representation shall be in the ratio of not more than one Representative to every 50,000, instead of 30,000, as fixed in our Constitution.

4. The proviso of the old Constitution requiring Senators to have been nine years citizens is omitted in the Constitution of the Confederate States.

5. The new Constitution states that "Congress may, by law, grant to the principal officer in each of the executive departments a seat upon the floor of either House, with the privilege of discussing any measures pertaining to his department." This is borrowed from the British system. In England, ministers must be members of one or other House, and are expected to defend their policy in person. The obvious advantages of the method, both to the Government and the opposition, commended it to the adoption of the Southern Congress. If, however, the right of occupying a seat is merely a privilege of which the Cabinet officer may avail himself or not as he pleases, the opposition will gain little by the change.

6. Power is given to the President to approve certain appropriations, while disapproving others in the same bill. This is an obvious improvement upon the present system, which often operates to compel the Executive to sanction appropriations of which he disapproves for fear of defeating others which are necessary.

7. It is expressly stated that the revenue to be raised by taxes and imports shall be "to pay the debts, provide for the common defence, and carry on the Government of the Confederate States." In our Constitution no restriction is laid upon Congress as to the manner in which the revenue shall be applied. But it is also stated that "no bounties shall be granted from the Treasury, nor shall any duties or taxes on importations from foreign nations be laid to promote or foster any branch of industry." Thus the axe is laid at the root of the fatal protective system which has done so much injury to this country. Again, the clause requiring commerce, the new Constitution adds that "no clause . . . shall ever be construed to delegate the power to Congress to appropriate money for any internal improvement intended to facilitate commerce, except for the purpose of furnishing lights, beacons, and buoys, and other aids to navigation upon the coasts, and the improvement of harbors and the removal of obstructions in river navigation, in all which cases such duties shall be laid upon the navigation facilitated thereby as may be necessary to pay the costs and expenses thereof." This again is a blow at the old theories of internal improvements, which have proved so fruitful of corruption, and have militated so gravely against the satisfactory working of our system of government.

8. It is expressly stated that "no law of Congress shall discharge any debt contracted before the passage thereof."

9. It is provided that "the expenses of the Post-Office Department after March 1, 1863, shall be paid out of its own revenues." This section goes a wide bit of controversy. We have always held, in this country, that as it was politic to tax the people at large for the maintenance of schools, so it was wise to tax them for postal service on productive routes. In the South they think otherwise. We are inclined to the opinion that the difference grows out of the different habits of the two peoples. In the South, the class which requires the Post-Office is small, and can afford to pay high rates of postage. In the North, every body uses the Post-Office, and low rates are a necessity. The new regulation will operate against popular education in the Confederate States.

10. We now come to the most important innovation attempted on the Constitution. The old Constitution, as every body knows, avoided the use of the word "slave," and called slaves "other persons." The framers of the old Constitution—Jefferson, Washington, Madison, Hamilton, Adams, etc.—were all heartily ashamed of slavery, and desired to see it abolished. The framers of the new Constitution entertain no such sentiment. The clause enumerated above one mention of the word slave. In the clause respecting fugitive slaves, which is otherwise copied from the old Constitution, the same word is used. The following are other clauses bearing upon the subject of slavery:

> The importation of negroes of the African race from any foreign country other than the slaveholding States or territories of the United States of America, is hereby forbidden; and Congress is required to pass such laws as shall effectually prevent the same.
>
> Congress shall also have power to prohibit the introduction of slaves from any State not a member of, or Territory not belonging to, this Confederacy.
>
> The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States, and shall have the right of transit and sojourn in any State of this Confederacy, with their slaves and other property; and the right of property in said slaves shall not be thereby impaired.
>
> The Confederate States may acquire new territory, and Congress shall have power to legislate and provide governments for the inhabitants of all territory belonging to the Confederate States lying without the limits of the several States, and may permit them, at such times and in such manner as it may by law provide, to form States to be admitted into the Confederacy. In all such territory the institution of negro slavery, as it now exists in the Confederate States, shall be recognized and protected by Congress and by the Territorial Government, and the inhabitants of the several Confederate States and Territories shall have the right to take to such territory any slaves lawfully held by them in any of the States or Territories of the Confederate States.

These clauses require no comment. They embrace the principles embodied in the Breckinridge platform, and would doubtless constitute a formidable objection to the adoption of the Crittenden Compromise by the three million eight hundred thousand voters who voted against that platform at the last election.

11. Permission is given to lay export duties on articles exported from any State by a vote of two-thirds of both Houses. This is of course in order to lay an export duty on cotton.

12. In order to provide against the corruptions and frauds which have disgraced our Congressional legislation in our time, the following clauses are added to the old section providing that no money shall be paid except under an appropriation:

> Congress shall appropriate no money from the treasury except by a vote of two-thirds of both Houses, taken by yeas and nays, unless it shall be asked and estimated for by some one of the heads of departments, and submitted to Congress by the President, or for the purpose of paying its own expenses and contingencies; or for the payment of claims against the Confederate States, the justice of which shall have been judicially declared by a tribunal for the investigation of claims against the Government, which it is hereby made the duty of Congress to establish.
>
> All bills appropriating money shall specify in federal currency the exact amount of each appropriation and the purpose for which it is made; and Congress shall grant no extra compensation to any contractor, officer, agent, or servant, after such contract shall have been made or such service rendered.

13. In order to defeat the tacking of lobby riders to appropriation bills, by which method many corrupt schemes have recently been forced through Congress, it is stated that "every law or resolution having the force of law shall relate to but one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title."

14. The new Constitution fixes the Presidential term at six, instead of four, years, and renders the President ineligible. These innovations will be favorably received by the approval of all who have watched the mischiefs produced by the too speedy recurrence of elections, and by the manœuvres of acting Presidents for reelection. They would be greatly adopted by the people throughout the Union. The new Constitution declares that the President must have been fourteen years a resident of the Confederate States; but the Constitution contains a similar provision—the word "united" being used instead of "confederate."

15. In order to guard against the gross abuses arising from the notation in office at present established, the new Constitution contains the following section:

> The principal officer in each of the executive departments, and all officers and agents of the diplomatic service, may be removed from office at the pleasure of the President. All other civil officers of the executive department may be removed at any time by the President, or other appointing power, when their services are unnecessary, or for dishonesty, incapacity, inefficiency, misconduct, or neglect of duty; and when so removed, the removal shall be reported to the Senate, together with the reasons therefor.

If this section be faithfully carried, the chief source of corruption in our political system will be stopped.

16. By the old Constitution Congress has power to admit new States. The Southern Congress requires a vote of two-thirds of both bodies to admit a new State.

17. By the old Constitution Congress has power "to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States." In the Southern Constitution the words "the territory or" are omitted—thus removing the territorial question from the control of Congress.

18. Under the old Constitution amendments can only be proposed by two-thirds of both Houses of Congress, or two-thirds of the State Legislatures. Under the Southern Constitution we have State conventions for amendments.

19. The ratification by nine of the old thirteen States was required to establish the old Constitution. The Southern Constitution requires only the ratification of five out of seven.

We have thus enumerated the principal alterations in the Constitution effected by the Congress at Montgomery. Most of them would be readily adopted with the people of the North. But further comment is superfluous at the present time.

A FRAUD ATTEMPTED.

THE Committee on Insurance Companies in the State Legislature reported favorably a bill to the effect that no costs exceeding $10 shall be recovered in any action brought or to be brought by Receivers of Mutual Insurance Companies. The object of this is to deprive the public of a remedy to which they are entitled. Under the Act of 1849 a large number of Mutual Insurance Companies were formed in various parts of this State, and notes given for policies of insurance—said notes being, under the law and several judgments of Court, legally and equitably applicable to the payment of losses. Within the past six or eight years several of these Companies have failed, and Receivers have been appointed who have proceeded to sue on the notes. These suits have been strenuously resisted in Court after Court; and now, after many years of litigation, just as the creditors of the broken Companies are about to collect the amounts due to them, this bill steps in to cheat them of their costs. Will not some honest man in the Senate or Assembly just state the facts respecting this bill, so that members who support it may know what they are voting for?

THE LOUNGER.

LAYING ANCHORS TO WINDWARD—AN EPISODE.

PLAY-ACTORS perform their parts with the full consciousness that they are known to be acting. But there are comedies of which the comic point is that the excellent and respected actors pretend that the spectators do not know that it is all a pretty play.

When the Prince of Wales came last autumn, some worthy American citizens, who were born in Ireland, refused to parade as a military company in honor of the guest. It was a question of taste. It might have occurred to them, as it did to the great mass of the American people, that it was very proper to honor one of our most faithful and friendly allies in the manner proposed. Still, these citizens had a different view, and they took a right, and they staid severely at home. It has since been made a question of military law.

The reason is the important. Do you think so, gentle reader? Alas! you do not know the political playwright; you do not know that there is no act so compromising that it may not be will not get a dinner or, at least, a lunch or a supper out of it.

So, upon a recent evening, the excellent citizens who sympathized with those who staid at home when the little Prince drove up Broadway, pretended to express their sympathy and to present a sword and flags in token of it. That was all pleasant. There was a band of music; there were lively tunes; there was a fine military array; there was an enthusiastic crowd; and when the most distinguished sympathizers stepped upon the stage, or platform, gently, advancing to the footlights, there was a thrilling roll of drums and rattle of presenting arms. The sword of honor was presented and received in glowing and eloquent addresses; then the flags of sympathy were brought forward, and that excellent citizen and orator, Mr. Meagher, appeared to make an address. When the "shouting plaudits" of the audience had ceased, he began. He said that his words should be few and plain—that the language of soldiers was direct and brief, and he should emulate it. And he added that he said so much to repress "the inordinate expectations of rhetoric" which might be indulged by some of the audience. Skirmishing, at first, with the light rapier of ridicule at the princely ovation, he proceeded to graver work, and held the strict legality of the commander's conduct; and then, passing to the immediate ceremony, he presented the flags, and ended in a "few plain words," evidently meant to squelch those luckless and untimely "expectations of rhetoric" "I do so with the assurance that the superb gift passes into the hands of soldiers who will never permit the gold with which it abounds to be tarnished by cowardice, insubordination, or neglect of duty—who will never permit the green field, which to-night looks so ample and luxuriant, to lose its freshness and deep wealth of color, if love of country and joyfulness of life at home will perpetuate it—and who will carry it into the battle, wherever the Eumenides wave their torches and the trumpet of Alecto peals, pure and quickened by the faith that the sun, bursting from it in a flood and storm of glory, will maintain its light, as did the sun of victory over the mountains of the Amorrhite."

There was more music, more sympathy, more congratulation, and good feeling, and the satisfied company separated.

Do you think that was the whole play? Do you think the excellent citizens, Mr. Stout, Mr. Chanler, Mr. Haggerty, Mr. Maguire, Mr. J. Hennessy, "Dunply," Mr. Alderman Farley, and others, who were received with the thrilling martial salute, as they bounded upon the stage, were moved solely by sympathy with the severe staying at home of the gallant Sixty-ninth? Perhaps that was the sole reason, for it was surely sufficient, which brought them there. But wouldn't it be very droll if these citizens chanced to be statesmen, and the sword presented to comprise several hundred most desirable voters, whose favor might be wooed and haply won by a little gush of timely sympathy? And if those statesmen chanced to have political projects of any kind, wouldn't it possibly be convenient to have propitiated the worthy voters of the Sixty-ninth?

Is there any objection to laying anchors to windward? Not the least. Only don't suppose that the Sixty-ninth are their own. "Cranford" Mrs. Forrester had her little householding humbugs; but then "she knew and we knew, and she knew that we knew, and we knew that she knew that we knew, she had been busy all the morning making tea-bread and sponge-cakes." The political world is wonderfully like Cranford; and the shrewdest statesmen are those who behave like Mrs. Forrester. If you have a wart on your nose, it is not advisable to brush at it casually, as if it were a fly. If you are a great statesman, don't look so very innocent as if you supposed that we outsiders believed you to be so. When you present swords and rust rhetoric, we shall all believe that it is pure sympathy with the hereditary scruples of the Sixty-ninth, if you are of the same blood as the regiment. If you are not, we shall believe in as much pure sympathy as we can—Lwbchen wau willst Du mehr?

* See the Times report.

THE NATIONAL ACADEMY.

THE pictures are out with the crocuses this year, and they are to show for a month only. The exhibition is at the old place in Tenth Street, but the Academy is to have a better, possibly a permanent, gallery, by-and-by. Meanwhile, although fine foreign pictures multiply, our own painters do not recede, and American art was never so strong in significant names as it is to-day. And there is this palpable good effect resulting from the increase of the foreign works, that we see how good our own are in the comparison. It is easy to believe that the pictures of the living European artists are incomparable, before you have seen them. And certainly it is very easy to admire them, after you have seen them. But you learn that to be a foreign painter is not necessarily to be a great painter.

This week, then, we will all look at the pictures, and next week we will talk about them.

CATTLINE LEECH.

WHENEVER a party loses power under our governments, it inevitably sets up a great mistake: it is to remove all the office-holders. And especially the gentlemen who fill office under the retiring administration hold the most pathetic convictions upon this point. In their opinion there was never before such a swarm of shameless office-seekers. They have at least some sympathy for the present dent, consumed by a cloud of cormorants. They see clearly that all the fine principles paraded during the canvass were only masks and snake under cover of which the thieves might make their way to the public plunder. The whole policy of the party which may displace them is told in one word, patronage.

Of course these things are not true of the party which appointed them. That was a truly patriotic party. That had in view only the public welfare. Nobody who worked with that party expected any reward. Procul, ah! procul!

But now comes Catiline Leech, who holds a government sinecure of five thousand dollars—"now, good Heavens! upon what times have we fallen, when such offices are abroad, and the whole party grabs for spoils?"

So they sing whenever the Federal power changes hands. And although Catiline and his dear friend mean only that they are going to be turned out of office, and their talk and that of the newspapers which echo his talk means at the bottom, yet there is a serious consideration lying under it.

The quadrennial change of office is a strain at the very roots of our institutions. The system of forcing a vast and universally diffused class conservative of the government itself, the countless minor officers of our system are a vast army of advertisers fighting for an insecure position, and often irresistibly tempted to prostitute their personal character as well as their official influence to the ambition of political leaders, who promise them the permanence of their offices as rewards. Theoretically, no merely executive officer of the government should be removed without cause.

But as the system has been actually practiced in this country, it may be imperatively necessary for the very existence of the government itself that the changes in office, upon an administrative change, be almost universal. If from Washington's time there had been no general sweep for cause, there would be no necessity of such removal merely because of the advent to power of a new party. But the whole system of public offices has been made a great partisan machine, good faith to the Constitutional majority of the people requires that no powerful engine of party power do not approve be made to assist the policy they do. Had arbitrary removals never been made, office-holders would have been, ex officio, almost non-party men; but since they have been so made the officers are, ex officio, the most reckless and desperate of all partisans; and when the party ex officio force is subversive of the government itself, there must be and ought to be short work with them.

And then, Catiline, when the offices are filled with men who are more heartily devoted to the government than they are to any party under the government, of course you will give your vote for restoring the old plan of removal for cause only, will you not? It will leave you and all other Catilines out of office, indeed; but then you are anxious for the country, and you will have saved it from clouds of cormorants, and vultures, and buzzards, and all kinds of rapacious and foul birds. You will have done your duty, Catiline Leech, and we will all try to help you.

"THE PRESS."

DEAR MR. LOUNGER,—I am amused as I read my morning papers—and I faithfully peruse them all—to see how loudly they praise themselves for the wonderful power of "the newspaper press," and how hard they work to prevent the existence of any such power. And this they do by incessant editorial repetition. The very force upon my mind as I read that I am only having the opinion of one man, whose judgment I may or may not respect. From under his and your they constantly squeak "Take heart, I'm only Sing the choir-boy!" and for the reader, Heaven be praised, he was just beginning to believe that it was really a lion, and is infinitely relieved by the timely rescue.

The prestige of the paper is thus entirely destroyed. It is not a voice from a cloud, imposing from its vastness and impersonality, but is a spirit of prejudice, a passion, upon the part of a fellow-citizen, or it is his well-considered conviction, but with no relief of its strict individuality. It has just the value and influence of a private letter.

But the great model of newspapers, for it is still that, the London Times, is no private performance. People do not ask each other in the morning, "Have you seen what Smith says to-day about the Italian business?" or, "Do you see how Jenkins pitches into Tomkins this morning?" or, "What is Bumpers's freshest lie?" No; when the London Times speaks it thunders. You know that some individual hand has written the article, but you do not know who, nor under what circumstances of superior knowledge. Even if it have a personal inspiration you can not know it, and that very secrecy makes the point a thousand-fold sharper.

Now, Mr. Lounger, why can not you, and I, and all the readers of our daily papers, try to persuade the editors that we are not in the least interested in their private quarrels, and that we acknowledge, in advance, that each paper is the most enterprising, able, and truthful paper? We freely confess that all news is given first and exclusively in each; that each has better means of information than any other paper can possibly have; in fact, we concede all you mentioned the other day, and ask only that they try for a little while the effect of the London Times' principle. If they insist upon declaring every day that A, over the way, is a liar, and Z's dirty sheet is fouler than usual, and Y's stupidity was superhuman yesterday morning, we shall laugh even more than we do now, when we see the next self-felicitation upon the mighty position and power of "the Press."

Obediently yours, GUTENBERG.

GUELPH AND GHIBELLINE.

THE news from France shows that the priestly party is beginning to make a fight to play against the Emperor. The Bishop of Poitiers very plainly calls Louis Napoleon Pontius Pilate, and appeals, in the most peculiar manner, to the superstitious emotions of the ignorant mass of the French people.

The contest which is now arising in Europe about the temporal power of the Pope is a purely political movement, and has nothing to do with religion or Christianity. That should be carefully remembered by every spectator, and the more carefully, because the first movement of every Roman Church party is to confound the temporal and spiritual throne of the Pope, so that the bulk of the faithful may be taken in by the assumption that the other is attacked. But there is no more reason that Pope Pius should be a king than that Archbishop Hughes should be a king. He is the Bishop of Rome, and that is precisely the fact which Louis Napoleon will prove to the Catholic population of Europe and the world.

The charge of the Bishop of Poitiers, in which the gauntlet is openly thrown, is most skillfully conceived; and the taken of it by the Count Persigny is heroic and wise. He says it is best that such publications should not be suppressed, because if they were suppressed they would be public opinion of the country, which thus sees the secret designs of the party which hates the people and its chief magistrate the Emperor.

As for the contest itself, Louis Napoleon is not the man to underrate the difficulties nor to shrink from them. The principle of his own elevation is essentially opposed to the temporal power of the Pope. He knows that where the priests govern the people perish. He sees Austria, Naples, Rome, and Spain, and Mexico, and he sees the contrast in which civilization halts and mankind goes backward. He sees also, however, that at this moment Austria is overthrown, that Naples lives, that Rome is ready, that Mexico has conquered priestcraft, and that day for the first time begins to break over these lands.

The great example of Brazil is not lost to him or to any political student of the time. In the degree that the power of the priests is broken is the Church and State is resisted, nations every where, however they may change, become more peaceful, more prosperous. You know it, Napoleon, that education develops, it eliminates development in every form from every national system. The Past is not a model, but a beacon. Great mistakes are not to be made because the people of the Past have made them. Human History is a warning as well as an encouragement.

The struggle will be sharp, for the Church, as a political power, dies hard. But the long and faithfully enraged Mexicans have given it its deathblow there, and the Queen of Spain will not long will deal with it in Italy, and so, practically, in Europe.

The most extraordinary and ludicrous man in this century is he who asks whether the world is not going backward.

CHARITY IS PATIENT.

WHAT is a man's character worth, if it be not worth every thing? If it can not defend him from slander even when slanderers are not to be defended: if it will not keep the faith of friends in his purpose sweet and white as snow; if it will not victoriously smile and say, whatever it be said, I am and evanescent? Is not that just its value, that you do not require at every instant that you shall see the whole secret of things, but shall only know that the action is for the best? As jealousy is incompatible with perfect love, so doubt of a friend is incompatible with friendship. Trust, trust; and you believe entirely until you utterly disbelieve.

There is Sir Philip Sidney, darling of history, whom they so glowingly depicts in his late volumes. His life just as it was, and not as it should be. It was only thirty-four years long, and you may read it in detail; and so reading you will feel, as all students have felt, that he was the soul of honor, beyond the ideal of his time. Upon the whole, probably, no historical figure so completely satisfies the various conditions essential to what we call the gentleman.

Do you believe that Sidney could have done a mean thing or a base thing? And do you know of your faith in his character. No man can positively know precisely his relation with Stella. But as we should not believe that Washington ever basely told a lie, or ran cowardly from a necessary danger, because our confidence in his character forbids; so shall and must Sidney's white fame avail to shed aspersion as a polished statue sheds water. There is but one hint of any thing unworthy Sidney repeated in the books, and those are modern insinuations—of his relation with the Stella of his sonnets and the Lady Rich of history. The point is, was he perfectly honorable in his love and friendship for her?

It is now nearly three hundred years since he charged into the thick cloud of battle, that misty early morning upon the Isel, and came out of it to suffer for a few days and die; and against the aspersion only his character remains to plead. The charge is thought to be maintained by his sonnets. Yet if sonnets can prove any thing except that a man is a poet or is not a poet, Sidney's support the view that every lover of Lamb's Tales and Rosalinds is a villain. Every one who reads those sonnets knows that all new is given first and exclusively in each; that each has better means of information than any other paper can possibly have; in fact, we concede all you mentioned the other day, and ask only that they try for a little while the effect of the London Times' principle. If they insist upon declaring every day that A, over the way, is a liar, and Z's dirty sheet is fouler than usual, and Y's stupidity was superhuman yesterday morning, we shall laugh even more than we do now, when we see the next self-felicitation upon the mighty position and power of "the Press."

Obediently yours, GUTENBERG.

GUELPH AND GHIBELLINE.

THE news from France shows that the priestly party is beginning to make a fight to play against the Emperor. The Bishop of Poitiers very plainly calls Louis Napoleon Pontius Pilate, and appeals, in the most peculiar manner, to the superstitious emotions of the ignorant mass of the French people.

The contest which is now arising in Europe about the temporal power of the Pope is a purely political movement, and has nothing to do with religion or Christianity. That should be carefully remembered by every spectator, and the more carefully, because the first movement of every Roman Church party is to confound the temporal and spiritual throne of the Pope, so that the bulk of the faithful may be taken in by the assumption that the other is attacked. But there is no more reason that Pope Pius should be a king than that Archbishop Hughes should be a king. He is the Bishop of Rome, and that is precisely the fact which Louis Napoleon will prove to the Catholic population of Europe and the world.

The charge of the Bishop of Poitiers, in which the gauntlet is openly thrown, is most skillfully conceived; and the taken of it by the Count Persigny is heroic and wise. He says it is best that such publications should not be suppressed, because if they were suppressed they would be public opinion of the country, which thus sees the secret designs of the party which hates the people and its chief magistrate the Emperor.

As for the contest itself, Louis Napoleon is not the man to underrate the difficulties nor to shrink from them. The principle of his own elevation is essentially opposed to the temporal power of the Pope. He knows that where the priests govern the people perish. He sees Austria, Naples, Rome, and Spain, and Mexico, and he sees the contrast in which civilization halts and mankind goes backward. He sees also, however, that at this moment Austria is overthrown, that Naples lives, that Rome is ready, that Mexico has conquered priestcraft, and that day for the first time begins to break over these lands.

The great example of Brazil is not lost to him or to any political student of the time. In the degree that the power of the priests is broken is the Church and State is resisted, nations every where, however they may change, become more peaceful, more prosperous. You know it, Napoleon, that education develops, it eliminates development in every form from every national system. The Past is not a model, but a beacon. Great mistakes are not to be made because the people of the Past have made them. Human History is a warning as well as an encouragement.

The struggle will be sharp, for the Church, as a political power, dies hard. But the long and faithfully enraged Mexicans have given it its deathblow there, and the Queen of Spain will not long will deal with it in Italy, and so, practically, in Europe.

The most extraordinary and ludicrous man in this century is he who asks whether the world is not going backward.

CHARITY IS PATIENT.

WHAT is a man's character worth, if it be not worth every thing? If it can not defend him from slander even when slanderers are not to be defended: if it will not keep the faith of friends in his purpose sweet and white as snow; if it will not victoriously smile and say, whatever it be said, I am and evanescent? Is not that just its value, that you do not require at every instant that you shall see the whole secret of things, but shall only know that the action is for the best? As jealousy is incompatible with perfect love, so doubt of a friend is incompatible with friendship. Trust, trust; and you believe entirely until you utterly disbelieve.

There is Sir Philip Sidney, darling of history, whom they so glowingly depicts in his late volumes. His life just as it was, and not as it should be. It was only thirty-four years long, and you may read it in detail; and so reading you will feel, as all students have felt, that he was the soul of honor, beyond the ideal of his time. Upon the whole, probably, no historical figure so completely satisfies the various conditions essential to what we call the gentleman.

Do you believe that Sidney could have done a mean thing or a base thing? And do you know of your faith in his character. No man can positively know precisely his relation with Stella. But as we should not believe that Washington ever basely told a lie, or ran cowardly from a necessary danger, because our confidence in his character forbids; so shall and must Sidney's white fame avail to shed aspersion as a polished statue sheds water. There is but one hint of any thing unworthy Sidney repeated in the books, and those are modern insinuations—of his relation with the Stella of his sonnets and the Lady Rich of history. The point is, was he perfectly honorable in his love and friendship for her?

It is now nearly three hundred years since he charged into the thick cloud of battle, that misty early morning upon the Isel, and came out of it to suffer for a few days and die; and against the aspersion only his character remains to plead. The charge is thought to be maintained by his sonnets. Yet if sonnets can prove any thing except that a man is a poet or is not a poet, Sidney's support the view that every lover of Lamb's Tales and Rosalinds is a villain. Every one who reads those sonnets knows that all new is given first and exclusively in each; that each has better means of information than any other paper can possibly have; in fact, we concede all you mentioned the other day, and ask only that they try for a little while the effect of the London Times' principle. If they insist upon declaring every day that A, over the way, is a liar, and Z's dirty sheet is fouler than usual, and Y's stupidity was superhuman yesterday morning, we shall laugh even more than we do now, when we see the next self-felicitation upon the mighty position and power of "the Press."

Obediently yours, GUTENBERG.

GUELPH AND GHIBELLINE.

THE news from France shows that the priestly party is beginning to make a fight to play against the Emperor. The Bishop of Poitiers very plainly calls Louis Napoleon Pontius Pilate, and appeals, in the most peculiar manner, to the superstitious emotions of the ignorant mass of the French people.

The contest which is now arising in Europe about the temporal power of the Pope is a purely political movement, and has nothing to do with religion or Christianity. That should be carefully remembered by every spectator, and the more carefully, because the first movement of every Roman Church party is to confound the temporal and spiritual throne of the Pope, so that the bulk of the faithful may be taken in by the assumption that the other is attacked. But there is no more reason that Pope Pius should be a king than that Archbishop Hughes should be a king. He is the Bishop of Rome, and that is precisely the fact which Louis Napoleon will prove to the Catholic population of Europe and the world.

The charge of the Bishop of Poitiers, in which the gauntlet is openly thrown, is most skillfully conceived; and the taken of it by the Count Persigny is heroic and wise. He says it is best that such publications should not be suppressed, because if they were suppressed they would be public opinion of the country, which thus sees the secret designs of the party which hates the people and its chief magistrate the Emperor.

As for the contest itself, Louis Napoleon is not the man to underrate the difficulties nor to shrink from them. The principle of his own elevation is essentially opposed to the temporal power of the Pope. He knows that where the priests govern the people perish. He sees Austria, Naples, Rome, and Spain, and Mexico, and he sees the contrast in which civilization halts and mankind goes backward. He sees also, however, that at this moment Austria is overthrown, that Naples lives, that Rome is ready, that Mexico has conquered priestcraft, and that day for the first time begins to break over these lands.

The great example of Brazil is not lost to him or to any political student of the time. In the degree that the power of the priests is broken is the Church and State is resisted, nations every where, however they may change, become more peaceful, more prosperous. You know it, Napoleon, that education develops, it eliminates development in every form from every national system. The Past is not a model, but a beacon. Great mistakes are not to be made because the people of the Past have made them. Human History is a warning as well as an encouragement.

The struggle will be sharp, for the Church, as a political power, dies hard. But the long and faithfully enraged Mexicans have given it its deathblow there, and the Queen of Spain will not long will deal with it in Italy, and so, practically, in Europe.

The most extraordinary and ludicrous man in this century is he who asks whether the world is not going backward.

CHARITY IS PATIENT.

WHAT is a man's character worth, if it be not worth every thing? If it can not defend him from slander even when slanderers are not to be defended: if it will not keep the faith of friends in his purpose sweet and white as snow; if it will not victoriously smile and say, whatever it be said, I am and evanescent? Is not that just its value, that you do not require at every instant that you shall see the whole secret of things, but shall only know that the action is for the best? As jealousy is incompatible with perfect love, so doubt of a friend is incompatible with friendship. Trust, trust; and you believe entirely until you utterly disbelieve.

There is Sir Philip Sidney, darling of history, whom they so glowingly depicts in his late volumes. His life just as it was, and not as it should be. It was only thirty-four years long, and you may read it in detail; and so reading you will feel, as all students have felt, that he was the soul of honor, beyond the ideal of his time. Upon the whole, probably, no historical figure so completely satisfies the various conditions essential to what we call the gentleman.

Do you believe that Sidney could have done a mean thing or a base thing? And do you know of your faith in his character. No man can positively know precisely his relation with Stella. But as we should not believe that Washington ever basely told a lie, or ran cowardly from a necessary danger, because our confidence in his character forbids; so shall and must Sidney's white fame avail to shed aspersion as a polished statue sheds water. There is but one hint of any thing unworthy Sidney repeated in the books, and those are modern insinuations—of his relation with the Stella of his sonnets and the Lady Rich of history. The point is,

A DIFFERENT RENDERING.

AN old clergyman—more distinguished for his piety than for his elegance of his oratorical delivery—once read aloud from his pulpit a hymn, in which occurs this line:

"Life's like a shadow, how it flies!"

But pausing in the middle of the word shadow to take his breath, the venerable parson astonished his hearers by what seemed to read:

"Life's like a shad—ch, how it flies!"

"Are you an Odd Fellow?"—"No, Sir; I have been married once or twice, but not—" "I mean, do you belong to the Independent Order of Odd Fellows?"—"No; I believe in the order of marriage, Sir, not—" "Mercy, how dull! Are you a Mason?"—"No; I'm a carpenter."—"Worse and worse! Are you a son of Malta?"—"No; I am a son of Mr. John Horsehall!"

Some time ago there was a trial for trespass in cutting wood from a neighbor's premises without authority. One of the plaintiff's witnesses was a plain old farmer, whose testimony was very clear and directly to prove the charge. The defendant's counsel—a blustering man of brass—thought to weaken the force of the witness by proving idiocy to be a trait of his family. He therefore theorgrated him thus: "Mr. Hodge, you have a son who is an idiot, have you not?"—"Yes, Sir."—"Is not his name Jeremiah?"—"Very little."—"How much does he know?"—"Well, almost nothing; not much more than you do." The witness was allowed to retire without further question.

A shop-keeper purchased of an Irishwoman a quantity of butter, the lumps of which, intended for pounds, he weighed in the balance and found wanting. "I share, it's your fault that the scale is light," said Biddy, in reply to the complaints of the buyer; "it's your own fault, Sir, for I know it will be a pound of your own soap, I dunno how to repeat, that I weighed them with?" The shop-keeper had nothing more to say on that subject.

The following epitaph is to be found in the church-yard of Upton-on-Severn:

"Beneath this stone, in hopes of Zion,
Doth lie the husband of the 'Lion.'
His son keeps on the business still,
Bought the Red Horse, and Windmill."

Clutterbuck's story of the old lady this week is excellent. Being very nervous, she told Sir Walter Farquhar she had a dreadful fear of his leg-of. "It's very odd," said Sir Walter, "but that's the very thing that I was going to recommend to you. I will write the prescription at your case to a very clever man there, in whose hands you will be safe, my dear Madam." So he finished with the letter, set off, and on arriving at Newbury, found a note of consultation from her, for her confidante, "Long as Sir Walter has attended me, he has never explained to me what ails me. I have a great mind to open his letter and see what he has ordered." Her case to the Lady Huntingdon in vain her friend represented to her the breach of confidence that would be. She opened the letter, and read, "Dear Dovie, keep the old lady three weeks and send her back again."

A gentleman walking through Knightsbridge, in England, one Sunday lately, overheard the following conversation between a man and a woman, who seemed to be just come from some pleasure trip into the country:

"Well, Bill," said the lady, "I'm glad to find I'm as miserable, too, as a starved herring. What a miserable world is this! I wish I'd never been born, that I do; and now that I am born, I wish myself dead again."

"Why, Sal, what's the matter with you now? What are you grumbling about?"

Woman. "Why, don't I tell yer I am as miserable as a rat?"

Man. "Miserable, indeed! Why, what on earth would you have? You are drunk Monday, and you are drunk again Wednesday, and I'm blessed if you haven't had pretty near enough to-day. What is it you're grumbling for, yer, I don't know what is. I suppose you wants to be a downright hangel here upon earth?"

HOW TO GET RID OF A WITCH.—Madam, your broom is at the door.

A LEGAL QUESTION.—Should a person who has been brought up in a Quaker family have corporal punishment?

The celebrated Dr. Ward was not more remarkable for his humanity and skill than wit and humor. An old woman, to whom he had incurred some medicine proper for a disorder under which she labored, applied to him with a complaint that she had not received the benefit of effect from taking them. "No effect at all?" says the doctor. "Why, how did you take them?" replied the nurse. "Why, then, you should have taken a tempting glass of gin." "So I did, Sir." "Well, but," said he when you found that did not succeed, you should have taken another." "So I did, Sir, and another after that." "Why, then the ague has the doctor: "say, is it just as I imagined; you complain that you found no benefit from my prescription, after you confess yourself that you swallowed gin enough to counteract my medicine in the whole system of physic."

A youth, after vainly trying to explain some scientific theory to his old fox-hunting father, at last exclaimed in despair, "Well, I don't see what I can do to make it clearer." "I suppose you must," whispered the blunt old sportsman.

The Hon. Henry Erskine was, notwithstanding his powers as a humorist, once overcome in wit by a country clergyman, Mr. Scott. The late Dr. Lawrence, minister of Dornoch, and Mr. Erskine, had met at the dinner-table of a mutual friend. A dish of pigeons was served up, when the reverend gentleman took a supply on his plate, which he proceeded to eat, using fork and knife. Erskine remarked on the doctor's proceeding reminded him of Nebuchadnezzar. "Ay," retorted Dr. M'C——, "that'll be because I'm eatin' among the brutes."

It is an old and true saying, that a man should not marry under a year's courtship, and, from some examples we have seen, we are beginning to doubt seriously whether a woman can prudently marry unless she can support a husband.

Minds are more capacious than most persons think. We never knew one that was filled.

An eminent tectotaler would only consent to sit for his portrait on condition that he should be taken in water colors.

This life's contradictions are many. Salt water gives us fresh fish, and light gives us prudent coalness.

A clergyman relates the following incident in the Pacific Methodist: "A few years ago, as I was preaching at ——, Nevada, a little urchin, about five years of age, sat on a front seat listening, as I thought, very attentively. He was accompanied by his father, who, I supposed, was one of the 'lambs' were being led as well as the 'sheep.' But just as I finished my discourse, and was in the act of sitting down, he called out, at the top of his voice, 'Mr. Simmons, how are you, my new stocking?' The mystery was solved. He had borne in silence the sermon that he might tell me of his new stocking."

The late Rev. T—— G——, of C——m, was a reputed wit. Along with a party, he was dining with a friend at Balcothlin, of which estate, he was examining the hall a valuable ring worn by a young lady of the family, when he was unexpectedly struck by the beauty of the ball. Replacing the ring on the lady's finger, Mr. G—— humorously exclaimed, "I'm ringing the bells, Sir."

The late Rev. A—— had, at a Presbytery dinner, indulged in the usual habit of grumbling. In returning home he was accompanied part of the way by a clerical neighbor, who especially enjoyed the humor of his conversation. They were about to separate for their respective manses at a place where was a narrow or pack-bag. "Just one pun more before we part," said the delighted auctioneer. "Nay," replied the humorist, referring to what he thought his language, "you have fairly logged me now."

LET US BE FRIENDS.

For eighty-five years we have struggled and toiled,
By blessing and battle as best we could,
And 'tis hard to see all our fidelity spoiled
By blundering politicians who own with another.
Together we fought and together we bled.
Together we blanched our country's resplendence,
And over the dead we together did plead
Together we builded a grand Independence!

Could Mexico speak, every mountain would cry,
North and South at our feet lie in red graves together.
The struggle was fierce, but we learned to die,
Or who could bust brave cruel famine and weather.
Common brothers in arms! We have been through the mill,
Shall we be brothers yet more in blood be forgotten?
Do no mutual memories hang round us still?
Have our hearts, like the bones of our Martyrs, grown rotten?

But if you must go, let us part-like good friends—
It's hard on the heart that our Union should sever!
Oh! let them embrace with a tenderer end,
And keep us like brothers for ever and ever!
Trust this—and you know the no sparring vow—
Should quarrels arise, Erskine remarked to the clown,
Well fight by your side as we did before now.
For united we two can be conquered by no man!

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

OUR morning a party came into the public rooms at Buxton, somewhat late, and requested some tongue. They were told that Lord Byron had eaten it all.—"I am very sorry that his lordship," said a lady, enough for him to hear the observation, "I am sorry for it. Mamma! yesterday Lord Byron, "but before I ate the tongue I was assured you did not want it."

Lawyers are very critical. Once a young lawyer, upon being informed of an attachment between a young lady of his acquaintance and a young man of gentlemanly was the "lover or lover?" So an attorney in Dublin made a challenge to his opponent to meet him "in the Four Acres, be the same more or less."

A gentleman lately resident in Sunderland, at one time a strong advocate of teetotalism, now a leading manufacturer not far off, was recently asked by an acquaintance how he could reconcile his former profession with his present practice. "Oh!" was the reply, "when I started building, he was a child, and began to drink beer."

Some years ago, at a time when there was a triangular contest in progress between the Whigs, Old Line Democrats, and Free-soilers, it was reported that the late John Morrissett, of Monroe, Alabama, would address the people of the county in favor of the Whigs. Chancellor Lessaw was sent up from Mobile to meet him as the representative of the Southern Rights party. The Chancellor went down to his postmasters, then not a prevalent fashion in Monroe, and having a habit of putting his hands behind him when speaking, and lifting the skirts of his coat, displayed a large brass buckle that fastened his waistband. Mr. Morrissett, replying, remarked, in his own peculiar and inimitable vein, that the people of Monroe did not "need to receive political instruction from Mobile—least of all from a gentleman who were galluses under his breast and a brand-prin on his pants."

THE CHARITY OF LAWYERS.—Keeping one's own counsel.

MORE VIEWS IN NEW ORLEANS.

WE present characteristic sketches of the Crescent City. The traveler who approaches by the Pontchartrain Railway sees the domes, spires, and chimney-tops of the city peering over tufts of grass and shrubbery, looking as though a town had been sown there and was just coming up. Upon entering, one passes first through the French quarter, built up mainly of low red-tiled wooden houses, many of which are surrounded with shrubbery and ornamental trees. The lamps not unfrequently hang over the centre of the street, suspended by chains passing from one side to the other. Here the streets bear French names, such as "Rue des Grands Hommes," "Des Bonnes Enfants," "Dauphine," "Bourbon," "Toulouse," "Bienville," "Royale." The shop signs are mostly French. "Artiste en Modes," "Café des Quatre Saisons," "Nettoyage de Tête," "Chambres garnies à louer," and the like, meet the eye at every turn. French is the language commonly spoken by both whites and blacks, though the patois of the latter would be hardly intelligible in Paris. This excites the special wonder of their brethren from more northern States.

"The idea," exclaimed Squire Berkeley's Virginian servant, "of them black rascals 'undertakin' to talk larned, like ladies and gentlemen!" His wonder was increased when told that this was their own language, and that few of them understood English. "I thought," he said, "that all black people talked like we does at home. I thought they larned to talk from white people, and not outen books as these does." That French could be learned without books passed his comprehension utterly.

Approaching the river one finds himself in an American city; though even here the French element is not wanting, only not predominant. From the foot of Canal or Poydras streets, or, better still, from the upper deck of a steamer, one can perceive the peculiar conformation from which New Orleans derives its popular appellation of "the Crescent City." The Mississippi, whose general course is almost due north and south, here makes a sudden bend, so that the city lies on its northwest bank, facing the southeast. Looking up stream, one sees a fleet of immense river steamers moored in tiers four or five deep; beyond them is a fleet of masts, fading away in the distance; facing down stream, a similar fleet of steamers meets the eye; beyond them another line of masts, whose termination is hidden by the bend of the river. Eighty steamers have been counted at a time lying at the levee; these, with fifteen hundred flat-boats from up the river, and three hundred vessels from other ports, American and European, which have often been in the harbor in a single day, give some idea of the immense commerce which centres at New Orleans.

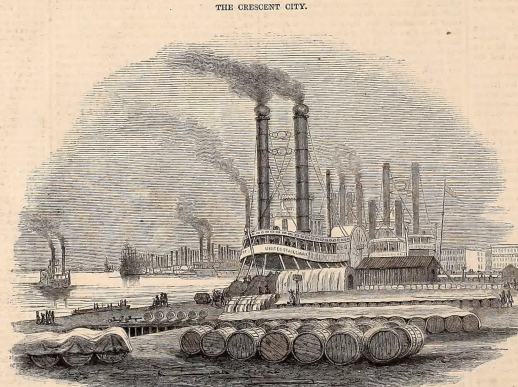
THE CRESCENT CITY.

Looking shoreward, the levee presents a scene of bustling life altogether unequaled. The surface of the river, when it is full, is some feet above the level of the adjacent country. The levee is properly the embankment, beginning some 60 miles below the city, and extending about 150 miles above, built to prevent inundation. Opposite the city the levee is so broad as to furnish a landing-place for all the bulky merchandise in which the trade of New Orleans mainly consists. The broad space is literally buried under the wealth of the Great Valley. Bales of cotton, hogsheads of sugar, barrels of pork by the thousand, are arranged in long lines, piled up tier upon tier. Thousands of busy hands are engaged in loading and unloading, handling and removing this merchandise, whose volume, in the busy season, never appears to be diminished. There are cities whose entire commerce exceeds vastly that of New Orleans; but nowhere is so great an amount of commercial activity presented at a single view as on the levee of the Crescent City. The aspect of the levee at night is even more striking than by day. The fire-baskets on the bows of the steamers throw a red light over the scene, by the aid of which the stevedores and laborers pursue their work. In the back-ground, lit up by the ruddy glare, the spacious warehouses and cotton-presses loom up, while in the distance the domes of the Odd-Fellows' Hall, the Saint Charles, and the Saint Louis, and the church spires stand sharply out against the clear sky.

"Jackson Square" was the "Place d'Armes" in the old times. The Cathedral of Saint Louis, and the public buildings of the First Municipality front upon it. The Square itself is handsomely laid out, and is now the favorite resort of nurses and children. Of this we present a reduced sketch, also one of Lafayette Square.

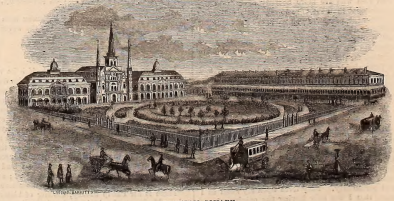
The famous "Shell Road" is one of the specialties of New Orleans. It extends for about six miles back to Lake Pontchartrain. The road is built upon piles, by which it is raised a few feet above the swamp. Its surface is composed of the shells of a species of clam, of which vast embankments are found on the lake. These are ground down and packed together by the pressure of innumerable wheels and hoofs, into a compact body as white, and almost as firm, as solid marble. It furnishes one of the most delightful drives in the world.

The climate of New Orleans is as pleasant as that of any city in the world, and for nine months in the year is hardly surpassed in healthfulness. But during the other three months the pestilence, to which the unacclimated are exposed, drives away all who can leave, except those who are willing to run the risk of the fever for the sake of the comparative immunity which they enjoy when once acclimated. But in spite of the terrors of the sickly season, the population of New Orleans has increased with a rapidity excelled by but few cities of the country.



THE LEVEE.

VIEW IN FRENCH QUARTER.



JACKSON SQUARE.

LAFAYETTE SQUARE.

MAP OF THE COAST LINE FROM THE MOUTHS OF THE MISSISSIPPI TO PENSACOLA.

THE COAST LINE FROM THE MISSISSIPPI MOUTH TO PENSACOLA.

THE accompanying map will shed light on the discussions which are taking place in political and commercial circles with regard to the effects of the establishment of a Southern Confederacy upon trade. It exhibits the coast line of the new Confederacy from the western limits of Louisiana to the harbor of Pensacola, Florida; thus including the mouths of the Mississippi, New Orleans, and Mobile.

Questions have lately arisen in reference to the diversion of trade from Northern to Southern ports which may ensue from the adoption of a free-trade policy at the South, while the North adheres to a protectionist policy. It is certain that broadcloth, all manufactures of cotton, wool, and silk, iron and other metals, glass, liquors, etc., can be imported far more cheaply at the ports of the Southern Confederacy than at Northern ports, in consequence of the difference in the customs duties in the two sections. In order, however, that the Southern ports should outstrip their Northern rivals in the commercial race, they require not only favorable tariffs, but equal advantages of access.

The map shows the mouths of the Mississippi. By one of these vessels bound to New Orleans must enter the river. From the mouth to New Orleans the distance is 105 miles, and vessels take from a week to a month to perform the voyage, the current being always against them. The depth of water over the bar at the mouth of the deepest outlet of the Mississippi is 13 feet 6 inches.

Mobile stands at the point where the Alabama and Tombigbee rivers disembogue themselves into the Bay of Mobile. It is thirty miles from the sea, and when a vessel is once in the bay it is safe. The mouth of the bay is closed by an island called Dauphin Island, and the only exits and entrances are on either side this island. On the west side the channel is only 5 feet deep. On the other side 22 feet are found in the main strait; but a little further on, near the head of the bay, there is a bar on which it is impossible to rely on more than 11 feet water.

The best, indeed the only good harbor on the Gulf of Mexico, is at Pensacola. Between Santa Rosa Island and the main shore there is a land-locked harbor, in which the greatest fleet in the world can lie securely. The depth of water over the bar is never less than 22 feet. If Pensacola had been situate in any other State than Florida it would have been a large and flourishing place. Unfortunately, the poor credit of Florida and the sparseness of its population have operated against internal improvements, and Pensacola is sadly deficient in railroads, and consequently in population and trade.

A DAY'S RIDE:

A LIFE'S ROMANCE.

By CHARLES LEVER.

AUTHOR OF "CHARLES O'MALLEY," "HARRY LORREQUER," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XLIV.

As I ascended the long hill out of Innspruck, the next morning, with my knapsack on my back, I could not help owning to myself that I was a bad man to send on an errand.

That thought lasted me till I halted for the night at Maltz. I was now bound for the first port in the Mediterranean from which I could take ship for Malta; and the better to carry out my purpose, I resolved never to make acquaintance with any one, or be seduced by any companionship, till I had seen Miss Herbert, and given her the message I was charged with. This time, at least, I would be a faithful envoy, at least as faithful as a man might be who had gone to sleep over his credentials for a twelvemonth. And so I reached Maltz, and took my place by diligence over the Stelvio down to Lecco, never trusting myself with even the very briefest intercourse with my fellow-travelers, and suffering them to indulge in the humblest estimate of me, morally and intellectually—all that I might be true to my object and firm to my fixed purpose. For the first time in my life I tried to present myself in an unfavorable aspect, and I was astonished to find the experiment by no means unpleasing, the reason being, probably, that it was an eminent success.

I had now a task of some nicety before me, and addressed myself at once to its discharge. At the hotel I learned that the cottage inhabited by Mrs. Keates was in a small nook of one of the bays, and only an easy walk from the town; and so I dispatched a messenger at once with Miss Crofton's note to Miss Herbert, inclosed in a short one from myself, to know if she would permit me to wait upon her, with reference to the matter in the letter. I spoke of myself in the third person and as the bearer of the letter.

While I was turning over the letters and papers in my writing-desk, awaiting her reply, I came upon Buller's note to his brother, and, without any precise idea why, I sent it by a servant to the Government House with my card. It was completely without a purpose that I did so, and if my reader has not experienced moments of the like "inconsequence," I should totally break down in attempting to account for their meaning.

Miss Herbert's reply came back promptly. She requested that the writer of the note she had just read would favor her with a visit at his earliest convenience.

It was evident that the communication had engaged her attention to some extent by the promptitude of her message to me; and with this thought I crossed the little lawn, and rang the bell at the door.

"The gentleman expected by Miss Herbert, Sir?" asked a smart English maid. "Come this way, Sir. She will see you in a few minutes."

I had fully ten minutes to inspect the details of a pretty little drawing-room, one of those little female temples where scattered drawings and books and music, and, above all, the delicious odor of fresh flowers, all harmonize together, and set you a thinking how easily life could glide by with such appliances were they only set in motion by the touch of the enchantress herself. The door opened at last, but it was the maid; she came to say that Mrs. Keates was very poorly that day, and Miss Herbert could not leave her at that moment; and if it were not perfectly convenient to the gentleman to wait, she begged to know when it would suit him to call again?

"As for me," said I, "I have come to Malta solely on this matter; pray say that I will wait as long as she wishes. I am completely at her orders."

I strolled out after this through one of the windows that opened on the lawn, and gaining the sea-side, I sat down upon a rock to bide her coming. I might have sat about half an hour thus, when I heard a rapid step approaching, and I had just time to arise when Miss Herbert stood before me. She started back, and grew pale, very pale, as she recognized me, and forfully a minute there we both stood, unable to speak a word.

"Am I to understand, Sir," said she, at last, "that you are the bearer of this letter?" And she held it open toward me.

"Yes," said I, with a great effort at collectedness. "I have much to ask your forgiveness for. It is fully a year since I was charged to place that letter in your hands, but one mischance after another has befallen me; not to own that in my own purposeless mode of life I have had no enemy more than my fate."

"I have heard something of your fondness for adventure," said she, with a strange smile that blended the sort of pity with a gentle irony. "After we parted company at Schaffhausen, I believe you traveled for some time on foot. We heard, at least, that you took a fancy to explore a mode of life few persons have penetrated, or, at least, few of your rank and condition."

"May I ask, what do you believe that rank and condition to be, Miss Herbert?" asked I, firmly.

She blushed deeply at this; perhaps I was too abrupt in the way I spoke, and I hastened to add,

"When I offered to be the bearer of the letter you have just read, I was moved by another wish than merely to render you some service. I wanted to tell you, once for all, that if I lived for a while in a fiction land of my own invention, with day-dreams and fancies, and hopes and ambitions all unreal, I have come to lay the due penalty of my deceit, and confess that nothing can be more humble than I am in birth, station, or fortune—my father was apothecary, my name Potts, my means a very few pounds in the world; and yet, with all that avowal, I feel prouder now that I have made it than ever I did in the false assumption of some condition I had no claim to."

She held her hand to me with such a significant air of approval, and smiled so good-naturedly, that I could not help pressing it to my lips, and kissing it rapturously.

Taking a seat at my side, and with a voice meant to recall me to a quiet and business-like demeanor, she asked me to read over Miss Crofton's letter. I told her that I knew every line of it by heart, and, more still, I knew the whole story to which it related. It was a topic that required the nicest delicacy to touch on; but with a frankness that charmed me, she said,

"You have had the candor to tell me freely your story; let me imitate you, and reveal mine.

"You know who we are, and whence we have sprung; that my father was a simple laborer on a line of railroad, and by dint of zeal and intelligence, and an energy that would not be baffled or impeded, had raised himself to station and affluence. You have heard of his connection with Sir Edward Crofton, and how unfortunately it was broken off; but you can not know the rest; that is, you can not know what we alone know, and what is not so much as suspected by others, that this event scarcely dare to speak, since it is essentially the secret of my family."

I guessed at once to what she alluded; her troubled manner, her swimming eyes, and her quavering voice, all betrayed that she referred to the mystery of her father's fate: while I doubted within myself whether it were right and fitting for me to acknowledge that I knew the secret source of her anxiety. She relieved me from my embarrassment by continuing thus:

"Your kind and generous friends have not suffered themselves to be discouraged by defeat. They have again and again renewed their proposals to my mother, only varying the mode, in the hope that by some stratagem they should overcome her reasons for refusal. Now, though this rejection, so persistent as it is, may seem ungracious, it is not without a sufficient and substantial cause."

Again she faltered, and more confused, and now I saw how she struggled between a natural reserve and an impulse to confide the sorrow that oppressed her to one who might befriend her.

"You may speak freely to me," said I, at last.

"I am not ignorant of the mystery you hint at. Crofton has told me what many surmise and some freely believe is—"

"But we know it, know it for a certainty," cried she, chasing my hand in her eagerness. "It is no longer a surmise or a suspicion. It is a certainty—a fact! Two letters in his handwriting have reached my mother; one from St. Louis in America, where he had gone first; the second from an Alpine village, where he was laid up in sickness. He had had a terrible encounter with a man who had done him some gross wrong, and was wounded in the shoulder. After which he had to cross the Rhine, wading or swimming, and travel many miles ere he could find shelter. When he wrote, however, he was rapidly recovering, and as quickly regaining all his old energy and spirit."

"And from that time out have you had no tidings of him?"

"Nothing but an order on a Russian banker in London to pay to my mother's order a sum of money, a considerable one too; and although she hoped to gain something by the remittance, she could not succeed, nor have we now any trace of him whatever. I ought to mention," said she, as if struck by the recollection, "that in his last letter he enjoined my mother not to receive any payment from the assurance company, nor enter into compromise of any sort, but to wait, only to live in the hope that we should meet again and be happy."

"And are you still ignorant of where he now is?"

"We only know that a cousin of mine, an officer of engineers at Aleppo, heard of an Englishman being engaged by the Shah of Persia to report on certain silver mines at Kashan, and from all he could learn this was the person to apply to him. My cousin had obtained leave of absence expressly to trace him, and promised in his last letter to bring us himself any tidings he might procure here to Malta. Indeed, when I learned that a stranger had asked to see me, I was full sure it was my cousin Harry."

Was it that her eyes grew darker in color as this name escaped her—was it that a certain manner shook, and changed the whole character of my own jealous humor, that made me wretched as I heard of that Cousin Harry, now mentioned for the first time?

"What reparation can I make you for so blank a disappointment?" said I, with a sad, half-bitter tone.

"Be the same kind friend that he would have proved himself if it had been his fortune to come first," said she; and though she spoke coldly, she blushed deeply. "Harry," said she, hurriedly, taking a small printed paragraph from a letter, and eagerly, as it seemed, trying to recover her former manner, "here is a slip I have cut out of the Levant Herald. I found it about two months since. It ran thus: 'The person who had contracted for the building of the railway is now turns out to be an Englishman, is reported to have had a violent altercation yesterday with Mustafa Pasha, and was ordered to be seized and thrown up his contract and demanded his passport for Russia. It is rumored here that the Russian embassy has taken this individual under its sure. Vague as this is, I feel persuaded that he is the person alluded to, and that it is from Constantinople we shall hear of him."

"Well," cried I, "I am ready. I will set out at once."

"Can I believe you will do us this great service?" cried she, with swimming eyes and clasped hands.

"This time you will find me faithful," said I, gravely. "He who has said and done so many foolish things as I have, must, by one good action, give bail for future conduct."

"You are a true friend, and you have all my confidence."

"Alas, Keates's compliments, Miss," said the maid, at this moment, "and hopes the gentleman will stay to dinner with you, though she can not come down herself."

"She imagines you are my cousin, whom she is aware I have been expecting," said Miss Herbert, in a whisper, and evidently appearing uncertain how to act.

"Oh!" said I, with an anguish I could not repress, "would that I could change my lot with his!"

"Very well, Mary," said Miss Herbert; "thank your mistress from me, and say the gentleman accepts with much pleasure. Is it too much presumption on my part, Sir, to say so?" said she, with a low whisper, while a half shame-faced look fell on her eyes, and I could not speak with happiness.

Determined, however, to give an earnest of my good faith, I resolved that I would at once return to the town, and learn when the first packet sailed for Constantinople. The dinner hour was seven, so that I had fully five hours yet to make my inquiries ere we met at table. I wondered at myself how business-like and practical I had become; but a strong purpose now impelled me, and seemed to add a sort of strength to my whole nature.

"As cousin Harry is the mirror of punctuality, and you now represent him, Mr. Potts," said she, shaking my hand, "pray remember not to be later than seven."

CHAPTER XLV.

"CONSTANTINOPLE, ODESSA, and the LEVANT.—The Cyclops, five hundred horse-power, to sail on Wednesday morning, at eight o'clock. For freight or passage apply to Captain Robert B. Rogers."

This announcement, which I found amidst a great many others in a frame over the fire-place in the coffee-room, struck me forcibly, first of all, because, not belonging to the regular mail packets, it suggested a cheap passage; and secondly, it promised an early departure, and the vessel was to sail on the very next morning, an amount of haste I believe that I felt would gratify Miss Herbert.

Now, although I had been living for a considerable time back at the cost of the Imperial House of Hapsburg, my resources for such an expedition as was opening before me were of the most slender kind. I made a careful examination of all my worldly wealth, and it amounted to the sum of forty-three pounds odd shillings. On terra firma I could of course economize to any extent. With self-denial and resolution I could live on very little. Life in the East, I had often heard, was singularly cheap and inexpensive. All I had read of Oriental habits in the Arabian Nights and Tales of the Caliphs went to show that with a few dates and a water-melon a man dined fully as well as need be; and the delicious warmth of the climate rendered clothing a complete superfluity. Before forming any thing like a correct budget, I must ascertain what would be the cost of my passage to Constantinople, and so I rang for the waiter to direct me to the address of the advertiser.

"That's the captain yonder, Sir," whispered the waiter, and he pointed to a stout, weather-beaten man, who, with his hands in the pockets of his pilot-coat, was standing in front of the fire, smoking a cigar.

Although I had never seen him before, the features reminded me of some one I had met with, and suddenly I recognized in me of the skipper with whom I had sailed from Ireland for Milford, and who had given me a letter for his brother. "Bob"—the very Robert Rogers now before me.

"Do you know this handwriting, captain?" said I, showing the letter from my pocket-book.

"That's my brother Joe's," said he, not offering to take the letter from my hand, or removing the cigar from his mouth, but talking with all the unconcern in life. "That's Joe's own scrawl, and there ain't a worse from this to himself."

"The letter is for you," said I, rather offended at his coolness.

"So I see," said he, stick it up there, over the chimney; Joe has never any thing to say that won't keep."

"It is a letter of introduction, Sir," said I, still more haughtily.

"And what if it be? Won't that keep? What's in the wind now?"

"The humble individual before you, Captain Rogers."

"So, that's it!" said he, slowly. "Well, read it out for me, for, to tell you the truth, there's no harder navigation to me than one of Joe's reviews."

"I believe I can master it," said I, opening and reading what originally had been composed and drawn up by myself. When I came to "Algernon Sydney Potts, a man so completely after your own heart," he drew his cigar from his mouth, and laying his hand on my shoulder, turned me slowly around till the light fell full upon me.

"No, Joseph," said he, deliberately, "not a bit of it, my boy. This ain't my sort of chap at all!"

I almost choked with anger, but somehow there was such a mixture of good-humor in the man, and such a total absence of all wish to offend, that I read on to the end.

"Well," said he, when I concluded, "he usedn't to be so wordy as that. I wonder what came over him. Mayhap he wasn't well."

"What a strange taste the fellow must have adorned the Correct Letter Writer!

"He was, on the contrary, in the enjoyment of perfect health and spirits," said I, tartly.

"All I can pick out of it is, I ain't to offer you any money; and as there isn't any discussion about the fare, I suppose you're to pay, here's my hand!" And he wrung mine with a grip that would have flattened a chain cable.

"What's your line, here? You ain't soldering, are you?"

"No; I'm traveling, for pleasure, for information, for pastime, as one might say."

"In the general do-nothing and careless line of business? That ain't mine. No, by jingo! I don't eat my fish without catching, ay, and landing them, too, I ain't ashamed to say. I'm captain, supercargo, and pilot of my own craft; take every lime that is taken aboard; I've writ every line that ever is writ in the log-book, and I vaccinated every man and boy aboard for the natural small-pox with these fingers and this tool that you see here!" And he produced an odd and very rusty instrument of veterinary surgery from his vest-pocket, where it lay with copper money, knife, and lucifer matches.

"Can you take me as a passenger to Constantinople?"

"To Constantinople? Ay, to the Persian Gulf, to Point de Galle, to Cochin China, to Ross River; don't think to puzzle me with navigation, my lad."

"Are there many other passengers?"

"I could have five hundred, if I'd take 'em! Put Bob Rogers on a placard, and see what'll happen! If I said, 'I'm going to sea on a plank to-morrow,' there's men would rather come along with me than go in the Queen or the Hannibal. I don't say they're right, mind ye; but I won't say they're wrong, neither."

"Oh, why didn't I meet this wretch when I was a child? Why didn't my father find a Helot like this to toil lies before me, and frighten me with their horrid ugliness?" This was the thought that flashed through me as I listened. I felt, besides, that such stupid, purposeless inventions, corrupted and blunted the taste for graceful narrative, just in the same way that an undeserving recipient of charity offends the pleasure of real benevolence.

"May I ask, Captain Rogers, what is the fare?" said I, with a bland courtesy.

"That depends upon the man, Sir. If you was Ram Sam Can-tanker-whad, I'd say five hundred gold zagodas. If you was a Cockney stripling, with a fresh-water face and a sky-sail yarn whisker, I'd call it a matter of seven or eight pound."

"And you sail at eight?"

"To the minute. When Bob Rogers says eight o'clock, the first turn of the paddles will be with the first stroke of the hour."

"Then book me, pray, for a berth; and, for sweet's sake, I'll go aboard to-night."

"Meet me, then, here at ten o'clock, and I'll take you off in my gig, an honor to be proud on, my lad; but as Joe's friend, I'll do it."

I bowed my acknowledgments and went off, neither delighted with my new acquaintance nor myself for the patience I had shown him. After all, I had secured an early passage, and thus was able to show Kate Herbert that I was not going to let the grass grow under my feet this time, and that she might reckon on my zeal to serve her in future. As I returned the road to the cottage, I forgot all about Captain Rogers, and only thought of Kate, and the interests that were hers. It was next to a certainty that her father was yet alive; but how to find him in a strange land, with a feigned name, and most probably with every aid and appliance to complete his disguisement. It was, doubtless, a noble enterprise to devote one's self for such as me was, but not very hopeful withal; and while I went over various plans for my future guidance: what I should do if I fell sick, what if I were robbed, what if I were to be waylaid by Arabs, or carried away to some fearful region in the mountains, and made to feed a pet alligator or a domestic hyena—I felt that I was conceiving that I was over-estimating my possible perils, but it was wise to give a large margin to the unknown; and so I did not curb myself in the least.

As I entered the grounds the night was falling, and I could see that the lamps were already lighted in the drawing-room. What surprised me, however, was to see a very smart groom, well mounted, and leading another horse as ready bored before the door. There was evidently a visitor within, and I felt indisposed to enter till he had gone from me. My curiosity, however, prompted me to ask the groom the name of his master, and he replied, "The Honorable Captain Buller."

The very essence of all jealousy is, that it is unreasoning. It is well known that husbands—the most unbelieving and most ill-used class—always suspect every one but the right man; and now, without the faintest clew to a suspicion, I grew actually sick with jealousy!

Nor was the feeling blameable in me, for as I looked through the uncurtained window, I could see the captain, a fine-looking, rather tigerish sort of fellow, standing with his back to the fire-place, while he talked to Miss Herbert, who sat some distance off at a work-table. There was in his air that assumption of joyous and easy possession that said, "I'm at home here; in this fortress I hold the chief command." These was about him, too, the tone of unquestioned superiority, which, when displayed by a man toward a woman, takes the most offensive of all possible aspects.

As he talked he moved at last toward a window, and, opening it, held out his hand to feel if it were raining.

"I hope," cried he, "you'll not send me back with a refusal; her ladyship counts upon you as the chief ornament of her ball."

"We never do go to balls, Sir," was the dry response.

That make this occasion the exception If you only knew how lamentably we are off for pretty people, you'd pity us. Such garrisons wives and children are unknown in the oldest inhabitant of the island. Surely Mrs. Keates will be quite well by Wednesday, and she'll not be so cruel as to deny you to her first dance."

"I can but repeat my excuses—I never go out."

"If you say so, I think I'll abandon all share in the enterprise. It was a point of honor with me to persuade you; in fact, I pledged myself to succeed, and if you really persist in a refusal, I must pitch all these notes in the fire, and go off yachting till the whole thing is over." And with this he drew forth a mass of notes from a pocket-case, and proceeded to con over the addresses: "Mrs. Hilyard,' 'Mr. Barnes,' 'Mr. Clinton,' 'Lady Bladgen.' Oh, Lady Bladgen! Why, it would be worth while coming only to see her and Sir John; and here are the Crosbys, too; and what have we here? Oh! this is a new face, I'll be bound. I know my brother Grey—he'd amuse you immensely. Just listen to this, by way of a hint of introduction:

"DEAR ——: Cherish the cove that will hand you this note as the most sublime snob I have ever met in all my home and foreign experiences. In a large garrison like yours, you can have no difficulty in finding fellows to give him a field-day. I commit him, therefore, to your worthy keeping, to dine him, draw him forth, and pitch him out of the window when you're done with him. No harm if it is from the topmost story of the highest barrack in Malta. His name is Potts—seriously and truthfully, Potts. Birth, parentage, and belongings all unknown to,

Yours ever,

"GREY BULLER."

"You are unfortunate, Sir, in confiding your correspondence to me," said Kate, rising from her seat, "for that gentleman is a friend, a sincere and valued friend, of my own, and you could scarcely have found a more certain way to offend me than to speak of him slightingly or ill."

"You can't mean that you know him—ever met him?"

"I have him and respect him, and I will not listen to one word to his disparagement. Nay, more, Sir, I will feel myself at liberty, if I think it fitting, to tell Mr. Potts the honorable way in which your brother has discharged the task of an introduction, its good faith, and gentlemanlike feeling."

"Pray let us have him at the mess first. Don't spoil our sport till we have at least one evening out of him."

But she did not wait for him to finish his speech, and left the room.

It is but fair to own he took his reverses with great coolness: he tightened his sword-belt, set his cap on his head before the glass, stroked down his whiskers, and then lighting a cigar, swaggered off to the door with the lounging swing of his order.

As for myself, I hastened back to the town, and with such speed that I traversed the mile in something like thirteen minutes. I had no very clear and defined plan of action, but I resolved to ask Captain Rogers to be my friend, and see me through this conjuncture. He had just dined and I entered the coffee-room, and consented to have his brandy-and-water removed to my bedroom while I opened my business with him.

I will not, at this eleventh hour of revelations, inflict upon my reader the details, but simply be satisfied to state that I found the skipper far more practical than I looked for. He was cool, besides, had a taste for these sort of adventures, and prided himself on his conduct of them.

"Go back quietly and eat your dinner comfortably with your friends; leave every thing to me, and I promise you one thing—the Cyclops shall not get full steam up till we have settled this small transaction."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

EXTRA SESSION OF THE SENATE.

On Friday, 15th, in the extra session of the Senate, Senator MASON offered a resolution requesting the President for information as to the number of troops quartered in the District, when they are to be withdrawn, for what purpose they are maintained there, and whether the force is to be increased, and to what extent. The resolution was laid over. Senator Douglas's resolution, calling upon the Secretary of War for information in relation to the forts, arsenals, navy-yards, and other public property in the seceded States, whether the administration intend to re-capture them in pursuance of the recommendation, and if so what military force will be necessary, etc., was taken up. The resolution and his policy elicited a eulogium of the policy of the administration with reference to the seceded States. Senator Wilson said the administration would make known its policy through gentlemen in whom it had confidence. The debate was indulged in somewhat generally. In the course of it, Senator Douglas gave Senator Fessenden the last direct, and was severely rebuked by that Senator.

On Saturday, 16th, Senator Rice made a personal explanation, and after some general conversation of no direct moment, the Senate went into executive session.

On Monday, 18th, Senator Douglas offered a resolution to comment upon the Inaugural Address of President Lincoln, and the general course of the Administration. The debate he interpreted, in accordance with the ultra Southern view, as meaning war. He also argued that the construction of Mr. Lincoln's Cabinet left nothing to hope for peace. His opinion was that the Federal Government could not be perpetuated on the principles which brought the now dominant party to power. Senator Hale followed in reply and set the conclusions of his speech in direct west indi executive session.

On Tuesday, 19th, the subject before the Senate being the resolution presented by Senator Douglas, making inquiries relative to the fortifications and other public property in the seceded States, remarks were made by Senators Clingman of North Carolina, Grimes of Iowa, Clark and Hale of New Hampshire, Chandler of Michigan, Brockliffge of Kentucky, Trumbull of Illinois, and Douglas. The latter gentleman proposed a substitute for Senator Douglas's resolution, requesting the Committee on the Judiciary to make inquiries as to the qualifications of Senators, what vacancies exist, and whether the executive of any State in which vacancies may exist has a constitutional right to make temporary appointments. No action was taken on the resolutions, it being decided to hold an executive session.

On Wednesday, 20th, the consideration of Senator Douglas's resolution in relation to the fortifications, etc., was then resumed, and Senator Bayard, of Delaware, made a speech on the troubles of the country, in which the reconstruction of the Union impossible. At the conclusion of Senator Bayard's remarks the Senate held an executive session, and confirmed a number of appointments.

On Thursday, 21st, Senator Bayard continued his speech.

THE NEW DIPLOMATIC APPOINTMENTS.

We publish below the names and salaries of the various Ministers and Consuls thus far appointed by the Lincoln Administration:

MINISTERS.

ENGLAND.	Where to Succeed.	Salaries.
Min. Plen., Charles F. Adams	London	$17,500
Sec. of Leg., Chas. L. Wilson	London	2,000
Asst Sec. of Legation, John Adams	London	1,500
FRANCE—
Min. Plen., Wm. Dayton	Paris	17,500
Sec. of Legation, W. J. Pennington	Paris	2,000
PRUSSIA—
Min. Plen., N. P. Judd	Berlin	12,000
Sec. of Legation, H. Kreismann	Berlin	1,500
SARDINIA—
Min. Res., Geo. P. Marsh	Turin	7,500
TURKEY—
Min. Res., James Watson Webb	Constantinople	7,500
AUSTRIA—
Min. Plen., Anson Burlingame	Vienna	12,000
SWEDEN AND NORWAY—
Min. Res., Jacob T. Halderman	Stockholm	7,500
DENMARK—
Min. Res., Bradford R. Wood	Copenhagen	7,500
BRAZIL—
Min. Plen., Thomas H. Nelson	Rio Janeiro	12,000
BELGIUM—
Min. Res., Henry S. Sanford	Brussels	7,500
PORTUGAL—
Min. Res., Carl Schurz	Lisbon	7,500
SPAIN—
Min. Plen., Gustavus M. Clay	Madrid	12,000
Sec. of Legation, Clay Clemens	Madrid	1,500
GUATEMALA—
Min. Res., Elisha W. Crosby	Guatemala	7,500
PONTIFICAL STATES—
Min. Res., Rufus King	Rome	7,500

CONSULS.

At what Place.	Names.	Compensation.
London	Freeman H. Morse	$7,500
Bordeaux	C. Dawson	3,000
Liverpool	DeWitt C. Littlejohn	7,500
Havre	Leonce Lamarre	3,000
Aix la Chapelle	Wm. H. Vesey	5,000
Frankfort-on-the-Maine	Julius Hoffman	5,000
Alexandria, Egypt	W. S. Thayer	10,000

COMMISSIONER.

Sandwich Islands ..... Chancellor J. Dyer 7,500

SOUTHERN ENVOYS TO EUROPE.

The Government of the seceded States has appointed Hon. William L. Yancey of Alabama, Judge A. D. Sort of Louisiana, Colonel A. Dudley Mann and T. Butler King of Georgia special Commissioners to proceed to England and France to obtain the recognition of the independence of the Confederate States, and to secure commercial arrangements as their joint interests may inspire.

THE SLAVE-TRADE ACT VETOED.

We have authority for stating the fact that Hon. Jefferson Davis had vetoed the Slave-trade Act recently passed by the Congress of the C. S. A. The Washington correspondent of the Charleston Mercury publishes the document. It is as follows:

"EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, Feb. 28, 1861.

"GENTLEMEN OF THE CONGRESS,—While sincere desirous to the people of the Confederate States, and if so what military force will be necessary, etc., was taken on

THE COOPER UNION FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF SCIENCE AND ART.

Not many men propose to themselves as the definite purpose of their lives the improvement of their fellow-men; fewer still adhere to such a purpose through good and evil report; while those who achieve the fruition of their labors are rare indeed. When amidst struggles and discouragements innumerable the work is successfully accomplished, mankind sooner or later recognize the true heroic element of character, and enroll the self-sacrificing laborer among its benefactors.

On the 29th of April, 1859, PETER COOPER, at first an humble mechanic, and then a successful merchant of the city of New York, without parade and in the quiet of his own home in the full vigor of his years, and with his children at his side approving the splendid offering, executed and delivered to six trustees a deed in fee simple for the ground and building commonly known as the Cooper Institute, covering an entire block at the junction of the Third and Fourth avenues, which had cost him $630,000 in money to complete, upon the condition "that the above mentioned and described premises, together with the appurtenances, and the rents, issues, income, and profits thereof, shall be forever devoted to the instruction and improvement of the inhabitants of the United States in practical science and art." An additional sum of ten thousand dollars was given to the trustees for procuring the requisite furniture and apparatus.

Thus was accomplished during his lifetime a purpose formed forty years before, by a mechanic working at his bench for his daily bread; a purpose never lost sight of amidst the fluctuations of business, the temptations of political and social position, or the demands of public or private charities, to which his hand had ever been open. One knows scarcely which to admire most, the stern tenacity of his purpose or the magnificent scale on which it has been executed.

The Cooper Union is a fire-proof building of stone, brick, and iron, containing seven floors, covering each 24,000 superficial feet. The three lower floors, including the Great Hall so well known for its public meetings, are rented out, to procure revenue for the support of the literary and scientific departments of the Institution, to which the four remaining floors are devoted. The first of these floors is appropriated to a great Free Reading-Room and Picture Gallery. The admission is absolutely free to all comers, male and female, who are not even required to register their names. The number of daily visitors is now over fifteen hundred; and they are supplied with the most valuable current literature of Europe and America, in the shape of the leading newspapers and magazines, as well literary as scientific. The number of periodicals regularly received is over two hundred and eighty. A Reference Library, now containing over four thousand volumes, and rapidly increasing, completes the attractions of this department, which is contained in a noble hall 120 feet long and 80 feet wide. The Picture Gallery adjoining contains the Bryan Gallery of Christian Art, and many other valuable paintings.

The next floor is devoted to the School of Design for Women, which is capable of accommodating three hundred pupils. This is a day-school, and is absolutely free to all who may desire to pursue art as a profession, or to become teachers or engravers. Amateurs are also received at a very moderate charge; but the great object of the school is to provide for respectable females of suitable capacity the means of earning a livelihood in a congenial pursuit. The number of pupils is now one hundred and eighty, of whom over one hundred and forty are free scholars. The best teachers (five in all) are employed in the several departments, and so successful is the school that last year the scholars earned over eleven hundred dollars for themselves in engraving alone. A council of ladies—among them many of those most eminent for taste and social position in the city—have the general supervision of the school, which, as now organized, is undoubtedly a credit to the country.

PETER COOPER, ESQ., AGED 71.

The two remaining floors are devoted to free instruction at night "in the application of science to the useful occupations of life, and on such other branches of knowledge as in the opinion of the Board of Trustees will tend to improve and elevate the working classes in the city of New York."

The trustees have practically put in operation a free college at night for the working classes of this city. Classes are formed in the following departments:

1. In Mathematics	Number of Pupils.	163
2. In Chemistry and Physics	" "	255
3. In Music	" "	207
4. In Architectural Drawing	" "	82
5. In Mechanical Drawing	" "	86
6. In Free-hand Drawing	" "	122
Total number of Pupils		1115

The number of instructors is fifteen.

Besides these classes a course of free readings in English literature is given, which is attended by over six hundred persons of both sexes.

The pupils represent every kind of business carried on in this city, one hundred distinct branches being specified in the Annual Report of the Trustees, from which our facts are mainly derived. The great majority of the pupils are between the ages of 16 and 30, but there are pupils who acknowledge to over 60 years.

The total outlay last year for carrying on the operations of the Union which have been described was $30,800$\frac{11}{100}$, all of which was derived from the rents of the three lower floors, except $5000 which was given by the founder of the Institution.

The trustees expect in addition to establish a Polytechnic School of the highest grade, and a great Free Lending Library, such as are possessed by the cities of Boston and Liverpool. For these purposes they will require help, which by their charter they are authorized to avail themselves of, from whatever quarter it may be offered.

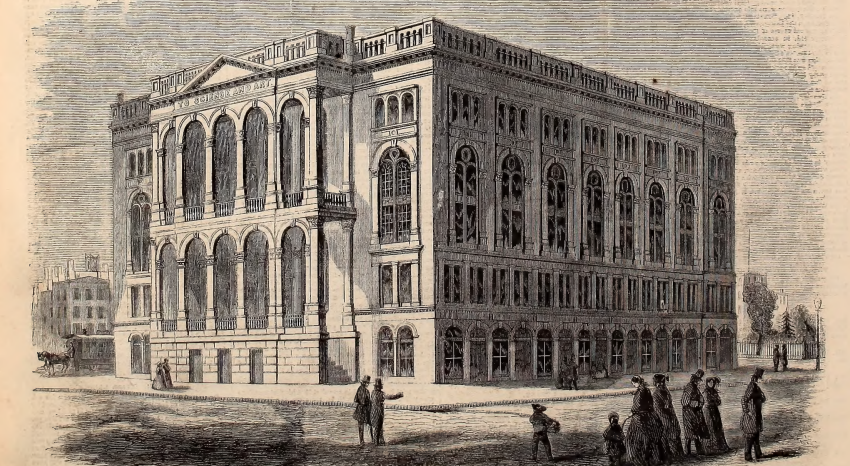
An examination of this noble Institution, and of its great practical operations and results, will satisfy the most skeptical that the main idea of the founder, the elevation and improvement of the working classes of this city, by instruction offered without money and without price in the several departments of knowledge applicable to their daily business, will be abundantly realized. Long may Mr. Cooper live to see its fruits!

THE VASSAR COLLEGE.

On the 26th of February, at the Gregory House, in the city of Poughkeepsie, was enacted a scene which is almost without a parallel on the theatre of our country's history. Then and there MATTHEW VASSAR laid down on the altar of Christian benevolence the sum of Four Hundred Thousand Dollars—given by him to build and endow A COLLEGE FOR THE EDUCATION OF YOUNG WOMEN. Others, as Girard and Astor, have left by will an equal amount, to become available after their death; some, possibly—like Mr. Cooper, and the Lawrences of Boston—while living, have contributed, at different times and for various objects, an aggregate as large as the above; but no man in the United States, excepting Mr. Cooper, has ever in his lifetime, and by a single act, consecrated such a princely donation to the interests of humanity.

This event, destined to become of historic interest in the annals of philanthropy and benevolence, occurred in connection with the first meeting of the Trustees of VASSAR FEMALE COLLEGE, under a charter recently obtained from the Legislature.

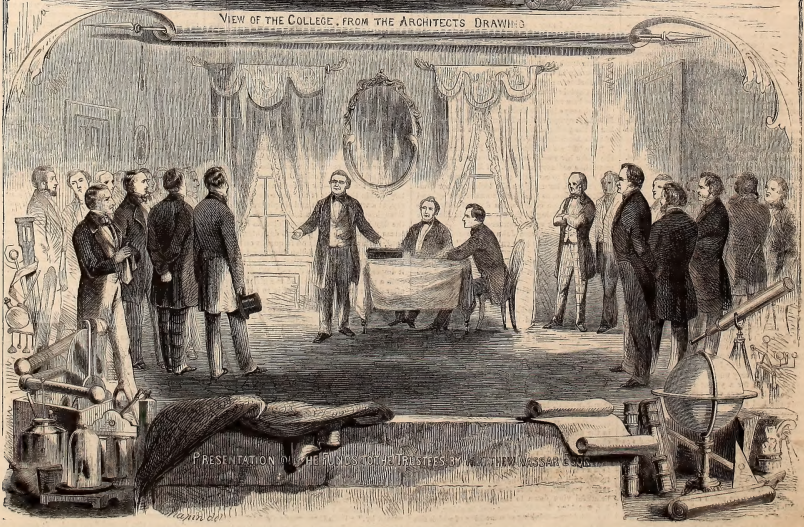
The Board being organized by the election of Hon. William Kelly, Chairman, and Cyrus Swan, Secretary, Mr. Vassar addressed the Chair, stating his reasons for this appropriation of his funds, and expressing his views and wishes as to the principles on which the College should be founded; the system of instruction and government; and the most judicious investment and management of the funds. The moment when he pronounced the words, "And now, gentlemen of the Board of Trustees, I transfer to your possession and ownership the real and personal property which I have



THE COOPER UNION FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF SCIENCE AND ART.

VASSAR FEMALE COLLEGE.

VIEW OF THE COLLEGE, FROM THE ARCHITECTS DRAWING.



PRESENTATION OF THE FUNDS TO THE TRUSTEES OF VASSAR FEMALE COLLEGE.

devoted to this object, as a SACRED TRUST"—that moment was a sublime one! A thrill ran through the assembly such as it is the privilege of a man to feel but once in this mortal life.

Our artist has given an accurate and spirited sketch of the PRESENTATION OF THE FUNDS. The munificent DONOR stands with one hand on the box containing the title-deeds, bonds and mortgages, stocks, and other securities; the other hand offering the key, resting on the open palm. His lofty purpose spreads a glow of enthusiasm over his face; his eye kindles with generous emotion; the lines of the mouth indicate the decision and energy with which he will prosecute the enterprise which he has inaugurated.

The College edifice will attract attention. It was designed by J. Renwick, Jun., of the firm of Renwick, Auchmuty, & Sands, from plans furnished by Professor Milo P. Jewett, now the President of the College. The building is to be of brick, four stories high, with capacity to accommodate 300 students, each having her own separate sleeping-room. It will contain a Chapel, Library, Art Gallery, Lecture and Recitation rooms, etc. It will be abundantly supplied with pure, soft water, lighted with gas, and heated by steam. It will be nearly fire-proof. The location is about a mile and a half east of the city of Poughkeepsie, on grounds embracing two hundred acres in extent.

THE PARSON'S DAUGHTER OF OXNEY COLNE.

BY ANTHONY TROLLOPE.

IN the parish of Oxney Colne there are only two decent houses. The larger and better is the parsonage, in which lived the parson and his daughter; and the smaller is the freehold residence of a certain Miss Le Smyrger. Miss Le Smyrger was an old maid, with a pedigree and blood of her own, a hundred and thirty acres of respectable land on the borders of Dartmoor, fifty years of age, a constitution of iron, and an opinion of her own on every subject under the sun.

And now for the parson and his daughter. The parson's name was Woolsworthy—or Woolthy as it was pronounced by all those who lived around him—the Rev. Saul Woolsworthy; and his daughter was Patience Woolsworthy, or Miss Patty, as she was known to the Devonshire world of those parts. The name of Patience had not been well chosen for her, for she was a hot-tempered damsel, warm in her convictions, and inclined to express them fervently. She had but few companions or friends in the world, and by both of them this freedom of expression had been fully permitted to her since she was a child. Miss Le Smyrger and her father were well accustomed to her ways, and on the whole well satisfied with them. The former was quick, sharp, and equally ready prepared as herself, and as Mr. Woolsworthy was allowed by his daughter to be quite paramount on his own subject—for he had a subject—he did not object to his daughter being paramount on all others. A pretty girl was Patience Woolsworthy at the time of which I am writing, and one who possessed much that was worthy of remark and admiration had she lived where beauty meets with admiration, or where fashion required it of a maiden. But at Oxney Colne, on the borders of Dartmoor, there were few to appreciate her, and it seemed as though she herself had but little idea of carrying her talent further afield, so that it might not remain forever wrapped in a blanket.

She was a pretty girl, tall and slender, with dark eyes and black hair. Her eyes were perhaps too round for regular beauty, and her hair was perhaps too crisp; her mouth was large and expressive; her nose was finely formed, though a critic in female form might have declared it to be somewhat broad. But her countenance altogether was very attractive—if only she could be seen without that resolution for dominion which occasionally marred it, though sometimes it even added to her attractions.

It must be confessed on behalf of Patience Woolsworthy that the circumstances of her life had peremptorily called upon her to assume dominion. She had lost her mother when she was sixteen, and had had neither brother nor sister. She had no neighbors near her eligible for association or rank to interfere in the conduct of her life, excepting always Miss Le Smyrger. Miss Le Smyrger would have had the whole parish under her, including the whole management of her morals and of the parsonage household, had Patience been content with such an attempted rule. But such a Patience had ever loved Miss Le Smyrger, she was not content with this, and therefore she had been called on to put forth a strong hand of her own. She had put forth this strong hand early, and hence had come the character which I am attempting to describe. But I must say on behalf of this girl that it was not only over others that she thus exercised dominion. In acquiring that power she had also acquired much greater power of exercising rule over herself.

She had taken her outlook into life, weighing the things on the side she had and those which she had not, in a manner very unusual, and, as a rule, not always desirable for a young lady. The things which she had were very many. She had not society; she had not a fortune; she had not any assurance of future means of livelihood; she had not high hope of becoming for herself a position in life by marriage; she had not that excitement and pleasure in life which she read of in such books as found their way down to Oxney Colne Parsonage. It would be easy to add to the list of the things which she had not; and this list against herself she made out with the utmost vigor. The things which she had, or those rather which she assured herself of having, were much more easily counted. She had the birth and education of a lady, the strength of a healthy woman, and a will of her own. Such was the list as she made it out for herself, and I protest that I assert no more than the truth in saying that she never added to it either beauty, wit, or talent.

Miss Le Smyrger was not given to extensive hospitality, and it was only to those who were bound to her, either by ties of blood or of very old friendship, that she delighted to open her doors. As her old friends were very few in number, as those few lived at a distance, and as her nearest connexions were higher in the world in their way, and were said by herself to look down upon her, the visits made to Oxney Combe were few and far between.

But now, at the period of which I am writing, such a visit was about to be made. Miss Le Smyrger had a younger sister who had married a property in the parish of Oxney Colne equal to that of the lady who now lived there; but this younger sister had inherited more wealth, and also therefore, in early life, had found sundry lovers, one of whom became her husband. She had married a man even then well to do in the world, but very rich and almost mighty; a member of Parliament, a lord of this and that board, a man who had a house in Eaton Square, and a park in the North of England; and in this way her course of life had been very much divided from that of our Miss Le Smyrger. But the lord of the Government board had been blessed with various children, and Plympton Jr. was now thought expedient to look after Aunt Penelope's Devonshire acres. Aunt Penelope was empowered to leave them to whom she pleased, and though it was thought in Eaton Square that she must, as a matter of course, leave them to one of the family, nevertheless a little cousinly intercourse might make the thing more certain. I will not say that this was the sole cause for such a visit, but in these days a visit was about to be made by Captain Broughton to his aunt. Now Captain John Broughton was the second son of Alfonso Broughton, of Queen Ann's Gate and Eaton Square, Member of Parliament, and Lord of the aforesaid Government Board.

"And what do you mean to do with him?" Patience Woolsworthy asked of Miss Le Smyrger when that lady walked over from the Combe to say that her nephew John was to arrive on the following morning.

"Do with him? Why, I shall bring him over here to talk to your father."

"He'll be too fashionable for that, and papa won't trouble his head about him if he finds that he doesn't care for Dartmoor."

"Then he must do so in spite with you, my dear."

"Well, yes; there's that resource at any rate, and for your sake I dare say I should be more civil to him than papa. But he'll soon get tired of making love to me, and what you'll do then I can not imagine."

Captain Broughton came to Oxney Combe, staid there a fortnight—the intended period for his projected visit having been fixed at three or four days—and then went back to Eaton Square, only back to his London haunts, the time of the year then being the close of the Easter holidays; but as he did so he told his aunt that he should assuredly return to her in the autumn.

"And assuredly I shall be happy to see you, John—if you come as a visitor to Oxney Colne. If you have no such purpose you had better remain away."

"I shall assurelly come," the Captain had replied, and then the visit was over for the present.

The summer passed rapidly by, and very little was said between Miss Le Smyrger and Miss Woolsworthy about Captain Broughton. Patience never expects—nay, I may say, as to all ordinary matters—no two women could well be more intimate with each other than they were, and more than that, they had the courage each to talk to the other with absolute truth as to things concerning themselves —a courage in which dear friendship often fail. But nevertheless, very little was said between them about Captain John Broughton. All that was said may be here repeated.

"John says that he shall return here in August," Miss Le Smyrger said, as Patience was sitting with her in the parlor at Oxney Combe, on the morning after that gentleman's departure.

"He told me so himself," said Patience; and as she spoke her round dark eyes assumed a look of more than ordinary brightness. Miss Le Smyrger had intended to carry the conversation any further she changed her mind as she looked at her companion. Then, in a few days, the month of July, and toward the close of the warm days of July, Miss Le Smyrger, sitting in the same chair in the same room, again took up the conversation.

"I got a letter from John this morning. He says that he shall be here on the third."

"Does he?"

"He is very punctual to the time he named."

"Yes; I fancy that he is a punctual man," said Patience.

"I hope that you will be glad to see him," said Miss Le Smyrger.

"Very glad to see him," said Patience, with a bold, clear voice; and then the conversation was again dropped, and nothing further was said till after Captain Broughton's second arrival in the parish.

Four months had then passed since his departure, and during that time Miss Woolsworthy had performed all her usual duties in a most accustomed course. No one could discover that she had been less careful in her household matters than had been her wont, less willing to go about her little neighbors, or less assiduous in her attentions to her father. But not the less was there a feeling in the minds of those around her that some great change had come upon her. She would sit during the long summer evenings on a certain spot outside the parsonage orchard, at the top of a small sloping field in which their solitary cow was always pastured, with a book on her knees before her, but rarely reading. There she would sit, with the beautiful view down to the winding river below her, watching the setting sun, and thinking, thinking, thinking—thinking of something of which she had never spoken. Often would Miss Le Smyrger come upon her there, and sometimes would pass by her even without a word; but never—never once did she dare to ask her of the matter of her thoughts. But she knew the matter well enough. No confession was necessary to inform her that Patience Woolsworthy was in love with John Broughton—nay, in love, to the full and entire loss of her whole heart.

On one evening she was so sitting till the July sun had fallen and left behind itself for the night, when her father came upon her as he returned from one of his rambles on the moor. "Patty," he said, "you are always sitting there now. Is it not late? Will you not be cold?"

"No, papa," she said, "I shall not be cold."

"But you had better come to the house? I miss you when you come in so late that there's no time to say a word before we go to bed."

She got up and followed him into the parsonage, and when they were in the sitting-room together, and the door was closed, she came up to him and kissed him. "Papa," she said, "I would it make you very unhappy if I were to leave you?"

"Leave me!" he said, startled by the serious and almost solemn tone of her voice. "Do you mean for always?"

"If I were to marry, papa?"

"Oh, marry! No; that would not make me unhappy. I am very happy, Patty, that you to see you married to a man you would love—very, very happy; though my days would be desolate without you."

"That is it, papa. What would you do if I went from you?"

"What would it matter, Patty? I should be free, at any rate, from a load which often presses heavily on me now. What will you do when I shall leave you? But I am not going, and will be over with me. But who is it, love? Has any lady said any thing to you?"

"It was only a question, papa. I don't often think of such a thing; but I did think of it then." And so the subject was allowed to pass by. This had happened before the visit of the second arrival had been absolutely fixed and made known to Miss Woolsworthy.

And then that second arrival took place. The reader may have understood from the words with which Miss Le Smyrger authorized her nephew to make his second visit to Oxney Combe that Miss Woolsworthy's passion was not altogether unauthorized. Captain Broughton had been told that is was not to come unless he came with a certain purpose in his mind to be told, he still persisted in coming. There can be no doubt but that he well understood the purport to which his aunt alluded. "I am coming, of course," he had said. And true to his word, he was now there.

Patience knew exactly the hour at which he must arrive at the house of Miss Le Smyrger, and the time also which it would take to travel over those twelve up-hill miles from the station to Oxney Colne. She knew also that she paid no visit to Miss Le Smyrger's house on that afternoon; but she might have known something of Captain Broughton's movements from Woolsworthy Parsonage had she not altogether unauthorized. Captain Broughton had been told that is was not to come unless he came with a certain purpose in his mind to be told, he still persisted in coming. There can be no doubt but that he well understood the purport to which his aunt alluded. "I am coming, of course," he had said. And true to his word, he was now there.

Patience knew exactly the hour at which he must arrive at the house of Miss Le Smyrger, and the time also which it would take to travel over those twelve up-hill miles from the station to Oxney Colne. She knew also that she paid no visit to Miss Le Smyrger's house on that afternoon; but she might have known something of Captain Broughton's movements from Woolsworthy Parsonage had she not altogether unauthorized. The road to the Combe passed by the parsonage-gate, and had Patience sat even at her bedroom window she must have seen him. But on such an evening she would not sit at her bedroom window—she would do nothing which would force her to accuse herself of having watched for her lover's coming. It was for him to seek her. If he chose to do so, he knew the way to the parsonage.

Miss Le Smyrger was, I say, honest, hearty Miss Le Smyrger, was in a fever of anxiety on behalf of her friend.

"John," she said, as soon as the first greetings were over, "do you remember the last words that I said to you before you went away?" Now, for myself, I much doubt Miss Le Smyrger's happiness, but I do not think much of her discretion. It would have been better, perhaps, had she allowed things to take their course.

"I can't say that I do," said the Captain. At the same time the Captain did remember very well what those last words had been:

"I am a fool, Jack, I am so delighted to see you, if—if—if—" and then she paused, for with all her courage she hardly dared to ask her nephew whether he had come there with the express purport of asking Miss Woolsworthy to marry him.

To tell the truth—for there is no room for mystery within the limits of a short story—to tell, I say, at a word the plain and simple truth, Captain Broughton had already asked that question. On the day before he had done so, and he had in set terms proposed to the parson's daughter, and, indeed, the words, the hot and frequent words, which previously had fallen from his like sweetest honey into the ears of Patience Woolsworthy, had made it imperative on him to do so. When a man in such a plight comes to the house of a girl of love day after day, must not he talk of it to some definite purpose on the day on which he leaves her? Or if he be not so, he is not infinite to be regarded as false, selfish, and almost fraudulent? Captain Broughton, however, had asked the question honestly and truly. He had done so honestly and truly, but in words, perhaps, simple with a tone, that had hardly sufficed to satisfy the proud spirit of the girl he loved. She by that time had confessed to herself that she loved him with a true love, but she had made no such confession to him. To him she had spoken no word, granted no favor, thus far had been willing to go only so far as a token of love returned. She had listened to him as he spoke, and bade him keep such sayings for the drawing-rooms of the fashionable ladies. Then he had spoken out and had asked for that hand—not, perhaps, as a suitor tremulous with hope—but as a rich man who knows that he can command that which he desires to purchase.

"You should think more of this," she had said to him at last. "If you would really have me for your wife, it will not be much to you to return here again when time for thinking of it shall have passed by." With these words she had touched him, and now he had again come back to Oxney Colne. But still she would not place herself at the window to look for him, nor dress herself in other than her simple morning country dress, nor omit one item of her daily work. If he wished to take her at all, he should wish to take her as she really was, in her plain country life, but he should take her also with full observance of all those privileges which maidens are allowed to claim from their lovers. He should curtail no ceremonious observance because she was the daughter of a poor country parson who would come to him without a shilling, whereas he stood high in the world's books. He had asked her to give him all that she had, and that all she was ready to give without stint. But the gift must be valued before it could be given or received. He also was to give her as much, and she would accept of no less beyond her price. But she would not allow that that which was offered to her was in any degree the more precious because of his outward worldly standing.

She would not pretend to herself that she thought he would come to her that afternoon, and therefore she busied herself about the kitchen, and about the house, giving directions to her two maids as though the day would pass as all other days did pass in that household. They usually dined at four, and she rarely, in these summer months, went far from the house before that hour. At four precisely she sat down with her father, and then said that she was going up as far as Helpholme after dinner. Helpholme was a solitary farm-house in another parish, on the border of the moor, and Mr. Woolsworthy asked her whether he should accompany her.

"No, papa," she said, "if you are not too tired." And yet she had thought how probable it might be that she should meet John Broughton on her walk. And so it was managed; but, just as matter was over, Mr. Woolsworthy remembered himself.

"Gracious me," he said, "how my memory is going! Goodman from Lydridge, and old John Poulter, from Bovey, are coming to meet here by appointment. You can't put Helpholme off till to-morrow?"

Patience, however, never put off any thing, and therefore at six o'clock, when her father had finished his slender modicum of toddy, she tied on her hat and went on her walk. She started forth with a quick step, and left no word to say by which route she would go. As she passed up along the little lane which led toward Oxney Combe she would not even look to see if he was coming toward her; and when she left the road, passing over a stone stile into a field which cut off much through the upland fields, and then across the moor ground toward Helpholme, she did not look back once, or listen for his coming.

She paid her visit, remaining upward of an hour with the old bedridden mother of the farmer of Helpholme, who died since you, my friend," said the old lady as she left her; "and send you some one to make your own path bright and happy through the world." All these words were ringing in her ears with all their significance as she saw John Broughton waiting for her at the first stile which she had to pass after leaving the farmer's haggard.

"Patty," he said, as he took her hand, and held it close within both his own, "what a chase I have had after you!"

"And who asked you, Captain Broughton?" she answered, laughing. "If the journey was too much for your poor London strength, could you not have waited till to-morrow morning, when you would have found me at the parsonage?" But she did not draw her hand away from him, or in any way pretend that he had not a right to accost her as a lover.

"No; I could not wait. I am more eager to see those I love than you seem to be."

"How do you know whether I love, or how eager I might be to see them? There is an old woman there whom I love, and I have thought nothing of this walk with the object of seeing her." And now, slowly withdrawing her hand away from him, she pointed to the farm-house which she had left.

"Patty," he said, after a minute's pause, during which she had turned full into his face with all the force of her bright eyes; "I have come from London to day, straight down here to Oxney, and from my aunt's house I have come upon your father after you, to ask you that one question. Do you love me?"

"What a Herculean!" she said, again laughing. "Do you really mean that you left London only this morning? Why, you must have been five hours in a railway carriage and a post-chaise, not to talk of the walk afterward. You ought to take more care of yourself, Captain Broughton!"

He would have been angry with her—for he did not like to be quizzed—had she not put her hand on his arm as she spoke, and the tone of her face touch had redeemed the offense of her words.

"All that have I done," said he, "that I may hear one word from you."

"That any word of mine should have such potency! But let us walk on, or my father will take us for some of the standing stones of the moor. How have you found your aunt? If you only knew the cares that have sat on her dear shoulders for the last week past, in order that your high mightiness might have a sufficiency to eat in these desolate half-starved regions."

She might have saved herself such anxiety. No one can care less for such things than Ido."

"And yet I think I have heard you boast of the cook of your club." And then again there was silence for a minute or two.

"Patty," said he, stopping again in the path; "answer my question. I have a right to demand an answer. Do you love me?"

"And what if I do? What if I have been so silly as to allow your perfections to be too many for my weak heart? What then, Captain Broughton?"

"It can not be that you love me, or you would not joke now."

"Perhaps not, indeed," she said. It seemed as though she were resolved not to yield an inch in her own humor. And then again they walked on.

"Patty," he said, once more, "I shall get an answer from you to-night—this evening; now, during this walk; or I shall return to-morrow, and never revisit this spot again."

"Oh, Captain Broughton, how should we ever manage to live without you?"

"Very well," he said; "up to the end of this walk I am beat all to; and one word spoken then will mend it all."

During the whole of this time she felt that she was ill-using him. She knew that she loved him with all her heart; that it would nearly kill her to part with him; that she had nearly his renewed offer with an ecstasy of joy. She had acknowledged to herself that he was giving proof of his devotion as strong as any which a girl could receive from her lover. And yet she could hardly bring herself to say the word he longed to hear. That word once said, and then she knew that she must succumb to her love forever. That word once said, and then would be nothing for her but to spoil him with her idolatry. That word once said, and she must continue to repeat it to his ears till perhaps he might be tired of hearing it! And now he had threatened her, and how could she speak it after that? She certainly would not speak it when she ached her again without such a threat. And so they walked on again in silence.

"Patty," he said, at last, "by the heavens above us, you shall answer me. Do you love me?"

She now stood still, and almost trembled as she looked up into his face. She stood opposite to him for a moment, and then placing her two hands on his shoulders, she answered him—"Yes, I do, I do," she said, "with all my heart; with all my heart—with all my heart and strength." And then her head fell upon his breast.

Captain Broughton was almost as much surprised as delighted by the warmth of the acknowledgment which he got. He regarded the girl, indeed, as the girl whom he now held within his arms. She had said it now; the words had been spoken; and there was nothing for her but to swear to him over and over again with her sweetest oaths, that those words were true—true as her soul. And very sweet was the walk down from thence to the parsonage gate. He spoke as one of the distance of the ground, or the length of his day's journey. But he stopped her at every turn that he might press her arm the closer to his side, that he might look into the brightness of her eyes, and prolong his hour of delight. There were no more gibes now on her tongue, no affected airs, no little tricks at laughing comments on his coming and going. With downright honesty she told him every thing: how she had loved him before her heart was so warmed in such a passion; how, with much thinking, she had resolved that it would be unwise to take him at his first word, and had hoped to the last that he should return to London, and then think over it; how she had almost repented of her courage when she had left him during those long summer days, that he would forget her; and how her heart had leaped for joy when her old friend had told her that he was coming.

"And yet," said he, "you were not glad to see me!"

"Oh, was I not glad? You can not understand the feelings of a girl who has lived secluded as I have done. Glad is no word for the joy I felt. But it was not showing you that I cared for so much. It was the knowledge that you were near me once again. I almost wish now that I had not seen you till to-morrow." But as she spoke she pressed his arm, and this caress gave the lie to her last words.

"No; do not come in to-night," she said, when she reached the little wicket that led up to the parsonage. "Indeed you shall not. I could not behave myself properly if you did."

"But I don't want you to behave properly."

"Oh! I am to keep that for London, am I? But, nevertheless, Captain Broughton, I will not invite you either to tea or to supper to-night."

"Surely I may shake hands with your father."

"Not to-night—not till—. John, I may tell him, may I not?—I must tell him at once."

"Certainly," said he.

"And then you shall see him to-morrow. Let me see—at what hour shall I bid you come?"

"To breakfast."

"No, indeed. What on earth would your aunt do with the best turkey and the cold pie? I have got no cold pie for you."

"I hate cold pie."

"What a pity! But, John, I should be forced to leave you directly after breakfast. Come down—come down at two or three; and then I will go back with you. Aunt Penelope, I must see her to-morrow." And so at last the matter was settled, and the happy Captain, as he left her, was hardly resisted in his attempt to press her lips to his own.

When she entered the parlor in which her father was sitting there were with him Gribbles and Poulter discussing some knotty point of Devon law. So Patience took off her hat, and sat herself down, waiting till they should go. For full an hour she had to wait, and then Gribbles and Poulter did go. But it was not in such matters as this that Patience Woolsworthy was impatient. She could wait, and wait, and wait, curling hair for weeks and months, while the thing waited for was in her eyes good; but she could not curb her hot thoughts or her hot words, when things came to be discussed which she did not think to be good.

"Papa," she said, when Gribbles's long-drawn last word had been spoken at the door, "do you remember how I asked you the other day what you would say if I were to leave you?"

"Yes, surely," he replied, looking up at her in astonishment.

"I am going to leave you now," she said. "Dear, dearest father, how am I to go from you?"

"Going to leave me," said he, thinking of her visit to Hulpholme, and thinking of nothing else.

"Yes, dearest," she said; and as she spoke she now knelt at his knees. "I have been asked in marriage, and I have given myself away."

"Well, my love, if you will be happy—"

"I hope I shall; I think I shall. But you, papa?"

"You will not be far from us."

"Oh yes; in London."

"In London?"

"Captain Broughton lives in London generally."

"And has Captain Broughton asked you to marry him?"

"Yes, papa—who else? Is he not good? Will you not love him? Oh, papa, do not say that I should not love him!"

He embraced her, and told her, with all his enthusiasm, that he loved her joy, and would be happy in her happiness. "My own Patty," he said, "all I have ever known that you were too good for this life of ours here." And then the evening wore away into the night, with many tears but still with much happiness.

Captain Broughton, as he walked back to Oxney Combe, made up his mind that he would not say one word on the matter to his aunt till the next morning. He wanted to think over it all, and to think it over, if possible, by himself. He had taken a step in life, he must suppose, that a man is even called on to take, and he had to reflect whether or no he had taken it with wisdom.

"Have you seen Miss Le Smyrger, Miss Le Smyrger, very anxiously, when he came into the drawing-room.

"Miss Woolsworthy you mean," said he. "Yes, I've seen her. As I found her out I took a long walk and happened to meet her. Do you know, aunt, I think I'll go to bed. I'm tired, I do, I mean to be off early in the morning, and have been on the move ever since."

Miss Le Smyrger perceived that she was to hear nothing then of the matter that day, and so his dilestick and allowed him to go to his room.

But Captain Broughton did not immediately retire to bed, nor for a while to sit down in his chair at once. Had this step that he had taken been a wise one? He was not a man who, in worldly matters, had ever thought much of himself or others for him, as is the case with so many men. He had formed views for himself, and had a theory of life. Money for money's sake was a thing which he liked to be had. Money as a concomitant to things which were in themselves good he had declared to himself to be a good also. That enjoyment in this step of his marriage, he had now missed. Well, he had made up his mind to that, and would put up with the loss. He had means of living of his own, enough means we may say, when the whole is considered. That it would be well for him to become a married man, looking merely to that state of life as opposed to a bachelor's life, he fully resolved. On that point, therefore, there was nothing to repent. That Patty Woolsworthy was good, affectionate, clever, and pretty, he was sufficiently satisfied. It would be odd indeed if he were not so satisfied now, seeing that for the last four months he had been at work from early morning to late night in order to prove to that fair young lady that he was so with many inward asseverations. And yet, though he repeated now again that he was satisfied, I fear that he was so from no other satisfaction of it as he had been throughout the whole of those four months. It is sad to say so, but I fear—I fear that such was the case. When you have gained your thing how much of the anticipated pleasure vanishes, especially if it have been won easily!

So far he had got that night; when the morning came he went a step further, and began mentally to criticise her manner to himself. It had been very sweet, that manner, and in that ready declaration of love. Yes, it had been very sweet; but —but—when, after her little jokes, she did confess her love, had she not been a little too free for feminine exactitude? Had she not to be told that he is loved, but he hardly wishes that the girl he is to marry should fling herself at his head!

Ah me! yes; it would be well indeed to himself as on that morning he went through the arrangements of his toilet. "Then he was a brute," you say, my gentle reader. I don't think that he was not a brute. But this I remark, that many such brutes are to be met with in the beaten paths of this world's life. The lucky wife of many a country-bred girl had fallen at the first word from his mouth. Had she not so confessed to him? She was very nice—very nice indeed. He loved her dearly. But had he not sold himself too cheaply?

I by no means say that he was not a brute. But whether brute or no, he was an honest man, and had no remotest dream, either then, on that morning, or during the following days on which such thoughts presented themselves to his mind, of breaking away from his pledged word. At breakfast on that morning he told all to Miss Le Smyrger, and that lady, with warm and gracious attentions, confided to him her purpose regarding her property. "I have always regarded Patience as my heir," she said, "and shall do so still."

"Oh, indeed!" said Captain Broughton.

"But it is a great, great pleasure to me to think that she will give back the little property to my sister's child. You will have your mother's, and thus it will all come together again."

"Ah!" said Captain Broughton. He had his own ideas about money, and did not, even under existing circumstances, like to hear that his aunt considered herself at liberty to leave the acres away to one who was by blood quite a stranger to the family.

"Does Patience know of this?" he asked.

"Not a word, my dear Smyrger. And then nothing more was said upon the subject.

On that afternoon he went down and received the parson's benediction and congratulations with a good grace. Patience said very little on the occasion, and indeed was absent during the greater part of the interview. The two lovers then walked up to Oxney Combe, and there were more benedictions and more congratulations. "All went merry as a marriage bell," at any rate as far as Patience was concerned. Not a word had yet fallen from that dear mouth, not a look had yet come over that handsome face, which tended in any way to mar her bliss. Her first day of acknowledged love was a day altogether happy, and when she prayed for him as she knelt beside her bed there was no feeling in her mind that any fear need disturb her joy.

I will pass over the next three or four days very quickly, merely saying that Patience did not find them so pleasant as that first day after her engagement. There was something in her lover's manner —something which at first she could not define—which by degrees seemed to grate against her feelings. He was sufficiently affectionate, that being a matter on which she did not require much demonstration; but joined to his affection there seemed to be—she hardly liked to suggest to herself a harsh word, but could it be possible that he was beginning to think that she was not good enough for him? And then she asked herself the question —was she good enough for him? If there were doubt about that, the match should be broken off, though she knew that it went out in the struggle. The truth, however, was this—that he had begun that teaching which he had already found to be so unnecessary. Now, had any one conveyed to Such Patience German or even mathematics, with that young lady's free consent, I believe that she would have been found a meek scholar. But it was not probable that she would be meek when she found a self-appointed tutor teaching her manners and conduct without her consent.

So matters went for four or five days, and on the evening of the fifth day Captain Broughton and his aunt drank tea at the parsonage. Nothing very especial occurred; but on the parson and Miss Le Smyrger insisted on playing backgammon with devoted perseverance during the whole evening. Broughton had a good deal to say to Patience—a word or two about those changes in his lady love which a life in London would require; and some word he said also —some ugly word—about the shorter and easier life to which he would exalt his bride. Patience bore it—for her father and Miss Le Smyrger were in the room—and made no speaking no syllable of anger, and enduring, for the moment, the implied scorn of the old parsonage. Then the evening broke up, and Captain Broughton walked back to Oxney Combe with his aunt.

"Patty," her father said to her before they went to bed, "it seems to me to be a most excellent young man."

"Dear papa," she answered, kissing him.

"And terribly deep in love," said Mr. Woolsworthy.

"Oh, I don't know about that," she answered, as she left him, with her sweetest smile. But though she could laugh at her father's joke, she had already made up her mind that there was still something to be learned as to her promised husband before she could allow herself altogether to his hands. She would ask him whether he thought himself liable to injury from this proposed settlement of her property. She would deny any such thought, she would know from the manner of his denial what his true feelings were.

And he, too, was thinking during his silent walk with Miss Le Smyrger, had entertained some similar thoughts. "I fear she is obstinate," he had said to himself, when he had half accused her of being sulley also. "If that be her temper, what a life of misery I have before me!"

"Aunt Penelope," he said, as they sat in the drawing-room after dinner, "I'm in a scrape."

"No, not yet: I don't know whether it will suit me to find myself in one."

"Why, it was but the other day you were in such a hurry."

"As you—I have thought better about it since then."

"I should have imagined that this would depend on what Patty thinks," said Miss Le Smyrger, standing up for her favorite sex. "It is presumed that the gentleman is always ready as soon as the lady will consent."

"Yes, that is reasonable enough; and I'm glad it taken out of her own sphere—"

"Her own sphere! Let me caution you, Master John, not to talk of Patience under her own sphere."

"Aunt Penelope, as Patience is to be my wife and not yours, I must claim permission to speak of her on such subjects as seem suitable to me." And then they parted—not in the best humor with each other.

On the following day Captain Broughton and Miss Woolsworthy did not meet till the evening. She had said, before those few ill-omened words had passed between her and her lover, that she would probably be at Miss Le Smyrger's house in the following morning. Those ill-omened words did pass, but she had not gone. Captain Broughton, therefore, did not come from sullenness, nor even from anger, but from a conviction that it would be well that she should think over those she met him again. Nor was he anxious to hurry a meeting. His thought—his base thought—was this: that she would be sure to come up to the Combe after him; but she did not come, and therefore in the evening he went down to her, and asked her to walk with him.

They went away by the path that led to Helpholme, and little was said between them till they had walked some mile together. Patience, as she went along, felt herself determined almost to the latter the sweet words which had greeted her ears as she came down that way with him on the night of his arrival, but she discovered nothing of that sweetness then. Had he not made an ass of himself during these last six months? That was the thought which very much had possession of his mind.

"Patience," he said at last, having hitherto spoken only an indifferent word now and again since they had left the parsonage, "Patience, I hope you realize the importance of the step which you and I are about to take?"

"Of course I do," she answered: "what an odd question that is for you to ask!"

"Because," said he, "sometimes I almost doubt it. It seems to me as though you thought you could remove yourself from her into your new home with no more trouble than when you go from home up to the Combe."

"Is that meant for a reproach, John?"

"No, not for a reproach, but for advice. Certainly not for a reproach."

"I am glad of that."

"But I should wish to make you think how great is the leap in the world which you are about to take." Then again they walked on for many steps before she answered him.

"Tell me, then, John," she said, when she had sufficiently considered what words she would speak; and as she spoke a dark bright color suffused her face, and her eyes flashed almost with anger. "What leap do you mean? Do you mean a leap upward?"

"Well, yes; I hope it will be so."

"In one sense, certainly, it would be a leap upward. I, the wife of the man I loved; to have the privilege of holding his happiness in my hand; to know that I was his own—the companion whom he had chosen out of all the world—that would, indeed, be a leap upward; a leap almost to Heaven, if all that were so. But if you mean upward in other sense—"

"I was thinking of the social scale."

"Then, Captain Broughton, your thoughts were doing me dishonor."

"Doing you dishonor!"

"Yes, doing me dishonor. That your father is, in the world's estimation, a greater man than mine is doubtless true enough. That you, as a man, are richer than I am as a woman is doubtless also true. But you dishonor me, and ourselves also, if these things can weigh with you now."

"Patience—I think you can hardly know what words you are addressing to me."

"Pardon me, but I think I do. Nothing that you can give me—no gifts of that description—can weigh much in the balance with me. I am giving you. If you had all the wealth and rank of the greatest lord in the land, it would count as nothing in such a match as this. I have not doubted—if in return for my heart you have given me yours, then—then —then you have paid me fully. But when gifts such as those are going, nothing else can count even as a make-weight."

"I do not quite understand you," he answered, after a pause. "I fear you are a little high-flown."

And then, while the evening was still young, they walked back to the parsonage almost without another word.

Captain Broughton at this time had only one more full day to remain at Oxney Colne. On the afternoon following that he was to go as far as Exeter, and thence direct to London. Before it was to be expected that the wedding-day would be fixed before he went, and much had been said about it during the last day or two of his engagement. Then he had pressed for an early time, and Patience, with a girl's usual diffidence, had asked for some little delay. But now they had come to the last day, and how was it probable that such a matter could be settled after such a conversation as that? Nothing had been related this evening. Miss Le Smyrger asked whether the day had been fixed.

"No," said Captain Broughton, harshly; "nothing has been fixed." And then he left the arranged before you go."

"Probably not," he said; and then the subject was dropped for the time.

"John," she said, just before she went to bed, "if there be any thing wrong between you and Patience, I conjure you to tell me."

"You had better ask her," he replied. "I can tell you nothing."

On the following morning he was much surprised by seeing Patience on the gravel path before Miss Le Smyrger's window. She immediately after breakfast. He went to the door to open it for her, and she, as she gave him her hand, told him that she came up to speak to him. There was no heaviness in her manner, nor any look of anger in her face. But there was in her gait and form, in her voice and countenance, a sternness of purpose which he had never seen before, or at any rate had never acknowledged.

"Could you," said he. "Shall I come out with you, or will you come up stairs?"

"We can sit down in the summer-house," she said; and direct they went both very direct.

"Captain Broughton," she said—and she began her task the moment that they were both seated—"you and I have engaged ourselves as man and wife, but perhaps we have been over-rash."

"How so?" said he.

"It may be so, indeed I will say more—it is the case that we have made this engagement without knowing enough of each other's character."

"I have known you well from you," he said.

"The time will perhaps come when you will so think, but for the sake of all that we must value, it is come before it is too late. What would be our fate—how terrible would be our misery, if such a thought should come to either of us after we have linked our lots together!"

There was a misanxiety about her as she thus spoke which almost repressed him—which for a time did prevent him from taking that tone of anger and theory with each a subject he would choose to adopt. But he recovered himself. "I hardly think that this comes well from you," he said.

"From whom else should it come? Who else can fight that battle for me; and, John, who else can fight that same battle on your behalf? I tell you this, with pretty nearly my latest breath let me as it does stand at present, you could not give me your hand at the altar with true words and a happy conscience. It is not true? You have half repented of your bargain already. Is it not so?"

He did not answer her; but getting up from his seat walked to the front of the summer-house, and stood there with his back turned upon her. It was not that he meant to be ungracious, but in truth he did not know how to answer her. He had half repented of his bargain.

"John," she said, getting up and following him so that she could put her hand upon his arm, "I have been very angry with you."

"Angry with me!" he said, turning sharp upon her.

"Yes, angry with you. You would have treated me like a child. But that feeling has gone now. I am not angry now. There is my hand; the hand of a friend. Let the words that have been spoken between us be as though they had not been spoken. Let us both be free."

"Do you mean it?" he asked.

"Certainly I mean it." As she spoke these words her eyes were filled with tears in spite of all the efforts she could make to restrain them; but he was not looking at her, and her efforts had sufficed to prevent any sob from being audible.

"With all my heart," he said; and it was manifest from the tone that he had no thought of her happiness as he spoke. It was true that she had been angry with him—angry, as she had herself declared; but nevertheless, in what she had said and what she had done she had thought more of his happiness than of her own.

Now she was angry over again.

"With all your heart, Captain Broughton! Well, so be it. If with all your heart, then is the necessity so much the greater. You go to-morrow. Shall we say farewell now?"

"Patience, I am not going to be lectured."

"Certainly not by me. Shall we say farewell now?"

"Yes, if you are determined."

"I am determined. Farewell, Captain Broughton. You have all my wishes for your happiness." And she held out her hand to him.

"Patience!" he said. And he looked at her with a dark frown, as though he would strive to frighten her into submission. If so, he might have saved himself any such attempt.

"Farewell, Captain Broughton. Give me your hand, for I can not stay." He gave her his hand, hardly knowing why he did so. She lifted it to her lips and kissed it, and then, leaving him, passed from the summer-house down through the wicket-gate, and straight home to the parsonage.

During the whole of that day she said no word to any one of what had occurred. When she was once more at home she went about her household affairs as she had done on that day of his arrival. When she sat down to dinner with her father he observed nothing to make him think that she was unhappy; nor during the evening was there any expression in her face, or any tone in her voice, which excited his attention. On the following morning Captain Broughton called at the parsonage, and the servant-girl brought word to her mistress that he was in the parlor. But she would not see him. "Laws, miss, you ain't a quarrelled with your beau?" the poor girl said. "No, not quarrelled," she said; "but give him that." It was a scrap of paper containing a word or two in pencil. "It is better that we should not meet again. God bless you!" And from that day to this, now more than ten years, they never have met.

"Papa," she said to her father that afternoon, "dear papa, do not be angry with me. It is all over between me and John Broughton. Dearest, you and I will not be separated."

It would be useless here to tell how great was the old man's surprise, and how true his sorrow. As the tale was told to him no cause was given for anger with any one. Not a word was spoken against the suitor, who had on that day returned to London with a full conviction that now at least he was relieved from his engagement. "Patty, my darling child," he said, "may God grant that it be for the best!"

"It is for the best," she answered, stoutly. "For this place I am fit; and I much doubt whether I am fit for any other."

On that day she did not see Miss Le Smyrger, but on the following morning, knowing that Captain Broughton had gone off—having heard the wheels of the carriage as they passed by the parsonage gate on his way to the station—she walked up to the Combe.

"He has told you, I suppose?" said she.

"Yes," said Miss Le Smyrger. "And I will never be him again unless he asks your pardon on his knees. I have told him so. I would not even give him my hand as he went."

"But why so, thou kindest one? The fault was mine more than his."

"I understand. I have eyes in my head," said the old maid. "I have watched him for the last four or five days. If you could have kept the truth to yourself and bade him keep off from you, he would have been at your feet now, licking the dust from your shoes."

"But, dear friend, I do not want a man to lick dust from my shoes."

"Ah, you are a fool. You do not know the value of your own wealth."

"True; I have been a fool. I was a fool to think that one coming from such a life as he has led could be happy with such as I am. I know the truth now. I have bought the lesson dearly, but perhaps not too dearly, seeing that it will never be forgotten."

There was but little more said about the matter between our three friends at Oxney Colne. What, indeed, could be said? Miss Le Smyrger for a year or two still expected that her nephew would return and claim his bride; but he has never done so, nor has there been any correspondence between them.

Patience Woolsworthy had learned her lesson dearly. She had given her whole heart to the man; and, though she so bore herself that no one was aware of the violence of the struggle, nevertheless the struggle within her bosom was very violent. She never told herself that she had done wrong; she never regretted her loss; but yet—yet!—the loss was very hard to bear. He also had loved her, but he was not capable of a love which could do much injury to his daily peace. The daily peace was gone for many a day to come.

Her father is still living; but there is a curate now in the parish. In conjunction with him and with Miss Le Smyrger she spends her time in the concerns of the parish. In her own eyes she is a confirmed old maid; and such is my opinion also. The romance of her life was played out in that summer.

Patience never sits now lonely on the hill-side thinking how much she might do for one whom she really loved. But with a large heart she loves many, and, with no romance, she works hard to lighten the burdens of those she loves.

As for Captain Broughton, all the world knows that he did marry that great heiress with whom his name was once before connected, and that he is now a useful member of Parliament, working on committees three or four days a week with a zeal that is indefatigable. Sometimes, not often, as he thinks of Patience Woolsworthy a smile comes across his face.

GENERAL SAM HOUSTON.

THE accompanying portrait of General SAM HOUSTON, Governor of Texas, will be recognized by all who know the old hero. Even those who remember him as he was two years ago, when he wore a heavy mustache, will readily recall the noble brow and the fierce eye.

Probably no man in this country has led so adventurous a life as Sam Houston. Born, sixty-eight years ago, in Rockbridge County, Virginia, he lost his father when very young, and removed with his mother to the confines of the forest in Tennessee. Here he grew up as best he could, associating much with Indians and imbibing a fondness for their rude mode of life. As he reached manhood he tried to earn a living as a schoolmaster, and then as a clerk in a country store. But neither pursuit pleased his fancy, and in 1813, when General Jackson called for volunteers to fight the Creeks, Sam Houston responded to the call. He won credit during the campaign; when it ended, he had risen to the rank of lieutenant. But as there was no more fighting to be done then, he laid down the sword, studied law at Nashville, and soon rose to be a prominent lawyer and politician. In 1823, he went to Congress from his district in Tennessee; in 1827, he was elected Governor. In 1829, a fit of restlessness seized him. He resigned his post as Governor; tried life a while in Arkansas, where the frauds practiced by the Government Agents upon the Indians disgusted him; went to Washington, to endeavor to have his red friends righted, and found himself involved in no end of lawsuits with the rogues whom he sought to expose; became a good deal disgusted with every thing and every body, and finally migrated to Texas.

Texas was then about to be admitted as a State of the Mexican Union. It was in a miserable condition. Its people comprised among them the worst vagabonds and scoundrels in the world. When a man was so infamous and hopeless that he could not ship on board a whaler, he went to Texas. There was no money in the country, no trade, no industry, very little judicious agriculture. The whole State was overrun by wild bands of Indians, Comanches, Apaches, etc., who regarded the white man as an invader and robber, and shot him wherever they could. This was the condition of Texas when the people met, adopted a Constitution, and asked admission to the Mexican Confederacy—the American Sam Houston being elected as their first Governor.

Santa Ana refused, Texas declared its independence, and war was begun. The Texans organized a militia, and elected General Austin Commander-in-Chief. Austin gave way to Houston, and after a brief campaign he met Santa Ana at San Jacinto, in April, 1836, and totally routed him. The Mexican President was taken prisoner, and in the agony of defeat was forced to acknowledge the independence of Texas.

GENERAL SAM HOUSTON, GOVERNOR OF TEXAS.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

For eight years, during which General Houston was twice President, Texas was an independent nation. But its independence was intolerable. There was still no money, no credit, no commerce, no industry, no peace, no safety in the country. There was no means to pay the interest on the bonds issued by the Texan Government for the war of independence. Wars with the Indians never came to an end. Foreign nations treated the new State with contempt. Desperadoes only sought it as a home. These miseries becoming at length too grievous to be borne, the leading men of Texas, with General Houston at their head, sought admission to the Union, and after a long struggle carried their point. The last act of President Tyler's career as President was to sign an Act admitting Texas to the Union. This Act bound the United States to pay the Texan debt—some $10,000,000; to keep the Indians in check, at a cost of some $2,500,000 annually; and to take the further measures which brought on the Mexican war. In return, Texas agreed to enter the Union as an independent State, with the reservation, however—which was not suspected at the time—that she would secede when she pleased.

In the year 1844, when Texas was admitted, General Houston was chosen to the United States Senate. He held his seat in that body some fifteen years, and was always a useful member, not given to long speeches, and scrupulously tender of his colleagues' feelings.

Two years ago he was elected Governor of Texas. He fills the post still; and, if the newspaper reports are to be credited, he is by no means the facile tool of the disunionist Convention which seems to have been expected. An irrepressible conflict between him and the secessionists seems to be impending; if it comes on, we may rely upon it Governor Houston will give a good account of himself.

Governor Houston is a man of very simple habits and genial manners. He eats no flesh and drinks no wine. His ordinary dinner is a plate of oranges or other fruit, and a glass of milk. One of his many peculiarities, which used to form the subject of conversation at Washington, was his habit of whittling. When he took his seat in the Senate, a page always appeared bearing a faggot of small pine sticks, which he laid respectfully beside the hero of San Jacinto. One of these the Senator soon seized, and began unconsciously to whittle. If the debate was dull the Senatorial knife traveled slowly, and exquisite little images were carved out of the stick to serve as mementoes to lady friends. If, on the contrary, the debate waxed warm, the knife worked nervously and quickly, and stick after stick fell in their shavings around the desk, until the whole fagot disappeared.

Very few Senators were so personally popular at Washington as Senator Houston.

THE BIGGEST GUN IN THE WORLD.

We publish on page 205 an accurate drawing of the great Fifteen-inch Gun at Fort Monroe, Virginia; and also a picture, from a recent sketch, showing the experiments which are being made with a view to test it. It is proper that we should say that the small drawing of the lithographic stone which is published in MAJOR BARNARD'S "Notes on Sea-Coast Defense," published by Mr. D. Van Nostrand, of this city.

This gun was cast at Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, by Knapp, Rudd, & Co., under the directions of Captain T. J. Rodman, of the Ordnance Corps. Its dimensions are as follows:

Total length	190	inches.
Length of caliber of bore	156	"
Length of ellipsoidal chamber	9	"
Total length of bore	165	"
Maximum exterior diameter	48	"

Distance between rimbases	48	inches.
Diameter at muzzle	15	"
Thickness of metal behind the chamber	19	"
Thickness at junction of bore with chamber	16½	"
Thickness at muzzle	9	"
Weight of gun	49,100

This gun is usually loaded with 35 pounds of large-grained powder, which projects shells of 205 to 335 pounds weight. A solid shot for a gun of this size would weigh 425 pounds. The following table will show the range of the gun with the shells above-mentioned, at various elevations:

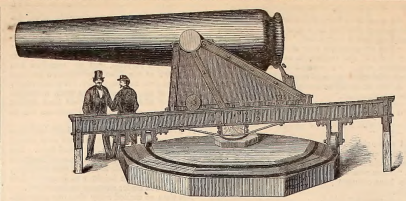
At 6° elevation (and 35 pounds powder), 2017, 1937, 1902, 1893, and 1873 yards.
At 19° elevation (and 40 pounds powder), 2700, 2900, 2754, and 2760 yards.
At 28° 15' elevation (and 60 pounds powder), 3238, 4050, and 5375 yards.

Major Barnard thinks that at 30° elevation, and 40 pounds powder, a range considerably beyond 4 miles might be attained.

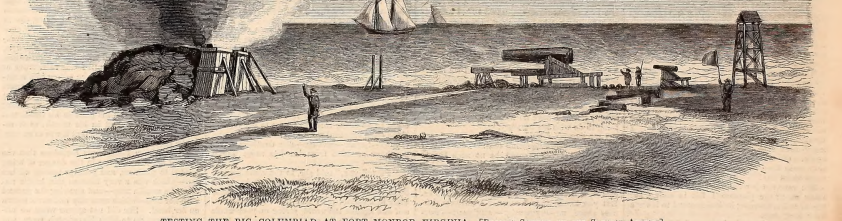
The events of the past few weeks have unfortunately directed no small share of public attention to the subject of coast defenses, and Major Barnard's able refutation of Sir Howard Douglas's fallacies in relation to land fortifications have been much discussed. The state of the controversy may be briefly summed up. The Crimean War proved the worthlessness of wooden ships as opposed to land-batteries, when properly manned and worked. Accordingly, at the conclusion of that war, fighting nations began to think of arming their vessels of war with iron plates: the result of that movement is to be seen in the new iron-clad ships Warrior and La Gloire, of which we published engravings in a recent number. It is demonstrated that the old cannon carrying 24-pound, 32-pound, and 42-pound balls and shells produce no impression upon vessels of this class. But it is also admitted that even such iron-clad vessels as La Gloire and the Warrior could not withstand shots fired from 10, 11, and 15 inch guns. Hence it follows that, if our forts are to be placed in a condition to resist the assault of iron-clad ships, they must be armed with cannon of the class which we now illustrate. To convince the public of this truth has been a constant effort with such distinguished soldiers as Major Barnard.

One difficulty with regard to big guns has arisen from the fact that guns beyond a certain calibre (found by experience to be 10 inches) are deficient in strength when cast in the usual way —viz., in one single piece, and afterward bored out. This difficulty was obviated by Captain Rodman, in the case of the 15-inch Columbiad at Fort Monroe, by casting the gun hollow, and cooling it from the interior by introducing a stream of water into the core. In England, the new guns of great calibre are cast in several pieces.

It is to be hoped that no time will be lost by our Government in acting upon the successful experiments of the past, and in providing our forts with guns which can overmatch the iron plates of the navies of foreign nations.



THE FIFTEEN-INCH COLUMBIAD.



TESTING THE BIG COLUMBIAD AT FORT MONROE, VIRGINIA.—[FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.]

GREAT EXPECTATIONS.

A NOVEL.

By CHARLES DICKENS.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

BETIMES in the morning I was up and out. It was too early yet to go to Miss Havisham's, so I loitered into the country on Miss Havisham's side of town—which was not Joe's side; I could go there to-morrow—thinking about my patroness, and painting brilliant pictures of her plans for me.

She had adopted Estella, she had as good as adopted me, and it could not fail to be her intention to bring us together. She reserved it for me to restores the desolate house, admit the sunshine into the dark rooms, set the clocks a going and the cold hearths a blazing, tear down the cobwebs, destroy the vermin—in short, do all the shining deeds of the young Knight of romance, and marry the Princess. I had stopped to look at the house as I passed; and its seared red brick walls, blocked windows, and strong green ivy clasping even the stacks of chimneys with its twigs and tendons, as if with sinewy old arms, had made up a rich attractive mystery, of which I was the hero. Estella was the inspiration of it, and the heart of it, of course. But though she had taken such strong possession of me, though my fancy and my hope were so set upon her, though her influence on my boyish life and character had been all-powerful, I did not, even that romantic morning, invest her with any attributes save those she possessed. I mention this in this place, of a fixed purpose, because it is the clew by which I am to be followed into my poor labyrinth, such as it is. According to my experience, the conventional notion of a lover can not be always true. The unqualified truth is, that when I loved Estella with the love of a man, I loved her because I found her irresistible. Once for all; I knew to my sorrow, often and often, if not always, that I loved her against reason, against promise, against peace, against hope, against happiness, against all discouragement that could be. Once for all; I loved her none the less because I knew it, and it had no more influence in restraining me than if I had devoutly and conventionally believed her to be human perfection.

I so shaped out my walk as to arrive at the gate at my old time. When I had rung at the bell with an unsteady hand I turned my back upon the gate, while I tried to get my breath and keep the beating of my heart moderately quiet. I heard the side-door open and steps come across the court-yard; but I pretended not to hear, even when the gate swung on its rusty hinges.

Being at last touched on the shoulder, I started and turned. I started much more naturally then to find myself confronted by a man in a sober gray dress. The last man I should have expected to see in that place of porter at Miss Havisham's door.

"Orlick!"

"Ah, young master, there's more changes than yours. But come in, come in. It's opposed to my orders to hold the gate open."

I entered and he swung it, and locked it, and took the key out. "You!" said he, facing round, after doggedly preceding me a few steps toward the house. "Here I am!"

"How did you come here?"

"I come here," he retorted, "on my legs. I had my box brought alongside me in a barrow."

"Are you here for good?"

"I ain't here for harm, young master, I suppose?"

I was not so sure of that. I had leisure to entertain the retort in my mind, while he slowly lifted his heavy glance from the pavement, up my legs and arms, to my face.

"Then you have left the forge?" I said.

"Do this look like a forge?" replied Orlick, sending his glance all round him with an air of injury. "Now, do it look like it?"

I asked him how long he had left Gargery's forge?

"One day is so like another here," he replied, "that I don't know without casting it up. However, I come here some time since you left."

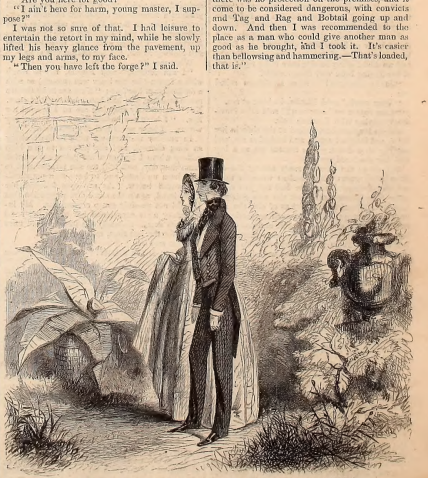
"I could have told you that, Orlick."

"Ah!" said he, dryly. "But then you've got to be a scholar."

By this time we had come to the house where I found his room to be one just within the side-door, with a little window in it looking on the court-yard. In its small proportions it was not unlike the kind of place usually assigned to a gate-porter in Paris. Certain keys were hanging on the wall, to which he now added the gate key, and his patchwork-covered bed was in a little inner division or recess. The whole had a slovenly, confined, and sleepy look, like a cage for a human dormouse: while he, looming dark and heavy in the shadow of a corner by the window, looked like the human dormouse for whom it was fitted up—as indeed he was.

"I never saw this room before," I remarked; "but there used to be no Porter here."

"No," said he; "not till it got about that there was no protection on the premises, and it come to be considered dangerous, with convicts and Tag and Rag and Bobtail going up and down. And then I was recommended to the place as a man who could give another man as good as he brought, and I took it. It's easier than hollowing and hammering.—That's loaded, that is."



"WE WALKED ROUND THE GARDEN TWICE OR THRICE MORE," ETC.

My eye had been caught by a gun with a brass-bound stock over the chimney-piece, and his eye had followed mine.

"Well," said I, not desirous of more conversation, "shall I go up to Miss Havisham?"

"Burn me if I know!" he retorted, first stretching himself and then shaking himself; "my orders ends here, young master. I give this here bell a rap with this here hammer, and you go on along the passage till you meet somebody."

"I am expected, I believe?"

"Burn me twice over if I can say!" said he.

Upon that I turned down the long passage which I had first trodden in my thick boots, and he made his bell sound. At the end of the passage, while the bell was still reverberating, I found Sarah Pocket, who appeared to have now become constitutionally green and yellow by reason of me.

"Oh!" said she. "You, is it, Mr. Pip?"

"It is, Miss Pocket. I am glad to tell you that Mr. Pocket and family are all well."

In my conscience I doubt very much with a dismal shake of the head; "they had better be wiser than well. Ah, Matthew, Matthew! You know your way, Sir?"

Tolerably, for I had gone up the staircase in the dark many a time. I ascended it now, in lighter boots than of yore, and tapped on my old way at the door of Miss Havisham's room.

"Pip's rap," I heard her say, immediately; "come in, Pip."

She was in her chair near the old table, in the old dress, with her two hands crossed on her stick, her chin resting on them, and her eyes on the fire. Sitting near her, with the white shoe that had never been worn in her hand, and her head bent as she looked at it, was an elegant lady whom I had never seen.

"Come in, Pip." Miss Havisham continued to mutter, without looking round or up; "come in, Pip; how do you do, Pip? Don't kiss my hand as if I were a queen, eh?—Well?"

She looked up at me suddenly, only moving her eyes, and repeated, in a grimly playful manner,

"Well?"

"I heard, Miss Havisham," said I, rather at a loss, "that you were so kind as to wish me to come and see you, and I came directly."

"Well?"

The lady whom I had never seen before lifted up her eyes and looked archly at me, and then I saw that the eyes were Estella's eyes. But she was not changed, unless to be more beautiful, so much more womanly, in all things winning admiration had made such wonderful advance that I seemed to have made none. I fancied, as I looked at her, that I slipped hopelessly back into the coarse and common boy again. Oh the sense of distance and disparity that came upon me, and the impossibility that came about her!

She gave me her hand. I stammered something about pleasure I felt in seeing her again, and my having looked forward to it for a long, long time.

"Do you find her much changed, Pip?" asked Miss Havisham with her greedy look, and stirring her stick upon a chair that stood between them, as a sign to me to sit down there.

"When I came in, Miss Havisham, I thought there was nothing of Estella in the face or figure; but now it all settles down so curiously into the old—"

"What? You are not going to say, into the old Estella?" Miss Havisham interrupted. "She was proud and insulting, and you wanted to go away from her. Don't you remember?"

I said, confusedly, that that was long ago, and that I knew no better then, and the like. Estella smiled with perfect composure, and said she had no doubt of my having been quite right, and of her having been very disagreeable.

"Is he changed?" Miss Havisham asked her.

"Very much," said Estella, looking at me.

"Less coarse and common?" said Miss Havisham, playing with Estella's hair.

Estella laughed, and looked at the shoe in her hand, and laughed again, and looked at me, and put the shoe down. She treated me as a boy still, but she had set me on.

We sat in the dreamy room among the old strange influences which had so wrought upon me, and I thought that she had but just come home from France, and that she was going to London. Proud and willful as of old, she had brought those qualities into such subjection to her beauty that it was impossible and out of nature—or I thought so—to separate them from her beauty. Exactly if it was impossible to dissociate her presence from all those wretched hankerings after money and gentility that had disturbed me, so exactly—from all those ill-regulated aspirations that had first made me ashamed of home and Joe—from all those visions that had raised her, the elusive, glowing fire, struck it out of the iron on the anvil, extracted it from the darkness of night to look in at the wooden window of the forge and flit away." In a word, it was impossible for me to separate her, in the past or in the present, from the innermost life of my life.

It was settled that I should stay there all the rest of the day, and return to the hotel at night, and to London to-morrow. When we had conversed for a while, Miss Havisham sent us two out to walk in the neglected garden; on our coming in by-and-by, she said I should wheel her about a little as in times of yore.

So Estella and I went out into the garden by the gate through which I had strayed to my encounter with the pale young gentleman, now Herbert; I, trembling in spirit and worshiping the very hem of her dress; she, quite composed and most decidedly not worshiping the hem of mine. As we drew near to the place of encounter, she stopped and said:

"I must have been a singular little creature to hide and see that fight that day: but I did, and I enjoyed it very much."

"You rewarded me very much."

"Did I?" she replied, in an incidental and forgetful way. "I remember I entertained a great objection to your adversary, because I took it ill that he should be brought here to pester me with his company."

"We are great friends now," said I.

"Are you?" I think I recollect though, that you read with his father?"

"Yes."

I made the admission with reluctance, for it seemed to have a boyish look, and she already treated me more than enough like a boy.

"Since your change of fortune and prospects you have changed your companion," said Estella.

"Naturally," said I.

"And necessarily," she added, in a haughty tone; "what was fit company for you once would be quite unfit company for you now."

In my consciousness I doubted very much whether I had any lingering intention left of going to see Joe; but if I had, this observation put it to flight.

"You had no idea of your impending good fortune in those times?" said Estella, with a slight wave of her hand, signifying in the lighting times.

"Not the least."

The air of complacence and superiority with which she walked at my side, and the air of youthfulness and deference with which I walked at hers, made a contrast not to be missed. If I would have rankled in me more than it did, if I had not regarded myself as eliciting it by being so set apart for her enhancement of value.

The garden was too overgrown and rank for walking in with ease, and after we had made the round of it twice or thrice we came out again into the brewery-yard. I showed her where a cavity where I had seen her walking on the casks, that first old day, and she said, with a cold and careless look in that direction, "Did I?" Reminded her where she had come out of the house and given me my meat and drink, and she said, "I don't remember." Not remembering that you made me cry?" said I. "No," said she, and shook her head and looked about her. I verily believe that her not remembering me was mounting in the least, made me cry again inwardly—and that is the sharpest crying of all.

"You must know," said Estella, condescending to me as a brilliant and beautiful woman might, "that I have no heart—if that has any thing to do with my memory."

I got through some jargon to the effect that I took the liberty of doubting that. That I knew better. That there could be no such beauty without it.

"Oh! I have a heart to be stabbed in or shot in, I have no doubt," said Estella, "and, of course if it could not, it should cease to be. But you know what I mean. I have no softness there, no—sympathy—sentiment—nonsense."

What was it that was borne in upon my mind when she stood still and looked attentively at me? Any thing that had been in Miss Havisham? No. In some of her looks and gestures there was that tinge of resemblance to Miss Havisham which may often be noticed to have been acquired by children from grown persons with whom they have been much associated and secluded, and which, when it is first traced, will produce a remarkable occasional likeness of expression between faces that are otherwise quite different. And yet it was not anything in Miss Havisham. I looked again, and though she was still looking at me, the suggestion was gone.

What was it?

"I am serious," said Estella, not so much with a frown (for her brow was smooth) as with a darkening of her face; "if you don't know, you cannot think me worth your notice, but I believe it at once. No!" imperiously stopping me as I opened my lips. "I have not bestowed my tenderness any where. I have not even passed my eyes followed her white hand, again the same dim suggestion that I could not possibly grasp crossed me. My involuntary start occasioned her eyes to be fixed upon my arm. Instantly the ghost passed once more, for the last time, and was gone.

What was it?

"What is the matter?" said Estella; "are you scared again?"

"I should be, if I believed what you said just now." I replied, to turn it off.

"Then you don't? Very well. It is said, and say rate. My intercourse with you, which began very soon after you came to my old post, though I think that might be laid aside now, with other old belongings. Let us make one more round of the garden, and then I must go." Upon that we did shed tears for my cruelty to-day; you shall be my Page, and give me your shoulder."

Her handsome dress had trailed upon the ground. She held it in one hand now, and with the other lightly touched my shoulder as we walked. We walked round the garden twice or thrice more, and it was all in bloom for me. If the green and yellow growth of weed in the chinks of the old wall had been the most precious flowers that ever blew, it could not have been more cherished in my remembrance.

There was no discrepancy of years between us to remove her far from me; we were of nearly the same age, though of course the age told for more in her case than in mine; but the air of inaccessibility which her beauty and her manner gave her, tormented me in the midst of my delight, and lay in the height of the argument. I felt that our patroness had chosen us for one another.

Wrotched boy!

At last we went back into the house, and there I heard, with surprise, that my guardian had come down to see Miss Havisham on business and would come back to dinner. The old wintry branches of chandeliers, in the room where the mouldering table was spread, had been lighted while we were out, and Miss Havisham was in her chair and waiting for me.

It was like pushing the chair itself back into the past, when we began the old slow circuit round about the soiled of the bridal feast. But in the funereal room, with that figure of the grave fallen back in the chair fixing its eyes upon her, Estella looked more like a queen than before. I was under stronger enchantment.

The time so melted away that our early dinner-hour drew near, and Estella left us to prepare herself. We had stopped near the centre of the long table, and Miss Havisham, with one of her withered hands stretched out of the chair, rested that clenched hand upon the yellow cloth. As Estella looked back over her shoulder before going out at the door, Miss Havisham kissed that hand to her, with a ravenous intensity that was, of its kind, quite dreadful.

Then Estella being gone and we two left alone, she turned to me, and said, in a whisper,

"Is she beautiful, graceful, well-grown? Do you admire her?"

"Every body must who sees her, Miss Havisham."

She drew an arm round my neck, and drew my head close down to hers as she sat in the chair. "Love her, love her, love her! How does she use you?"

Before I could answer (if I could have answered so difficult a question at all) she repeated, "Love her, love her! If she be not proud yours, you love her. If she wounds you, love her. If she tears your heart to pieces—and as it gets older and stronger it will tear deeper—love her, love her, love her!"

Never had I seen such passionate eagerness as was joined to the violence of these words. I could feel the muscles of the thin arm round my neck swell with the vehemence that possessed her.

"Hear me, Pip! I adopted her, to be loved. I bred her and educated her, to be loved. I developed her mind, so that she is, that she might be loved. Love her!"

She said the word often enough, and there could be no doubt she meant love to say it; but if the often repeated word had been hate instead of love—despair—revenge—dire death—it could not have sounded from her lips more like a curse.

"I'll tell you," said she, in the same hurried passionate whisper, "what real love is. It is blind devotion, unquestioning self-humiliation, utter submission, trust and belief against yourself and against the world, giving up your whole heart and soul to one idea—as I did!"

When she came to that, and to a desperate cry that followed that, I caught her round the waist, for I felt that she was in the chair, in her shroud of a dress, and wildly struck at the air as if she would as soon have struck herself against the heavy walls.

All this passed in a few seconds. As I drew her down into her chair, I was conscious of a scent that I knew, and turning, saw my guardian in the room.

He always carried (I have not yet mentioned it, I think) a great variety of rich silk and of imposing proportions, which was of great value to him in his profession. I have seen him so terrify a client or a witness by ceremoniously unfolding his pocket-handkerchief as if he were immediately going to blow his nose, and then pausing, as if he should not blow his nose time to do it before such client or witness committed himself, that the self-committal followed directly, quite as a matter of course. When I saw him in the room, he had this expressive pocket-handkerchief in both hands, and was looking at us. On meeting my eye, he said plainly by a momentary look that he was in that attitude, "Indeed? Singular!" and then put the handkerchief to its right use with wonderful effect.

Miss Havisham had risen as soon as I, and was (like every body else) afraid of him. She made a strong attempt to compose herself, and reanimated her withered counterfeit as ever.

"As punctual as ever," he repeated, coming up to us. "(How do you do, Pip? Shall I give you a kiss, Miss Havisham? Once round?) And so you are here, Pip?"

I told him when I had arrived, and how Miss Havisham had desired me to come and see Estella. To which he replied, "Ah! Very fine young lady!" Then he pushed Miss Havisham in her chair, and took one of his large hands, and put the other in his trousers-pocket as if the pocket were full of secrets.

"Well, Pip? How have you seen Miss Estella before?" said he, when he came to a stop.

"How often?"

"Ah! How many times? Ten thousand times?"

"Oh! Certainly not so many."

"Twice?"

"Jaggers," interposed Miss Havisham, much to my relief; "leave my Pip alone, and go with him to your dinner."

He complied, and we groped our way down the dark stairs together. While we were still on our way to those detached apartments across the paved yard at the back, he asked me how often I had seen Miss Havisham eat and drink; offering me a breadth of choice, as usual, between a hundred times and once.

"I considered, and said, "Never."

"And never will, Pip," he retorted, with a frowning smile. "She has never allowed herself to be seen doing either since she lived this present life of hers. She wanders about in the night, and lays hands then on such food as she takes."

"Pray, Sir," said I, "may I ask you a question?"

"You may," said he, "and I may decline to answer it. Put your question."

"Estella's name. Is it Havisham, or ——?" I had nothing to add.

"Or what?" said he.

"Is it Havisham?"

"It is Havisham."

This brought us to the dinner-table, where she and Sarah Pocket awaited us. Mr. Jaggers presided, Estella sat opposite to him, I faced my patroness and her friend. We dined well, and were waited on by a maid-servant whom I had never seen in all my comings and goings, but who, for any thing I knew, had been in that mysterious house the whole time. After dinner a bottle of choice old port was placed before my guardian (he was evidently well acquainted with the vintage), and the two ladies left us.

Any thing to equal the determined reticence of Mr. Jaggers under that roof I never saw elsewhere, even in him. He kept his eye on Wemmick himself, and scarcely directed his eyes to Estella's fine dinner during dinner. When she spoke to him, he listened, and in due course answered, but never looked at her that I could see. On the other hand, she often looked at him, with interest and curiosity, if not distrust, but his face never showed the least consciousness. Throughout dinner he took a dry delight in making Sarah Pocket grotesque and yellower, by often referring in conversation with me to my expectations; but here, again, he showed no consciousness, and even made the point clear that he extorted—and even did extort, though I don't know how—those references out of my innocent self.

And when he and I were left alone together, he sat with an air upon him of general lying by in consequence of information he possessed, that really was too much for me. He once examined his very wine when he had nothing else in hand. He held it between himself and the candle, tasted it, rolled it in his mouth, swallowed it, looked at the port again, smelled it, tried it, drank it, filled again, and cross-examined the glass again, until I was as nervous as if I had known the wine to be telling him something to my disadvantage. Three or four times I feebly threw out a lure to start conversation; but whenever he saw me going to ask him any thing he looked at me with his glass in his hand, and rolling his wine about in his mouth, as if requisite to take notice that it was of no use, for he couldn't answer.

I think Miss Pocket was conscious that the sight of me unnerved her in the danger of being goaded to madness, and perhaps tearing off her cap—which was a very hideous one, in the nature of a mosque, or pincushion, and was pinned with her hair—which assuredly had never grown on her head. She did not appear when we afterward went up to Miss Havisham's room, and we four played at whist. In the interval, Miss Havisham, in a wild way, had put some of the most beautiful jewels from her dressing-table into Estella's hair, and above her bosom and waist; and I saw even my guardian look at her from under his thick eyebrows, and relax from a little, when her loveliness was before him, with those rich flushes of glitter on her color in it.

Of the conversation and extent to which he took our trumps into custody, and came out with mean little cards at the ends of hands, before which the ace of our last Kings and Queens was utterly abased, I say nothing; nor of the feeling that I had, respecting his looking upon us personally in light of three very obvious and poor riddles that he had found out long ago. What I suffered from, was the incompatibility between his cold presence and my feelings toward Estella. It was not that I knew I could never bear to speak to him about her, that I knew I could never bear to hear him creak his boots at her, that I knew I could never bear to see him wash his hands of her; it was, that my admiration should be within a foot or two of him—in vain, when I thought things could be in the same place with him—that, was the agonizing circumstance.

We played until nine o'clock, and then it was arranged that when Estella came to London I should be forwarned of her coming and should meet her at the coach, and then I took leave of her, and touched her and left her.

My guardian lay at the Boar, in the next room to mine. Far into the night, Miss Havisham's words, "Love her, love her, love her!" sounded in my ears. I adapted them for my own repetition, and said them over to myself, "Love her, love her, I love her!" thousands of times. Then a burst of gratitude came upon me, that she should be destined for me, and then I took leave of her, and touched her and left her.

My guardian lay at the Boar, in the next room to mine. Far into the night, Miss Havisham's words, "Love her, love her, love her!" sounded in my ears. I adapted them for my own repetition, and said them over to myself, "Love her, love her, I love her!" thousands of times. Then a burst of gratitude came upon me, that she should be destined for me, and then I took leave of her, and touched her and left her.

My guardian lay at the Boar, in the next room to mine. Far into the night, Miss Havisham's words, "Love her, love her, love her!" sounded in my ears. I adapted them for my own repetition, and said them over to myself, "Love her, love her, I love her!" thousands of times. Then a burst of gratitude came upon me, that she should be destined for me, and then I took leave of her, and touched her and left her.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York, have Just Published:

TRUMPS. A Novel. By Geo. Wm. Curtis. Illustrated by Hoppin. Large 12mo. Muslin, $1 50; Half Calf, $2 25.

THE ORDEAL OF FREE LABOR in the British West Indies. By Wm. G. Sewell. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of Price.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

BUNKER'S COMBINATION

FLOOR AND ICE SKATES.

The frames, consisting of fine steel, are light and strong, and free from all objections which attach to wooden or cast-iron frames. The rollers are covered with leather, which prevents all noise or injury to the oil-cloth, carpet or floor where they may be used. Send for Circular. Depot, PATTERSON BROTHERS, No. 27 Park Row, New York.

Hard Times

MADE EASY!

Good News for the Unemployed!

1000 Chances to make Money!!!

One Million Dollars worth of WATCHES, JEWELRY, and SILVER-PLATED WARE,

TO BE DISPOSED OF ON

AN ENTIRELY NEW AND ORIGINAL PLAN!

2,500 Agents Wanted!!!

All persons desirous of securing an Agency in this

NEW ENTERPRISE

Should send on their names at once, enclosing a 3 cent stamp to pay postage, and receive by return of mail

A PREMIUM CATALOGUE

Containing

OUR INDUCEMENTS,

Which afford

A Rare Chance to make Money

without risk, together with

Full Particulars Relative to this

NOVEL PLAN!

To insure prompt and satisfactory dealings, direct all orders to

GEORGE G. EVANS, 439 Chestnut Street, Philad.

WANTED.—Agents to sell packages of Stationery and Jewelry, at prices one third less than can be purchased elsewhere. Call on or address (stamp enclosed) J. L. BAILEY, 164 Court Street, Boston, Mass.

Cough Lozenges.

BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES

Brown's Bronchial Troches. At this season of the year, when so many are troubled with hoarseness, influenza and bronchial difficulties, have Troches within reach of all. We have seen instances of their good effects in cases of inflammation of the bronchial tubes and of the hoarseness of children. They contain nothing which can injure the constitution, and have a nothing effect very efficacious in assisting expectoration, and prevent the accumulation of phlegm. For public speakers, singers, and all persons troubled with hoarseness, they are invaluable.—Portland Transcript.

WEDDINGS for the UNION—Supplied with Cards, Notes, Satin Ties, Envelopes, &c., of the latest styles, at fair prices, by A. DEMAREST, Engraver, No. 192 Broadway, N. Y. Samples by mail.

No Chimney!

Burners that will fit any Coal Oil Lamp, and burn Coal Oil or Kerosene without a chimney. Burner sent by mail on receipt of $1 25. Callender's Carbo-Air Gas Lamp burns pure Coal Oil, Camphene, &c., without wick or chimney. Sample Lamp $3 00. Enclose stamp for Circulars. Address CALLENDER & PERKIN, Dealers in Lamps, Oils, &c., 175 Broadway, New York.

The Working Farmer

AND

Harper's Weekly,

$2 40 per Annum.

Address CHARLES T. MAYER, Maps' Agricultural Warehouse, 136 and 138 Nassau Street, N. Y.

Reissue of the Great Histories.

The Only Complete Edition.

HUME, GIBBON, AND MACAULAY.

In Duodecimo Volumes, Muslin, Forty Cents Each.

☞ The volumes sold separately, and sent, postage free (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of the Money.

HARPER & BROTHERS, FRANKLIN SQUARE, N. Y.,

Have Now Ready:

Lord Macaulay's History of England.

The History of England, from the Accession of James II. By THOMAS BABINGTON MACAULAY. With an Original Portrait of the Author.

IN FIVE VOLUMES.

DUODECIMO EDITION, COMPLETE. With Portrait and elaborate Index. Printed on Fine Paper, Muslin, 60 cents a volume; Sheep, 60 cents a volume; Half Calf, $3 26 a volume.

Hume's History of England.

History of England, from the Invasion of Julius Cæsar to the Abdication of James II., 1688. By DAVID HUME. A New Edition, with the Author's last Corrections and Improvements. To which is prefixed a Short Account of his Life, written by Himself. With a Portrait of the Author. 6 vols. 12mo, Muslin, $2 40; Sheep, $3 60; Half Calf, $7 50.

Gibbon's Rome.

History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. By EDWARD GIBBON. With Notes, by Rev. H. H. MILMAN and M. GUIZOT. With Maps and Engravings. A New Library Edition. To which is added a Complete Index of the whole Work, and a Portrait of the Author. 6 vols. 12mo, Muslin, $2 40; Sheep, $3 60; Half Calf, $7 50.

Fine Octavo Edition

OF

Lord Macaulay's History of England.

OCTAVO LIBRARY EDITION, COMPLETE. With Portrait and elaborate Index, of indispensable value to a Library Edition. Printed on Superfine Paper, Five Volumes, Muslin, $1 50 a volume; Sheep, $2 00 a volume; Half Calf, $2 00 a volume.

Mantillas! Mantillas!

BRODIE

Will make his Great

Spring Opening

on

Thursday, the 28th inst.,

at his

Palace of Fashion,

Under the 5th Avenue Hotel,

Corner 23d Street,

and at the

Old Celebrated Stand,

300 Canal Street.

The richest Display of

MANTILLAS

in

Silk and Fancy Cloth

Ever made in New York.

Great Work on the Horse!

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES:

BY ROBERT JENNINGS, V. S.,

Professor of Pathology and Operative Surgery in the Veterinary College of Philadelphia, Professor of Veterinary Medicine in the late Agricultural College of Ohio, Secretary of the American Veterinary Association of Philadelphia, &c., &c.

WILL TELL YOU of the Origin, History and distinctive traits of the various breeds of Eurpean, Asiatic, African and American Horses, with the physical formation and peculiarities of the animal, and how to ascertain his age by the number and condition of his teeth; illustrated by numerous explanatory engravings.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES

WILL TELL YOU Of Breeding, Breaking, Stabling, Feeding, Grooming, Shoeing, and the general management of the horse, with the best modes of administering medicine, also, how to treat Biting, Kicking, Rearing, Shying, Stumbling, Crib Biting, Restiveness, and other vices to which he is subject; illustrated by numerous explanatory engravings.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES

WILL TELL YOU Of the causes, symptoms, and treatment of Strangles, Sore Throat, Distemper, Catarrh, Influenza, Bronchitis, Pneumonia, Pleurisy, Broken Wind, Chronic Cough, Roaring and Whistling, Lumps, Sore Mouth and Ulcers, and Diseases of the Teeth, and other diseases of the Mouth and Respiratory Organs.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES

WILL TELL YOU Of the causes, symptoms, and Treatment of Worms, Colic, Gastritis, Gastric Stone, Constipation, Stony Concretions, Ruptures, Palsy, Diarrhœa, Jaundice, Hepatirrhœa, Bloody Urine, Stone in the Kidneys and Bladder, Inflammation, and other diseases of the Stomach, Bowels, Liver and Urinary Organs.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES

WILL TELL YOU Of the causes, symptoms, and Treatment of Worms, Mange, and Bog Spavin, Ring-Bone, Sweenie, Strains, Broken Knees, Wind Galls, Foundered, Sole Bruise and Gravel, Cracked Heels, Scratches, Canker, Thrush, and Corns; also, of Megrims, Vertigo, Epilepsy, Staggers, and other diseases of the Feet, Legs and Head.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES

WILL TELL YOU Of the causes, symptoms, and Treatment of Fistula, Poll Evil, Glanders, Farcy, Scurvy, Fever, Mange, Surfeit, Locked Jaw, Rheumatism, Cramp, Colic, Diseases of the Eye and Heart, &c., &c., and how to manage Cattle in Breeding, Parturition, Weaning, Rowelling, Firing, Hernia, Castration, Tapping, and other surgical operations.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES

WILL TELL YOU Of Harper's Model of Stables and Horses: how to Approach, Halter, or Stable a Colt; how to accustom a horse to strange sounds and sights, and how to Bit, Saddle, and Break Colts prior to Harness; also the form and law of Warranty. The whole being the result of more than fifteen years' careful study of the habits, peculiarities, vices and wonderfulness of this noble and useful animal.

The book contains 340 pages, elegantly illustrated by nearly One Hundred Engravings. It is printed in a clear and open type, and will be forwarded to any address, postage paid, on receipt of price, half bound, $1 00, or, in cloth, extra, $1 25.

$1000 A YEAR can be made by canvassing for the above popular works of ours. Our inducements to all such are exceedingly liberal.

As our books are unequaled in their mechanical execution, as well as the value of their contents, a certain and rapid sale follows their introduction everywhere.

For single copies, or for terms to agents, with other information, apply to or address

JOHN E. POTTER, Publisher,

No. 617 Sansom Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

HOW TO DO GOOD AND GET "PAID FOR IT".—Take an Agency for our Publications. The terms are such, there can be no possibility of loss. EVERY FAMILY will be glad to obtain some of them. For particulars address FOWLER AND WELLS, No. 308 Broadway, New York.

DENSLOW'S

Useful, Cheap, and Popular Articles are as follows:

I.

Denslow's Richly-Perfumed Hair Tonic,

IN FOUR SIZES.

THE SMALLEST HAIR TONIC.....12 cents.
HALF PINTS—TOILET SIZE.....25 cents.
PINTS.....50 cents. QUARTS.....$1.

50,000 Dozen have been Sold.

REMARKS.—DENSLOW'S HAIR TONIC is superior in every particular to the old-fashioned high-priced preparations which have, for years past, been in vogue. It is scientifically combined by a most experienced Chemist, excellently perfumed, and nothing injurious whatever allowed to enter into its composition; on the contrary, this useful and agreeable Tonic contains all the ingredients which years of observation and experiment have demonstrated to be the best adapted to restore the growth of the Hair, restore it to its natural color, and add to its beauty. Rest assured, there is no preparation superior to this, and few so nice. Most of the noted Hair mixtures nowadays contain caustic ingredients very deleterious to the Skin and roots of the Hair. Avoid them; they are issued under a thousand different, unmeaning fancy titles, imagined to allure purchasers. If you want a good, honest, reliable article for daily use, try Denslow's, which is incomparably the CHEAPEST AND BEST OBTAINABLE.

II.

Denslow's Double-Distilled Benzine.

FOR INSTANTLY REMOVING GREASE, PAINT, WAX and OIL STAINS.

☞ The best article ever introduced for this purpose, and the only one that will give perfect satisfaction.

IN FOUR SIZES.

THE SHILLING BENZINE.....12 cents.
HALF PINTS.....50 cents.
PINTS AT 50 CENTS.....QUARTS AT $1.

30,000 Dozen have been Sold.

REMARKS.—This comparatively new liquid has now been sufficiently long in use to have been thoroughly tested, and the regularly increasing sale is evidence of its useful character. Denslow's Benzine is, in fact, the best in use previous to the French even, and was the first kind that was sold before the war, at a reasonable price, so that it could be in daily use in every family at a trifling expense.

This Benzine is the only article ever offered under what kind whatever now before the public; and, as will be seen above, it is by far the cheapest.

PROPERTIES OF DENSLOW'S BENZINE.

It is unequaled for instantly removing from all kinds of silk and woollen goods, fancy carpets, oil, and grease stains, without in the slightest degree injuring the texture of the fabric, and is perfectly safe to use for these purposes. Gloves may be cleaned beautifully with it. Greasy stains upon engravings, drawings, plans, and other valuable papers, can be removed without injury to them. Artists find it preferable to any other liquid for cleaning their brushes.

Full Directions Accompany each Bottle

For its use in a great variety of cases.

N. DENSLOW, CHEMIST.

The popularity of Denslow's Purified and Concentrated Benzine has called into existence numerous articles purporting to be similar, but in point of fact very inferior, oftentimes leaving as much grease upon the article to be cleaned as they were expected to remove. The majority of druggists have "THE SHILLING BENZINE" on sale, and expect from the large sale they have given this preparation it in its use, avoid all other kinds but Denslow's, which is sure to give the best satisfaction.

III.

The Shilling Indelible Ink.

RETAILED AT ONLY 12 CENTS.

Surprisingly Cheap and Excellent.

REMARKS.—This Indelible Ink will be found a perfectly reliable article, equal in all respects to any of the established kinds which are sold at double its price. The bottles are exactly the same as Payson's and other well-known kinds. Full directions for its use are given on the label of each bottle.

IV.

The Shilling Troches.

FOR COUGHS, COLDS, AND THROAT DIFFICULTIES GENERALLY.

PRICE ONLY 12 CENTS.

REMARKS.—The Shilling Troches are an agreeable and effective Lozenge for Coughs, Colds, and Throat difficulties generally. They afford a pleasant sensations in the Throat resulting from Irritation, will find these Troches indispensable. Public Speakers should invariably have a box of these Troches in their pocket. Containing no Opium, which is so common an ingredient in numerous similar articles in use.

Conveniently put up in boxes, suitable to carry in the pocket, and sold at the low price of 12 cents. They are having a rapid sale.

V.

The Shilling Camphor Ice,

FOR CHAPPED SKIN.

In all points, far superior to the numerous kinds of Camphor Ice in use. This is an especial remedy of chappedness.

REMARKS.—The Shilling Camphor Ice with Glycerine is a beautiful preparation for use at this time of the year. Softening the skin, it does away with Chapped hands, lips, and face. For preserving the smoothness of the skin in frosty and windy weather, it excels all other preparations.

The Foregoing Popular Articles

Are kept by Druggists throughout the country, and at the general dealers throughout the country.

In all places where they are not already introduced, the proprietor desires to make arrangements with some Enterprising dealer to take hold of them. To facilitate doing so, he has prepared these Ten Dollar Cases are put at something less than the usual trade price. Remittance may be made upon receipt of the Cases, by responsible dealers.

AN INDUCEMENT,

Further particulars in a Trade Circular, which may be had by addressing

Denslow's Wholesale Depot,

No. 162 Broadway, N. Y.

NOTE.—These goods are sold for Cash only; none are sent out on time or commission.

ANDREWS' YEAST POWDER

is economical and perfectly pure. All the best families use it. It is ready for use in one minute! It makes Tea Biscuit, Dumplings, Pancakes, splendidly light and wholesome. Inquire for the "Excelsior" Yeast Powder. The Best Store will get it for you. If you want the Best buy our Brand! Depot 126 and 128 Cedar Street, N. Y., for 15 years.

ONLY 30 CENTS for the NEW POCKET GLEE BOOK, containing nearly Sixty of the choicest Trios, Glees, Quartettes, Rounds, Catches, &c., all by the best English, German, and American Authors. It is of convenient pocket size, and will be sent by mail, postage paid.

Just Published, BUCKLEY'S NEW METHOD for the BANJO. Price One Dollar.

FIRTH, POND & CO.,
547 Broadway.

$100 PER MONTH MADE WITH STENCIL TOOLS.—I will the cheapest and best. Send for my circular, which explains the business. Address JOHN MILLIKEN, LAWRENCE, MASS., or No. 79 Third Street, St. Louis, Mo.

H. WORCESTER'S

IMPROVED PIANO FORTES,

Manufactory & Salesrooms,

14th St., cor. 3d Av., N. Y.

W. A. HAYWARD,

MANUFACTURING JEWELER,

208 Broadway, New York.

N.B. FULL ASSORTMENT of Goods for the $1 00 STORES and JEWELERY ENVELOPES.

WEDDING CARDS,

Specimens by Mail on receipt of 2 postage stamps.

EVERDELL & SON, 302 Broadway, N. Y.

WANTED—MEN, WOMEN, AND BOYS in every Town, City, and Village in the United States, to act as Agents for the sale of Sherman & Co.'s Gift Jewelry Stock. Agents can make from 3 to 5 dollars a day. Being largely engaged in the manufacture of a superior quality of Jewelry, we are enabled to offer to our customers a greater variety and more valuable Gifts than any other similar establishment. For further particulars enclose a stamp, and address, SHERMAN & CO., 229 Broadway, corner of Barclay Street, New York.

A GREAT CURE.—Dr. Leland's ASTRINGENT BLOOD PURIFIER. Instantly cures Dyspepsia, Gout, and Neuralgia, and all Mercurial Diseases. Price $2. Send by mail or express. Complete circulars sent free. Agents wanted everywhere. G. Smith & Co., Proprietors, 46 Spruce Street, New York.

LE BON TON—THE BEST LADIES' FASHION BOOK in the World. Splendid Engravings, with two valuable patterns, posted for 30 cents.

S. RAILEY & SON, 667 Broadway, N. Y.

BACK NUMBERS and BOUND VOLUMES of HARPER'S WEEKLY and MONTHLY MAGAZINE can always be had of

A. WALLEY, 302 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—My Ointment will force them to grow heavily in six weeks (upon the smoothest face) without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of an order. B. C. GRAHAM, No. 162 Nassau Street, N. Y.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA PURIFIES THE BLOOD, and produces the greatest effects of a tonic, alterative, and stimulative medicine.

Prepared by A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists, No. 100 Fulton Street, corner of William, New York.

HARPER'S

NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE

For April, 1861.

The Publishers of HARPER'S MAGAZINE have the pleasure of announcing that the New Novel by the Author of "Adam Bede" and the "Mill on the Floss" is nearly completed, and that its publication will be commenced in an early Number of the Magazine.

The present Number contains an opening paper on "Labrador." The Illustrations are from Photographs taken expressly for the Magazine. Those in the present Number relate chiefly to the coast. The succeeding paper will contain Illustrations of Scenery and Character in the interior. They are probably the first accurate pictures ever given of this little known region. The same papers will be followed by others, describing the most interesting portions of the British Provinces in America. The "Chapter on Mice" is a continuation of the series of Natural History which have attracted so little attention among scientific men in Europe and in this country. The first one of the previous ones on "Destructive Insects," shows the great importance, in a country of commercial agriculture, of a thorough investigation into the structure and habits of the minute insect world. The article on the "Horse Tamer" was prepared from materials and information obtained directly from Mr. RAREY, and furnishes the most authentic account of his career that has been given to the public.

The other articles in the Number will be found fully to sustain the character of the Magazine in all its departments.

Any Number will be sent by Mail, post-paid, for Twenty-five Cents. Any Volume, comprising Six Numbers, well bound in Cloth, will be sent by Mail, to any part of the United States within 3000 miles of New York, post-paid, for Two Dollars per Volume. Complete Sets will be sent by Express, the freight in all the charge of the purchaser, at a Discount of Twenty-five per Cent. from the above rates. Twenty-one Volumes, bound uniformly, extending from June, 1850, to November, 1860, are now ready.

HARPER'S WEEKLY will be sent gratuitously for one month—as a specimen—to any one who applies for it. Specimen Numbers of the MAGAZINE will also be sent gratuitously.

TERMS.

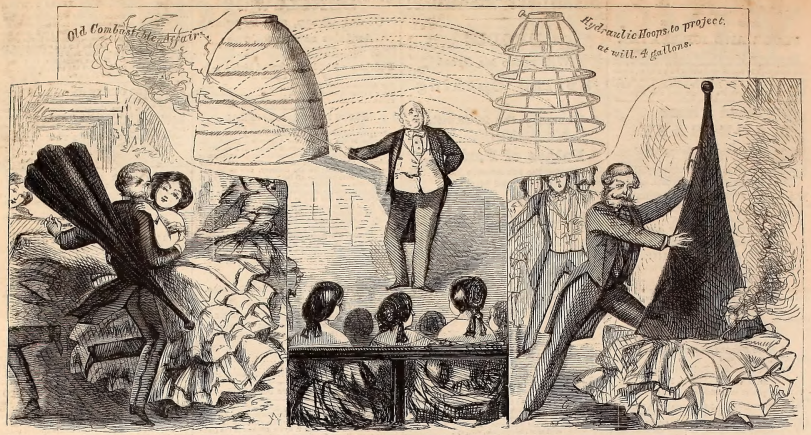
One Copy for one Year.....$3 00
Two Copies for One Year.....5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each).....2 00

And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of EIGHT SUBSCRIBERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MAGAZINE, together, one year, $4 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

HOOPS AND COMBUSTION.



Young JOWLES carries a Patent Extinguisher.

PROFESSOR JOWLES (to an Admiring but Select Audience.) "This, Ladies, is the miserable OLD COMBUSTIBLE AFFAIR which has led to so many Fatal Accidents. Now, let me draw your attention to my New HYDRAULIC HOOP. By wearing this, every Lady can extinguish herself. Four Gallons of Water, Ladies, in a Minute!"

The Extinguisher in use.

WINDING OFF THE TANGLED SKEIN.

THE ITALIAN BOOT.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

John B. Dunham.

Overstrung Grand Square and Upright Pianos.

Established in 1834.

Are pronounced to be the best Pianos manufactured. Each Instrument warranted 5 years. Send for Circular. Warerooms and Manufactory, 75 to 85 East 13th Street, near Broadway, N. Y.

Thorley's Food for Cattle

Converts the poorest of hay or straw into a superior fitting for sale. A pamphlet mailed free. Depot for U. S., 21 Broadway, N. Y.

Agents wanted in every City and Town.

WARD'S PERFECT FITTING SHIRTS.

Made to Measure at $18 per doz, OR SIX FOR NINE DOLLARS.

Printed directions sent free everywhere, and so easy to understand, that any one can take their own measure for shirts. I warrant a good fit. The cash to be paid to the Express Company on receipt of goods.

S. W. H. WARD, from London, 387 Broadway, N. Y., up Stairs.

A NEW TIE EVERY DAY. THE PAPER NECK-TIE. SMITH & BROUWER, No. 89 Warren Street, New York.

History of the United Netherlands.

From the Death of William the Silent to the Synod of Dort. With a Full View of the English-Dutch Struggle against Spain, and of the Origin and Destruction of the Spanish Armada. By JOHN LOTHROP MOTLEY, LL.D., D.C.L., Corresponding Member of the Institute of France, Author of "The Rise of the Dutch Republic." With Portraits and Map. 2 vols. 8vo, Muslin, $4 00; Sheep, $4 50; Half Calf, $6 00.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage prepaid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of the Money.

Harper's Weekly.

PRICE FIVE CENTS.

TERMS.

One Copy for Twenty Weeks	$1 00
One Copy for One Year	2 50
One Copy for Two Years	4 00
Five Copies for One Year	9 00
Twelve Copies for One Year	20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year	40 00

Harper's Weekly and Harper's Magazine, one year, $4 00.

Volumes I., II., III., and IV. of HARPER'S WEEKLY, handsomely bound in Cloth extra, Price $3 50 each, are now ready.

 To postmasters getting up a Club of Twelve or Twenty-five, a Copy will be sent gratis. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. Specimen Numbers gratuitously supplied.

☞ Clergymen and Teachers supplied at the lowest CLUB RATES.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. V.—No. 223.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 6, 1861. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1861, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

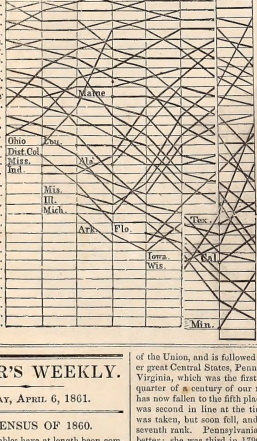
HON. WILLIAM H. SEWARD, SECRETARY OF STATE.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY BRADY.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

THE CENSUS OF 1860.

STATES.	CENSUS OF 1850.			CENSUS OF 1860.			33TH CONGRESS.
	Free.	Slaves.	Total.	Free.	Slaves.	Total.	Reps.	Loss.	Gain.
Alabama*	426,514	342,844	771,623	529,164	435,132	964,296	6	1	..
Arkansas	162,717	47,100	209,897	324,323	111,104	435,427	3	..	1
California	92,597	....	92,597	389,015	....	389,015	4	..	1
Connecticut	370,792	....	370,792	460,151	....	460,151	4	..	..
Delaware	88,742	2,290	91,532	110,420	1,798	112,218	1	..	..
Florida*	48,135	39,310	87,445	78,686	61,753	140,439	1	..	..
Georgia*	524,503	381,682	906,185	703,057	465,509	1,168,566	7	1	..
Illinois	851,470	....	851,470	1,711,951	....	1,711,753	11	..	4
Indiana	988,416	....	988,416	1,350,479	....	1,350,428	7	..	..
Iowa	192,214	....	192,214	674,948	....	674,948	5	..	3
Kansas	....	....	....	107,110	....	107,110	1	..	1
Kentucky*	771,434	210,981	982,405	999,228	225,490	1,155,718	8	2	..
Louisiana*	376,905	244,809	517,762	376,913	332,520	709,433	4	..	..
Maine	583,169	....	583,169	628,276	....	628,276	5	..	1
Maryland	492,661	90,368	583,034	599,846	87,188	687,034	5	1	..
Massachusetts	994,514	....	994,514	1,231,065	....	1,231,065	10	1	..
Mississippi*	296,648	309,878	606,526	354,699	436,696	791,395	5	..	..
Missouri	592,004	87,422	682,044	1,058,352	114,965	1,173,317	9	2	..
Michigan	397,654	....	397,654	749,113	....	749,113	6	..	2
Minnesota	6,077	....	6,077	162,022	....	162,022	1	1	..
New Hampshire	317,976	....	317,976	326,072	....	326,073	3	..	..
New Jersey	489,519	236	489,555	672,031	....	672,035	5	..	1
New York	3,097,394	....	3,097,394	3,887,542	....	3,887,542	31	..	1
North Carolina	553,470	288,548	869,039	629,942	331,081	992,667	7	1	..
Ohio	1,980,329	....	1,98 ,329	2,339,599	....	2,339,599	19	3	..
Oregon	13,294	....	13,294	52,464	....	52,464	2	1	..
Pennsylvania	2,311,786	....	2,311,786	2,906,370	....	2,906,370	23	2	..
Rhode Island	147,545	....	147,545	174,621	....	174,620	2	1	..
South Carolina*	283,523	384,984	668,507	301,271	402,541	703,812	4	2	..
Tennessee	753,788	239,459	1,002,717	834,082	275,784	1,109,866	8	2	..
Texas*	154,431	58,161	212,592	420,651	180,388	601,039	4	..	2
Vermont	314,120	....	314,120	315,116	....	315,098	3	..	..
Virginia	894,183	472,528	1,421,661	1,105,196	436,987	1,596,083	11	2	3
Wisconsin	305,391	....	305,391	775,873	....	775,881	6	..	2
Pop. of States	19,553,421	3,204,769	23,061,792	27,185,109	3,947,557	31,134,666	233	24	19
Territories.
Colorado	....	....	....	34,197	....	34,197
Dakotah	....	....	....	4,837	....	4,839
Nebraska	....	....	....	28,832	10	28,841
Nevada	....	....	....	6,857	....	6,857
New Mexico	61,547	....	61,547	93,516	24	93,541	1
Utah	11,354	26	11,380	40,266	29	40,295
Washington	....	....	....	11,623	....	11,623
Dist. of Col.	48,003	3,687	51,687	71,809	3,181	75,076
Total Pop.	19,957,553	3,204,511	23,191,876	27,477,660	3,951,301	31,428,961
* Deduct the population of the seven "Cotton Confederate States," 1860				2,656,481	2,311,260	4,967,741
Population of the other, according to their Census of 1860				24,820,660	1,641,541	26,462,150

The number of Representatives is fixed at 233, apportioned as follows: To each State one Representative for 93,706 of the number of slaves is added to the number of free, to form the ratio of population required for a Representative. The representative population of the whole is then divided by 233, to find the number of Representatives to which it is entitled. The fractions that left would decrease the Representatives below the number of 233. This is obviously to bring the additional member to the States having the largest fractions, until the number of 233 is reached.

The following Table, for which we are indebted to the courtesy of the New York Times, shows the progress of population in each State from 1790 to 1860:



HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, APRIL 6, 1861.

THE CENSUS OF 1860.

THE Census Tables have at length been completed at Washington. The preceding analysis shows the population of the United States according to the Census of 1850 and that of 1860, together with the Representatives in the 38th Congress, and the losses and gains in each State.

The great increase of the past ten years has been in the Western States. The population of Illinois and Wisconsin has doubled; that of Iowa has nearly trebled; that of Michigan has nearly doubled. The exact increase has been 90 per cent. in Michigan, 101 per cent. in Illinois, 154 per cent. in Wisconsin, 251 per cent. in Iowa. The older Western States have not gained as much; Ohio shows an increase of 18 per cent. only; Indiana 37 per cent. The Middle States—New-York, New-Jersey, and Pennsylvania—have increased 26 per cent. The New England States have only increased 15 per cent., less than the natural increase; Vermont and New Hampshire have stood still. The border Slave States have increased 28 per cent. in white, and 14 per cent in slave population. The seceded States 33 per cent. in white, and 31 per cent. in slave population. These figures illustrate the gradual migration of our people, North and South, from the old to the new lands.

The second table published above shows how New York has steadily risen to be the first State of the Union, and is followed closely by the other great Central States, Pennsylvania and Ohio. Virginia, which was the first State for the first quarter of a century of our national existence, has now fallen to the fifth place. Massachusetts was second in line at the time the first census was taken, but soon fell, and now occupies the seventh rank. The exact census has held her own better; she was third in 1790, and is now second. The fourth State, when the first census was taken, was North Carolina, and the seventh South Carolina; they are now the twelfth and eighteenth. Maryland has fallen from the sixth to the seventeenth place; New Jersey from the ninth to the twentieth; New Hampshire from the tenth to the twenty-second; Vermont from the eleventh to the twenty-eighth; Rhode Island from the fourteenth to the twenty-ninth. So the older States are thrust out of their original rank by their younger, more fertile, and more thriving sisters.

A PRESIDENTIAL PATENT.

AMONG the registered patents in the Patent Office at Washington is one for burying vessels through shallow waters, taken out some years ago by Abraham Lincoln, of Springfield, Illinois.

The method is by the employment of air-chambers constructed on the principle of a bellows, and distended or contracted by ropes, as the depth of water may require. It was by a somewhat similar scheme, on a larger scale, that it was once proposed to bring the Great Eastern through the East River to a dock.

The inventor, Mr. Lincoln, has not had the satisfaction of seeing his patent in use on the Mississippi or its tributaries.

But it has fallen to his lot to be in command of a ship of uncommon burden on a voyage of uncommon danger. It devolves upon him to navigate the ship of state through shallows of unprecedented peril, and over flats of unparalleled extent. The difficulty is how to prevent her grounding and becoming a wreck.

We trust that the President will set the fashion of using his own patent.

He can then lower all his cargo overboard, and buoy up his craft on all sides. He need not change his voyage, or put into a strange port. But unless he can set his air-chambers at work so as to diminish the draught of his vessel—in a word, unless he can increase her buoyancy, and bring more of her hull into God's daylight, he will run no small risk of losing her altogether.

THE GALWAY STEAMERS.

THE new line of transatlantic steamers, between Galway, in Ireland, and Boston and New York, in this country, commenced their weekly service, under contract with the British Government, on 26th March. The line consists of our famous Collins steamer the Adriatic, which the Company bought at one-third her cost, and of three new steamers—the Hibernia, Anglia, and Columbia—each of about 2800 tons register, and 4400 burden. The three last named vessels are known last year by the names of the Leinster, Munster, and Ulster; the names were changed at the instance of the Irish board of direction, in order to avoid their being confused with the Channel boats bearing those names. The board of direction, by-the-way, has been changed as well as the ships' names; and from all that we have heard of the old and of the new board, this change is undoubtedly for the better. The new board consists of practical steamboat men, of large means and high character: the well-known MACCORMICK—who would be the Commodore if he lived in this country—is an influential member.

The new line will run to Boston and New York alternately, and, with ordinary good fortune and ordinary good management, will probably do well. The Hibernia, we have heard, is a splendid vessel; on her trial trip she made 21 knots. The Adriatic, every body knows, is the finest passenger vessel afloat.

HON. WILLIAM H. SEWARD, SECRETARY OF STATE.

THE Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD, Secretary of State, whose portrait we publish on the preceding page, is one of the foremost statesmen now of the age. Few of his fellow-citizens are unwilling to render the due tribute to his intellectual ability, while his party regard him as the champion of human freedom and of progress.

Mr. Seward was born in the village of Florida, Orange County, New-York, on the 16th day of May, 1801. Of an active disposition, and possessing an inquiring mind, he mastered the rudiments of education at an early age, and in 1816 entered Union College, at Schenectady, where he greatly distinguished himself as a diligent student. Having graduated with high honors, he went to New York city in 1820, and commenced the study of the law in the office of Hon. John Anthon; but the next year returned to his native county, where he completed his legal studies in the office of Hon. Ogden Hoffman, at that time District Attorney.

In 1822 Mr. Seward was admitted to the bar, at Goshen, and soon afterward he removed to Auburn, where he entered into partnership with his future father-in-law, JUDGE MILLER, and where he has since resided. Devoted to the interests of his numerous clients, the young practitioner soon gained a high reputation, and enjoyed a lucrative practice.

Mr. Seward became identified with the "Anti-Masonic" party in this State, and in 1828 was the President of a State Convention, at Utica, in favor of the re-election of John Quincy Adams to the Presidential chair. In 1830 he was elected to the Senate of the State of New York, where he at once distinguished himself as a Reformer.

Having served four years as State Senator, Mr. Seward was persuaded, in 1834, to accept a nomination for Governor, in opposition to Hon. William L. Marcy, who then held the position. He was defeated; but two years later he was more successful, defeating his veteran opponent by ten thousand majority. In 1840, during the memorable "Harrison campaign," in which he took an active part, he was triumphantly re-elected.

In 1843 Governor Seward, having declined a renomination, settled down at Auburn to enjoy the comforts of domestic life, and to devote himself to his profession, in which he soon occupied a leading position. His practice was varied and extensive, embracing many important patent cases and other civil suits; but his defence of a negro is regarded as one of the best criminal lawyers in the State of New York.

The nomination of General Taylor in 1848 as the Whig candidate for President was regarded by Governor Seward as one eminently "fit to be made," and he entered into the canvass with great zeal. The State of New York gave Taylor and Fillmore a large majority; and when the Legislature assembled Governor Seward was elected to the United States Senate by a vote of 121 to 30. It was expected that he would have been the controlling spirit of the Taylor Administration; but the untimely death of the President completely changed the aspect of political affairs at Washington.

Senator Seward was one of the most earnest opponents of the "Compromise Measures" passed by the Thirty-First Congress. "I feel assured," said he, in his famous speech of March 11, 1850, "that slavery must give way, and will give way, to the salutary instruction of economy and to the ripening influences of humanity; that emancipation is inevitable and is near; that it may be hastened or hindered; that all measures which fortify slavery or extend it tend to the consummation of violence—all that check its extension and abate its strength tend to its peaceful extirpation. But I will object none but lawful, constitutional, and peaceful means to secure even that end; and none such can I or will I withhold."

In the Presidential campaign of 1852 Senator Seward advocated the election of General Scott, although he did not approve of the "platform." The disastrous result, which brought about a dissolution of the old "Whig party," did not appear to discourage the Senator from New York, who took bold and decided ground against the Kansas-Nebraska Bill, which he denounced in two able speeches.

In February, 1855, Senator Seward was re-elected by a combination of Whig, American, and Anti-Slavery Representatives, who then laid the foundation of the present Republican party, of which he is the acknowledged leader. It was, however, deemed expedient, at the ensuing Presidential election, to place COLONEL FREMONT in nomination; and Mr. Seward labored on behalf with the same energetic zeal which had marked his exertions to promote the success of Clay, of Taylor, and of Scott.

After the adjournment of Congress in the summer of 1859 Senator Seward again left Europe, extending his tour to "the Orient." He was every where received with marked distinction, and was the guest of the sovereigns of the principal governments.

When the Chicago Convention met in May, 1860, it was generally expected that Mr. Seward would be the candidate of the party. He was passed over, and Mr. Lincoln was selected in his stead. He did his share of the campaign; he stumped the entire Northwest, and part of New England and New York, speaking every where to enormous audiences, and no doubt contributed largely to the success of the party. It was generally understood that he would not accept office, at least at home, under Mr. Lincoln; but the unexpected trouble which followed the election compelled him to reverse this intention, and he accepted the post of Secretary of State as soon as it was offered him. His speeches in the Senate, which were delivered shortly afterward, have been justly regarded as expositions of the policy of the administration. In office, Mr. Seward is understood to be in favor of conciliation and delay, in the hope that time will mitigate the asperities of the pending civil contentions.

In personal appearance Senator Seward is remarkably unassuming, of middle size, with light hair toned down by age, prominent features, and heavy, overhanging eyebrows. His smile is cordial, and there is a luminous depth in the searching glance of his keen eyes that betrays a warm heart. Married, early in life, to a daughter of Judge MILLER, of Auburn, he has two sons and two daughters, and a portion of his family have always accompanied him to Washington whenever his duties have called him there. No man has a larger circle of devoted friends, and no public personage of our time enjoys a higher reputation as a cultivated, high-toned gentleman. Politicians of every phase meet at his hospitable board, which is enlivened by his inexhaustible reminiscences and sparkling wit.

THE LOUNGER.

THE ACADEMY EXHIBITION.

It is a dismal beginning to say that the present exhibition of the National Academy is the poorest of late years, but we may as well begin by telling the truth. It is not fair, of course, to require that a plant shall put forth its finest blossoms every time it flowers, nor that every apple on the tree shall be the best apple it ever grew. It is too much to require that every annual exhibition shall be better than all the others, but it would be a very agreeable fact if it were so; and certainly, for the last few years, it has not been easy to deny that there was a steady advance in the quality of execution and the variety of subjects. This year there are a few capital pictures, and no more. The works are very good, or they are poor.

Some of the most familiar names are not upon the catalogue. Elliott has no portrait; for last year, you remember, he cut one of his wife out of the frame because he did not like the place in which it was hung. Hicks has no portrait, and only two small contributions. Kensett has nothing. Church shows one small picture. Kensett has but one small landscape, very lovely, and one portrait! Eastman Johnson's works are less striking than in the last two years. Allan Gay, whose coast scenes of last year were among the best pictures, is not represented. Hamilton Wild has not chosen to make his rentrée. The eye goes about the rooms asking the walls for many a touch it remembers and anticipating, but does not get.

On the other hand, Page and Leutze have each a considerable work; Gray has the best portrait he has yet exhibited; Rowse has an exquisite crayon head of an Italian girl; Furness, of Philadelphia, and Hunt, of Newport, have masterly portraits, and Gifford has a striking and admirable landscape.

This morning let us take a rapid run through the rooms and note what arrests us. Nos. 25 and 26 are colored elevations of the new building for the National Academy. It is somewhat Saracenic or Venetian in its general aspect, vaguely recalling the palace of the Doges. It can not fail to be unique. Mr. P. B. Wight is the architect. Nearly opposite, No. 72, is an Italian Girl. It is full of the tenderest feeling, and the handling is delicate, broad, and poetic. It has the true Italian pensiveness, which we shall find in Page's Italian picture, further on. In the same gallery, Nos. 151 and 157 are portraits by William Hunt. The latter is the head of W. S. Thayer, our new Consul-General to Egypt. The former is the back-head of a lady. It is turned away and half-downward with sweet womanly decision. Every tit of a rose-leaf is obvious, and the character of a woman shows itself, however you may see her. If Mr. Hunt is as good a painter as we believe him to be, this is a study of feminine simplicity, elegance, and repose. A man could write an essay upon this portrait, the text of which should be what Dick Steele said of Lady Elizabeth Hastings, that to love her was a liberal education.

In the next room, No. 170 is a portrait three-quarters length, by W. H. Furness, of Philadelphia. The modelling, the expression, and the fidelity of this work are remarkable. It is a human skull beneath the skin, and the hand, with the forefinger in the book, is a hand of bone and muscle and blood, and can spurn and shut. Mark, too, how well the book itself is done; not a point of the picture is slighted. The color is rich and mellow. Mr. Furness must count among the very best of our portrait painters. Try him, for instance, by Gray's No. 176, certainly one of the worst portraits in the gallery. How well 170 holds its own!—less-rich and bold in color, indeed, but of the same masterly quality.

No. 194, a Lake in the Highlands, by Gifford, catches one of those fleeting moments of golden glory which illuminate the landscape with a summer shower, the moment of which Tennyson sings

"Sweet after showers ambrosial air."

It is a fair question whether an aspect of nature necessarily so evanescent is a satisfactory study; but the picture is certainly effective and pleasing: so No. 199, a Reminiscence of Trenton Falls, by Hicks, is a striking and poetic bit of composition, effect upon the water and wooded bank steeped in rich gloom. It is a vigorous and charming sketch. In No. 218, Benjamin Curtis's Captain Kidd, who painted the large Rocky Mountain landscape of last year, gives another episode of the far Western life, toward California and the Oregon Trail; and No. 223 is Eastman Johnson's Husking. This little picture has all the fidelity which marks his pictures, and his reliance upon the incidents of common contemporary life for a deep poetic effect. It is not so charming as the Pigeon-house and the Margaret of last year; for he seems less fully to represent what he intends. Are the artist-pair lovers? That is a kind of question which Mr. Johnson should never allow a Lounger to ask. He may retort, of course, that he furnishes pictures and not brains to perceive them with. He may insist that only the dullest of Loungers could fail to see that they are lovers. Perhaps, but it is a very incipient stage of the passion. The Lounger could put the whole, with differences in the handling, is more like Edmonia than Johnson.

In No. 225, a Twilight in the Catskills, we have the largest and most important landscape in the Exhibition, by Gifford. The general artistic progress of late years is very marked; and this picture is the most striking proof of it. The spectator looks across a wild valley to the range of the mountains; a dense purple wall rimmed above by a broad belt of luminous sunset sky, which is again contrasted with a belt of downy cloud. This peculiar but not unusual effect is painted with a great deal of richness and power. The picture undeniably reminds you of some earlier work of Church, in which the same general effect was represented; but that is only a resemblance of subject. It is a very interesting and skilful work. If Mr. Gifford resists the almost inevitable tendency of an artist who, like himself, has such graphic facility, to slur the conscientious details of his work, he will apparently go far from year to year to a very high position. Every one who has watched his course will sincerely wish it.

Next week we will step into the next room.

ONE HEROINE LESS.

Two or three weeks ago Mrs. Mary Ann Patten died in Boston, a woman as famous, three or four years ago, as Miss Darling in her time. She was the wife who, when her husband was laid low upon his ship with illness and blindness, took command, and brought the vessel safely into San Francisco. She was not twenty years old at the time, and she has earned more than the rhetorical torpedoes which were cracked in her honor—she has made her name an illustration of heroic fidelity.

The point of her story, however, is the fact that, what is well done and approved, conclusively answers the question whether it ought to be, or can be done. We wrangle and cant until we are blue about the rights of women; but when Elizabeth rules England—when Madame de Staël writes "Corinne"—when Florence Nightingale goes to the Crimea, or Dorothy Dix to the asylums, or Elizabeth Fry to the prisons, or Mary Ann Patten to the helm—then we discover that we need not lose our temper, nor call names, nor utter vague slander, but see, with our eyes wide open, that God means us all to do what he gives us the capacity and the occasion to do.

MACAULAY'S LAST.

THERE is one good thing in this general lull of literary activity, and it is that we shall all have plenty of time to read and enjoy every word of the last volume of Macaulay's History, which will presently appear. It is stale and rather questionable praise of a history to say that it is so interesting as a novel; but the brilliancy and interest and vehemence of Macaulay do certainly invest all that he wrote with a singular fascination. He was a great literary artist, if not a great historian. He had also a peculiarly limitation of English history. It was the study and delight of his life, to which all his other scholarship was subsidiary, and his work will always be a classic. There was a report last year that Thackeray was to continue it, and it is just one of the instances in which such a continuation might be possible and successful—for Macaulay left his work precisely at that period of English history with which Thackeray is most familiar, and of which he himself lived chronicler.

The new volume is edited by Macaulay's sister, Lady Trevelyan. With the exception of a most interesting account of the death of William Third, with which the work closes, it was finally transcribed and revised by the author himself. Macaulay's "History of England from the Accession of James Second" is thus fully completed to the death of that King, and to the close of the reign of his successor, with the exception of the last two months of that reign, of which Macaulay's first rough draft is published. The new volume has an interest of story and splendor of narration not surpassed by any thing Macaulay wrote, and can not fail to renew the satisfaction and popularity with which the first volumes were hailed.

DE OMNIBUS, ETC.

As there is a general discussion of the advantage of a railroad in Broadway, people begin to discover that we have now, so to speak, the luxury, the high, lumbering, and inconvenient omnibus to be behind the age. But every citizen will probably have the same kindly feeling for the old, heavy body had for the old stage-coaches when railroads came in. There could be no question that they must go—but they could not be kicked out. They should be gently remembered; yes, they should be even pathetic, so that when the good old stage-coach days were quite over there should be a vision of an Arcadian and golden age.

Omnibuses ought hardly to anticipate a poetic remembrance, for they are not dead, and are not even got rid of, and we are obliged to ride in them no more, how charitably we shall speak of them! We say, for now, those long white omnibuses of Brower's, which, used to stand at the corner of Broadway and Wall Street, with a seat outside at the door for the collector, may be remembered and mentioned to the young men who will be Lord of Knickerbocker air, as if you were speaking of a remote antiquity. The truth is, that New York is hooped down and down and down, and a man of few years may appear as venerable, from his remembrances, to a younger man, as the good Dr. Knickerbocker himself. Even the Bowery Theatre have the same fine traditional flavor which gave such zest to the Doctor's talk.

If time, omnibuses must go, let them retire with all the honors; and if rights are vested in them, let them be carefully respected. It is still a puzzle to the Lounger why it is not as easy to run up and down the city without asking the Legislature of the State. Do the omnibuses run by Legislative grant? Isn't a city capable of making its own city streets? One thing may be freely granted, and that is, that it is not capable of managing its police so well as the Legislature manages it. Does the Police that it can not regulate railroads in its highways? If it can not, why not enter a general verdict of incompetency, and have done with legislative aid for lighting the streets and cleaning them?

It is, indeed, a fair question whether the city of New York would not be a hundred-fold cleaner, safer, and more economical, if it were managed altogether by the State. Its upright and candid Chief Magistrate thinks otherwise, and is doubtless of opinion that it would be the more wisely and successfully governed if it were given over to his unlimited tender mercies. But until that Millennial day arrives, will it not be fair to carefully manage our own affairs, why do we not go through the form, at least, of deciding whether cars shall or shall not run in our streets?

JENNY LIND.

THE annual report is in circulation that Mr. Gye, director of several London theatres, has made an engagement with Jenny Lind for the coming season. It is probably not true, but if it were so, it would be almost a pity. Not for Jenny, for those who would hear her, but for her own fame.

Nobody can turn and wreath the old laurels around his head. Mendelssohn died in early maturity. They were both of too decided talent not to do well: but they did not do as at first, and they could not. They stood in their own light, as we, under such circumstances every artist must. They may have been of even greater power than before, but they had to measure themselves with a traditional fame which always magnifies. If Kean could come again, Kean would not seem to us what we believe he seemed to our fathers. Even they would wonder whether the old charm had fled.

In another way we often try to renew emotions by removing to the spot in which they were felt. We constantly go to Rome that we may go twice to a place for the first time. And yet how many a man of forty, who recalls what Europe was to him as a youth of twenty, recently began to go again, that he may renew that enjoyment!

When Fanny Kemble returned to the stage, it was remembered that twenty years of theatric practice had painted her. But histrionic or operatic verdicts are always mellowed by the intoxication of enthusiasm. We remember seems to us as beautiful as her lover describes her. No actor can satisfy your anticipations reared by your imagination upon the description of another. Malibran can never sing so sweetly as you believe her, or remember her, to have sung. Then in all great popularity there is something factitious. It overdoes the occasion. At best it is the foam upon the wine. Do not try to shake it back again. Sontag's prestige in her latter days, when the Countess became the cantatrice again, was a warm but sad Indian summer of success. Let us do no harm to the image of Jenny Lind, so frank, so fair, so willful, so earnest, so triumphant. The sky-lark, still singing, soars to our view. Let the memory be "a sightless song."

GORILLA DU CHAILLU.

IN mentioning the forthcoming books of travel, a few weeks since, the Lounger spoke of the work of Mr. Du Chaillu as one that would naturally attract more attention than any since Livingstone's. Those who remember his most interesting exhibition of the gorilla which he had brought back, will be very sure of the great interest of his story.

Mr. Du Chaillu went to England, a few weeks since, to superintend the English publication of his work, and has been the subject of an "ovation" from the Royal Geographical Society and many of the most distinguished men in England.

A very crowded meeting of the famous Society was held, with Sir Roderick Murchison in the chair. Among the guests of mark were the Count of Paris, the Right Honorable Mr. Gladstone, the American Minister and Consul, Professor Owen, Captains Sherard Osborn, and Forbes, Mr. Layard, the Austrian Minister, Sir Henry Holland, and many more of the men whose presence is considered the highest distinction.

The paper read was Mr. Du Chaillu's "Travels in the [Gorilla] Region of Western Equatorial Africa," illustrated by diagrams and specimens of the gorilla. After the reading was over, Sir Rod. Murchison made some remarks, and was followed by the greatest English authority upon comparative anatomy, Professor Owen, who said that natural history had never received a more remarkable acquisition than had been imported that evening. Hitherto we had obtained a few raw materials of this great gorilla; but now, for the first time, the naturalist had heard, from one who had lived among them in their country, some authentic account of its power and its habits."

Professor Owen was followed by the greatest orator in England, Mr. Gladstone. Mr. E. Glad stone, who "wished that it were in his power more frequently to appear in the character of a pupil. He could not, however, refrain from saying that they had heard that night one of the most modest talented, and enterprising of modern travellers; and in the city of commerce which he had communicated had been developed and applied to many of the highest and most important points of knowledge by a man of the most brilliant genius that in this or any other period has applied himself to the study."

The latter part of this remark applies to Owen, who has devoted himself to the examination of the gorilla.

Mr. Du Chaillu's work will be published simultaneously in New York and London.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE HERMIT IN THE WOOD.

FATHER JOHN was a holy man,
And he lived upon a wood,
The breamble fruit and the scarlet hip
Were all his simple food.

'Twas when the rose began to bloom,
And flush in crimson dyes,
He said, "Where is Madam Adam saved
As a relic of Paradise."

And when the thrush came to the time
To pour his melody,
He said, "It is my little child's out
An angel taught to sing."

A TAKING FASHION.

It is extraordinary what thieves owe to the fashions. This is their last debt, and one that they are never likely to repay, unless they take to the strong hand of justice.

A noted French pickpocket, upon his arrest, declared his opinion that Crinoline affords better opportunities for practising that light-fingered gentleman's nay style of dress previously worn. Being worn loosely away from the body, ample opportunity is afforded for the hand and gut of the purse without detection."

We are not sure, however, at its favoring the propensity of thieves, when we know that Crinoline itself is, in the generality of cases, strongly attached to steal. It may be called the perfect pick of the fashion.

NAVAL FASHIONS.

Steel corsets are beginning to be worn by frigates, but it has not been decided whether the bows in front or descend quite to the other extremity. The sides are pierced with holes for ventilation, forming a stylish spectacle. Crinoline is less employed than formerly, which, during the prevalence of March winds, is not to be regretted.

HAUSSE ET BAISSE.

HAUSSE.

I see a Brass Colossus, thinly gilt,
Who has fixed a tariff on twilight, and
Holding a huge mud-bobble, where doth waver,
The inscription "Gas at Discretion."

BAISSE.

The gold upon the brass is rent and tarnished,
The lacquer cracks with heat, and the clay was varnished.
A sudden cloud blots out the Imperial fire,
The huge mud-bobble, like Gas, shuts more is.

FINE OLD GIRLS.

The moralizing wit blunkets who try to make young girls old-fashioned with constant sentimental lamentation on the fugitive character of feminine charms, will find a refutation of their unwholesome philosophy in the subjoined extract from the "Fashions for March" in Le Follet:

"Velvet, though very effective, is only deemed suitable for elderly ladies."

The effect of the padding is in the end; for a pity of the velvet must lie in the wearing. As velvet is only recommended for the elderly, the presumption is that velvet is worn by elderly ladies only. Then the apparent paradox which at first sight strikes us is the only proof of its effectiveness. But velvet is very effective, either positive or negative. Whether worn where it is very effective, notwithstanding the wearers' time of life, or where, in the serious learning of a millinery, seems leaving the power of attracting admiration, and not that of exciting pain. We are to understand that elderly ladies in velvet create the same sort of sensation as that which their juniors dress with a view to exciting. In short, according to the Follet, elderly ladies in velvet look pretty, or at least handsome. This consideration may encourage the younger portion of the softer sex to dismiss all unpleasant suggestions as to the mayors of time, and indulge the pleasing confidence that Loveliness, in future, will outgrow mortality only to bloom perennially in velvet.

Which of our servants is most likely to steal the eggs?—The cook, who (cooked) is notorious for that species of larceny!

SYMPATHY.

BY A SAILOR.

That Dublin mayor[ess] trial—hear!
Most charming history to wend!
Few fellah! what a naweal hear!
A crowd case few him indeed!
A should not care few waving nobs,
And having all the Press at one;
Would be Lord Attorney some day,
And vastuous indignation's fun.

Three nine days' wonders soon elapse,
Whol I should feel to bring in,
By Jove! few liggany packages;
At any woe law lots of him!
I do admire the fellaw's pluck,
Web, deserving sumthething mad,
Owns he don't pay the mun work
The same respect as gentle blood.

It may town out all right at last—
Many a worthy A hope it may:
And he, when all the woe is past,
Will be Lord Attorney some day.
But still, whoever feels, henceforth,
Inclined to do that navy of things,
He'd better no go too few Navth,
Nor board a whaling wing.

TWO FRENCH IDOLS.

The Senate Napoleon exalts on a line,
Where if two names could stand, they would both be dimmed.

And a Bishop, effecting fanatical airs,
Up Pontius Pilate the Emperor compares.
The abuse and the lucrase alike are profane,
But shall the Tootles alone would continue
And give the Fanatic abundance of rope?
If Napoleon's Tiberius, why not the Pope?

SUPERNATURAL SWINDLE.

According to the Unita Italiana of Genoa, several Portuguese officers, having been made prisoners, had arrived at Genoa. These officers were all provided with a paper inscribed with the following words:

"Receive Father Pio, and for 100 years of pleasure indulgence to whoever takes arms against the excommunicated Alone, Victor Emanuel—Caminda au Lisbonne."

Of course a century of plenary indulgences could hardly be worth much, but it is also a natural sign of the mean advantage to be conferred in this other—remission, for a long, of purgatorial pains. In short, the Pope thinks, if it were not a mere humbug, would entitle the holder to a discharge from all the pains and penalties he may have before, in the regular way, his term of imprisonment would expire. The true extent of release above described, which the Pontifical soldiers were furnished with, by a convenient fiction, is that the Pope's troops being largely composed of brigands and bandits, were no doubt qualified in every respect, except amendment of life, to be not only spiritually, but also in a natural sense, ticket-of-leave men. As to Cardinal De Angelis, whose signature was appended to the paper now note of redemption from future punishment, he may call himself de Angelis, but he must consider himself a devil here for all our Angelis. Yet the Cardinal is only the Pope's deputy, so that the alliterate assertion of His Holiness, that greater than that pretended to by his Eminence. When an old priest, to induce credulous folk to buy his worthless commercial bauble, bribes the rascals with checks on the Bank of Divine Justice, to be payable, in the other world, the attitude that he has attained to is evidently that of absurdity or swindling.

A GOOD LICKING.

The height, or depth, of profane addiction was rarely arrived at by the French Senate in the antithesis presented by the following extract from their address to their imperial master:

"It was a fine day that on which, in the centre of the restored Cathedral, were heard the 'Te Deum' for the Lord, and the 'Domine Salvum' for the Emperor!"

Louis Napoleon smokes. In the presence of his Senators he will never want vapid praise.

Doctor Barter was a painter. He said, "The fellows of my college wished to have an organ in the chapel, but I put a stop to it." We suppose for the sake of the pun, or because he disliked music, is uncertain. He invited, for the love of music, Mr. Crowe and Mr. Booker to dine with him; and having given Mr. Birdmore, another guest, a bird to be eaten after the time, on his appearance, said, "Mr. Booker, Mr. Crowe, I beg leave to introduce you Bird more?"

There is a curious little song, dating back to 1691, entitled "O Mother, Hoop!" in which the fear of hoopskirts is set forth by a fair damsel in terms that would delight a Lounger who loves the picturesque:

"What a fine thing I have seen to-day!
O mother, my Cousin Kate
I must have one; you can not say nay!
O mother, O mother!"

Another stanza shows the practical usefulness of the hoop:

"Pray hear me, dear mother, what I have been taught,
How men do admire a handsome sport in a coat!
The men were all drown'd, but the women did float,
And by the help of their hoops were all saved to get out."

"The most luxurious smoker I ever knew," says Mr. Paget, "was a young Transylvanian, who told me that his servant always inserted a lighted pipe into his mouth every time he rang the morning bell, and then lighted it out before he awoke. 'It is so pleasant,' he observed, 'to have the proper taste restored to one's mouth before one is sensible even of its waste.'"

"Julius, what did you get dat coal?"
"Dem bank Pullo."
"What's dat?"
"Little wuly foam in Brattle Street, what it says 'Pull' on the door. I pulled dis coat, and run out."

THE FIVE DAUGHTERS.—A gentleman had five daughters, all of whom he brought up to some useful and respectable occupation in life. Two of them commenced soon after the other, with the concept of their father. The first married a gentleman, by the name of Peet; the second a Mr. Little; the third a Mr. Short; the fourth a Mr. Brown; and the fifth a Mr. Hogg. At the wedding of the latter her sisters, with their husbands, were present. After the ceremonies of the marriage were over, the old gentleman said to his guests: "I have taken great pains to educate my five daughters that they might fill their respects in life; and from their advantages and improvements I hoped that they would do honor to my family; and now I find that all my pains, cares, and expectations have turned out nothing but a Peet, Little, Short, Brown, Hogg."

A wayward son of Emerald Isle "left the bed and board" which he had bargained for with his wife, but came back a long while, and spent his time around rum-shops, where he was generally to be found. Returning to his lawful home one day behold "stand erect." Margaret was dissatisfied with this state of affairs, and endeavored to get her husband home again. We shall see how she proceeds—

"Now, Patrick, my honey, will you come home?"

"No, Margaret, I won't come home."

"And won't you come back for the love of the children?"

"Not for the love of the children, Margaret."

"Will you come back for the love of myself?"

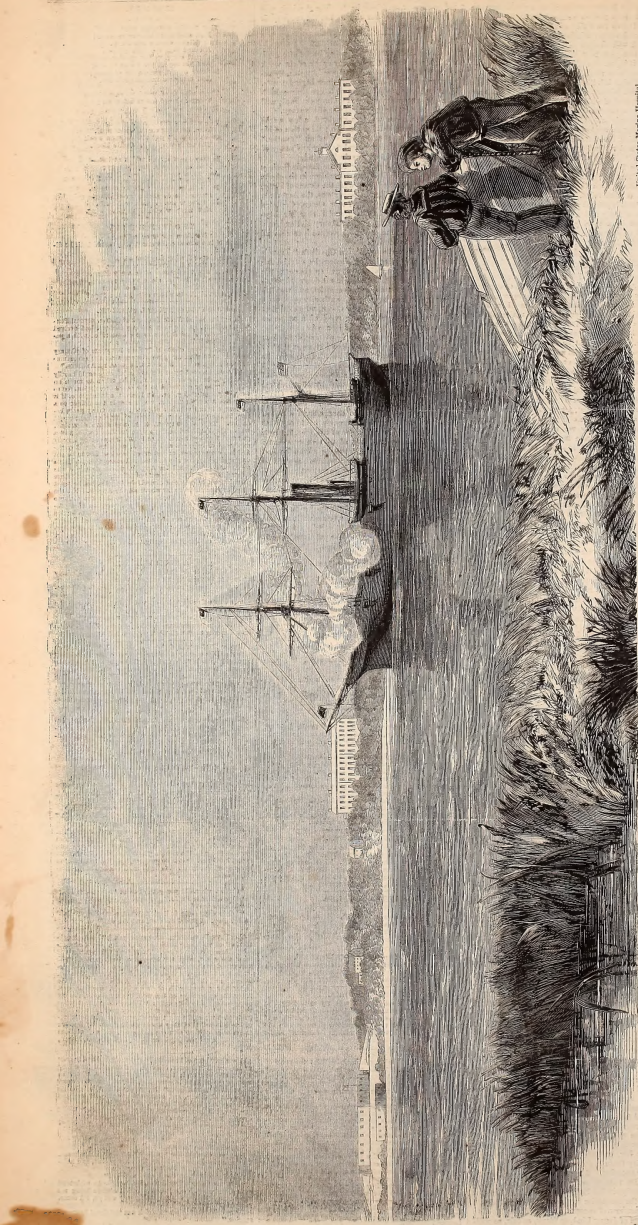
"Never at all. Why wid ye?"

Margaret thought she would try another inducement. Taking a pint-bottle of whisky from her pocket, holding it up to her truant husband, she said—

"Will you come for the drop of whisky?"

"Ah, me darling," said Patrick, unable to withstand such temptation, "it's yourself shall always bring me home again—ye has such a winning way wid ye, I'll come, Margaret."

Margaret declares that "Patrick was reclaimed by moral suasion."



THE UNITED STATES GUN-BOAT "WYANDOTTE" FIRING A SALUTE ON WASHINGTON'S BIRTHDAY IN PENSACOLA HARBOR.—DRAWN BY AN OFFICER OF LIEUT. SLEMMER'S COMMAND.

Fort Barrancas. Barrancas Barracks. Old Spanish Battery. Navy-yard. United States Marine Hospital.

LOST JEWELS.

A flash of gold—of silver sheen—
Of the light thrown quivering back
From gems that shone, like fairy things,
In the palace of Bull & Black.
A stately lady, fair and tall,
On her slender fingers tried
The jewelled circlets one by one,
But she laid them all aside.

"I have lost a gem that was brighter far
Than these in their shimmering light;
I shall never find it—never more—
It has sunk 'mid the coral white;
For it slipped as I pointed down below
To the waves 'round the good ship's prow,
And the ocean queen, in her gleaming home,
May be decked with its glory now."

In a weary tone, with a little sigh,
The lady swept the gems away,
And the quiet salesman put them back,
Till in glittering ranks they lay.
But his eye fell not on the diamond's light,
On the opal's changeful hue,
The purple gleam of the amethyst,
Or the pearls like drops of dew.

But a wistful, longing, eager gaze
He cast on the little child
Whom the lady held by a loving clasp—
He looked, but he never smiled:
For his eyes grew dim with coming tears
As he stooped to the golden head
For a good-by kiss. In a trembling tone,
Like a dreamer's voice, he said:

"And I a treasure, too, have lost,
That was dearer far to me
Than a tunble drop'd in an idle moof
Down in the dark blue sea.
My jewel slipped from my loving hand,
Though I clasped it on my heart
Till its light grew strangely dim and pale;
Then I knew we must sadly part.

"But I shall find my vanished gem,
I know"—and the speaker's face grew bright—
"Where the golden streets and the pearly gates
Will glow in its living light;
For His jewels all He will gather in,
That were lent on the earth to men;
And then in the shining rank I'll see
My long-lost pearl again."

On the lady's face a shadow fell,
And grave grew her laughing eye,
For she heard it still as she walked away—
"I shall find it by-and-by."
The boy put back his golden hair,
Glancing with movement shy,
And the echo came in his childish voice—
"He will find it by-and-by."

OUR FORT PICKENS PICTURES.

We continue our series of illustrations of Fort Pickens from sketches by our attentive correspondent in the fort. Our correspondent writes, with reference to the picture of the salute on Washington's birthday:

"This view of the Wyandotte firing a salute on Washington's birthday is taken from the same spot as my last sketch of Fort Pickens, but of course looking in the opposite direction.

"On the right is seen the United States Marine Hospital. On the left of the bow is Barrancas Barracks. In front of this, half hidden by trees, is a private house, economically allowed to cumber the premises in a most inconvenient manner. On the left of the barracks are part of the officers' quarters seen through the foliage, and on the extreme left is Fort Barrancas firing a salute in honor of the day. Between the fort and the long low white beach at the foot of its glacis, and flanked by low shrubbery, is the old Spanish stone water-battery, within a few rods of the ditch of the main work in its rear. When the Spaniards, at the approach of General Jackson, were helped off by the English, they blew up the old Fort San Carlos de Barrancas, on whose site the present fort was built; but the water-battery being uninjured was mounted subsequently by the Americans, and is in all other respects the work as the Spaniards left it.

"The Wyandotte is a third-class sloop of war, mounting four long thirty-twos on the main and two brass pieces on the upper deck. She is commanded by Captain Berryman, who, with his officers and men, deserve great praise for their conduct since the evacuation of Fort Barrancas, and for the aid given by them to Lieutenant Slemmer, in his labors both then and since. Berryman exposed the treason of his former comrades, and as soon as relieved from the incubus of Armstrong's command, was ordered to remain by Captain Wauk under the walls of the fort. The Wyandotte is sentinel, coast guard, and supply vessel for the fleet. The unanimity and pleasant concord existing between the naval and military commanders affects the men, who have more than once, and in a marked manner, displayed their amor patriæ. The few men in Fort Pickens, and the crew of the Wyandotte, are the only ones out here just now who have any thing to do; the rest lie out beyond the bar, and helplessly but unwillingly look on while these devoted fellows work like horses.

"At noon on the 22d some secession guns in the Navy-yard, to the right of the Hospital, next unexpectedly to us opened a salute; soon after a puff of smoke rolled up from Fort Barrancas, and hid their flag of our star and many stripes, and they were hardly fairly at it before Berryman's port showed a lightning flash, and a column of smoke shooting out, paused an instant, rose, and then the breeze, striking it in the centre, bore it to leeward in an N-like shape over the vessel, while a beautiful ring hung for a moment over the flag at the main, then mulled softly away, while one could hear exclamations of delight from our men on the ramparts. It was a grand, pleasing, but withal melancholy sight; these white puffs of smoke shrouding different flags, and yet honoring one man. The guns, all harmless now, and speaking in thunder tones for him whom we all call Father, might, alas! on the morrow be shotted and worked by brothers against brothers. I am sure we all felt the better for this unexpected meeting on a common ground.

Water Battery near Fort M'Rae.

THE FLAG-STAFF BASTION AT FORT PICKENS, FLORIDA.—[DRAWN BY AN OFFICER OF LIEUT. SLEMMER'S COMMAND, MARCH 6, 1861.]

"Looking seaward, we saw the Brooklyn and St. Louis close together, and wrapped in a cloud of smoke, while the rapid, spiteful discharges brought most vividly to mind one's idea of a naval battle. The Sabine was further off, pounding away majestically by herself, which I think she is well able to do. After all was silent, and the eyes of friend and foe were turned to Fort Pickens, a long thirty-two opened seaward, and then the salute ran from gun to gun around the whole parapet, and thus ended the 23d in Pensacola Harbor."

With regard to the other picture he writes, on 15th:

"Inclosed I send you a sketch of the Flag-staff Bastion of Fort Pickens. In my drawing of the fort last sent the flag appears on the northeast bastion. It has since been changed, and is now on the southwest, or diagonally opposite its former position, and in what may be called the rear. The staff is scarcely less temporary than the former, which was simply a long pole stuck up in the first hurry of occupation. The present one is a piece of joist propped up in the dirt of the parapet. The end of the covered way, with its buttressed traverse stairs leading down to the gallery, and the door to the gallery in the counterscarp, are all seen on the left, with the parapet of the covered way overlooking the beach, about two hundred yards distant.

"On the distant point on the other side of the channel is seen the water-battery of Fort M'Rae, which, by-the-way, has no guns. The fort itself is hidden from view by the bastion on which is seen the field-piece. To the left of the latter is a Columbiad pointing toward the hostile forces, and from the flank opposite to the one seen in the picture. The size and height of this gun renders it easy to see it over the intervening parapet. The two bastions represented are separated by a curtain. One embrasure of this curtain is seen beyond the nearest bastion. The face of the bastion to the left is loopholed for musketry.

"The two sail—one an English ship with painted ports, and the other a pilot-boat—are near the buoy in the Swash Channel."

GREAT EXPECTATIONS.

A NOVEL.

By CHARLES DICKENS.

CHAPTER XXIX.

AFTER well considering the matter while I was dressing at the Blue Boar in the morning, I resolved to tell my guardian that I doubted Orlick's being the right sort of man to fill a post of trust at Miss Havisham's. "Why, of course he is not the right sort of man, Pip," said my guardian, comfortably satisfied beforehand on the general head, "because the man who fills the post of trust never is the right sort of man." It seemed quite to put him into spirits to find that this particular post was not accidentally and exceptionally held by the right sort of man, and he listened in a satisfied manner while I told him what knowledge I had of Orlick. "Very good, Pip," he observed, when I had concluded, "I'll go 'round presently, and pay our friend off." Rather alarmed by this summary action, I was for a little delay, and even hinted that our friend himself might be difficult to deal with. "Oh no he won't," said my guardian, making his pocket-handkerchief point with perfect confidence: "I should like to see him argue the question with me."

As we were going back together to London by the mid-day coach, and as I breakfasted under such terrors of Pumblechook that I could scarcely hold my cup, this gave me an opportunity of saying that I wanted a walk, and that I would go on along the London Road while Mr. Jaggers was occupied, if he would let the coachman know that I would get into my place when overtaken. I was thus enabled to fly from the Blue Boar immediately after breakfast. By then making a loop of about a couple of miles into the open country at the back of Pumblechook's premises, I got round into the High Street again, a little beyond that pitfall, and felt myself in comparative security.

It was interesting to be in the quiet old town once more, and it was not disagreeable to be here and there suddenly recognized and stared after. One or two of the tradespeople even darted out of their shops and went a little way down the street before me, that they might turn, as if they had forgotten something, and pass me face to face—on which occasions I don't know whether they or I made the worse pretense; they of not doing it, or I of not seeing it. Still my position was a distinguished one, and I was not at all dissatisfied with it, until Fate threw me in the way of that unlimited miscreant, Trabb's boy.

Casting my eyes along the street at a certain point of my progress, I beheld Trabb's boy approaching, lashing himself with an empty blue bag. Deeming that a serene and unconscious contemplation of him would best discern me, and would be most likely to quell his evil mind, I advanced with that expression of countenance, and was rather congratulating myself on my success, when suddenly the knees of Trabb's boy smote together, his hair uprose, his cap fell off, he trembled violently in every limb, staggered out into the road, and crying to the populace, "Hold me! I'm so frightened!" feigned to be in a paroxysm of terror and contrition, occasioned by the dignity of my appearance. As I passed him his teeth loudly chattered in his head, and, with every mark of extreme humiliation, he prostrated himself in the dust.

This was a hard thing to bear, but this was nothing. I had not advanced another two hundred yards, when, to my inexpressible terror, amazement, and indignation, I again beheld Trabb's boy approaching. He was coming round a narrow corner. His blue bag was slung over his shoulder, honest industry beamed in his eyes, a determination to proceed to Trabb's with cheerful briskness was indicated in his gait. With a shock he became aware of me, and was severely visited as before; but this time his motion was rotatory, and he staggered round and round me with knees more afflicted, and with uplifted hands as if beseeching for mercy. His sufferings were hailed with the greatest joy by a knot of spectators, and I felt utterly confounded.

I had not got as much further down the street as the post-office, when I again beheld Trabb's boy shooting round by a back way. This time he was entirely changed. He wore the blue bag in the manner of my great-coat, and was strutting along the pavement toward me on the opposite side of the street, attended by a company of delighted young friends to whom he from time to time exclaimed, with a wave of his hand, "Don't know yah!" Words can not state the amount of aggravation and injury wreaked upon me by Trabb's boy, when, passing abreast of me, he pulled up his shirt-collar, twined his side-hair, stuck an arm akimbo, and smirked extravagantly by, wriggling his elbows and body, and drawling to his attendants, "Don't know yah, don't know yah, 'pon my soul don't know yah!" The disgrace attendant on his immediately afterward taking to crowing and pursuing me across the bridge with crows as from an exceedingly dejected fowl who had known me when I was a blacksmith, culminated the disgrace with which I left the town, and was, so to speak, ejected by it into the open country.

But unless I had taken the life of Trabb's boy on that occasion, I really do not even now see what I could have done save endure. To have struggled with him in the street, or to have exacted any lower recompense from him than his heart's best blood would have been futile and degrading. Moreover, he was a boy whom no man could hurt; an invulnerable and dodging serpent who, when chased into a corner, flew out again between his captor's legs, scurrilously yelping. I wrote, however, to Mr. Trabb by next day's post, to say that Mr. Pip must decline to deal further with one who could so far forget what he owed to the best interests of society, as to employ a boy who excited Loathing in every respectable mind.

The coach, with Mr. Jaggers inside, came up in due time, and I took my box-sent again, and arrived in London safe—but not sound, for my heart was gone. As soon as I arrived I sent a penitential codfish and barrel of oysters to Jos (as reparation for not having gone myself), and then went on to Barnard's Inn.

"HOLD ME! I'M SO FRIGHTENED!"

I found Herbert dining on cold meat, and delighted to welcome me back. Having dispatched The Avenger to the coffee-house for an addition to the dinner, I felt that I must open my breast that very evening to my friend and chum. As confidence was out of the question with The Avenger in the hall, which could merely be regarded in the light of an ante-chamber to the keyhole, I sent him to the Play. A better proof of the severity of my bondage to that taskmaster could scarcely be afforded than the degrading shifts to which I was constantly driven to find him employment. So mean is extremity that I sometimes sent him to Hyde Park corner to see what o'clock it was.

Dinner done and we sitting with our feet upon the fender, I said to Herbert, "My dear Herbert, I have something very particular to tell you."

"My dear Handel," he returned, "I shall esteem and respect your confidence."

"I conceras myself, Herbert," said I, "and one other person."

Herbert crossed his feet, looked at the fire with his head on one side, and having looked at it in vain for some time, looked at me because I didn't go on.

"Herbert," said I, laying my hand upon his knee. "I love—I adore—Estella."

Instead of being transfixed, Herbert replied in an easy, matter-of-course way, "Exactly. Well?"

"Well, Herbert? Is that all you say? Well?"

"What next, I mean?" said Herbert. "Of course I know that."

"How do you know it?" said I.

"How do I know it, Handel? Why, from you."

"I never told you."

"Told me! You have never told me when you have got your hair cut, but I have had sense to perceive it. You have always adored her, ever since I have known you. You brought your adoration and your portmanteau here together. Told me! Why you have always told me all day long. When you told me your own story, you told me plainly that you began adoring her the first time you saw her, when you were very young indeed."

"Very well, then," said I, to whom this was a new and not unwelcome light, "I have never left off adoring her. And she has come back a most beautiful and most elegant creature. And I saw her yesterday. And if I adored her before, I now doubly adore her."

"Lucky for you then, Handel," said Herbert, "that you have picked out for her a friend addicted to her. Without encroaching on forbidden ground, we may venture to say that there can be no doubt between ourselves of that fact. Have you any idea yet of Estella's views on the adoration question?"

I shook my head gloomily. "Oh! she is thousands of miles away from me," said I.

"Patience, my dear Handel: time enough, time enough. But you have something more to say?"

"I am ashamed to say it," I returned, "and yet it's no worse to say it than to think it. You call me a lucky fellow. Of course I am. I was a blacksmith's boy but yesterday; I am—what shall I say I am—to-day?"

"Say a finished fellow, if you want a phrase," returned Herbert, smiling, and clapping his hand on the back of mine, "a good fellow with impetuous but honorable feelings, and with diffidence, action and dreaming, curiously mixed in him."

I stopped for a moment to consider whether there really was this mixture in my character. On the whole, I by no means recognized the analysis, but thought it not worth disputing.

"When I ask what I am to call myself today, Herbert," I went on, "I suggest what I have in my thoughts. You are so lucky. I know I have done nothing to raise myself in life, and that Fortune alone has raised me; that is being very lucky. And yet, when I think of Estella—"

"And when don't you, you know?" Herbert threw in, with his eyes on the fire; which I thought kind and sympathetic of him.)

"Then, my dear Herbert, I can not tell you how dependent and uncertain I feel, and how exposed to hundreds of chances. A reading forbidden ground as you did just now, I may still say that on the constancy of one person (naming no person) all my expectations depend. And of the best, how indefinite and unsatisfactory only to know so vaguely what they are!" In saying this, I relieved my mind of what had always been there, more or less, though no doubt most since yesterday.

"Now, Handel," Herbert replied, in his gay, hopeful way, "it seems to me that in the despondency of the tender passion we are looking into our pipe-bowls instead of the magnifying glass. Likewise, it seems to me that concentrating our attention on that examination we altogether overlook some of the best points of the animal. Didn't you tell me that your guardian, Mr. Jaggers, told you in the beginning that you were not endowed with expectations only? And even if he had not told you so—though that is a very large If, I grant—could you believe that, of all men in London, Mr. Jaggers is the man to hold his present relations toward you unless he were sure of his ground?"

I said I could not deny that this was a strong point. I said it (people often do so, in such cases) like a rather reluctant concession to truth and justice—as if I wanted to deny it!

"I should think it was a strong point," said Herbert, "and I should think you would be puzzled to imagine a stronger; as to the rest, you must bide your guardian's time, and he must bide his client's time. You'll be one-and-twenty before you know where you are, and then perhaps you'll get some further enlightenment. At all events you'll be nearer getting it, for it must come at last."

"What a hopeful disposition you have!" said I, gratefully admiring his cheery ways.

"I ought to have," said Herbert, "for I have not much else. I must acknowledge, by-the-by, that the good sense of what I have just said is not my own, but my father's. The only remark I ever heard him make on your story was the final one: 'The thing is settled and done, or Mr. Jaggers would not be in it.' And now before I say any thing more about my father, or my father's son, and your confidence with confidence, I want to make myself seriously disagreeable to you for a moment—positively repulsive."

"You won't succeed," said I.

"Oh yes I shall!" said he. "One, two, three, and now I am in for it. Handel, you are a good fellow"—though he spoke in this light tone he was much in earnest—"I have been thinking since we have been talking with our feet on this fender, that Estella may prove to be a condition of your inheritance, if she was never referred to by your guardian. Am I right in so understanding what you have told me, that he never referred to her, directly or indirectly, in any way? Never even hinted, for instance, that your patron might have views as to your marriage ultimately?"

"Never."

"Now, Handel, I am quite free from the flavor of sour grapes, upon my soul! Not being bound to her, can you not detach yourself from her?—I told you I should be disagreeable."

I turned my head aside, for, with a rush and a sweep, like the old marshes when they sprang up from the sea, a feeling like that which had subdued me on the morning when I left the forge, when the mists were rising, and when all that I had my hand upon the village finger-post, smote upon my heart again. There was silence between us for a little while.

"Yes, but my dear Handel," Herbert went on, as if we had been talking instead of silent, "it's having been so strongly rooted in the breast of a boy under romantic circumstances made so romantic renders it very serious. Think of her bringing-up, and think of Miss Havisham. Think of what you have told me, and what you have observed, and what I (not I am repulsive, and you abominate me). This may lead to miserable things."

"I know it," said I, and I, with my head still turned away, "but I can't help it."

"You can't detach yourself?"

"No. Impossible!"

"Well!" said Herbert, getting up with a lively shake as if he had been asleep, and stirring the fire, "now I'll endeavor to make myself agreeable again."

So he went round the room and shook the curtains out, put the chairs in their places, tidied the books and so forth that were lying about, looked into the hall, peeped into the letter-box, shut the door, and came back to his chair by the fire; where he sat down, nursing his left leg in both arms.

"I was going to say a word or two, Handel, concerning my father and my father's son. I am afraid it is scarcely worth while going into it soon to remark that my father's establishment is not particularly brilliant in its housekeeping."

"There is no secrecy, Herbert," said I, "to say something encouraging."

"Oh yes! and so the dustman says, I believe, with the strongest possible assurance, when he has nine store-shop in the best street. Gravely, Handel, for the subject is grave enough; you know how it was that I came to Mr. Pocket. I suppose my father was a time once when my father had not given matters up; but if there ever was, the time is gone. Mrs. Pocket was a Stoyles, and no lucky. I know I have done nothing to raise myself in life, and that Fortune alone has raised me; that is being very lucky. And yet, when I think of Estella—"

"And when don't you, you know?" Herbert threw in, with his eyes on the fire; which I thought kind and sympathetic of him.)

"Then, my dear Herbert, I can not tell you how dependent and uncertain I feel, and how exposed to hundreds of chances. Avoiding as I dressed, made the same mistakes in his reading at rehearsal, till I got him to put a large red wafer on each of his shins, and then at that rehearsal (which was the last) I went in front, Sir, to the back of the pit, and whenever his reading brought him into profile, I called out 'I don't see no wafers!' And at night his reading was lovely."

Mr. Waldengarver smiled at me, as much as to say "A faithful dependent—I overlook his folly:" and then said aloud, "My view is a little classic and thoughtful for them here; but they will improve, they will improve."

Herbert and I said together, Oh, no doubt they would improve.

"Did you observe, gentlemen," said Mr. Waldengarver, "that there was a man in the gallery who endeavored to cast disrepute on the service —I mean, the representation?"

We basely replied that we rather thought we had noticed such a man. I added, "He was drunk, no doubt."

"Oh dear no, Sir," said Mr. Wopsle, "not drunk. His employer would see to that, Sir. His employer would not allow him to be drunk."

"You know his employer?" said I.

Mr. Wopsle shut his eyes, and opened them again; performing both ceremonies very slowly.

"You must have observed, gentlemen," said he, "an ignorant and a blatant person, with a rasping throat, and a countenance expressive of low malignity, who went through—I will not say sustained—the role (if I may use a French expression) of Claudius King of Denmark. That is his employer, gentlemen. Such is the profession!"

Without distinctly knowing whether I should have been more sorry for Mr. Wopsle if he had been in direct employment, I was so sorry for him as it was, that I took the opportunity of his turning round to have his braces put on—which jostled us out at the door—to ask Herbert if he could be thought of having him home to supper? Herbert said he thought it would be kind to do so; therefore I invited him, and he went to Barnard's with us, wrapped to the eyes, and partook of mutton for him, and he sat until two o'clock in the morning, reviewing his success and developing his plans. I forget in detail what they were, but I have a general recollection that he was to begin with reviving the Drama, and to end with crushing it inasmuch as his decease would leave it utterly bereft and without a chance or hope.

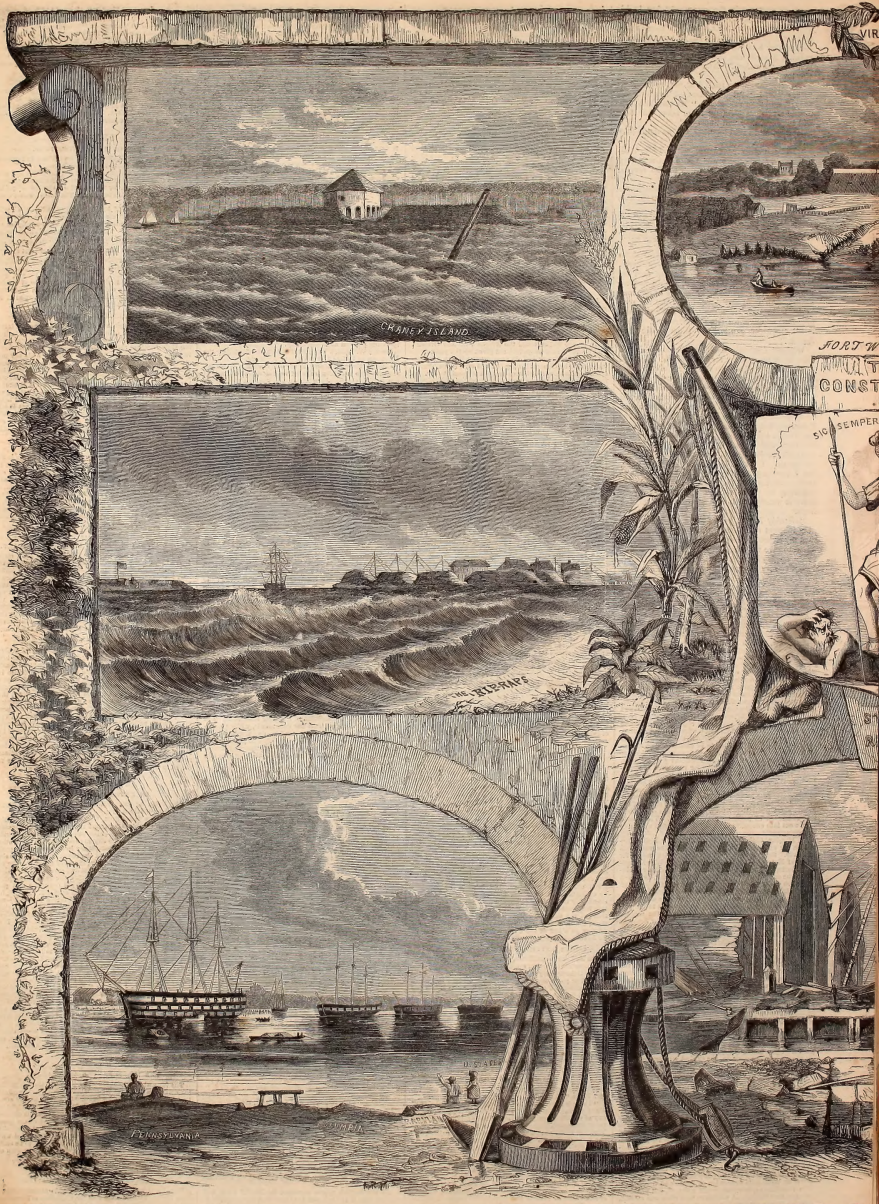
Miserably I went to bed after all, and miserably thought of Estella, and miserably dreamed that my expectations were all canceled, and that I had to go for my hand in marriage to Herbert's Clara, or play Hamlet to Miss Havisham's Ghost, before twenty thousand people without knowing twenty words of it.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

EXTRA SESSION OF THE SENATE.

On Friday, 22d, in the United States Senate, Senator Hale offered a resolution that the Senate proceed to an election of Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper. It was laid over. A resolution directing the payment of extra compensation to those of committees was discussed, and rejected. Senator Doolittle's resolution calling for information as to the pledge of the administration with reference to the Southern forts was then taken up, and Senator Bayard concluded his remarks in opposition to the independence of the Confederate States. He was followed by Senator Lane, of Wisconsin, in favor of the motion. Before Senator Howe had concluded the Senate went into executive session, and confirmed appointments.

On Saturday 23d, in the Senate, the Vice-President having signified his intention to be absent during the remainder of the session, on motion of Senator Hale, Senator Foot, of Vermont, was elected President pro tempore. Senator Foot returned his thanks for the honor in appropriate terms. Senator Sherman, on the part of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a bill to provide for the reception of consuls and other commercial agents appointed by the Confederate States. He was followed by Senator Wilkinson, of Minnesota



VIRGINIA SKETCHES.—By

SPECIAL ARTIST.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

OUR VIRGINIA SCENES.

ONE of our artists has just returned from a sketching tour through Virginia, and has furnished us with the pretty collection of pictures published on the two preceding pages. Most of the scenes are familiar, at least by name, to all our readers.

Beginning from the westward, Fort Washington is situated on the northern, or Maryland side of the Potomac River, about fourteen miles below Washington City. It is garrisoned by a company of United States Rifles. The sketch is taken looking up the river. It is not by any means impregnable, being almost defended on the land side, but, from its elevation, it would be difficult to take by assault from the water front.

Richmond Armory, at Richmond, Virginia, was originally built for the purpose of making arms for the State of Virginia, and as a barracks for the "Public Guard"—a regularly enlisted body of men paid by the State, whose duty it is to guard the public property, quell insurrection, or perform any needed military service in the State. The manufacture of arms has not ceased some time ago, until it was recently determined, in view of the sectional disturbances, to recommence operations, which are being principally carried at present on to extended a scale that the Guard is to be removed to other quarters, and the whole building used for military manufactures. In the gig quadrangle are several fine brass guns and mortars presented to the State by the French Government. The sketch is taken from Gamble's Hill, and overlooks the Valley of James River, showing the Southern Railroad, on Petersburg Bridge.

Cranet Castle is situated south of the Elizabeth River. The Americans erected fortifications there in 1812, which commanded the entrance to Norfolk harbor. In the 23d June, 1813, a powerful British fleet made an attack upon these works. A part of the hostile force landed on Nansemond Point, and a part attacked from the island in barges. The former were driven off by the Virginia militia, and the latter were so galled by the guns of artillery that landed, that they destroyed retreated to the ships. The repulse was decisive. More than two hundred of the enemy were killed and wounded. Norfolk, Portsmouth, and Gosport were saved.

Fort Norfolk stands a mile or so below that city. It is not of much use at present, having been pierced. Barbette guns, however, can be used; but at present no guns are mounted at all. Used as a magazine.

Fort Calhoun, or The Rip Raps, so called from being built on a made island of sunken stones —c. Rip Raps—is situated in Hampton Roads, opposite Newport News. It is of the usual lying between them. The stones of this fort were piled upon one another (without mortar in some places until the foundation reached, when the regular building was commenced. It is only carried up one tier, and the work has been stopped since political troubles began. The material is James River granite.

The "United States ships of war "Pennsylvania," "Columbia," "Raritan," and "United States"—the latter the only one of any historical interest—lie at the Norfolk, or more properly, the Portsmouth navy yard. The first-named is used as a receiving-ship. The others are dismantled and weather-stained, the United States being a store hulk.

The steam frigate "Merrimac" is moored to the wharf at the Norfolk Navy-yard, spars all down, deck housed over, presenting a very rusty appearance altogether.

The centre vignette, the arms of the State of Virginia, deserves some notice, as it is the most effective, artistically considered, in the whole blazonry of the States. The Constitution of the State prescribed that there should be an armed female figure of Virtue, or Liberty, trampling the prostrate figure of a man, with a broken crown and fetters lying near, and the motto "Sic Semper Tyrannis"—"Thus always with Tyrants."

BESSIE ELMORE.

Bessie Elmore was my cousin. She is my cousin now that she is not Bessie Elmore, though she is the same Bessie.

Bessie was not a "flirt"—at least not a wicked nor a heartless one. I say so, for I think I ought, and was subjugated, she had always a captive in her train.

Let no one suppose that she was a gentle, sentimental, long-ringlested fair one. Gentle she was not, nor is now, unless the winds and waves of foreign lands have greatly changed her, though no one could fulfill the tender ministrations of woman with a softer grace.

She spent a winter with me a year or two after her mother died, and long talks we had—of things in heaven and things on earth; for there was nothing into which she did not enter.

Love and marriage came in for a share of attention; and Bessie's indignation grew hot and high as we discussed the conduct of many of our acquaintance, which exemplified what she called the popular ideas of marriage. "A man expects his wife to fulfill all the duties of a housekeeper, and often of a cook and seamstress; to yield to all his lightest wishes 'with sweet attractive grace;' to smile upon him whenever he comes into her presence, however weary or ill she may be; never to put forth her own wishes; and above all, never to be intrusted with a family purse, but meekly to ask for 'whatever he deems is right for them!'" At this point of illustration Bessie's holy wrath rose past fever heat, and was only expressed by fierce "snorts" and tossings of her round shoulders, which took the place of words to those who knew her.

One day in August my brother Joe came in, having been "down street," in village parlance, and of course being "posted" on all matters.

"Bessie," said he, "one of your beaux has followed you here—Mr. Browning, Harry Browning. I just left him; he came in town last night—has business in this section of country,' he says; but lawyers have business in all sections, I think."

Bessie turned to me: "Now is your time, Anne; I've always told you he was your man; it is all coming right."

"Well done, Queen Bess!" said Joe; "you speak as if he were yours to give—one of your subjects. You are a genuine specimen—the 'real' coquette."

"Ah, Joe, you should have given me more than my share of sins. I'm innocent here. He is one of your solemn chaps. I've always told Anne she could have him. He doesn't take kindly to such butterflies as I; the strong-minded female is his ideal;" and she made a low bow at my feet.

"Settle it between you, my girls, and don't come to blows. He told me he should call this afternoon," and Joe went out. He opened the door, put in his head—"Don't be too much on the young ladies, it was only because I urged him!" and he made his final exit, a stream of exclamations, questions, and laughter following him through the hall.

The afternoon brought with it Mr. Henry Browning, and also a discovery. After the introductions were accomplished, and we, comfortably arranged, were launched upon the social sea, I missed Bessie. Where was she? She had a peculiar charm of conversation, by which she could make herself, if she chose, equally agreeable to old and young, and was always to be relied on in chance evils. I said she could not be gone? No. She sat close by, listening with perfectly well-bred attention to our discourse. Whenever Mr. Browning addressed himself to her, she answered just as any nice, pleasant young lady would do, but not at all like my Cousin Bessie. The truth flashed upon me with such force that I, myself, felt crimson, blushed like any rose while Mr. Browning was making some very unimpressive remark about climates, and seemed a little surprised at my susceptibility.

I regained myself with as little delay as possible, and answered him. Meantime, I thought of what might and might not be.

It was discovered by my father that Mr. Browning had a great deal of property, and by my mother that he was a zealous politician; and thus, between them, he had a general invitation to our house at all times and seasons, of which he availed himself. Agreeable at first, he continued to improve upon acquaintance. He did sometimes have a very solemn air. Bessie declared he was then silting in judgment upon our follies.

Meanwhile the long August days, filled each with sunshine and dying in purple mist, melted into each other and passed away. Many of their hours were spent with Mr. Browning. He was a college friend of Arthur Elmore, Bessie's brother, and always every year visited him at his home with Arthur for a day or two; so they were old acquaintance. I knew many of Bessie's admirers: they were still in my mind. We always spoke of them by brief titles ("Will," "Lewis," "Boel," etc.); but never, through all my knowledge of her, had she spoken of this one otherwise than as "Mr. Browning." Her manner to him was pleasantly cordial—precisely what it would have been to our friend and companion Arthur's fellow-student, except that it lacked the reverence which superior age would have received from her. For if his opinions differed from those ever approached, as she thought, toward the verge of meanness of any sort, or displayed a false taste, the crust of reserve was taken from her, and the indignation revealed itself in varied wit, ridicule, and irony.

But when he revealed a lofty manliness, keen intellect, or any deep feeling, Bessie sat quietly listening, her eyes industriously bent upon her needle-work, with which she always fortified herself, and sometimes she slightly averted her face, as if she distrusted her self-control. In a word, while in his presence she completely transformed herself, and was, to all intents and purposes, another person, and not my own great-hearted Bessie. I was thoroughly vexed with her. But remonstrance would have been useless, if I had possessed the ability to attempt it. For upon the day about every thing else, and peculiarly attractive to those she loved and trusted in her unreserved and full discussion of herself or others, the subject I could easier have sealed the Andes than have uttered a word. Indeed she so perfectly assumed that there was no "mystery" in it, that I, myself, when absent, so precisely as if he were a middle-aged friend of her father's, that I was often completely baffled; but when the next interview confirmed me in my first opinion.

I passed many unhappy hours that summer in thinking of Bessie. Many sleepless nights had long careless air whenever he was talked of or present; there were times, and they increased in number and in quality, when I found her very wretched. So used often to sit at the end of the piano, while I, in the long summer twilight, would play, at her desire, some of Beethoven wildest and saddest airs in their deep chords and mazy wanderings such strong, passionate life and longing, and for the most part unquieted and aching sense of sympathy and despair, and when I turned, startled, her face showed not a gleam of light, and she often left me and was seen no more till morning.

I had called this a "flirtation" in the beginning, and was at length convinced, much against my will, that he did not love her, though I was sure she intended he should, and simply because he was a student of human nature. When I was reluctantly obliged to confess to myself that she was indifferent to him I felt painfully crushed and hopeless, as if I had glanced at the veritable book of fate. Indeed, I began to wish that Mr. Browning's business, whatever it was, might be speedily accomplished. My woman's heart was sorely grieved for Bessie, and my fancy began to be filled with visions of a trip to Niagara, Newport, Nahant —any where to cheat the dear one from herself. And yet I knew that she was one of the very few who would never be thus cheated.

About half a mile behind our house was an old saw-mill. It stood in a wild glen, and the little mill-pond behind it, edged with tall trees and shrubs of various kinds, which made a green mansion on its placid face, was our favorite resort. It was in the early September that, by mutual though hardly spoken consent, we found ourselves in our accustomed seat. Bessie was in one of her bitter despairing moods. An uncle of mine, who had been for long years a missionary in a distant station, had left us that morning. He was on a brief visit to the land of his youth, to get fresh vigor for himself and new teachers for his work. We had been speaking of him. "He can not but be happy," said Bessie, "whatever he may lack, for he knows he is constantly creating happiness. But what do I do? What am I? Who is the better for it? Oh, I'm sick of myself!" She was silent for a moment, and then turned to me with a sad smile: "It would not be a proper reason for going on a mission though, would it, because one was sick of one's self?" The sorrow deepened in her face as she spoke, and I—"Sometimes I say I've made no growth these years—fool—from a little child that 'felt its life in every limb,' I'm come to have a sorrow gone out of every joy—that's progress, I'm thinking!" She hid her face in her hands, and her sobs shook her. It was the rarest thing for me to weep for any one, and when she did the passion seemed to rend and tear its way like a destroying flood. I sat silent and sad, knowing that I could not console, and that "sair grief must have its will." I looked up and saw Jane, the servant-girl, approaching.

"Miss Anne, your mother wants you in the house for a little."

"I'll be back soon, Bessie," said I, and ran home. Various causes combined to detain me, and it was an hour before I again found my way to the mill. And what a spectacle saluted my infallible, philosophizing eyes! My cousin Bessie, with a dewy rose-bush growing in bloom at sunrise, both her hands in the manly clasp of Henry Browning!

I stood bewildered. Mr. Browning, whose fine eyes are a little dimmed, turns to me and says:

"My dear friend, let me introduce to you—my dearest friend and wife!"

Bessie, suddenly restored to her faculties, with lowly bowing head, says:

"I also introduce him to you."

I still stood stupefied. My own clear, critical judgment, and the results thereof, are fast drifting down the tide, and my tongue refuses to "utter the thoughts that arise in me."

"But how—why—what," at last, in homely Saxon, "why in the world did you seem so cool and indifferent, and come to spy out the land, and it is unworthy of you."

Mr. Browning linked one arm into mine, put the other about Bessie's shoulder of his Bessie, and we turned homeward.

"My friend Anne," said he, in his deep voice, "Bessie and I think we have a claim on your candor—a wicked pride. Never, through all the days of our acquaintance, have I dreamed that she cared for me. I felt a very strong and growing sorrow in that belief. Until just now, seeing her in tears, my sympathy stilled my pride, and love spake. That first time I came to spy out the land, and it is unworthy of you."

Mr. Browning linked one arm into mine, put the other about Bessie's shoulder of his Bessie, and we turned homeward.

"My friend Anne," said he, in his deep voice, "Bessie and I think we have a claim on your candor—a wicked pride. Never, through all the days of our acquaintance, have I dreamed that she cared for me. I felt a very strong and growing sorrow in that belief. Until just now, seeing her in tears, my sympathy stilled my pride, and love spake. That first time I came to spy out the land, and it is unworthy of you."

We walked on in silence. As we drew near the house I said, "And shall you go on the mission, Bessie?"

She smiled into his eyes. "Oh yes, I have always wanted."

He have never recovered that keenness of observation and unfailing judgment for which I was previously so remarkable. I am afraid I never shall.

And years of wedded life have not shaken Bessie's love and faith in Mr. Henry Browning, but rather have added thereto.

A DAY'S RIDE:

A LIFE'S ROMANCE.

By CHARLES LEVER.

AUTHOR OF "CHARLES O'MALLEY," "HARRY LORREQUER," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XLVI.

THROUGH I was a few minutes late for dinner, Miss Herbert did not chide me for delay. She was charming in her reception of me; nor was the fascination diminished to me by feeling with what generous warmth she had defended and upheld me.

Miss Herbert heard with joy that I had already secured a passage for Constantinople, and declared that she could not dismiss from her mind the impression that I was destined to aid Turkey in her present and future prosperity. I liked the notion, too, of there being a fate in our first meeting—a fate in that acquaintanceship of which the fortunes, which gave the occasion to seek her out again; and, last of all, if it might be so, a fate in the influence I was to exercise over their fortunes. I can not better show the tone of mind in these pleasant themes than by the simple fact, that I, with as little of the lion in my heart as any man breathing, I, whose whole personality through life had been a spirit with more of the dove than the dragon in it—I, I repeat, never once thought of the danger—never all the dire consequences that impended me. If any thing can show an intense preoccupation, this may.

How the scene, even yet, rises before me, as we bent together over the great map spread out upon the table, so close together that her long ringlets once touched my cheek. What pretexts did I invent to give importance to some spot upon the map, just that I might touch her hand as I pointed it out; and how my heart beat as her soft breath fanned me while she spoke! She was just telling when and from whence I was to write to her, when the servant came to say that a gentleman outside begged to see Mr. Potts. I guessed rightly who this must be, and hurried to the hall, where he was standing.

"Not come to disturb you, Potts," said the skipper, in a brisk tone; "only thought it best to make your mind easy, you know. It's all right."

"A thousand thanks, captain," said I, warmly. "I knew when the negotiation was in your hands it would be so."

"Yes; his friend, a Major Colesby, boggled a bit at first. Couldn't see a thing in the light I put it. Asked very often 'who were you?' asked, too, 'what I was?' Good that! I made me laugh. Rather late in the day, I take it, to ask who Bob Rogers is! But in the end, as I said, it all comes right, quite right."

"And his apology was full, ample, and explicit? Was it in writing, Rogers? I'd like it in writing."

"Like what in writing?"

"His apology, or explanation, or whatever you like to call it."

"Why, ever spoke of such a thing? Who so much as dreamed of it? Haven't I told you the affair is all right? and what does all right mean, eh?—who does it mean?"

"I know what it ought to mean," said I, gingerly.

"So do I, and so do most men in this island, Sir. It means twelve paces under the Battery wall, fire together, and as many shots as the gridiron'll go by. That's all right, isn't it?"

"In one sense it is so," said I, with a mock composure.

"Well, that's the only sense I ever meant to consider it by. Go back now to your tea, or your sugar-and-water, or whatever it is, and when you come home to-night just step into my room, and we'll have a cozy chat and a cigar. There's one or two trifling things that I don't understand in the affair, and I'll get my own explanation on them, and maybe it ain't the right one. Not that it signifies now, you perceive, because you are going, and so the fire can't burn right. But as by this time to-morrow you might be where—I won't mention—we may as well put them out of our minds evening."

"I'll beat you up, depend upon it," said I, affecting a slap-dash style. "I can't tell you how glad I am to find allies into your hands, Rogers. You suit me exactly."

"Well, it's more than I expected when I saw you first, and I kept saying to myself, 'Whatever could have persuaded Joe to send me a creature like that?' To tell you the truth, I thought you were in the cheap funeral line."

"Droll dog," said I, while my fingers were writhing and twisting with passion.

"Not that it's fair to take a fellow by his looks—I'm sure I'm not that, Potts. Let's get back to the parlor—that's the second time the maid has come out to see what keeps you. Go back, and enjoy yourself; maybe you won't have so pleasant an opportunity soon again!"

This was the parting speech of the wretch as he buttoned the collar of his coat, and with a short nod bade me good-by, and left me.

"Why did you not ask your friend to take a cup of tea with us?" said Kate, as I re-entered the drawing-room.

"Oh! it was the skipper, a rough sort of creature, not exactly made for drawing-room life; besides, he only came to ask me a question."

"I hope it was not a very unpleasant one, for you look pale and anxious."

"Nothing of the kind—a mere formal matter about my baggage."

It was then that from that moment out I was the most miserable of mankind. What availed it to speculate any longer on the future? How could I interest myself in what years might bring forth? Hours, and a very few of them, were all that were left to me. Poor girl! how tenderly she tried to divert my mournful spirit, how most probably, scarcled it to the prospect of my speedy separation from her; and with a delicacy only to be found in her own, she forbore to cross out faint outlines of what painters call a "back distance"—a sort of future, where all the skies would be more serene and all the mountains blue. I am sure, if a choice had been given me at that instant, I would rather have been in brave, resolute misery than the greatest genius in the universe. So far, too, from rallying my spirits by the prospect of our next meeting, the only picture that my fancy drew was of a tender yet subdued greeting of cheerful gloom. I knew better what was before me. At last it came to ten o'clock, and I arose to say good-by. I was just about to tell her to fill upon her neck, and say, "Don't be angry with poor Potts; this is his last as it is his first embrace—"

"Wear that ring for me and my sake," said she, giving me one from her finger; "don't refuse me—this was my mother's, and you may attach to it from having been mine."

Oh dear! what a gulp it cost me not to say, "I'll never take it off while I live," and then add, "which will be about eight hours and a half more."

When I got into the open air I ran as if a pack of wolves were in pursuit of me. I can not say why; but the rapid motion served to warm my blood, so that when I reached the hotel I felt more composed and more resolute.

Rogers was asleep, and so soundly, that I had to pull the pillow from beneath his head before I could awaken him; and when I had accomplished the feat, either the remote effect of his hard sleeping-and-water or his drowsiness had so obscured his faculties that all he could mumble out was, "Hit him where he can't be spliced—hit him where they can't splice him!" I tried for a long time to recall him to sense and intelligence, but I got nothing from him save the one inestimable precept; and so I went to my room, and throwing myself on my bed in my cloak, prepared for a night of gloomy retrospect and gloomier anticipation; but, odd enough, I was asleep the moment I lay down.

"Get up, old fellow," cried Rogers, shaking me violently, just as the dawn was breaking; "we're lucky if we can get aboard before they catch us!"

"What do you mean?" said I. "What's happened?"

"The governor has got wind of our shindy, and put all the red coats in arrest, and ordered the police to nab us too."

"Bless him! bless him!" muttered I.

"Ay, so say I. He be blessed!" cried he, catching up my words; "but let us make off through the garden; my gig is down in the offing, and they'll pull in when they hear my whistle. Ain't it provoking—ain't it enough to make a man swear?"

"I have no words for what I feel, Rogers," said I, hurriedly about to collect my stray articles through the room. "If I ever chance upon that governor—he has only five years of it—I believe—"

"Come along! I see the boat coming round the point yonder." And with this we slipped noiselessly down the stairs, down the street, and gained the jetty.

"Steam up?" asked the skipper, as he jumped into the gig.

"Ay, ay, Sir; and we're short on the anchor, too."

In less than half an hour we were under way, and I don't think I ever admired a land prospect receding from view with more intense delight than I did that, my last glimpse of Malta.

CHAPTER XLVII.

I have very little more to tell, and I will be as brief as may be in the telling. Our voyage had nothing remarkable on record, we touched Constantinople in due course, and during the few days the Cyclops remained I had abundant time to discover that there was no trace of any one resembling Miss Forbes in the city. By the advice of Rogers, with whom now I had struck up a sort of friendship, I accompanied him to Odessa. Traveling I was not much enamored of, though I instituted the most persevering inquiries, all I could learn was that some American crews employed by the Russian Government in raising the frigates sunk at Sebastopol, and that it was not impossible an Englishman, such as I described, might have met a countryman among them. At all events, one of the consulting craft was already at Odessa, and I went on board of it to make my inquiries. I learned from the mate, who was a German, that they had come over on rather a strange errand, which was to survey a corps of convicted people in Balaclava. The American contractor at that place being in want of some amusement, had arranged with these people to give some weeks' performances there, but that, from an incident that had just occurred, the project had failed. This was no less than the elopement of the chief dancer, a young girl of great beauty, with a young Prince of Bavaria. It was rumored that he had married her, but my informant gave little credence to this version, and averred that he believed he had bought, not only herself, but a favorite old Arab horse she rode, for thirty thousand piastres. I asked eagerly where the others of the corps were to be found, and heard they had crossed over to Simoom, all broken up and disjointed, in the chief clown having died of grief after the girl's flight.

If I heard this tale rudely narrated, and not always with the sort of commiseration I went with my sympathies, I sorrowed sincerely over it, for I guessed upon whom these events had fallen, and recognized poor old Vätrchen and the dark-eyed Tintenfleck.

This mare grazed sorely on all my susceptibilities, and on the after day I went to go down to the quay, and sit talking with him over this event.

"You've fallen into the black melancholies these times, Mr. Burke," said Rogers to me. "Rouse up, and take a cruise with me. I'm going over to Balaclava with these steam-boilers, and then to Simoom, and back to the Bosphorus. Come aboard to-night—it will do you good."

I took his counsel, and at noon next day we dropped anchor at Balaclava. We had scarcely passed our "health papers" when a boat came out with a message to inquire if we had a doctor on board who could speak English, for the American contractor had fallen from one of the scaffolds that morning, and was lying dreadfully injured up at Sebastopol, but unable to explain himself to the Russian surgeons. I was not without some small skill in medicine; and, besides, out of common humanity, I felt it my duty to set out, and at about sunset I reached Sebastopol.

Being supposed to be a physician of great skill and eminence, I was treated by all the persons about with much deference, and, after very few minutes' delay, introduced into the room where the sick man lay. It had been his orders that when an English doctor could be found he was to be left entirely alone together; so that as I entered the door was closed immediately, and I found myself alone by the bedside of the sufferer. The curtain was closely drawn across the windows, and it was already the dusk of the evening, so that all I could discover was the figure of a man, who lay breathing very heavily, and with the irregular action that implies great pain.

"Are you English?" said he, in a strong, full voice. "Well, feel that pulse, and tell me if it means sinking—I suspect it does."

I took his hand and laid my finger on the artery. It was beating furiously—far too fast to count, but not weakly or faintly.

"No," said I; "this is fever, but not debility."

"I don't want subtleties," rejoined he, roughly. "I want to know am I dying? Draw the curtain there, open the window full, and have a look at me."

I did as he bade me, and returned to the bedside. It was all I could do not to cry out with astonishment; for, though terribly disfigured by his wounds, his eyes partially covered by the torn scalp that hung over them, I saw that it was Harpar Ivy before me, his large reddish beard now matted and clotted with blood.

"Well, what's the verdict?" cried he, sternly; "don't keep me in suspense."

"I do not perceive any grave symptoms so far—"

"No cant, my good friend, no cant! It's out of place just now. Be honest, and say what is it to be—live or die?"

"So far as I can judge, I say live."

"Well, then, set about the repairs at once. Ask for what you want—they'll bring it."

Deeming it better not to occasion any work whatever to a man in his state, I forbore declaring who I was, and set about my office with what skill I could.

With the aid of a Russian surgeon, who spoke German well, I managed to dress the wounds and bandage the fractured arm, during which the patient never spoke once, nor, indeed, seemed to be at all conscious of what was going on.

"You can stay here, I hope," said he to me, when all was finished. "At least, you'll see me through the worst of it. I can afford to pay, and pay well."

"I'll stay," said I, imitating his own laconic way; and no more was said.

Now, though it was not my intention to pass myself off for a physician, or deem any eyes the smallest advantage from the assumption of such a character, I saw that, remote as the poor sufferer was from all chance of recovery, and totally destitute of even companionship, it would have been cruelty to desert him, at least until he was sufficiently recovered to be left with servants.

It would appear that, from the calm composure of his manner, and the ease with which he was able to exercise, I had formed a far too favorable opinion of his case, or that when I saw him first the inflammatory symptoms had not yet begun; for at my next visit I found him in a high fever and raving wildly. In his wanderings he frequently spoke of having some gigantic enterprise, with hundreds of men under command, whose efforts he was cheering or chiding alternately. The indomitable will of a most resolute nature was displayed in all he said; and though his bodily sufferings must have been intense, he only alluded to them to show how little power they had to subdue his energy. His ever-recurring cry was, "It can be done, men! It can be done! See that we do it!"

I own that, even while I attended there on a sick-bed, and raving madly, this man's unquenchable energy impressed me greatly; and I often fancied to myself what he might make the resources of such a bold spirit in sad contrast to a mature plant and yielding like mine. To the violence of the first paroxysm of fever succeeded the far more dangerous state of low fever, through which I never left him. Care and incessant watchfulness were given him, and I devoted myself to the last with the resolve to make this effort the first of a new and changed existence.

Day and night in the sick-room, I lost appetite and strength, while an unceasing care preyed upon me and deprived me of rest. The very vacillations of the sick man's malady had affected my nerves, rendering me over-anxious, so that just as he had passed the great crisis of the malady I was stricken down with it myself.

My first day of convalescence after seven weeks of fever found me sitting at a little window that looked upon the harbor and the harbor of Sebastopol, where two frigates and some smaller vessels were as anchor. A group of lighters and such unpicturesque craft occupied another part of the scene, engaged as it seemed in operations for raising other vessels. It was in gazing for a long time at these, and guessing their occupation, that I learned to trace out the past, and why and how I had come to be sitting there. Every movement of the convalescent who tended me through my illness, used to bring me the "Herr Baron's" compliments to know how I was getting on, or ordered to say, that as the "Herr Baron" was able to walk so far, he begged that he might be permitted to come and pay me a visit. It was one of the Russian custom of giving titles to all who served the government in positions of high trust, and was therefore more than probable that the appointment of the Herr Baron was followed by the assistance of Harpar, who, sadly reduced, and leaning on a crutch, made his way slowly to where I sat. I attempted to rise to receive him, but he cried out, half sternly,

"Sit still! we are neither of us in good trim for ceremony."

He motioned to the servants to leave us alone together, as he took his place beside me, and then, leaning his crutch against the frame, for we were each too weak to grasp the other, he said,

"I know all about it. It was you saved my life, and risked your own to do it."

I muttered out some unmeaning words—I know not well what—about duty and the like.

"I don't care a brass button for the motive. You stood to me like a man." As he said this, he looked hard at me, and shading the light with his hand peered into my face. "Haven't we met before this? Is not your name Potts?"

"Yes, and you're Harpar."

He reddened, but so slightly, that but for the previous paleness of his sickly cheek it would not have been noticeable.

"I have often thought about you," said he, musingly. "This is not the only service you have done me; the first was at Lindau; may-hap you have forgotten it. You lent me two hundred florins, and, if I'm not much mistaken, when you were far from being rich yourself."

He leaned his head on his hand, and seemed to have fallen into a musing fit.

"And what, Sir," said I, "of the best turn I ever did you, you have never heard in your life, and what is more, might never hear, if not from myself. Do you remember an altercation on the road to Feldkirch, with a man called Riggs?"

"To be sure I do; he smashed the small-bone of this arm for me; I give worse than I got. They never could find that bullet I sent into his head, and so died of it at Palermo. But what share in this did you bear?"

"Not the worst nor the best; but I was impressed for a twelvemonth in your place."

"Impressed, for me?"

"Yes; they assumed that I was Harpar, and as I took no steps to undeceive them, there I remained till they seemed to have forgotten all about me."

Harpar questioned me closely and keenly as to the reasons that prompted the act of mistrust—an act all the more remarkable, as to use his own words, "We were men who had no friendship for each other, no common interests," and, added he, significantly, "the sort of fellows who, somehow, do not usually 'hit it off' together. You are a man of letters, with your dreamy mode of life; I, a hard worker, who could not enjoy idleness; and in this sense, far more likely to hold each other cheaply than otherwise."

I attempted to account for this piece of devotion as I could, but only very successfully, since I was only endeavoring to explain what I really did not well understand myself. Nor would he accept it as due to something generous, merely because it was generous, satisfy the practical intelligence of him who heard me.

"Well," said he, at last, "all that machinery you have described is new and strange to me, I can tell nothing as to how it ought to work; but I am as grateful to you as a man can be for a service which, I will not have rendered himself, nor has the slightest notion of what could have prompted you to do. Now, let me hear by what means you escaped it."

"You must listen to a long story to learn that," said I; and as he declared that he had nothing else to occupy him, I began. I began, almost as I have begun with my reader. On my first mention of Crofton he asked me to repeat the name, and on my speaking of mentioning Miss Herbert at the Milford station he slightly moved his chair, as if to avoid the strong light that fell upon him; from that moment till I finished he never interrupted me by a word nor interposed a question.

"And so you gave you that old seal-ring I see on your finger?" said he, at last.

"Yes," said I. "How came you to guess that?"

"Because I gave it to her the day she was sixteen! I am totally—"

He drew a long breath, and could only clutch his arm with astonishment, without being able to speak.

"It's all well known in England now. Every body has been paid in full, my creditors have met in a body, and signed a request to me to come back and recommence business. They have done more—they have bought up the lease of the Foundery, and sent it out to me. Ay, and old Elkany's mortgage, too, is redeemed, and I don't owe a shilling!

"You must have worked hard to accomplish all this?"

"Pretty hard, no doubt. You remember those little boats with the holes in 'em at Lindau. They did the business for me. I was fool enough at last to suppose that you had got a clew to my discovery, and were after me to pick up all the details. I ought to have known better. It was easy enough to see that you could have no head for any thing with a 'tough bone in it! Light, thoughtless creatures of your kind never do any mischief."

I was not quite sure whether I was expected to return thanks for this speech in my favor, and therefore only made some very unintelligible mutterings.

"There's only one liner now to be raised, and all the guns are already out of her, but I can return to-morrow. When they contract is completed; and the Synatief sloop of war is at my orders at Balaclava to convey me to any port I please in Europe."

He said this so boastfully and so vaingloriously, that I really felt Potts in his humility was not the smallest of the two. Nor, perhaps, was my irritation the less at seeing how little surprise our singular meeting had caused him, and how much he regarded all I had done in his behalf as being ordinary and commonplace services. But, perhaps, the coup-de-grace of my misery was to be still to come.

"Though I forwarded that ten-pound note you lent me to Rome, perhaps you'll like to have it now. If you've need any more, say so."

My heart was in my mouth, and I felt that I'd have died of starvation rather than accept the humblest benefit at his hands.

"Very well," said he to my refusal; "all the better that you've no need of cash, for, to tell the truth, Potts, you're not much of a doctor, nor are you very remarkable as a man of genius, and it is a kind thing of Providence when such fellows as you are born with a newer spoon in their mouths."

I nearly choked, but I said nothing

"If you'd like me to land you any where in the Levant, or down toward the Spanish coast, only tell me."

"No, nothing of the kind. I'm going north; I'm going to Moscow, to Tobolsk: I'm going to Persia and Astracan," said I, in wildest confusion.

"Well, I can give you a capital traveling cloak—it's one of those hunters they make in the Black Sands—and you'll need it, for they have fearfully severe cold in those countries."

And with this, and not waiting my resolute refusal, he arose, and hobbled out of the room, and I—ay, there's no concealing it—burst out a crying!

Weak and sick as I was, I procured an "araba" that night, and, without one word of adieu, set out for Krim.

* * *

It was about two years after this—my father had died in the interval, leaving me a small but sufficient income to live on, and I had just arrived in Paris, after a long desultory route through the east of Europe—I was standing one morning early in one of the occasion alleys of the Champs Elysees, watching with half listless curiosity the various grooms as they passed to exercise their horses in the Bois de Boulogne. Group after group passed me of those magnificent animals in which Paris is now more than the rival of London, and at length I was struck by the appearance of a very well-dressed groom, who led along beside him a small-sized horse, completely sheeted and shrouded from view. Believing that this must prove some creature of rare beauty, an Arab of purest descent, I followed them as they went, and at last overtook them.

The groom was English, and by my offer of a cigar somewhat better than the one he was smoking, he was very willing to satisfy my curiosity.

"I suppose he has Arab breeding in him," said I, half contemptuously; "he's not forty years old now if he's a day. What they keep him for I don't know, but they make as much work about him as if he was a Christian; and, as for myself, I have nothing else to do than walk him twice a day to his exercise, and take care that his ears are well brushed, and mixed with linseed, for he hasn't a tooth left to eat with."

"I suppose his master is some very rich man, who can afford himself a caprice like this."

"For the matter of money, he has enough of it. He is the Prince Ernest Maximilian of Wirtemberg, and, except the Emperor, has the best stable in all Paris. But I don't think that he cares much for the old horse; it's the Princess likes him, and she comes constantly down to the wood here, and when we come to a quiet spot, where there are no strangers, she makes me take off all the sheeting and rub him down, and she'll get out of the carriage and pat him. And he knows her, that he does, and lifts up that old leg of his when she comes toward him, and tries to whinny, too. But here she comes now, and it won't do if I'm seen talking to you, so just drop behind, Sir, and never mind me."

I crossed over the road, and had but reached the opposite pathway when the carriage stopped, and the old horse drew up beside it. After a word or two the groom took off the hood, and there was Blondel. But my amazement was lost in the greater shock, that the Princess whose jeweled hand held out the sugar to him, was no other than Catinka!

I can not say with what motive I was impelled —perhaps the action was too quick for either—but I drew nigh the carriage, and raising my hat respectfully, asked if the Princess would deign to remember an acquaintance of former days.

"I am unfortunate enough, Sir, not to be able to recall you," said she, in most perfect Parisian French.

"My name you may have forgotten, Madame, but scarcely so either our first meeting at Schaffhausen, or our last at Bregenz."

"These are all riddles to me, Sir; and I am sure you are too well-bred to persist in an error after you have recognized it to be such." And, with a cold smile and a haughty bow, she motioned the coachman to drive on, and I saw her no more.

Stung to the very quick, but yet not without a misgiving that I might be possibly mistaken, I hurried to the police department where the list of strangers was preserved. By sending in my card I was admitted to see one of the chiefs of the department, who, with great politeness, informed me that the princess was totally unknown as to family, and not included in the Gotha Almanack.

"May I ask," said he, as I prepared to retire, "if the letter here—it has been with us for more than a year—is for your address? I came with an inclusive covering any possible expense in reaching your address, and has lain here ever since."

"Yes," said I, "my name is Algernon Sydney Potts."

Strange are the changes and vicissitudes of life! Just as I stood there, shocked and overwhelmed with the mere trait of cold-blooded, I found a letter from Kate (she who was once Kate Herbert), telling me how they had sent letters after me through Europe, and begging, if these lines should ever reach me, to come to them in Wales. "My father loves you, my mother longs to know you, and none can be more eager to thank you than your friend Kate Letting."

I set off for England that night; I left for Wales the next morning, and I have never quitted it since that day.

THE END.

COATS OF ARMS OF THE SEVERAL STATES OF THE UNION.—[See Page 222.]

THE GREAT YELVERTON CASE.

We publish herewith, from a drawing made in Court, a portrait of MRS. YELVERTON, the lady who has been made famous by the great suit of Thelwall vs. Yelverton, just decided by the Court of Common Pleas at Dublin, Ireland. Her story is one of the most romantic that has ever seen the light.

In the fall of 1852—nearly nine years ago—Teresa Longworth, the orphan daughter of a silk merchant of Manchester, England, was returning by steamer from Boulogne—where she had been paying a visit to a married sister—to Dover. On embarking she was introduced to a Captain Yelverton, of the Royal Artillery, with whom she conversed during the passage. It chanced that the small steamer was overcrowded. Every cabin and berth below was taken. Miss Longworth and Captain Yelverton, like many other passengers, spent the night on the deck, in conversation: Captain Yelverton covered their knees, as they sat, with his plaid. On arriving at London, Miss Longworth gave him her address. He called next day, and was courteously received. Some two or three years elapsed before the acquaintance was renewed. Before the outbreak of the Russian war Captain Yelverton, then stationed at Malta, received a letter from Miss Longworth, who was residing at Naples, requesting him to forward an inclosure to her brother, a British consul at some Greek port. This led to a correspondence, which was kept up faithfully, and became pretty full, sufficiently so both sides. At the outbreak of the war Major Yelverton went to the Crimea, in command of a battery of siege artillery. Miss Longworth also went to the Crimea, as a Sister of Charity attached to the French hospitals. It should have been remarked that she is a Roman Catholic, and was educated in a convent in France. In 1855, or 1856, Major Yelverton visited the hospital at Galata, where Miss Longworth was acting as Sister of Charity, and there met her, for the first time since they had parted in London, in 1852. According to the statement of Mrs. Yelverton, he then offered her marriage; but she declined to leave her post until the war was over. According to the statement of Major Yelverton, he "embraced and kissed her several times, but did not refer to any intentions." They met again, in the heat of General Straubenzee, in the Crimea. There Major Yelverton was received as the accepted lover of Miss Longworth. On her departure in a steamer from the Crimea, Major Yelverton accompanied her—without the knowledge of General Straubenzee and his family. On board that steamer Major Yelverton states that he took disgraceful liberties with the young girl under his charge. Mrs. Yelverton states that he visited her to marry him in the Greek Church; but that she refused to be his on any other terms than a marriage in her own Church. She returned to England in 1857, and went to stay with a friend in Edinburgh. Major Yelverton was stationed at Leith—the port of Edinburgh—and visited her frequently. He says that while she was stationed at Edinburgh she triumphed over her virtue. She says that he offered to marry her in the Scotch manner, by reading the marriage ceremony over to her, and acknowledging her as his wife in the presence of a witness. She declined to consider this a marriage, and refused to live with him. On this he acceded to her suggestion that they should be married by a Roman Catholic clergyman. She crossed over to Waterford, Ireland, and met him there; thence they traveled to Newry, where a Father Mooney, having obtained, for five pounds, a dispensation from the bishop, duly married them, according to the rites of the Roman Catholic Church, and received from Major Yelverton five pounds for his pains. After the marriage they traveled through England, Scotland, and France. While at Boulogne, Mrs. Yelverton being ill, and in the family way, the Major left her, and has had no communication with her since. When she—unhappily—bore their offspring—she wrote to him, imploring him to make their marriage public. He replied, stating that such a thing would ruin him, and advising her to marry some rich man and go out to New Zealand. She retired to the house of a friend at Leith, Scotland. While living there she heard the news of her husband's marriage with a Widow Forbes, the relict of an Edinburgh professor, and a woman of large fortune.

She instantly sued him as his wife, for alimony. He allowed judgment to go by default, and paid the money.

The recent action was then brought by a Mr. Thelwall, an ironmaster at Hull, nominally for £250 15*s.* 4*d.*, Mrs. Yelverton's board while staying in his house. The object of the action was to have her admitted to be the wife of Major Yelverton. He put in the defense that the lady was not his wife, and so issue was fairly joined.

Mrs. Yelverton herself was, of course, the leading witness for the case. She stated her history as we have given it, exhibiting marked self-command, wit, and coolness. When the Counsel by assumed negligence addressed her as Miss Longworth, she instantly observed—"My name is Teresa Yelverton." A Dublin paper gives the following graphic sketch of her demeanor under cross-examination:

The cross-examination of the Hon. Mrs. Yelverton was resumed at the sitting of the Court on Saturday, and had not concluded until the Court rose at 6 o'clock. That she has been three days under examination, two of which have been occupied by one of the severest, closest, and most searching cross-examinations, conducted by one of the ablest lawyers, that has ever taken place in a public court. During that prolonged ordeal Mrs. Yelverton was never for a moment deserted by that dignified and lofty-like demeanor which has characterized her throughout these three days. She has maintained an imperturbable coolness, without in the least appearing too confident or too down, from her self-possession has elicited the highest admiration from all who have been able to procure admission to the Court, and observed her in the trying position in which she was placed. The manner, too, in which she replied—thoroughly unreserved, candid, and outspoken frankness of her replies call forth the warmest approbation, and pave that the Hon. Mrs. Yelverton is not only a lady most highly educated, but that she possesses an intelligence, a quickness of comprehension, and a power of language rarely met with in a lady, even in the present intellectual age, when the education of females receives so much attention. These high qualifications are revealed without the slightest effort, affectation, or departure from that graceful ease, placidity of manner, and composed dignity which should always distinguish a lady. No matter how severe the interrogatory of counsel, no matter how painful even to hear or embarrassing to answer, she always replies directly to the point of the query without confusion of language; and not unfrequently has she reminded the learned gentlemen by whom she was cross-examined of the impossibility of replying with accuracy to some questions which his cross-examination opened ominously for him.

MRS. YELVERTON.—[FROM A SKETCH MADE IN COURT.]

Q. "Major Yelverton, did you ever love Teresa Longworth?"—A. "I did."

Q. "Did you ever love her purely and honorably?"

A. "No."

Q. "Then your love for her was always founded in dishonor?"

A. "Yes."

Q. "With the determination from the first to seduce her?"

A. "No."

Q. "Had your love was all founded on dishonor?"

A. "Yes."

Q. "Explain me that?"

A. "When I began the correspondence with her it was with no object either dishonorable or otherwise; if continued that correspondence with her; when I met her at Galata I was exerted every by passion, and then first conceived the design of making her my mistress."

Q. "In the convent of Galata?"

A. "In the convent of Galata, Sir."

Q. "She wearing the robes of a Sister of Mercy?"

A. "Even, Sir."

Q. "In attendance on the sick and dying soldiers of the Crimea?"

A. "True, Sir."

Q. "And you conceived the notion, then, of taking her from that holy work and taking her as your mistress?"

A. "I conceived the notion of making her my mistress, but not from that holy place."

Q. "I suppose you thought as your mistress she could as well perform the works of charity?"

A. "The kindest-hearted women in the world sometimes are mistresses."

Q. "Now you put them both together?"

CHIEF JUSTICE. "What are the two answers."

WITNESS. "I said first that it depends upon the nature of the seduction, by which I mean the means a man takes, the trouble he gives himself, the position into which he puts a woman—whether it was all upon his part, or all upon hers—I think that makes a great difference in the laudability or otherwise of a seduction."

SERGEANT SULLIVAN. "I see. Do you think the laudability of it is lessened if the woman entered it in an orphan?"

"I don't say it is laudable under any circumstances."

"Do you say that now?"—"I do."

"Did you not say that its laudability depended upon whether there was or not?"—"I say its laudability or otherwise depends upon that."

"So whether it is found out or not is a material element in its laudability?"—"It is, Sir."

"It was, then?"—"It is the time it meets with."

"Had you known, in the month of August, that Teresa Longworth was an orphan?"—[After a pause.] "She had told me that her mother died in early life—that her father was dead, the atheist."

CHIEF JUSTICE. "Who said that?"

SERGEANT SULLIVAN. "The witness adds that, my lord. You wrote her letters, and you knew she was a minor and a lady—a gentlewoman?"—"I don't know, Sir, what your definition of a gentlewoman is (a laugh)."

"Tell me what your own is."—"A woman of gentle blood."

"Has education nothing to say to it, think you?"—"Makes a lady, Sir."

"Have manners nothing to say to it, think you?"—"They have, Sir."

"Have accomplishments nothing to say to it?"—"They have, Sir."

"Belief in religion?"—"It has, Sir."

"Did you know Bell Teresa Longworth was an accomplished woman?"—"I thought so from her letters, Sir."

"Was her manner that of a lady?"—[After a long pause, and with a degree of hesitation.] "I believe it was, Sir."

"Had she told you who she was?"—"She had told me that her father had been a rich silk merchant in Manchester; that her mother had been many years dead; that he and her family had quarreled with her father, and never lived with him for many years; and that she and her sister were living comfortable from every body in the place where they I say them in London."

"You knew all about her?"—"What she told me."

"Was she a gentlewoman in your opinion?"—"I think, Sir, that accomplishment, religion, and every thing else must be added to gentle blood, to give a proper definition of a gentlewoman."

"You must have gentle blood at all events, according to your definition?"—"Exactly."

"And perhaps it is no harm to seduce a woman who has not that qualification?"—"I did not say that."

"Well, what is your opinion? Before 1858 did you think the element of gentle blood material in reference to seduction?"—"I think I had better give you my idea of seduction, Sir."

SERGEANT SULLIVAN. "I should very much like to hear it."

WITNESS. "Seduction is where a man follows a woman persistently and perseveringly, and with intent throughout to make her his mistress and dishonor her."

"Very good, Sir; that was your idea of seduction then?"—"It was."

"Do you think that the fact of the lady not having gentle blood makes a seduction better or worse?"—"I don't think it makes any very great difference."

"Does it make any, in your opinion?"—[After a pause.]—"Well, it does; and my reason for saying so is, that one has more to lose than the other?"

"And that, as regards the woman herself, makes the seduction better or worse? as the case may be; is that so?"—"As regards the woman's own feelings, is it?"

"As regards herself and her position?"—"There is a greater loss of position in entering than in seducing."

I see. Did you believe Teresa Longworth to be a gentlewoman at the said day in the convent of Galata?"—[After a pause.]—"Not according to my definition."

"What part of the character did she lack?"—"Gentle blood, Sir."

"Gentle blood! She had all but that, had she not?"—"There was something about her manner not quite—"

"Yes; you said the manner was tolerable?"—"I think so."

"But with the exception of the 'tolerable manner' and the want of gentle blood she was a gentlewoman, was she not?"—"With those exceptions, Sir."

"Yes; we must be particular, you see?"

"Yes."

"And you believed her to be so?"—"Yes, Sir."

"And you there formed the idea of engaging her at making her your mistress, as you say?"—"Yes, Sir."

"Do you know General Straubenzee?"—"I have that honor."

"Is he a man of honor and a gentleman?"—"I believe so."

"He was a General in the British army in the Crimea?"—"He was Brigadier-General."

"Do you know his lady?"—"I do, Sir."

"A lady and gentlewoman?"—"Yes."

"Of virtue?"—"I don't know, Sir; I only believe so, Sir. I live to estimate—"

"What is your opinion?"—"I fully believe that she is one of the purest ladies in the world."

"An excellent mistress of an orphan?"—"An excellent protectress of an orphan."

"And General Straubenzee an excellent protector?"—"Yes, Sir."

There are many other parts of Major Yelverton's evidence which are painfully interesting, as showing the total perversion of the system of virtue, and the abominable selfishness of the man. But they are not fit for reproduction. The point of his testimony is clear. When he was first asked, some Irish people were summoned who swore to minor facts in the interest of Major Yelverton, and then the case adjourned for Q. We can not forbear extracting the peroration from the speech of Mr. Whiteside, the leading counsel for Mrs. Yelverton, and the best lawyer at the Irish bar. He said:

The argument made by the defendant's counsel is that from the day he was at Galata he was her deliberate, skilful, and selected seducer. These say the defendant in his argument—"I have added hypocrisy and profanity to deception and seduction." Such is the history of the acquaintance of this woman. I am not her wedded husband; I stand before you her profligate and heartless seducer. I found her young, I found her virtuous." What is the use, gentlemen? Innocence defiled, virtue lost, beauty spoiled, and the hopes of life fled forever. Better the hand of death had swept her to an early grave that would have been watered by the tears of maternal affection—gentle tears, calling up the happy memories of the past, smoothed by the blessed hopes of a bright immortal future. He has blasted her happiness in this life, and endeavored it in the life to come, according to his own argument. Save him from the consequences of that argument, and do not brand him as his counsel do, as a scientific, deliberate, unprincipled seducer. Whom stands the question, now that the whole of this great trial is before you—now that you have all these facts, and I can not dwell at this hour minutely upon them, so I might, if I had gained your attention at an earlier hour of the day, have endeavored to reason step by step? I ask you to judge that woman as she came before you, and then say do you believe her. Trace her conduct up from the time she sat within the walls of the convent until she comes to this bar to tell the story of her humiliations, sorrows, and ask yourselves what fact is proved against her with any living man save this defendant. Her crime is, she loved him too dearly and too well. If she had millions she would have flung them at his feet. Had she a throne to give she would have placed him on that throne. All she had to bestow was her heart; she made him sovereign of her affections, and there he reigned with undisputed sway. But what are those affections? They have been implanted in our nature by an Almighty hand. They have survived the fall, and are a spirit of the ravages of sin and death. They dignify, and exalt, and inspire our existence, which else were cold, monotonous, and dull. Nor may we believe that love terminates with the dissolution of the mysterious union between soul and body. Rather may we believe that the same high affections purified, spiritualized, and immortalized, become a portion of "the bliss unspeakable," reserved for the spirits of the just made perfect. (Loud applause.) She gave him that affection; she gave him that love,—a woman's love. Who can fathom its depths? Who can measure its intensity? Who can describe its fervidness? I will tell you herself what that love was.—"If you were to be executed as a convict, I would stand beneath the gallows." If he had taken that woman for his wife, misery would have overtaken him to her—poverty she would have shared with him, from sickness and misfortune she would never have fled, she would have been his constant companion, his guide, his friend—his polluted mistress never. Therefore I say you owe it to justice to find that injured woman. You can not restore her to the husband she adored or the happiness she enjoyed; you can not even restore to that faded cheek, nor lustre to the eye which has been dimmed by many a tear; you can not relieve the sorrows of her bursting heart; but you may restore her to her place in society—you may by your verdict enable her to say—"Rich I have been, indicted I may have been through excess of my affection, but guilty—no, that I am not." Place her in the rank which she would never disgrace; you may restore her to that society in which she is qualified to shine, and from which she has been hurled by a great cause. I can impede to further address you. Would to God I had the power, physical strength, to exert either or both longer on behalf of this injured, insulted woman! But this fond and adoring wife is gone; she has found it in other respected judge on the bench; she has found it in every heart that beats within this court, and in the breast of every honest man throughout this country.

The Judge charged the jury that they had three questions to decide: 1st, Was there a Scotch marriage? 2d, Was there an Irish marriage? 3d, Was Major Yelverton a Roman Catholic at the time of the latter?—as the law declares that a Roman Catholic priest can not lawfully celebrate a marriage between a Protestant and a Catholic.

The jury have just returned into court, in answer to the Chief Justice, stated—first, that they had found the Scotch marriage a valid one; and, secondly, that there was a good Irish marriage. The Chief Justice asked them if they found Major Yelverton was a Roman Catholic? to which they replied that they had.

On the announcement of the verdict the excitement of the audience burst into applause, which was continued for a short time, and which was taken up by the immense crowd assembled by the courts and along the quay. Mrs. Yelverton was in one of the chambers of the court. The horses of the carriage which was in waiting for her were taken off by the crowd, in order to draw her to the hotel where she is staying; when she arrived there she addressed the people.

The Dublin Morning News gives the following pen-and-ink portrait of Mrs. (Longworth) Yelverton:

Mrs. Yelverton is probably in her twenty-fifth year. She is under the middle height, and of fair complexion. She was pale, very pale, evidently suffering, if not agitated, by the circumstances of the occasion, time, and place. Subsequently, when slightly recovered with the excitement, or possibly the heat of the court, her face presented the appearance of what at daytime was to be passed by, when it were the charms that attracted the deceiver's gaze. Beautiful she was then indeed. Not that her features, when examined one by one, would be pronounced regular or beautiful. There was a motherly, a grave, thoughtful, sorrowful expression over all that I am utterly unable to describe; and this it was that first struck and impressed the beholder. Grief—grief and pity must be measured—had left its traces there. There was a softness in the flow of her voice, and there was a quick glance all around, in a half-troubled, apprehensive, inquiring manner, as if she wanted to be sure that no one indeed amidst the friendly hearts fame had always told her were ever to be found in Ireland, but the children of sorrow and misfortune. Hope spoke to the troubled soul that had so long lain in anguish, and therefore she seemed to acquire a strength none would have looked for in such a fragile form. The remembrance of which is delicately painted this; the general expression of the face is most feminine, her brow—clear, calm, touched—preserving, dignified power—confidence in repose. It is the eye that lights up, makes beautiful that whole countenance, which, in fact, is one of those which has its beauty and attraction more in expression, the soul of which can never be accurately fixed, than in the symmetry and regularity of the individual features themselves. Her glossy brown tresses, while it charms us with a style that has a profusion of rich, glossy, auburn hair, which was worn as it should be, and not with those antique drans. On the following day the news had reached her of the death of Mr. Bellingham, her brother-in-law, and, according, she appeared subsequently in mourning. So far for her personal appearance; but how shall I describe what constitutes the greatest charm about her? The perfection of graceful motion in the simplest movements and the voice—such a voice!—clear, soft, liquid, and musical. Browner was a child in her hands. In the very first sentence exchanged between them their relative positions were fixed, and the ascendency was hers. At her word he stirr she completely took up her position without effort or attempt, but seemingly naturally, it was her rightful position, one which exacted the most respectful and deferential demeanor from even her antagonist.

escutcheon is lilinis. The coat of arms of Louisiana may provoke some merriment among wags, who may suggest that the Pelican in the picture is not the true bird of that name, but the genuine American Eagle, while the breed around it represents the Sulcreasurer, etc., of New Orleans. Kansas, which has only been admitted a few weeks, is not represented in the picture.

THE GANOID.

WITH a biscuit in my pocket and a 'hammer in hand,
Charging bits from off the strata that were
"cropping" o'er the land;
Wearied out, at length I rested by a fractured fresh and new,
And gazed in languid humor at the thing it brought to view:
I had found an ancient casket that Agassiz e'en himself,
When he saw beneath its cover that a ganoid
curled his tail.

It was lying half imbedded in its matrix in the stone,
And scintillating round it, bright micaceous
fragments shone;
And I thought of all the weary, sad, and slow-
revolving years
Since the earth commenced her circling search for light among the spheres,
And the huge lithyosaurus must have felt his courage fail
In the turbulence around him when this ganoid
curled his tail.

When from out the turbid ocean seethed an atmosphere of steam,
And the waves refused in darkness to reflect a single beam,
And barren rocks, that dimly rose, like spectres,
from the waste,
Glared grimly for a little while, and disappeared in haste
Melted down with heat and horror—even gneiss could not prevail
In those liquidizing eras when this ganoid curled his tail.

Check the onward march of Nature, and reverse
the wheel of Time,
From the morn when Eden blossomed in its fresh-born mid its prime;
Roll it backward, roll it backward—backward still, and backward more
Through every trace of the effort strains the mind till it is sore.
Still a nebulæ beyond you, down within the Past's dim vale,
Are those years when chronologic when this ganoid
curled his tail.

And I thought of all the struggles that we make with such ado
To preserve our names from sinking for a century or two;
How the deeds of warrior, poet, stern philosopher or sage,
Are writ in brilliant letters on the Past's historic page;
And yet the years the best have won is but a fabric frail
By the grand unnumbered eras when this ganoid
curled his tail.

You're satisfied with glory, and you think the thing is done
If you perish in the conflict, when a marble bust is won.
Here's a rival—look upon him—he is not a friend!—no,
For a lime inf sion keeps him still original and real—
The antiseptic properties of Fame would prove but frail
Had you done your deeds of wonder when this ganoid curled his tail.

Perhaps in scaly armor, up and down these ancient seas
Roamed he, with a restless appetite that nothing could appease,
Crushing shoals and hosts of beings, every one of which that ran
Would, in course of time and season, have "developed" up to man;
But "Man is the profoligent," and we only may bewail
Our dear relations slaughtered when this ganoid
curled his tail.

But it is a sad reflection—sad and stern enough for tears,
To know that blood and carnage trail along the track of years;
That Love and Peace and Mercy had not even then begun
To sow the seeds of quiet for the future coming man,
And the cries of God's first creatures were a universal wail
Of fierce and brutal conflict when this ganoid
curled his tail.

C. A. P.

LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY.

THE "MAKEWAKE'S" DOG.

LOFTUS his name was—Lofty we mostly called him for short; but with strangers he answered to "Mister Loftus"—nothing less than that. Passengers and visitors to the ship would ask many and many a time, in the usual coaxing way, but he never took the least notice of them. If they had any thing to say, they must call him by his proper title—talk straight out, with no nonsense about "good fellow," or "fine old dog," or any such nickname: then he'd listen respectfully, and understand what was said too.

I sailed in the Makewake with him going on eight years, and will say I never had a better shipmate. Orderly and good-natured, he never made the least trouble, and wouldn't allow any body else to either, if he could help it. I don't think he would interfere between the officers and crew, but when we were bringing emigrants, Loftus would always put a stop to disturbances among them. He would single out the leader in a free fight, throw him, and hold him down until the others came to his rescue. Sometimes he had to throw two or three, but the steerage soon learned to stow shillalahs whenever Misther Loftus appeared. I remember one time when we were lying in the Wellington Dock at Liverpool, taking on a lot of Fardrexes—and the steward had some difficulty with one. His only argument was a rope's end, and when Lofty thought the poor fellow had had enough he intimated as much quite plainly. But by some means the steward contrived to get a line through his right hand and was just in the act of rigging; then the Fardrower had to suffer. Pretty soon the dog parted the line with his teeth, quietly went ashore, rolled himself over and over in the thick, black, tide-mud—stole on board again and crawled, whole length, into Mr. Steward's berth. After that he wouldn't go ashore for a long time, and on the whole, I think the steward got rather the worst of it.

He did all our marketing—Loftus did, and never once made a mistake to my knowledge. They would try tricks with him sometimes, but were very likely to get the best of his custom. He was acquainted with most of the market-men, and if one did not treat him well he would go to another.

I sailed in Stirling and Field's Line five years before I got to be first mate, and then the very next voyage I came near losing the number of my mess. While we were in Liverpool the cholera broke out among the shipping, and we lay in that steaming mud-hole from the first of July until the last of August before we could get men enough to take the craft to sea. Meantime we lost poor old Captain Hayworth—the best officer I in the line—and I came pretty near going too. Loftus watched me and tended me like a true friend, and I do believe if it hadn't been for him I never could have pulled through. Ever since we have had an eye to pass a cup of water.

When the new captain came down from London he called me into the cabin, didn't like his looks at all. He was smooth-spoken enough, too, but his eyes were vicious, and I felt sure we should have trouble. He said the ship was quite ready for sea, and soon as I was able we would sail. Not to make further detention, I was carried aboard in a cot, and we hauled out of dock on the next tide. In the cabin I found another cot, beside which a young lady was sitting with a fan, while Captain Darcy was busy prescribing for sea-sickness. I then learned that our cabin passengers were an old man named Archer and his grand-daughter Jennie.

Poor old Mr. Archer! He was far too ill to undertake such a voyage, but he insisted on going with the ship, feeling sure he should recover when the cool Atlantic breezes began to blow. Well, the first Sunday at sea we buried him.

Little Jennie Archer was left entirely alone without a friend in the world, save an aunt in Brooklyn to whom she was going. A timid, strong-hearted girl bore up bravely in that sorrowful time, and even in her deepest grief found opportunity to render me a tender and delicate service. When I first began to crawl out into the cabin, I noticed Captain Darcy's evil eye often wandering toward her with a peculiar expression that alarmed me. I was troubled and didn't know what to do. I could not say any thing to Jennie, and, unable to stand alone, I could not in any way protect her. In this difficulty Loftus came to my aid. He would guard the lone girl far better than I, and his dislike to Captain Darcy was even greater than mine.

And so I contrived that Jennie and Loftus should become great friends. She was the kindest and gentlest little girl in the world, and the dog learned to love her more than he ever did another human being. Lofty never had a master; the Makewake was his home, and he clung to the ship through all her changes of crew, officers, and owners. But to Jennie he seemed to attach himself as dogs usually do to their owners, or even more closely. After fairly understanding that she must be watched and protected, he hardly left her an hour in the day, and slept before her door at night.

By the time I was able to go about a little—and out on deck when the sun was not too warm—Jennie Archer had quite won my heart, and I was much hurt to find that she grew more reserved as health returned to me; the little womanly ministrations, which had been so grateful, were gradually discontinued. Yet we were very friendly, and being the only idlers in the after-part of the ship, were with each other a great deal. Our long pleasant evenings on deck and morning readings in the cabin were the happiest hours I had ever known. But I did not believe that I was making any progress in her affection—that is, I did not think she would ever care for me as I did for her. I was pleased to see, however, that the captain's attempts to be agreeable were quietly but decidedly repulsed. He saw it, too, after a while, and his hateful disposition thereafter began to show itself. He persecuted poor Jennie without mercy whenever he could find an opportunity, and though Loftus and I were seldom off duty, he part contrived to make her suffer from his spite in a thousand wretched ways. Her simple dignity and unswerving faith in herself during these trials made me love her very dearly. She never complained to me at all; not even when I found her, one time, weeping, heart-broken, and frightened, with little bits of a note from him scattered over the floor.

Captain Darcy made no secret of his rage and vengeful temper; he seemed to consider that he owed defeat to me, and hated me accordingly. "You think yourself too—mart," he would say—"but I'll show you I'm not the man to be baked by any such whelps as you and that dog. You pay for your 2—ert, but I'll master her yet, and then I'll settle with you, young man."

I didn't mind his threats much, knowing him to be cowardly like other mean souls; but I kept a close watch that never of Jennie, and Loftus with my own hand, to which care I think he owes his life.

The thirty-fifth day out we were off the Banks, and about noon I went up with Captain Darcy to take the sun. Lofty assisted in the observation, as always did with the sun and latitude, and Miss Archer added her smile to the brightness of the hour, happy—thought I—to know our voyage was nearly done. While working out my calculation, I noticed the captain hastily descending the cabin gangway. I thought it odd he did not wait for the result, and directly I got below I was surprised to find that Loftus had also disappeared. I didn't think much about it all, though. I was alone with her for the first time, the last time, and meant to speak my mind before going below to make my entry in the log. It seemed to me that she had never looked so kindly upon me as then, and I came very near telling how dearly I had learned to prize her favor, and asking that it might be mine forever. But I felt as though that would be taking an unfair advantage of her needing a protector, and, in some sort, presuming upon the claim I might be supposed to have—the words which trembled on my tongue were not spoken. I afterward wished they had been.

Entering the cabin at last, we were startled by sounds of strife, evident struggling, fierce growls, and a storm of curses. For the first time Jennie's courage gave way; she, even then, she seemed more hurt than afraid at the love against me, sobbing,

"Oh, Heaven! he's in my room!"

And so it was. Crushed down in one corner—a pitiable sight indeed—lay poor Lofty, faint with Loftus's teeth in his throat. He still clutched the leather belt which contained Jennie's little fortune, and in a sailor's bag at his feet I found every thing else of the least value which she possessed in the world—even the letters to her friends.

Loftus must have seen indignation and horror in my face, for he immediately renewed his attack with the utmost ferocity, and 'twas only by Jennie's active efforts he was prevented from finishing the wretch on the instant—he wouldn't listen to me at all. As it was, Captain Darcy had to be carried down when we came on deck, and I remember he used the very same cut that I was brought aboard in. During the fever which followed he was delirious part of the time, and I gathered from his wild talk that he had hoped, by reducing Jennie to utter poverty, he could make her dependent upon him and submissive to his will.

Thanks to Loftus, the robber was caught in the act, and I half envied the dog his reward of food and caresses. He remembered her by her letters and her friends came for her, and after that he used to run over there every day or two. As the Captain's brain fell to work again, I resigned my berth in the ship for more than a week, but soon as I could get off, I too made a visit to Jennie in her new home. A very nice place it was, way out on Clinton Avenue, and I found her delighted with it, and all she might be. Her friends, too, were just the pleasantest sort of people, and received me very kindly. And somehow I felt disappointed and unsatisfactable, though I couldn't tell why for the life of me. Jennie's manner to me was the same as always had been, except for the embarrassment of the first; she was friendly and confiding as ever, but yet I felt that in Clinton Avenue she was very far away from me, and from that day we had lived apart. Then there was a good-looking young chap at the house who played on the piano and sang with Jennie, and who had all those pleasant little ways somewhere which show cultivation and good-breeding. Well, I liked him—I hadn't any spite at all—but couldn't help thinking that Tompkins Square was a certain graces my plain sailor ways appeared to small advantage. So I did not enjoy my visit as I had planned, and went away early and rather cross, and vexed and dissatisfied with myself and every body else.

Captain Darcy got an idea into his unsettled mind that I were going to marry Jennie, and he came against him for piracy on the high seas, and though I assured him neither of us had any such intention, he became more frightened, and suddenly disappeared from his hotel before I believed him able to go about. I have never seen him or heard of him from that day to this. When I took out his flight to Stirling & Field, our owners, they seemed rather glad than otherwise, and much to my surprise immediately offered the command of the Makewake to me.

During the long days of convalescence, when I could do but little else, I had strengthened and again of the time when I should be captain of the Makewake, and be in position to offer Jennie Archer a home as well as a heart. These had been dreams of happiness to me; but now, when they might be realized, their brightness faded fast—it seemed highly improbable that I should ever make Jennie an offer of any thing at all, and being captain of a Liner didn't amount to much any way. However, I accepted the proposition gladly enough, and thereafter staid by the ship more closely than ever.

Loftus still continued his visits to Clinton Avenue, being over there, indeed, at least half the time, though he always came home at night. My first experience there had not been of a sort to encourage my going again—so, when the Makewake

COASTS OF ARMS OF THE STATES.

WE publish on page 220 the coats of arms of the various States of the Union; at the present crisis these mottoes of State pride are not without their peculiar interest. Georgia, it will be noticed, plights her faith to the "Constitution;" while Massachusett: may be said to have foreshadowed the policy of coercion by her cry for "Peace won by the sword." Arkansas justifies the submission of her ordinance to the people by the motto "Regnat populus;" and of all the States, the only one which makes a parade of State sovereignty in her was nearly ready for sea, I sent, by Loftus, a note to Jennie, apologizing for not calling, and saying good-by. Of course I half hoped he would bring some little reply from her—and so he did. She wished particularly to see me, and begged I would come to her before I sailed. Well, I was delighted! I spread all the light canvas I could carry, and bowled over there—gay as a lark. The very first thing I saw was Jennie walking about the grounds with that good-looking young fellow—talking so earnestly and gazing up to his face in such a charming way! It just took me flat aback; I wished myself aboard ship again and outside the Hook. I don't know but I might have run away, only Loftus attracted the children's attention, and then 'twas too late.

I had not been in the house ten minutes when I noticed an understanding of some sort between Jennie and the handsome young gentleman. They had consultations, and side-glances, and looks toward me—as I thought—and, finally, it ended in his presenting to me, on behalf of Miss Jennie Archer, a very fine gold chronometer and chain. He delivered it with a little speech of which I hardly heard a word—I was so confused. Passengers aboard ship often met in the cabin on coming into port and gave the officers something or other to remember the voyage by, and I had certain phrases which were always used on such occasions. I got them off now well as I could, and sat down in a corner to think the matter over.

I don't like people who are over-sensitive, easily grieved, and perpetually feeling hurt. I think it generally shows a mean disposition; but I do suppose that was just about my state of mind. This, thought I, is what she wanted me for. This watch means payment in full of all demands against her; and she didn't want me, even while going to Liverpool and back, to have an idea that she was under any obligation to me. A valuable gift settles the old accounts, and leaves her free to open new books. What a fool I have been! But I'll not be any more—I'll never trouble her again, that's certain.

Such bitter, gloomy reveries as these kept coming and coming all the afternoon. Meantime I hardly knew what to do with the watch. I carried it about in my hand a long time, and finally shut up the box case carefully and put it into my coat pocket. I thanked Jennie in an awkward, cold way, and felt an ugly satisfaction in noticing how pale she looked and grave she looked. I do not think, however, that any one else perceived my spiteful temper. I never had better access among men, than that afternoon. Later, I determined to show that I didn't care for any one particularly, and tried my best to be entertaining and agreeable to all the girls in the house—something, as I said, better than ever before. But my heart —the whole time—was filling more and more with sad, troubled memories. Gradually pride and vexation gave way to the old tenderness for Jennie, and as I thought of the long, weary hours I had to pass, without a hope of her, in the very place where we had so lately been happy together, I realized how dear she had become to me—how utterly desolate and lonely I was destined to be. At last, I could keep up the appearance of cheerfulness no longer, and determined to steal away—never to return.

I looked all about, quietly, for Loftus, and after some time found him in a little summer-house in the garden. 'Twas now quite dusk, but with him I recognized Jennie, her arms about his neck, her face hidden in his long fleecy coat. She started as I spoke, and would have run away, but Loftus was seated on her dress and could not move.

"I'm sorry to part old friends," I said; "but Loftus and I must go now, Miss Jennie." I wanted to say "old lovers," but couldn't.

"And are you going away angry, when we have always understood each other so well?"

How schemed and repentant I felt, finding the poor girl had been crying! "No, indeed, Jennie," I answered; "I am not angry now. Forgive me for hurting you by accepting your present with such bad grace—I was vexed then, but am not any more. Believe me, I do understand, and I see, you would have told me in a more delicate way. Come Loftus, we will go now. Good-by, Miss Jennie—do not feel troubled about me: I'll try never to think of you again, as I used to."

"What have I done dreadfully wrong that you should change so? Only the watch? Is that all?"

"Pray don't think you have done wrong. You have always been fair and sincere with me, and I have only myself to blame. I shall esteem and respect you as ever."

"We may be friends, then? You will visit me when you return?"

"No, no, Jennie, I could not do that. If you ever need me, I shall be only too happy to serve you; but otherwise, I hope this will be our last meeting in the world. After all you have been to me, and all I have dreamed you might be, I could not bear to see you with any one another, even though he is more worthy of you."

She turned away, covering her face with her dear little hands, sobbing as if her heart would break. "Oh, mother, what shall I do! what shall I do!"

I had been standing at the door of the summer-house, much farther away from Jennie than I used to be in our talks aboard the Mohawk, and Loftus didn't understand it at all. He walked from one to the other, growling, troubled and perplexed. When Jennie leaned for her seized my arm, dragged me across the floor, and pulled me down at her feet.

The darling girl put both her arms about my neck, nestled her beautiful head upon my shoulder, and without a word we did understand each other right well at last.

We have often tried to persuade Loftus to stay at home and keep Jennie company while I am away in the Mohawk, but he never would desert the ship. Whenever we arrive in New York, though, the instant we touch the dock he bounds away to tell his dear mistress her husband has come home.

ODE TO A BOB-TAILED CAT.

FELIS INFELIX! Cat unfortunate,
With nary narrative!
Canst thou no tale relate
Of how Miller?
Thy tail-end came to terminate
So bluntly?

Didst wear it off by
Sedentary habits,
As do the rabbits?

Didst go a
Fishing with it,
Wishing with it
To "bob" for cat-fish,
And get bobbed thyself?
Curses on that fish!

Didst lose it in kittenhood,
Hungrily chewing it?
Or, gayly pursuing it,
Did it make tangled,
Abrupt, refrangled,
From the tip curtail?

Did some brother Greyback—
Yowling
And growling
In nocturnal strife,
Spitting and slating,
Causing and swearing,
Ripping and tearing,
Cause thee "change-tail"—
Abbreviate thy suffix?

Or did thy jealous wife
Detect yer
In some sly flirtation,
And after Count Coaxal lecture,
Bite off thy termination?
And serve yer right?

Did some mischievous boy,
Some barbarous boy,
Some sacrilegious boy,
Eliminate thy fais?
(Probably!)
The wretch!
The villain!
Cruelly spilte!
Thy current blood!
Let every cat scratch him,
Sack his breath,
Be his death,
Where'er they can catch him!

Well, Bob, two courses are left,
Since thou'st lost all that you're bereft:
Tell your friends that by letter,
From Forth,
You have learned the style there is
To wear the tail short,
And the briefer the better,
And for private visitation
Such is the passion,
That every Grimalkin will Follow your fashion.
Or else,
If they laugh at the stump
That you wear, why wear none.
There are for-slops where cat skins are re-tailed—
Hurry off, Robert Cunds, and be tailed. R.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Barnard on Sea-Coast Defense.

Notes on Sea-Coast Defense: consisting of Sea-Coast Fortifications, Heavy Guns, and Casemate Embrasures. By Major J. G. BARNARD, U. S. Corps of Engineers. One volume, 8vo. $3.50.

☞ Sent free by mail on receipt of price.

D. VAN NOSTRAND,
Publisher, 192 Broadway.

ANDREWS' YEAST POWDER,
(Excelsior),
is economical and perfectly pure. All the best families use it! It is ready for use in one minute! It makes Tea Biscuit, Dumplings, Pancakes, splendidly light and wholesome. Ask your grocer for "Excelsior" Yeast Powder. The Best Stores will get it for you. If you don't want the Best buy our Brand! Depot 126 and 128 Cedar Street, N. Y. ANDREWS & CO.

The Art Journal
For March

Is now ready—price 75 cents—containing the following fine Engravings on Steel:

THE ARMORER.
(From the Original Publication.)
MODERN ITALY.
(Engraved by WILLMORE from the picture by J. M. W. Turner, R.A.)
CUPID CHASTISED BY VENUS.
(From the group of Sculpture by G. Fontana.)

LOSSING'S HUDSON ILLUSTRATED, part XIV., With twelve Engravings.
VIRTUE & Co., No. 26 John Street, New York.

Hoarseness, &c.

Brown's Bronchial Troches.—These Troches allay Cough and voice hoarseness, which we advertised a few weeks ago, are superior for relieving hoarseness, to anything which we are acquainted with. We have tried them during the past winter, and make this statement gratuitously, and entirely from our brethren in the ministry.—Central Christian Herald, Cincinnati.

VALUABLE TO ALL—Who use the Pen or Pencil. Shaver's Patent Penholder and Pencil Sharpener, &c., all neatly combined in one tasteful form. "It is a most ingenious contrivance, answering to many purposes entirely."—Independent.

"It combines more useful qualities than any other article of its size within my knowledge."—Ex-Gov. Dutton, of Connecticut.

1 Sample sent postage paid for 75 c., or 3 styles for $1 60. Send for Circular. A. G. SHAVER, New Haven, Ct.

WEDDINGS for the UNION—Supplied with Rosewood Cases, Velvet Linings, &c., of the latest styles, at fair prices, by A. DEMAREST, Engraver, No. 192 Broadway, N. Y. Samples by mail.

The Working Farmer
AND Beyerly's Weekly,
$2 40 per Annum.

Address CHARLES V. MAPES, Mapes' Agricultural Warehouse, 189 and 128 Nassau Street, N. Y.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA PURIFIES THE BLOOD, and produces the combined effects of a tonic, alterative, and stimulative medicine.
Prepared by A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists, No. 100 Fulton Street, corner of William, New York.

Anniversary Opening of BRODIE'S
5th Avenue Store.

Mantillas! Mantillas!

BRODIE
Will make his Great
Spring Opening
on Wednesday, April 3d,
at his
Palace of Fashion,
Under the 5th Avenue Hotel,
Corner 23d Street,
and at the
Old Celebrated Stand,
300 Canal Street.
The richest Display of
MANTILLAS
in
Silk and Fancy Cloth
Ever made in New York.

AGENTS WANTED.—$5 MAP FOR 25 CENTS, COLORED IN STATES NICELY.
LLOYD'S UNITED STATES RAILROAD MAP OF AMERICA IS NOW READY. The most price of a Map of this size is from $5 to $8. It is FOUR FEET SQUARE, printed on an entire sheet of strong white linen paper, and shows to the reader at one glance, from CANADA to TEXAS, and is acknowledged by all railroad men to be the most CORRECT MAP ever offered to the people of this country. As there is so much deception practiced on the public now-a-days, we have thought it advisable to submit evidence of the correctness of the above statement.
NEWARK, N. J., 1861.
J. T. LLOYD—Inclosed is $3. I consider your Railroad Map alone worth that amount. JOHN S. DARCY, President Morris and Essex Railroad Company.
OFFICE VIRGINIA AND TENNESSEE RR. CO.,
LYNCHBURG, Feb. 1, 1861.
J. T. LLOYD, 164 Broadway, N. Y.—Dear Sir—I think highly of your American Map, and inclose you $20 in order to aid in keeping it up. Yours truly,
A. H. GILL, General Superintendent.
Sent by mail anywhere. No stamps taken. Send for a circular. Address J. T. Lloyd, Publisher, 164 Broadway, New York City.

WANTED.—Agents to sell packages of Stationery and Jewelry, at prices one third less than can be purchased elsewhere. Call on or address (stamp enclosed) J. L. BAILEY, 154 Court Street, Boston, Mass.

MRS. HIS. UNION. MISS L. LOVE.
WEDDING CARDS,
Specimens by Mail on receipt of 2 postage stamps.
EVERDELL 302 Broadway. N. Y.

No Chimney!

Burners that will fit any Coal Oil Lamp, and burn Coal Oil or Kerosene without a chimney. Burner sent by mail on receipt of $1 25. Callender's Carbo-Air Gas Lamp burns pure Coal Oil, Kerosene, &c., without wick or chimney. Sample Lamp $3 00. Encloss stamp for Circulars. Address CALLENDER & PERCK, Dealers in Lamps, Oils, &c., 175 Broadway, New York.

HOW TO DO GOOD AND GET "PAID FOR IT."—Take an Agency for our Publications. The terms are such, there can be no possibility of loss. Terms Free. You will be glad to learn some of them. For particulars address FOWLER AND WELLS, No. 308 Broadway, New York.

LE BON TON—THE BEST LADIES' FASHION BOOK in the World. Specimen copies, with two valuable patterns, posted for 25 cents.
S. T. TAYLOR & SON, 407 Broadway, N. Y.

A very Choice Collection
of
BEAUTIFUL VOCAL DUETS.

THE SHOWER OF PEARLS, containing New and Attractive Duets, with Piano Forte Accompaniments. Bound in Cloth. Price, $2.50, or sent by mail, post-paid. Published by DITSON & CO., Publishers, Boston.

THE WATER-CURE JOURNAL.
If you are sick, and desire to be well,
Read the Water-Cure Journal.
If you are well, and desire to avoid disease,
Read the Water-Cure Journal.
If you would know the true science of Human Life,
Read the Water-Cure Journal.
If you would learn the injurious effects of Drugs,
Read the Water-Cure Journal.
If you would understand the conditions of Health,
Read the Water-Cure Journal.
If you desire to dispense with the services of a Physician,
Read the Water-Cure Journal.
This Journal—the first in the world to bring before the people a knowledge of the true, or Hygienic system of the Healing Art—is published monthly, at $1 a year; five copies for $4, or ten copies for $5. Specimens sent free, by
FOWLER AND WELLS,
308 Broadway, New York.

To Consumptives.
A Minister, having cured his son of Consumption in its worst stages, after being given up to die by the most celebrated physicians, desires to make known the mode of cure, which proves successful in every case, to those afflicted with Coughs, Colds, and Consumption, and he will send it free of charge to all who desire it and will forward him their address.
Address DANIEL ADEE, 373 Pearl Street, New York.

Great Work on the Horse!

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES:
BY ROBERT JENNINGS, V. S
Professor of Pathology and Operative Surgery in the Veterinary College of Philadelphia; Professor of Veterinary Medicine in the late Agricultural College of Ohio; Secretary of the American Veterinary Association of Philadelphia, etc., etc.

WILL TELL YOU Of the Origin, History and distinctive traits of the various breeds of European, Asiatic, African and American Horses, with the physical formation and peculiarities of the animal, and how to accurately tell his age by the number and condition of his teeth; illustrated with numerous explanatory engravings.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES
WILL TELL YOU Of Breeding, Breaking, Stabling, Feeding, Grooming, Shoeing, and the general management of the horse, with the best modes of administering medicine, also, how to treat Biting, Kicking, Rearing, Shying, Stumbling, Cribbing, Backbiting, and other vices to which he is subject; with numerous explanatory engravings.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES
WILL TELL YOU Of the causes, symptoms, and treatment of Strangles, Sore Throat, Distemper, Catarrh, Influenza, Bronchitis, Pneumonia, Pleurisy, Broken Wind, Chronic Cough, Roaring and Whistling, Lampas, Sore Mouth and Ulcers, and Decayed Teeth, with other diseases of the Mouth and Respiratory Organs.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES
WILL TELL YOU Of the causes, symptoms, and Treatment of Worms, Bots, Colic, Stranguglation, Stone Concretions, Hepatization, Ruley, Diarrhœa, Jaundice, Hepatitis, Bloody Urine, Stones in the Kidneys and Bladder, Inflammation, and other diseases of the Stomach, Bowels, Liver and Urinary Organs.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES
WILL TELL YOU Of the causes, symptoms, and Treatment of Bone, Blood, and Big Spavin, Ring-bone, Sweenie, Shrains, Broken Knees, Wind Galls, Founder, Sole Bruise and Gravel, Cracked Hoofs, Scratches, Canker, Thrush, and Corns; also, of Megrims, Vertigo, Epilepsy, Dropsy, and other diseases of the Feet, Legs and Head.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES
WILL TELL YOU Of the causes, symptoms, and Treatment of Fistula, Foll Evil, Glanders, Farcy, Scratch Fever, Mange, Sarcoptic, Locked Jaw, Rheumatism, Cramp, Colic, Inflammation of the Eye and Heart, &c., &c., and how to manage Castrating, Bleeding, Trepanning, Rowelling, Firing, Hernia, Amputation, Tapping, and other surgical operations.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES
WILL TELL YOU Harey's Method of Breaking Horses; how to Approach, Halter, or Stable a Colt; how to accustom a horse to strange sounds and sights, and how to Bit, Saddle, Ride, and Break him to Harness; also the law and use of WARRANTY. The whole being the result of forty years' close and careful study of the habits, peculiarities, wants and weaknesses of this noble and useful animal.

The book contains 324 pages, appropriately illustrated by nearly One Hundred Engravings. It is printed in a clear and open type, and will be forwarded to purchasers, postage paid, on receipt of price, half bound, $1 00, or, in cloth, extra, $1 25.

$1000 A YEAR can be made by any man or woman, in selling the above, and other popular works of ours. Our inducements to all such are exceedingly liberal.

As our books are unequaled in their mechanical execution, as well as in their style and variety, certain and rapid sale follows their introduction everywhere.

For single copies, or for terms to agents, with other information, apply to or address

JOHN E. POTTER, Publisher,
No. 617 Sansom Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

$100 PER MONTH MADE WITH STENCIL TOOLS.—I sell the cheapest and best. Send for circular, which explains the business. Address JOHN MILLIKEN, Lawrence, Mass., or No. 70 Third Street, Louisville, Ky.

H. WORCESTER'S
IMPROVED PIANO FORTES,
Manufactory & Salesrooms,
14th St., bet. 5d Av., N. Y.

WANTED—MEN, WOMEN, AND BOYS in every Town, City, and Village in the United States, to act as agents for the sale of Jewelry and G's Gift Jewelry Envelopes. Agents can make from 3 to 5 dollars a day. Believing that by dealing as manufacturers of a superior quality of Jewelry, we are enabled to offer to our customers a greater variety and more valuable Gifts than any other similar establishment. For further particulars enclose a stamp, and address SHERMAN & CO., 239 Broadway, corner of Barclay Street, New York.

BACK NUMBERS and BOUND VOLUMES of HARPER'S WEEKLY and MONTHLY MAGAZINE can always be had of
A. WINCH, 329 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

HARPER & BROTHERS
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK,
Have just Published:

HISTORY OF THE UNITED NETHERLANDS: from the Death of William the Silent to the Synod of Dort. With a full View of the English-Dutch struggle against Spain, and of the Origin and Destruction of the Spanish Armada. By JOHN LOTHROP MOTLEY, LL.D., D.C.L., Corresponding Member of the Institute of France, Author of "The Rise of the Dutch Republic." New Edition. 2 vols. 8vo, Muslin, $4 00; Sheep, $5 00; Half Calf, $8 00.

THE WITS AND BEAUX OF SOCIETY. By GRACE and PHILIP WHARTON, Authors of "The Queens of Society." With Illustrations from Drawings by H. BROWNE and JAMES GOWNIS. Engraved by the Brothers DALZIEL. Large 12mo, Muslin, $1 75.

ONE OF THEM. By CHARLES LEVER, Author of "Charles O'Malley," "Gerald Fitzgerald," "The Dodd Family," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

WALL STREET MILLIONAIRE. ("coming" the noble Patron). "Haw—I was indooced to buy a little Picture of yours the other day, SYDDE, haw——" ARTIST (who does not seem to see it). "Lucky Fellow!"

A WOULD-BE REPRESENTATIVE ABROAD.

The different aspirants of German birth are said to be determined to make ——'s appointment to —— a test question, and are prepared to withdraw from the field in a body in case of his discomfiture, and bring the matter before their countrymen throughout the North at the earliest possible opportunity.—Daily Paper.

PROPOSED NEW STYLE OF WHISK-ER.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK,
Have Just Published:

LORD MACAULAY'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND, from the Accession of JAMES II. With an Original Portrait of the Author. In Five Volumes. Duodecimo Edition, Complete. With Portrait and elaborate Index. Printed on Fine Paper, Muslin, FORTY cents a volume.

HUME'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND, from the Invasion of Julius Cæsar to the Abdication of James II., 1688. A New Edition, with the Author's last Corrections and Improvements. To which is prefixed a Short Account of his Life, written by Himself. With a Portrait of the Author. 6 vols. 12mo, Muslin, FORTY cents a volume.

GIBBON'S HISTORY OF THE DECLINE AND FALL OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE. With Notes, by Rev H. H. MILMAN and M. GUIZOT. With Maps and Engravings. A New Cheap Edition. To which is added a Complete Index of the whole Work, and a Portrait of the Author. 6 vols. 12mo, Muslin, FORTY cents a volume.

THUMPS. A Novel. By GEORGE WM. CURTIS, Author of "The Potiphar Papers," "Prue and I," "Nile Notes of a Howadji," &c. Illustrated by HOPPIN. Over 600 pages. Large 12mo, Muslin, $1.50.

THE ORDEAL OF FREE LABOR IN THE BRITISH WEST INDIES. By WM. G. SUMNER. 12mo, Muslin, $1.00.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above Works, by Mail, postage prepaid, for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles, on receipt of the Price.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Incomparable in Excellence.

Beadle's Dime American Library.

Issued in New York and London.

Ready, April 1st, a New Story,

BY MRS. M. A. DENISON

FLORIDA; or, The Iron Will.

A Story of To-day.

Beyond question one of the most powerful and beautiful romances ever penned by Mrs. Denison.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR:

ONE DIME

CHIP, the Cave-Child.
A Romance of the Wilds of Pennsylvania.

The Prisoner of La Vintresse;
Or, The Fortunes of a Cuban Heiress.
Each 128 pp. complete, price 10 Cts.

Dime Biographical Library.

No. 4. The Life and Services of Major Gen. Anthony Wayne.
("Mad Anthony.")
The Revolutionary Patriot and Indian Conqueror.
No. 1. GARIBALDI: The Washington of Italy.
No. 2. DANIEL BOONE: The Hunter of Kentucky.
No. 3. KIT CARSON: The Rocky Mountain Scout and Guide.

Hand-Books for Housekeepers.

Beadle's Dime Cook Book.
Beadle's Dime Recipe Book.
Beadle's Dime Family Physician.
Beadle's Dime Book of Etiquette.
Beadle's Dime Dressmaker and Milliner's Guide.

Dime Books for Schools.

Beadle's Dime Speakers, Nos. 1 and 2.
Beadle's Dime Dialogues, Nos. 1 and 2.
Beadle's Dime School Melodist.
Beadle's Dime Letter Writer.

Music and Song.

Beadle's Dime Melodist (Music and Words).
Beadle's Dime Military Song Book.
Beadle's Dime Song Books, Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7.

Ten Cents each. For sale by all News Dealers, Booksellers, and Country Merchants generally. Single copies sent post-paid on receipt of Ten Cents. Liberal discount to Agents. Address

BEADLE & COMPANY,
No. 141 William Street, New York.

John B. Dunham.

Overstrung Grand Square and Upright Pianos.

Established in 1834.

Are pronounced to be the best Pianos manufactured. Each instrument warranted 5 years. Send for Circular. Warerooms and Manufactory, 75 to 83 East 13th Street, near Broadway, N. Y.

Harper's Weekly.
PRICE FIVE CENTS.

TERMS.

One Copy for Twenty Weeks	$1 00
One Copy for One Year	2 50
One Copy for Two Years	4 00
Five Copies for One Year	9 00
Twelve Copies for One Year	20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year	50 00

Harper's Weekly and Harper's Monthly, one year, $4.00.

Volumes I., II., III., and IV. of HARPER'S WEEKLY, handsomely bound in Cloth extra, Price $2.50 each, are now ready.

 To postmasters getting up a Club of Twelve or Twenty-five, a Copy will be sent gratis. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. Specimen Numbers gratuitously supplied.

☞ Clergymen and Teachers supplied at the lowest CASH RATES.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

The New Patent Law.

Foreign Inventors.

Under the new Patent Law the fee on presenting an application for a patent is but $15, and if the patent is allowed, $20 additional has to be paid. ENGLISH, FRENCH, BELGIAN, GERMAN, and AUSTRIAN INVENTORS are placed on the same footing as citizens, as regards fees.

MESSRS. MUNN & CO., NO. 37 PARK ROW, NEW YORK, having had 16 years experience as PATENT SOLICITORS, will, upon application, procure patents and afford all needful advice.

A Pamphlet on this subject is sent free.

Thorley's Food for Cattle

Converts the poorest of hay or straw into a superior provender. A pamphlet mailed free. Depot for U. S., 21 Broadway, N. Y.

Agents wanted in every City and Town.

WARD'S PERFECT FITTING SHIRTS.

Made to Measure at $18 per doz.
OR SIX FOR NINE DOLLARS.

MADE OF NEW YORK MILLS MUSLIN,

With fine Linen Bosoms, and warranted as good a Shirt as sold in the retail stores at $2 50 each.

ALSO, THE VERY BEST SHIRTS THAT CAN BE MADE AT $2 EACH.

P. S.—Those who think I can not make a good Shirt for $18 per dozen are mistaken. Here's the cost of one dozen $18 fine Shirts.

20 yards of New York Mills muslin at 14½c. per yd.,	$4 33
7 yards of fine Linen, at 50c. per yard	3 50
Making and cutting	6 00
Laundry, $1; buttons and cotton, 50c	1 50
Profit	2 00
Total	$18 00

Self Measurement for Shirts.

Printed directions sent free everywhere, and so easy to understand, that any one can take their own measure for shirts. I warrant a good fit. The cash to be paid to the Express Company on receipt of goods.

S. W. H. WARD, from London,
387 Broadway, N. Y., up Stairs.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
For April, 1861.

The present Number contains an opening paper on "Labrador." The Illustrations are from Photographs taken expressly for the Magazine. There in the present Number relate chiefly to the coast. The succeeding paper will contain Illustrations of Scenery and Character in the interior. They are probably the first accurate pictures ever given of this almost unknown region. These papers will be followed by others, describing the most interesting portions of the British Provinces in America. The "Chapter on Mice" is a continuation of the series on Entomology which have attracted so little attention among scientific men in Europe and America. This paper, as well as the previous ones on "Destructive Insects," shows the great importance, in a sanitary and commercial point of view, of a thorough investigation into the structure and habits of the minute insect world. The article on the "Heron Tower" was prepared from materials and information obtained directly from Mr. RAREY, and furnishes the most authentic account of his career that has been given to the public.

The other articles in this Number will be found fully to sustain the character of the Magazine in all its departments.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year	$3 00
Two Copies for One Year	5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each)	2 00

And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of EIGHT SUBSCRIBERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MAGAZINE, together, one Year, $7 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. V.—No. 224.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 13, 1861. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1861, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE GREAT GAINES CASE.

We publish herewith a portrait of Mrs. General Gaines, the heroine of the most remarkable lawsuit ever prosecuted in our civil courts. This lady has just won a case which entitles her to a property variously estimated at from ten to fifteen millions of dollars. The circumstances which gave rise to that case constitute a romance stranger than the boldest fancies of novel writers.

Just sixty years ago a young man, handsome, polished, brave, energetic, who, from some strange whim, had devoted himself to a life of trade among the Indians and French settlers on the Mississippi, spent a winter in the American metropolis of that day—Philadelphia. The young man's name was DANIEL CLARK. He was fond of gayety and social pleasures. In some social haunt he met a French lady of uncommon beauty and rare wit, named ZULIME CARRIER. She was living with a Frenchman named Lagrange, a common adventurer, whether legitimately married to him or not it is now not easy to discover. In 1800 this lady left Lagrange, and went to live with Daniel Clark. The theory accepted by the Supreme Court of the United States is that Zulime Carrier was never married to Lagrange, and that she was married, privately, to Daniel Clark. In 1806, at Philadelphia, the only issue of her union with Clark—Myra, the present Mrs. Gaines—was born.

After the birth of this child it would seem that Clark sent Zulime to New Orleans, and prosecuted his amatory career at Philadelphia with the gay freedom of a bachelor. He engaged himself in marriage to the celebrated Miss Caton, who afterward married the Marquis of Wellesley. He formed other connections, the offspring of which have figured in the Gaines case. After a time Zulime returned to Philadelphia, and claimed her rights as a wife. Clark denied her right to the title, and she was unable to maintain it. She seems herself to have recognized the feebleness of her claim; for soon afterward she married or accepted the protection of a Dr. Gardette, with whom she lived till his death.

Meanwhile Daniel Clark grew tired of Capua, and returned to New Orleans. He formed extensive business connections, and being gifted with rare mercantile capacity, made money in every thing he touched. He soon became the leading merchant on the Mississippi. Those were the days when fortunes were made in judicious trading with the Indians. Daniel Clark was one of the wise men who saw the opportunity and turned it to account. When his daughter Myra was yet a child, her father was a rich man, whose wealth was daily increasing.

MRS. GENERAL GAINES.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY BRADY.]

It does not appear that he ever took steps to reunite his fortunes with those of his much-loved Zulime. But he certainly took charge of her child Myra, had her properly educated, and testified much affection for her on all occasions.

In 1813 Daniel Clark died, leaving an immense fortune, mostly invested in land in New Orleans and other cities on the Mississippi. A will was produced, bequeathing his fortune to his mother and to the city of New Orleans. The legatees and executors entered into possession.

Some thirteen years afterward Myra, his daughter, married a Mr. Whitney, of New Orleans, and set up a claim as heir to the property. Thus the great Gaines suit began. Myra claimed to be the only legitimate daughter of Daniel Clark, and sought to have the above-mentioned will set aside. It was natural that, where so much property was at stake, the claim should be hotly contested. It was so; and Mr. Whitney, Myra's husband, died during the first campaign in the war. His widow—young, beautiful, and as energetic as her father—continued to prosecute the suit. Meeting General Gaines shortly afterward, she married him, and he espoused her cause with warmth. The case was tried and lost at New Orleans: it was carried to the Supreme Bench at Washington, and lost there too. In 1852 the hopes of Mrs. Gaines seemed utterly extinguished, and the death of General Gaines appeared to crush out the last ember of expectation.

But the lady had an indomitable spirit. After the judgment of 1852 a will was discovered, duly executed by Daniel Clark, certifying that Myra was his only legitimate child, and creating her his sole heir. This will Mrs. Gaines offered for probate, and sued the possessors of her father's property thereupon. In the New Orleans Court the case went against her. She appealed again to Washington; and after several years of tedious legal proceedings, she obtained a judgment on March 14, 1861, confirming the will, declaring her the only rightful heir of Daniel Clark, and entitling her not only to the whole property left by him, but to the rents of the same during the thirty-old years which had elapsed since she first set up her claim.

So the case now stands. The judgment was delivered by Mr. Justice Wayne, of Georgia, who significantly remarked that the Supreme Court would have their decree carried out in Louisiana. No one knows how far the accession of that State may have impaired the power of the United States Supreme Court, within the State limits. Mr. Justice Wayne's obiter dictum looks as though the judgment would be acknowledged. If it is, Mrs. General Gaines will soon be the richest woman in America.

The portrait which we publish herewith reveals something of the indomitable spirit and energetic will which has enabled this lady to prosecute her case through so many courts, and for so many weary years.

POINT ISABEL, TEXAS, WITH THE "DANIEL WEBSTER" SAILING WITH U.S. TROOPS ON BOARD.—FROM A SKETCH BY A GOVERNMENT DRAUGHTSMAN.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

THE "DANIEL WEBSTER" AT POINT ISABEL, TEXAS.

We publish on page 225, from a drawing by a Government draughtsman, a view of Point Isabel, Texas, with the steamer Daniel Webster lying off the coast. Point Isabel was a place of note in the Mexican war, and the name will be familiar to our readers. The Webster arrived here from thence, on Saturday, March 30, with United States troops.

The reporter of the Associated Press states:

"When the Webster sailed there were left at Fort Brown one company Third Artillery, Captain Darvon commanding, and two companies of Second Cavalry, Captain Stoneman commanding. The posts in the upper part of Texas had generally been abandoned, and the troops were being concentrated on the sea-coast. Colonel Bonlin was at Fort Brown, and was to command the United Infantry, under Major Sibley, were expected soon. The Indians followed the march of the troops, and committed great havoc among the people, killing some and running off their stock. Major Sibley chastised some of the savages. Great fear is felt all along the line of the Rio Grande, and indeed the whole frontier, of attack from Indians. Couriers was understood to be simply waiting the departure of the Federal troops to recommence operations on a larger scale than heretofore, and in which he was checked by the army of last year.

"The Daniel Webster passed the Star of the West about two hundred miles off Tortugas. The Daniel Webster has had a remarkably pleasant passage, and the troops on board are all in fine health. When they reached Key West they found the people very much excited, and apparently not inclined to furnish them with fresh water; but finding that the troops were determined to take by force, if necessary, whatever supplies were needed, they complied with the request, although with very ill grace. The troops which arrived here on Saturday in the Daniel Webster proceeded to Fort Hamilton Saturday night, where they will remain until further orders are received from head-quarters."

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, APRIL 13, 1861.

THE PRINCIPLE OF CENTRALIZATION.

GOVERNOR PICKENS, of South Carolina, in a Message recently transmitted to the Legislature of that State, asserts that South Carolina has "made an advance in the science of government by engrafting the fundamental right of a separate and independent State to withdraw from any confederacy that may be formed, whenever her people, in sovereign convention assembled, shall so decide."

We will not stop to question the merit of the "advance" which South Carolina is here said to have made. But we must say, in justice to the ancients, that Governor Pickens is stealing their laurels. If it be a credit to establish separate governments, and to maintain separate nationalities on either side of each mountain ridge or river, the glory is due to the men who lived a thousand years ago or thereabouts. Governor Pickens and his State are borrowing the seanty honors of the barons of the Middle Ages. For they it was who invented the system of small nationalities, and an endless series of secessions.

The events of the past few months have done much to shake our belief in the teachings of history, and in the grand old truths which are generally in the lives of such men as George Washington and Benedict Arnold. But still, facts are facts, and can not be controverted. It is a fact, for instance, that before Charlemagne, France consisted of a series of petty nations like South Carolina, all warring against each other, and wasting their strength in internecine contests; that he united them under one head, after which they began to prosper; and that when his empire broke up, the "right of withdrawing from the empire whenever the people shall so decide" was invoked by various constituent parts of his wide, and France then became again into a congeries of independent States, which instantly made war on each other, and fought for centuries, breeding races of ignorant paupers, until another great man forcibly united the whole under one head, when, once more, France began to prosper. It is a fact again that, a thousand years ago, more or less, the little island from which our ancestors came was divided into no less than seven distinct kingdoms—to say nothing of Scotland; and that these kingdoms, all of which insisted on separate national rights, were steeped in the deepest barbarism; from which none of them emerged until the whole seven began to be united under one head. It is a fact that Italy—notwithstanding occasional gleams of energy and prosperity at Genoa and Venice—has never enjoyed any real national strength from the time of the Cæsars, when it was under one head, until now, when the Kingdom of Italy is reconstituted. The same is true of Spain, Germany, and Russia.

In a word, the history of all nations is the same. At first, in a state of nature, every man is his neighbor's enemy, and fights him when occasion offers. By-and-by he discovers that friendship and mutual assistance are better than fighting, and he agrees to an association for mutual benefit. This is the village. This village naturally goes to war with neighboring villages, and, for several generations—as the history of our Indian tribes proves—these village wars go on, until some day the communities make the discovery which the individual had made before—that peace and co-operation are better than war and disunion. Then several villages unite together, and form a county, a tribe, a State, or a province. The province or tribe or State follow the time-honored example, and war with other provinces, tribes, or States, until exhaustion and ripened intelligence teach them, too, the lesson that it is better to be friends than foes. Then several of the tribes or provinces or States unite, and constitute a NATION. This is the history of Great Britain; of the history of France; the history of Spain; the history of Germany; the history of Russia; and, we venture to say, it will be the history of America next century, if it survives.

So far from the doctrine of secession being an improvement in political science invented by South Carolina, it is, on the contrary, one of the oldest of the doctrines of barbarous nations in the dark ages. Nothing is commoner, in ancient history, than the rebellions of minorities against the decision of majorities. It is ripened experience and enlarged civilization which alone have taught and enforced the great truth that minorities must yield to majorities, and yield peaceably; and the same great teachers have also taught us that the tendency of civilization is toward the destruction of small and the consolidation of great nationalities.

The natural tendency of the wild man is to rebel against all authority. The effect that which is not directly palpable to his senses. The natural tendency of the civilized man is to bow to constituted authority for the sake of the advantages. The idea of the Indian is to declare his little clan independent of all control save his own. This is what he calls independent national existence. The idea of the civilized man, on the contrary, is to widen as far as possible the limits of the nation to which he belongs. He knows that in doing so he must sacrifice some of his own liberty; but he calculates that the gain he will realize from an enlarged nationality and freedom from strife will more than compensate him.

In one word, civilization centralizes. Barbarism divides. When the Roman Empire was in its glory, all the civilized world obeyed implicitly the decrees and the officers of the Senate. When it was in its decay, there were always provincials, every town, and every castle set up for itself. Shall it devolve upon the future historian to report that when the United States were in their glory, the Act of the Congress were obeyed from the frontier of Russia to the frontier of Mexico; but that the moment they broke up not only did each State deny the central authority, but each county and village, the power of their States, cities derided the superior control of counties, and strong places throughout the country arrogated to themselves an independent robber sovereignty?

THE PUBLIC CREDIT.

IT must be a matter of satisfaction to every true-hearted citizen that the public credit has begun to improve. In the spring of last year, all State Sixes were worth at least 15 per cent. premium. In November of the same year a political panic, assisted by the flooding of the market with bonds stolen from the Indian trust fund, caused them to decline to 6@7 discount. In February last, after the secession of the Cotton States, they were barely salable at 90½ per cent. On the 4th of March the Secretary of the Treasury asks for $8,000,000, and is offered $34,000,000 at an average of 93.2-6 per cent. The public credit is evidently improving.

In point of fact, the country has ended any sufficient reason for the depreciation of Government bonds which has been witnessed. If the whole fifteen slave States had seceded from the Union, their separate existence free-booters could have been abundantly able to pay the interest on the Federal debt, and to make arrangements for the principal at maturity. The decline in national credit proceeded from the fact of Cockburne in our financial community, and the knavish tricks of stock speculators.

The success of the new loan renders the negotiation of the Treasury Note loan a matter of comparative certainty. Pride will oblige the wealthy men of the South to subscribe for their loan, now that the Northern loan has gone off so well.

The people in both sections will realize, in due time, that if they wish to enjoy the luxury of a Government worth paying for it. Sweeping retrench thewishes in selfish independence, and leave their chiefs to support themselves by plundering the weak and levying toll on the cowardly. Civilized citizens see themselves voluntarily for the support of their Government, and the more onerous the tax the clearer the evidence of the satisfaction of the governed. Certain difficulties have lately arisen which will break down the credit of both Governments prove, that if we have still primitive people among us, they are powerless to oppose the enlightened will of our people.

☞In publishing last week the diagram of the "Ups and Downs of the States," we accidentally omitted to give due credit for it to Professor WM. MITCHELL GILLESPIE, LL.D., of Union College, to whom is due the conception and the development of this striking manner of presenting to the eye at a single glance relations and variations which the largest study of mere numerical tables could with difficulty suggest.

THE LOUNGER.

THE ACADEMY AGAIN.

LAST week we stopped in our tour through the Academy Exhibition just as we were entering the third room. Stop a moment longer and look at these two notices of the Academy, which have fallen in our way since last week. One of them begins in this melancholy way:

"It is in an eminent degree dispiriting to be forced to chronicle, year after year, the deterioration of the Academy exhibitions. Few exhibitions have shown the same number of tolerable ones, and an enormous increase of rubbish. If the annual exhibitions be practically, as they are in theory, an indicator of the condition of painting in the country, the conclusion is inevitable, either that the Academy fails to fulfill its contemplated ends, or that the conditions essential to the steady growth of art do not yet exist among us."

How doleful that is! On the other hand, The Crityon, which is the especial organ of Art, says, in a cheerful strain:

"The collection, numbering 576 works, is not quite as large as last year, or last year, nor is it so interesting, there being too few figure-subjects, which are always essential to render an exhibition effective. There are, nevertheless, many striking and excellent works—works that indicate a steady and encouraging growth of art."

There it is! One man looks round the galleries and says, "Well, at least art is steadily growing among us." Another looks about, shakes his head, and sighs, "Well, we have begun among oysters as he goes. It is not fair to measure this excellent picture of McEntee's by any standard so arbitrary as this—nor do I mean to do so. Mr. McEntee is too thoughtful and—in the old sense—painful, an artist, not to know thoroughly why he selects one scene rather than another; and his Indian Summer is another instance of the rapidity with which his fine eye and faithful hand are raising him to the heights of fame.

—Here we stop for the present, and pass out. If other visits shall reveal other pictures as good as those already named, a loyal Lounger will not fail to commend them—quite sure, in the mean time, that, as long as an Academy exhibition will furnish even as many good pictures as this, we need not give up all hope of American art.

STICK TO YOUR LAST.

VERDI, the composer, has been elected a deputy to the Italian Congress, and has therefore declined alluring engagements from Russia and France. The Lounger's neighbor Terence is of opinion that Verdi is a fool for so doing; that he makes a huge mistake. "Look at the musicians!" cries Terence—"then why doesn't he stick to his trade? Ne sutor ultra crepidam." (Terence graduated last year.) Let the shoemaker stick to his last, as Apelles said to the cobbler who found fault with the slipper the artist had painted.")

Terence says it of Verdi; but he means it of some people nearer home. He is polite, and does not wish to be personal, and so eastigates inferentially. "Methinks it is good," he said, speaking of a distinguished political gentleman; "why doesn't he stick to poetry?"

"Bosh!" replied his friend Plautus, to whom Terence made the remark—"and you are a stockbroker; why the d—— don't you leave politics alone, and stick to stock-broking?" Yes, and why doesn't your brother, continued Plautus, especially, carrying the war into Africa, as the classical Terence would allow if the debate were upon any other subject—why doesn't your brother, who is a dry-goods merchant, stick to his dry goods—and your cousin, who is a wet-goods merchant, to his wet goods—and your uncle, who is a dealer in clothats—and his brother, who is a watchmaker, to his watches—and his nephew, who is a manufacturer, to his manufactures—and his sister's husband, who is an iron man, to his iron—and the masons to their mortar, and the farmers to their plows, and the carpenters to their chips? That's your argument, is it: Let every man stick to his trade, and not meddle with politics?

"Well, then, tell me who the — (Plautus is profane when he is excited) "are to meddle with them? The politicians, of course, because politics is their trade. And they are actually the only fortenest scamps in the country." (Plautus is vehement upon these occasions.) Then you propose that all the intelligence, and honesty, and honesty, who have every thing at stake under the Government, shall stand aside and let the rotten scamps who have made the nation what it is—persons with all that is false, rule the country? That is where you come to, with your absurd talk about poets, and merchants, and lawyers, and lawyers, and clergymen having no business to meddle in politics.

"Why, Terence—bless your poor addled pell!—it has not yet got through your brain, it seems, that in our system, where the people are the Government, politics is the particular business of every citizen. Are your uncle, and brother, and cousins, are all your relations any less citizens because they are dealers in wet and dry goods? Why, in this country, even stock-brokers may be citizens; and when they are so, if they don't meddle with politics they don't do their duty, and they deserve every thing they get. Politics is or are—for I don't care a cent for grammar in a matter of this importance—the last of every citizen in the country, and, by Jove! let him stick to it. And when you or any of your tribe come pulling round with your weak twaddle about people's minding their own business—you must excuse me, really; but, by Jove! I hope you will be told to your face that it is just such white-livered sneaks as you, who leave and have left the Government to the scoundrels who make a trade of it, who are directly and morally responsible for all the troubles in which we find ourselves. By Jove! if you and your kind stuck to your last, as you call it, you'd stick to spitting in your own faces!"

Terence, of course, was moving off with dignity. Plautus ran after him, and held on by his hand: "I beg your pardon, Terence. I know I am a boor: but, by Jove! the great difficulty with this country is just such fellows as you. Without you, we should be all the best of us fed on the husks. So much by way of apology. Good-morning!"

"OUR OWN."

MR. RUSSELL, who has written vivid descriptions of Eastern battles and sacks and "indiscriminate loots," has arrived upon these happy shores, and, unluckily, in his official capacity. Now when the historiographer of Ireland was a well-bred, educated gentleman arrives anywhere, he is very sure to receive the welcome which Montague in his travels always presumed upon in stopping at the chateaux of the gentry. But when the historiographer comes to fulfill his vocation, his arrival ought to open our eyes and minds as to the conviction which causes him to be sent.

There has been a gush of curious rhetoric in the newspapers in regard to the luxury of the Fourth estate. The newspapers, as has often been conceded in this department, are models of modesty. They inform us that it is they who control public affairs, that they are really the government of countries in these days, etc., etc., and they therefore rub their hands with complacency as they inform us that the Bonds and Jacks and Moon, and the great grandfather of the fixed stars among newspapers, the London Times, has sent its embassador to this government.

That is, at least, a pleasant and highly poetic way of saying that the London Times has sent a correspondent to the United States—a correspondent already famous for his brilliant and picturesque descriptions—his battle-pieces, as Scott—calls them—and he will come to us as he went to India or the Crimea, to do our battles in the most gorgeous and impressive colors. But we have got the start of them. We "have" him in long-gorgeous and impressive hues, and no one probably enjoys the unexpected glitter more than the correspondent himself. He will be ruddier, keep his eyes and ears open. He will hold his pen ready to sketch whatever novel, grotesque, characteristic, or tragic aspect of American life may fall under his observation. He will interweave his comments, grave or gay. He will form his conclusion, often as grotesque and odd, of course, as the phenomena upon which they are based. He will do among us precisely what the correspondents of the leading New York papers do among the Japanese when a fire establishing relations and inaugurating policies, etc., those are things not precisely within the province of newspaper correspondents, however able they may be.

Newspaper correspondents are usually selected not so much from their merits as statesmen and diplomatists as from their power of entertaining graphic, and accurate description of life and manners.

Nor let any sensitive journalist suspect the Lounger of a disposition to depreciate his craft and its influence. Whatever may be true of other countries, it is certain as a fact here, that newspapers, as such, have little influence. It is the opinion of the men who are known to control them which has weight, and that weight is measured by its individual merits. That is the very defect and weakness of our whole newspaper system. Papers are persons with no powers. The Evening Journal is Mr. Weed, the Times is Mr. Raymond, the Tribune is Mr. Greeley, the Herald is Mr. Bennett, the Charleston Mercury is Mr. Rhett. The papers these gentlemen control have just as much influence as their names carry, and no more; except the mechanical and factitious effect of an incessant repetition.

THE LAST TETRACHORDON.

"A BOOK was writ of late called Tetrachordon," sings Milton in one of his sonnets. "Twalk'd the town a while," he continues. It was vehemently denounced and abused. In fact, it shared the fate of many a striking book before and since. The latest Tetrachordon is called Essays and Reviews, and the publication of theological essays by some of the most conspicuous clergymen of the Church of England, including the Queen's chaplain and the successor of Dr. Arnold in the headship of Rugby School. It has been republished in this country under the name of "Recent Inquiries in Theology," and has already passed to a second edition.

The latest accounts from England describe the great ecclesiastical excitement which the volume has occasioned there. No less than five thousand clergymen of the Church are reported to have petitioned or protested against it. Twenty-five bishops have followed suit in either petition. And, in this country, one of the most ardent of Churchmen declares it to be the pernicious book of the century. All the English papers, secular and religious, join in the deep bay of the hunt. What shall be done is not yet decided. What ought to be done the crowd of ecclesiastics are fully persuaded. But while the voice of denunciation clashes with the other voice that denounces the spirit of the denunciation, and while it is yet a question whether several of the most eminent English clergymen—by personal character, by scholarship, and by position—shall be degraded from their order, the Bishop of London lifts his voice and cries out, in a tone that pierces the din of censure, "Already your angry talk has dispersed edition after edition of what you condemn as the most dangerous of books, and you are sadly mistaken if you suppose you can remedy the error by denouncing the errorist. You can confound their influence only by confuting their arguments."

In the midst of a wild uproar how grateful is a little common-sense! If this work is so terrible it must be proved so; and the Bishop of London is the only one who seems fairly convinced that the more you bang a heretic the bigger he grows. Heresy thrives by hanging. The blood of the martyrs is not only the seed of the Church, it is the seed of every cause under heaven whose adherents are martyrized. If five clergymen of the Church of England, among its most pious, learned, and spotless servants, have published a collection of untruths, what is the obvious remedy? To kick them? Apparently not. But to show that they have spoken untruly. Let us, at least, quoth the Bishop of London, have common sense, though we are ecclesiastical.

GREEK AND LATIN TEXTS.

A CONVENIENT edition of the Greek and Roman classics, carefully printed from the best approved editions of the best German and English scholars, and in a clear, black, delightful type, upon fine paper, and substantially bound, is a desirable convenience. Students like to put their books to slip into their pockets, yet not so insignificant that they might not be upon your table, and adorn it: in fine, the most scholarly and the handsomest edition of the earliest great works in literature is the Harper's Greek and Latin Texts, sold for forty cents the volume. Every scholar, every man or woman who reads with ease and pleasure, or wishes that their children should so read, the tragic and comic poets, the historians, and the lyrists of Greece and Rome, ought to know of this most excellent series. And every school-boy and collegian who has a real interest in his studies (and there are many!) will be proud and glad to own an neat and "knowing" a collection.

We Americans are not thought to know much Greek and Latin after we have left school, and probably not many of the gentlemen who leave town presently for Newport or Saratoga put Virgil or Homer or Aristophanes into their pockets. And yet there are such, also. The Lounger was quietly coming through the Sound upon a steamer, one fine autumn morning last year, and the afternoon of a pleasant party fell upon favorite authors. "My vademecum is Montaigne," said Shem. "And mine Charles Lamb," said Ham. "And mine Horace," said Japhet, pulling a neat pocket copy of the gay Roman out of his coat. It was well thumbed, and in the greatest confusion of dog's ears and grief that it was well conned. The wonder is that Japhet was a candidate for the New York Assembly! Of course he was defeated. Think, Lobsky, of a member who actually read Horace in the original for pleasure!

CLOUDY WEATHER.

THE Parisian Lounger, and in fact those of all the world, are necessarily excited by the Mires swindle, or "Union," as it is called. Nobody that has a leading stock-gambler has failed or played false which makes the commotion. That is an event not entirely unprecedented. But the general suspicion that somehow the government is implicated; that perhaps even the Emperor's name may be associated with the matter; that it is only a closure through which you may have a glimpse into the abyss of rottenness underlying French society; that nothing prevents, but what may prevent, that France, socially and politically, and morally and commercially, is undermined, as Paris is by the catacombs, is not in any measure what may be a frightful inguiling—it is the vague suspicion of these things that disturbs the confidence of France, and leaves the mystery which shrouds the Mires "affair" with peculiar terror.

The truth probably is, that however evident the ability of the Emperor individually may be, there is a deep rottenness of the stability of things. Who feels sure, for instance, either in France or any where else, that if the Emperor Napoleon died his son would succeed to his place? Or that France would not fall again immediately into her chronic political chaos? Whatever Louis Napoleon's ambition, he cannot but be a very American citizen about the necessity of a "strong" or despotically absolute government as universally necessary, like gravity, to keep the globe in place. If lives long, are secure only in the degree that he recognizes the only possible basis of permanent government, as democracy—that is, the consent of experience—the consent of the governed. A "strong" government, in the usual sense—that is, a military organization—is not the strongest or safest government against itself. For it is always a "strong" government which provokes revolution. A system whose acted principle is order is the one to which civil rights of mankind, and the greatest good of the greatest number, is the strongest system in the world. If Louis Napoleon is wise enough to see that, and wary enough to trust himself to it, he may sit comfortably and his son securely. But if his system corrupts Society as the old Bourbon system corrupted the Louis Philippe system did, he too will fly over the frontier suddenly, and one apparently unimportant explosion may blow him and his throne to pieces. Then he will equally makes him, whether of pebbles or of planets.

"GOD MUST BE SO."

THERE is a very common fatalism in Christendom which is always brought to support every kind of iniquity: and that is, that God permits it. The argument is this: "If God permitted" a man to beg caught in his honey-say sinning as hard as ever, remarks with the utmost surprise, "Why, I've always done so. He took stealing as much view than God, and hasn't he always permitted it?"

Stated in this way the argument is ridiculously transparent, but no more so than it is in every other. Brigham Young can quote you the nations that have encouraged polygamy—and God certainly permitted it; or there would have been no polygamy. History is full of lusts, murders, rapines, and tyranny. What then? Are these things good things? Is the fact that a crime has been committed a reason that it should continue to be committed? The great Teacher taught otherwise. That it was said by them of old time was not a reason with him. He told us that God can in no just sense be said to have permitted what is not according to perfect love and charity. God wills only what is right. If, therefore, any thing is repudiated by the universal human instinct, God does not will it, though it be as venerable and universal and easy as lying.

AN ANSWER.

"——, KENTUCKY.

"MR. LOUNGER,—I have written you more than once to ask when the novel of 'Trumps' will be published, and so have many of my friends; but you have always declined to answer. HAVE you any particular objection to letting us know? Your friend, KITTY ——."

The Lounger is glad to inform his friend, and the many others who have asked him the same question, that "Trumps" is now published, with the admirable illustrations by Augustus Hoppin.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

"BEGGAR MY NEIGHBOR."

An International Duet.

LOUIS.

"COME, MR. Bull, your purse is full,
Let's have a friendly game:
See, here I play you my Les Gloire,
Now what's the card you name?"

JOHN.

"I play my Warrior, a good card,
And one I'll back to win;
Then follow suit with my Black Prince,
The Lion after the Lion.

"And so for every card you play,
You'll find that I'll play two:
My purse is as long as you say—
Who'll tire first, I or you?

"Your little game, my foreign friend,
Is one that two can play:
And he will be the winner to win
Who can the longest pay.

"But is it wise to waste our time
(Not it much I care)
In games that can do neither good,
And are only for grief?

"Throw up your cards, I'll throw up mine,
And core this Trubites labor:
There's work to be done, I ween, to do
Than Beggaring his Neighbor!"

MEMBERS OF THE SAME FAMILY THAT ARE VERY DISTANT TO ONE ANOTHER.

Washington Irving is well known as "City of Magnificent Distances." We think, if the gulf keeps widening, that Jeff. Davis will be known as "Capital, and going to the country at large: for if these secessions and ruptures continue much longer, Jeff. Davis's fourth Heaft will soon be known as "THE NATION OF MAGNIFICENT DISTANCES."

ADORIGINAL POEMS FOR INFANT MINDS.

BY LORD MACAULAY'S NEW ZEALANDER.

I.

Chickaboo, chickaboo, chuckaboo, chew,
Mark baby making a mouth at you,
Cut in the pattern like open-work tart:
Rub in the powder, and shake well the shirt.

II.

Catch a little white boy, catch him by the leg,
Kill a little white boy, and you may have an egg.
Fry a little white boy, do him brown and dry,
Put him on the table with the messenary pie.

III.

Tattoo him, tattoo him, artist-man,
Do on his back as well as you can.
Prick him, and prick him, and mark him with V.
For the name of the Queen that lives over the sea.

IV.

Will my baby go a-courting,
Yes, and ride a white bull:
Take his club and hang the lady:
That's the way to court the gal.

V.

O fe, naughty Wang-Wang, don't scratch little brother,
You're spoiling his pattern, you mischievous dunce:
Let him get well, directly, and then see another—
Or Mamma'll take you both, dear, and cut you at once.

IV.

Will my baby go a courting,
Yes, and ride a white bull:
Take his club and hang the lady:
That's the way to court the gal.

V.

O fe, naughty Wang-Wang, don't scratch little brother,
You're spoiling his pattern, you mischievous dunce:
Let him get well, directly, and then see another—
Or Mamma'll take you both, dear, and cut you at once.

VI.

What, cry when I'd cook you, not like to be stewed?
Then go and be raw, and not fit to be food.
Until you become, like a chop, well done,
I shan't take the trouble to eat such a child.

THE CHRISTIAN BROTHERS.

THE Christian Brothers have been unfortunate here-about in the Borough: here have Hope been rising lately ever so high, and now, Pray look, the Fates have risen also."

ANTIQUE DISCLOSURE OF OUR FUTURE.—TO BE SOLD.

A WHISPER IN THE EAR OF BROTHER JONATHAN.—Keep together, whatever you do. Maintain the Union at any risk. We are—you know—a family secret we wrong yet—that the secret of America's strength is gone, like every secret, the moment it is spilt.

It is the practice among waggish printers, when a poem "out" happens to be set up, to play jokes on him by sending him on an errand to a neighboring office for something that he could by no means find, and he returns with some strange article or other, thinking that, in printer's phrase, he has got a "sell" on the boy. Just a joke of this kind was recently perpetrated in a neighboring town. A boy who was rather "cruel" to cats left his father's printing business, and one of the journaymen, loving sport, sent him one day to the office of a literary editor to borrow "a gill of editorial." The editor, understanding the game, returned a pint bottle. After one day's trial the boy returned rather "come over," set his wits to work to think how he should be even with the editor, and he has not be rifled the lad, and told him to go and tell the editor that "it was editorial which he wanted, and not the editor."

A wag happening to go into the shop of a tailor just as the latter was in the act of putting a coat all garnished with new cloth, thus addressed the knight of the bodkin: "You are a clothier, I presume?" "I am by the highest authority." "How so?" replied the unsuspecting tailor, as he plied his needle with redoubled activity. "I should like to hear the evidence of your assertion." "You shall be accommodated, sir," says the wag, seizing at the same time the recollected of ever having read the passage in the New Testament which declares that "no man putteth a piece of new cloth into an old garment!"

A baby was out with the nurse, who walked it up and down a garden. "It's a baddie, a baddie!" said the gardener. "A baddie," said the maid. "Well," says he, "I'm glad of that, for there's over many women in the world."—"Hech, man," said Jess, "thy ye no ken there's aye maid aneu'd in the best crop?"

WHY SHE NEVER TOLD HER LOVE.

Could it be virgin bashfulness
That shut concealed the tender thought?
Or fear she might perchance confess
A love that was not sought?

Was it mere womanly caprice?
Or pride? or modesty reserve?
Or merely want of nerve?

She could not choose but understand,
His thought, his little game of sighs,
Slow parting gestures of the hand,
Soft words, and "speaking eyes:"

The reason why this was above
Ten years ago he now knows well:
She simply never told her love,
Because—she'd none to tell!

A gentleman at Paris amusing himself in the gallery of the Palais Royal, observed, while he was carelessly looking over some pamphlets at a bookseller's shop, a suspicious fellow stand rather too near him. The gentleman was dressed according to the times, in a coat with a prodigious number of silver tags and tassels, upon which the thief began to have a design; and, finding that he was not willing to disappoint him, turned his head another way to give him an opportunity. The thief immediately set to work, and in a trice twisted off seven or eight of the silver tags. The gentleman perceived it, and, drawing out a pen-knife, caught the fellow by the ear, and cut it off close to his head. "Murder! murder!" cries the thief. "Robbery! robbery!" cries the gentleman. Upon this the thief, in a passion, throwing them at the gentleman, roared—"There are your tags and buttons." "Very well," says the gentleman, throwing it back in the like manner, "there is your ear!"

An old bachelor says he is delighted at having nearly been called "loney" by the girl he loves, because she assisted him at their parting to complete the "O."

Why is a hen immortal?—Because her ova never sets.

"No one would take you to be what you are," said an old-fashioned gentleman the other day to a dandy who had more hair than brains. "Why?" was immediately asked. "Because they can't see your acre."

A beadle of one of the city churches of Glasgow being asked by a stranger in the country whether he could recommend a person to act as a church-officer, replied that he could not, "but if you want a minister," he added, "I could direct you at once, but where to get one qualified to undertake a beadleship is more than I ken."

"Where is your house?" asked a traveler in the depths of the mine of the old miner who was working by his side. "House? I ain't got no home."—"Well, where do you live?"—"I tell you I have no home." After a great punishment purchase, eat raw bear and wild turkey, and drink out of the Mississippi." And he added, "It is getting too thick with folks. You're the second man I've seen within the last month. I'll have to move a few hundred miles up about fifty miles down the river, and I am going to put out into the woods again."

A party of negroes in Biloxi, New York, recently decided to have a ball. It took place about six miles out of the city, and they engaged a splendid six-horse team to take them to the spot. The owner of the team, a well-known white man, was invited to join the party and to entertain him to the care of any one else, resolved to drive it himself. After the ball was opened one of the darkey managers politely invited the gentlemen to go in as a spectator if he pleased, and he did so. After a while, the negroes becoming aroused by the dance, the use of the room became slightly objectionable. As the ball progressed, the owner of the team became weary until he concluded to leave. Just at the moment he saw a number of darkeys in evening costume and one of them approached him with much politeness, and informed him that the ladies requested him to leave the room. The darkey further stated that he regretted to make the request, but that the ladies insisted, because, they said—he smelled too much of the stable!

The Rev. Dr. R——, of E——h, met one day in an omnibus Mr. T——n, a well-connected spoiler. "Now, having just been returned to Parliament, asked Dr. R——, somewhat patronizingly, what he intended to recommend him to follow any particular course in the House of Commons. Dr. R——n, having a little fish, and that Mr. T—— was attracting toward both parties in the public conveyance, said, sweetly, "I recommend moderate to omnibus."

Mothers and maternal aunts will find the following tender epistle from a boy of the fourth form of one of the latter, pleasing if not wholesome, from the moral it conveys:

"DEAREST SIMY,—Flantagenet will come by the train which arrives at 4 o'clock. Have dinner ready for him at 12. Mutton broth, the inside of a chop, the thigh of a pheasant, a few potatoes, a little fish, and a tart will do for him. When he goes to sleep after dinner, put some warmed plates on his knees: if we are breaking him of reading his thumbs. Warm the drawing-room sofa for him, and put three pins in the arm for me. If he can't be wakes cwiwick he probably will do, buy him several toys and give him a rap with a book or a dish or a spoon, and they arnsee him. If you have company at dinner, let him have a large pie of gravy near him, he likes pats both hands ile. When he is a man, we will leave this off. Let a servant go up with him to bed: if he wakes, let her have something hot for him. Be sure tun you grease his nose for him before he sleeps—he is getting to mosquing—tallow-candle next the lighted end, is best.

"Your affectionate MATILDA BROWN."

A North Wales paper thus begins one of its paragraphs: "The inhabitants of Llanbedgrock, and the contiguous parish of Llanfairpwllgwyngyllgogerychwyrndrobwllllantysiliogogogoch, are in very pleasant mood these last twenty-three letters must have!"

The Bridgeport Standard, alluding to Lincoln's farewell speech, at Lincoln Springfield, says it illustrates the following stanza from Watts:

"So Abraham by Divine command,
Left his own home to go with God;
His faith beheld the promised land,
And all the land was his abode."

Quoth Abraham, at Harrisburg—

"From my own house, Pve walked in faith,
Sustained by Divine command;
But here, I think, I'll change to sleep—
Lest I be taken for a deserter!"

The Rev. W—— B—— is possessed of a large share of ready humor. At an evening party in the house of V——, some one asked the learned divine if he had ever known an Edinburgh Professor in a Latin quantity. "I don't remember," said he, "but I know a professor in a false quantity has always been deemed a forfeiture."

Some people, if asked by the poor for relief, are liberal in words, but not in deeds. The only person they dispense charity from are their pursed-up mouths.

The meeting of two gentlemen in the theatre lobby is a happy illustration of the confusion a simultaneity of questions. Coming from different points, each in a great hurry, one addressed the other with, "Pray, have you seen Jacques?"—"No," replied the other; "are you?"

THE RIGHT MAN IN THE WRONG PLACE.—MR. VON FUDGE, who has been invited to a funeral at No. 37, unhappily mistakes the number, and finds himself in the midst of a wedding!—Excuse me, I am afraid I have made a mistake and come to the wrong house." (Distractedly, who is very superstitious, insists upon postponing the wedding for a month, much to the disappointment of Augustus and Julia.)

If a flock of geese are one of their number drink, they will all drink too. Man often make geese of themselves.

BIRD'S-EYE VIEW OF SOCIETY.

"AT HOME. SMALL AND EARLY." REFRESHMENTS.

By Richard Doyle.

THE drawing which accompanies these few lines does not pretend to novelty of subject. Nor is it hoped that people "in society" will be struck with the representation of what they so constantly see, and, it may be added, feel in the Season. It is intended chiefly for the information of country cousins, intelligent foreigners, and other remote persons; also young ladies and gentlemen growing up, and not yet out, to let them know what and where they may expect to go to if they should "give up to parties what is meant for mankind." Perhaps, also, in the future, it may be news to that distinguished New Zealander so often referred to by contemporary writers, and who, we are given to understand, will himself be fond of drawing. Far be it from me to imply that this attempt to picture a manner and custom of modern society is likely to "live" in that distant period of posterity when St. Paul's is in ruins, and the enterprising traveler is sitting patiently on the Monument—I mean the broken arch of London Bridge—sketching. I only intend to convey that a fossil copy of it may, by chance, be dug up by the antiquarian; or that my little fly-leaf may be preserved in the otherwise amber periodical in which it now appears.

It is a Protest against a habit the givers of parties are given to of inviting into their houses more people than the houses will hold. And it may be remarked, that if it be necessary to the happiness of the hostess and the success of "At Homes" that the guests should be crushed almost to death, it would be an improvement if such pressing invitations were issued in winter only, and not, as now, chiefly in the hottest months of the year.

It is common at these receptions for the crowd to reach such dimensions that, the rooms becoming quite full, the company is squeezed gradually up the stairs till it disappears out of sight in the direction of the bedrooms, and toward the roof of the house; while in another direction it overflows out of the windows on to the balconies into outer darkness. More guests arrive every minute, and endeavor to make their way into the presence of the hostess; some struggle manfully, but never reach the rooms, and subside at last on the stairs; others succumb sooner, and live the rest of the night on the landing, a quiet, but an oppressive existence among colored lamps and flower-pots. The whole staircase at last becomes choked up with "society," closely packed, leaning against the balusters on one side and the wall on the other, resigned to their fate; while in the centre or middle passage, the horrors of which increase each moment, two streams of company are seen, one supposing it is going up, and the other under the impression that it is coming down; but this is a delusion, for neither has moved more than three quarters of an inch the last half-hour, and it becomes a melancholy subject for speculation whether, at this rate, the middle of next week or the latter portion is the soonest their respective destinations are likely to be reached.

In such circumstances a philosopher may, although a stout lady be standing upon each of his patna-leather feet, in agony, yet fixed—the edge of a gibus hat stuck in his eye, or an elegant gold pin of enormous size decorating a lovely head, but at the same time stabbing him in the ear—he may, I suggest, still, if he has any pluck, find amusement and instruction. He may find pleasure in the delightful good-humor of some, in the long-enduring, uncomplaining patience of others; and again, he may see one of the gentler sex, while grief is struggling in her face, gallantly preserving her company smile, and trying hard to look as if she really thought it pleasure she was undergoing; and he may see, and hear too, some of the sex that is not gentle seeking relief to their pent-up feelings by muttering words of a condemnatory nature. He may discover who is good-tempered, and who is not, as he contemplates that mob of well-dressed persons, whose trains, heads of hair, wreaths and bouquets, flounces and feelings, are more or less disheveled.

But observe the refreshment-room. From about midnight all the various currents set in in that direction—those in the drawing-rooms, the landing, the little boudoir off the drawing-room, the staircases, and the hall; all these, which are full, are to be emptied into the refreshment-room, which is already full. That is the intention; the consequences of the attempt to carry it out it is not easy to imagine or to describe.

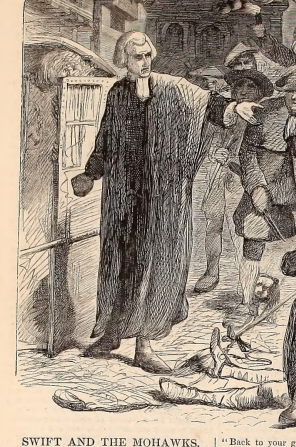
Suppose yourself slowly drifting toward the ices, you being, perhaps, short of stature but of a persevering nature—pledged, perhaps, to the Object of your Affections to get a strawberry cream, she being on the point of fainting—you yourself in an exhausted state, your progress stopped in front, and the horizon shut out from view by a big fat man. The consciousness that the parting of your back hair is being ruffled, that a dragoon's mustache of supernatural length is tickling your eye on one side, and that the man of all others in the world you most dislike has his elbow wedged into your side on the other, almost drives you to despair; and when, with a surprising effort, you are able to turn to escape these, it is only to find all your features violently imbedded in the prodigious wreath attached to a lady's head, and not hers. To be near the rose is considered an advantage, but when the roses are artificial that makes a difference. For my part, I think what I describe realizes the picture of an honest man struggling with adversity, formerly esteemed one of the noblest of sights.

After all, I suppose that, while there are Objects of the Affections, men will be found willing to go through dangers and difficulties to see them and to serve them; and who can doubt that in the fabulous period when the knight killed a dragon, or fought his way through the enchanted forest, an additional pleasure was imparted by those facts to the interview afterward with the princess, who was waiting the result on the tower-top?

Suppose, then, that you have survived the supper-room, your next endeavor is to get into the apartment devoted to outer coats, etc.; and upon reaching which you fondly hope that your garment will be delivered up upon the production by you of a small ticket, having a number inscribed upon it. Vain delusion, and weak-minded man! The barricade of tables formed for the preservation of order and the outer garments, and behind which neatly-attired maidens hat officiated in the early part of the night, has been stormed by "society," and complete anarchy prevails. Ladies' cloaks, beautiful burnooses, shawls, bags containing furs, strange hoods, are trampled under foot, with coats, Inverness wrappers, and hats, all mingled together, and flung about in the wildest disorder. "Numbers" are no use: the maids are fled, or out of their wits with perplexity; it is a wild hunt of ladies and gentlemen for their "things." Some find them, some don't; some take what comes, some go without taking any thing; some have even been known to imagine they had a chance of recovering their property by calling next day.

And to think that there were some people who "moved heaven and earth" to get invited to this party, while of those who were there the greater part seemed to think only of how they could get away soonest, and in safety.

The chance into the fresh air is pleasant after an atmosphere of faded flowers, wax-lights, and scent. There is a whole army of servants about the door, the familiar shouting of the linkman greets the ear, a long stream of carriages—their lamps shining into the far distance—meets the eye, while above are the stars glittering in the cool, bright sky.



SWIFT AND THE MOHAWKS.

[In one of his letters to Stella, dated from Harley Street, Swift speaks with angry disgust of the nightly outrages then perpetrating in London by bands of dissolute revellers, who assumed the Indian name of Mohawks, to express their wildness and ferocity. From what we can gather about them, from stray passages in the Spectator and elsewhere, it would appear that the Mohawks were in the habit of slitting the noses of poor servant maids, and insulting bewildered old citizens, on their way home from their tavern clubs, in prickly circles of sword points, besides breaking windows with showers of half-pence, illtreating old watchmen, and pulling down shop signs, and doing other wanton and selfish mischief. In the following ballad I have confounted them with Swift.]

A BLACK sedan through Temple Bar
Comes at the midnight chime,
Just as above the silvering roofs
The moon begins to climb.
There is something stern about the place,
And sad about the time.

That black arch rises like Death's door,
For rebels' heads are there;
The moonshine, now a silver crown,
Rests upon each in the air,
So bright that you can see their eyes
Upon the clear stars stare.

A grim man sits in the sedan;
It skirts St. Clement's tower
As high aloft in angel's voice
Is meting out the hour;
And on the street the moonbeams broad
Meridian brightness shower.

Fast down the Strand the Mohawks come,
With clash of shivering glass;
With bristling swords and flaming links,
That let no watchman pass;
A yellow gown upon a pole
Leads on the drunken mass.

With hurrying cries of "Scour!" and "Scour!"
The revelers rush on;
Red smoky whirls of drifting flame
Light faces woe-begone—
Such faces only night can show,
Day never on them shone.

"Down with the country parson's chair!"
The drunken Mohawks shout;
"Unearth, old fox! no preaching now
Will save your bacon—out!
Or we'll slit your nose, and float your chair
Down stream—now, Sir, come out!"

The jostled chairmen's trembling hands
Put down the black sedan;
Then out at once—wild beast from cage—
Strides forth a black-browed man,
Who pashes back the line of swords,
And faces all that clan.

Plain, homely, in a rusty gown—
Some village priest, no more—
And yet a lion, and at bay,
Had daunted them no more,
As, all unarmed, the stern man stood,
Backward the foremost bore.

"Begone!" he cried, "you swaggering rogues,
You fools and knaves by fits;
Who let bad wine creep up and steal
Your poor besotted wits;
E'en now for you the hangman works,
And chain to collar knits!

"Back to your garrets and your dens,
Your greasy dice and cards;
Back, lazy prentices and thieves,
Back to your Bridewell wards!
Go to the hospitals, and pine
With Blood Bowl Alley's hordes.

"For ye the madhouse cries and gapes,
For ye the gibbet creaks;
Go, join the highwayman, and kill
The miser when he squeaks;
Or cower around the glass-house when
The pent-house shelter leaks.

"You brood of apes, and dogs, and swine,
Back to your kennels—go—"
(Each bitter word that grim man spoke Fell like a bruising blow)
"—Spawn of the serpent, to your holes,
He calls you from below!"

Those wine-flushed faces pale to see
The sternness of that face;
The banners droop, the tankards sink,
The cowering links give place;
The stuttering mouths, the vacant eyes
Look sober for a space.

The wildest shrinks before that gaze,
Nor dares to brave that eye;
Them, one by one, like snow in thaw,
Melts all that company;
The swords are sheathed, the lights go out,
Hushed is their tipsy glee.

"To Harley Street!" Swift cries, and pass'd,
Humming a biting rhyme;
The moon, just now eclipsed, had ceased
To soar, and soaring climb.
There was something stern about the man,
And sad about the time.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1860, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.]

GREAT EXPECTATIONS.

A NOVEL.

By CHARLES DICKENS.

Splendidly Illustrated by John McLenan.

☞ Printed from the Manuscript and early Proof-sheets purchased from the Author by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."

CHAPTER XXXI.

ONE day when I was busy with my books and Mr. Pocket, I received a note by the post, the more outside of which threw me into a great flutter; for, though I had never seen the handwriting in which it was addressed, I divined whose hand it was. It had no set beginning, as Dear Mr. Pip, or Dear Pip, or Dear Sir, or Dear Anything, but ran thus:

"I am to come to London the day after to-morrow by the mid-day coach. I believe it was settled you should meet me? at all events Miss Havisham has that impression, and I write in obedience to it. She sends you her regards. Yours, ESTELLA."

If there had been time, I should probably have ordered several suits of clothes for this occasion; but as there was not, I was fain to be content with those I had. My appetite vanished instantly, and I knew no peace or rest until the day arrived. Not that its arrival brought me either; for then I was worse than ever, and began haunting the coach-office in Wood Street, Cheapside, before the coach had left the Blue Boar in our town. For all that I knew this perfectly well, I still felt as if it were not safe to let the coach-office be out of my sight longer than five minutes at a time; and in this condition of unreason I had performed the first half-hour of a watch of four or five hours, when Mr. Wemmick ran against me.

"Hallos, Mr. Pip," said he; "how do you do? I should hardly have thought this was your beat."

I explained that I was waiting to meet somebody who was coming up by coach, and I inquired after the Castle and the Aged.

"Both flourishing, thank ye," said Wemmick, "and particularly the Aged. He's in wonderful feather. He'll be eighty-two next birthday. I have a notion of firing eighty-two times, if the neighborhood shouldn't complain, and that cannon of mine should prove equal to the pressure. However, this is not London talk. Where do you think I am going to?"

"To the office?" said I, for he was tending in that direction.

"Next thing to it," returned Wemmick, "I am going to Newgate. We are in a banker's-parcel case just at present, and I have been down the road taking a squint at the scene of action, and thereupon must have a word or two with our client."

"Did your client commit the robbery?" I asked.

"Bless your soul and body, no," answered Wemmick, very dryly. "But he is accused of it. So might you or I be. Either of us might be accused of it, you know."

"Only neither of us is," I remarked.

"Yah!" said Wemmick, touching me on the breast with his fore-finger; "you're a deep one, Mr. Pip! Would you like to have a look at Newgate? Have you time to spare?"

I had so much time to spare that the proposal came as a relief, notwithstanding its unreconcilability with my latent desire to keep my eye on the coach-office. Muttering that I would make the inquiry whether I had time to walk with him, I went into the office, and ascertained from the clerk, with the nicest precision and much to the trying of his temper, the earliest moment at which the coach could be expected—which I knew beforehand quite as well as he. I then rejoined Mr. Wemmick, and affecting to consult my watch and to be surprised by the information I had received, accepted his offer.

We were at Newgate in a few minutes, and we passed through the lodge where some fetters were hanging up on the bare walls among the prison rules, into the interior of the jail. At that time jails were much neglected, and the period of exaggerated reaction consequent on all public wrong-doing—and which is always its heaviest and longest punishment—was still far off. So felons were not lodged and fed better than soldiers (to say nothing of paupers), and seldom set fire to their prisons with the excusable object of improving the flavor of their soup. It was visiting time when Wemmick took me in; and a potman was going his rounds with beer; and the prisoners behind bars in yards were buying beer and talking to friends; and a frouzy, ugly, disorderly depressing scene it was.

I struck me that Wemmick walked among the prisoners much as a gardener might walk among his plants. This was first put into my head by his seeing a shoot that had come up in the night, and saying, "What, Captain Tom? Are you there? Ah, indeed!" and also, "Is that Black Bill behind the cistern? Why, I didn't look for you these two months; how do you find yourself?" Equally in his stopping at the bars and attending to anxious whisperers—always singly—Wemmick with his post-office in an immovable state, looked at them while in conference, as if he were taking particular notice of the advance they had made, since last observed, toward coming out in full blow at their trial.

He was highly popular, and I found that he took the familiar department of Mr. Jaggers's business (though something of the state of Mr. Jaggers hung about him too, forbidding approach beyond certain limits. His personal recognition of each successive client was comprised in a nod, and in his settling his hat a little easier on his head with both hands, and then tightening the post-office, and putting his hands in his pockets. In one or two instances, there was a difficulty respecting the raising of fees, and then Mr. Wemmick, backing as far as possible from the insufficient money produced, said, "It's no use, my boy. I'm only a subordinate. I can't take it. Don't go on in that way with a subordinate. If you are unable to make up your quantum, my boy, you had better address yourself to a principal; there are plenty of principals in the profession, you know, and what is not worth the while of one may be worth the while of another—that's my recommendation to you, speaking as a subordinate. Don't try on useless measures. Why should you? Now, who's next?"

Thus we walked through Wemmick's greenhouse until he turned to me and said, "Notice the man I shall shake hands with." I should have done so, without the preparation, as he had shaken hands with no one yet.

Almost as soon as he had spoken, a portly upright man (whom I can see now, as I write) in a well-worn olive-colored frock-coat, with a peculiar pallor overspreading the red in his complexion, and eyes that went wandering about when he tried to fix them, came up to a corner of the bars, and put his hand to his hat—which had a greasy and fatty surface like cold broth—with a half-serious and half-jocose military salute.

"Colonel, to you!" said Wemmick; "how are you, Colonel?"

"All right, Mr. Wemmick."

"Every thing was done that could be done, but the evidence was too strong for us, Colonel."

"Yes, it was too strong, Sir—but I don't care."

"No, no," said Wemmick, coolly, "you don't care. Then, turning to me, "Served His Majesty this man. Was a soldier in the line and bought his discharge."

I said, "Indeed?" and the man's eyes looked at me, and then looked over my head, and then looked all round me, and then he drew his hand across his lips and laughed.

"I think I shall be off on Monday, Sir," he said to Wemmick.

"Perhaps," returned my friend, "but there's no knowing."

"I am glad to have the chance of bidding you good-by, Mr. Wemmick," said the man, stretching out his hand between two bars.

"Thank ye," said Wemmick, shaking hands with him. "Same to you, Colonel."

"If what I had upon me when taken had been real, Mr. Wemmick," said the man, unwilling to let his hand go, "I should have asked the favor of your wearing another ring—in acknowledgment of your attention."

"I'll accept the will for the deed," said Wemmick. "By-the-by, you were quite a pigeon-fancier." The man looked up at the sky. "I am told you had a remarkable breed of tumblers. Could you commission any friend of yours to bring me a pair, if you've no further use for 'em?"

"IF I SAY YES, MAY I KISS THE CHEEK AGAIN?"

"It shall be done, Sir."

"All right," said Wemmick, "they shall be taken care of. Good-afternoon, Colonel. Good-by!" They shook hands again, and as we walked away Wemmick said to me, "A Coiner, a very good workman. The Recorder's report is made to-day, and he is sure to be hanged on Monday. Still you see, as far as it goes, a pair of pigeons are portable property, all the same." With that he looked back, and nodded at this dead plant, and then cast his eyes about him in walking out of the yard, as if he were considering what other pot would go best in its space.

As we came out of the prison through the lodge, I found that the great importance of my guardian was appreciated by the turnkeys, no less than by those whom they held in charge. "Well, Mr. Wemmick," said the turnkey, who kept us between the two studded and spiked lodge gates, and carefully locked one before he unlocked the other, "what's Mr. Jaggers going to do with that waterside murder? Is he going to make it manslaughter, or what's he going to make of it?"

"Why don't you ask him?" returned Wemmick.

"Oh yes, I dare say!" said the turnkey.

"Now, that's the way with them here, Mr. Pip," remarked Wemmick, turning to me with the post-office elongated. "They don't mind what they ask of me, the subordinate; but you'll never catch 'em asking any questions of my principal."

"Is this young gentleman one of the 'prentices or relations ones of your own office?" asked the turnkey, with a grin at Mr. Wemmick's humor.

"Oh yes, I dare say!" said the turnkey.

"Now, that's the way with them here, Mr. Pip," remarked Wemmick, turning to me with the post-office elongated. "They don't mind what they ask of me, the subordinate; but you'll never catch 'em asking any questions of my principal."

"Is this young gentleman one of the 'prentices or relied ones of your own office?" asked the turnkey, with a grin at Mr. Wemmick's humor.

"There he goes again, you see!" cried Wemmick. "I told you so! Asks another question of the subordinate before his first is dry! Well, supposing I am, Pip is one of the family."

"Why then," said the turnkey, grinning again, "he knows what Mr. Jaggers is."

"Ah!" cried Wemmick, suddenly hitting out at the turnkey in a facetious way, "you're as dumb as one of your own keys when you have to do with my principal—you are. Recollect you are, Let us out, you old fox, or I'll get him to bring an action of false imprisonment against you."

The turnkey laughed, and gave us good-day, and stood laughing at us over the spikes of the wicket when we descended the steps into the street.

"Mind you, Mr. Pip," said Wemmick, gravely, in my ear, as he took my arm to be more confidential; "I don't know that Mr. Jaggers does to better than the way in which he keeps himself so high. He's always so high. His constant height is of a piece with his immense abilities. Head Colonel dare no more take leave of him, than that turnkey durst ask him his intentions respecting a case. Then between his height and them he slips in his subordinates—don't you see?—and so he has 'em, soul and body."

I was very much impressed, and not for the first time, by my guardian's subtlety. To confess the truth, I very heartily wished, and not for the first time, that I had had some other guardian of more abilities.

Mr. Wemmick and I parted at the office in Little Britain, where suppliants for Mr. Jaggers's notice were lingering about as usual, and I returned to my watch in the street of the ooach-office, with some three hours on hand. I consumed the whole time in thinking how strange it was that I should be accompanied by all this taint of prison and crime; that in my childhood out on our lonely marshes on a winter evening I should have first encountered it; that it should have reappeared on two occasions, starting out like a stain that was faded but not gone; that it should in the very new year pave my fortune and advancement. I thought of the beautiful young Estella, proud and refined, coming forward in, while the boy was thus engaged, and thought with absolute abhorrence of the contrast between the jail and her. I wished that Wemmick had not known me, or that I had not yielded to him and gone with him, so that, of all days in the year on this day, I might not have had Newgate in my mouth and on my clothes. I beat the prison dust off my feet as I sauntered to and fro, and I shook it out of my dress, and I exhaled its air from my lungs. So contaminated did I feel, remembering who was coming, that the coach came quickly after all, and I was not yet free from the soiling consciousness of Mr. Wemmick's commentary, when I saw her face at the coach window and her hand waving to me.

What was the nameless shadow which again in that one instant had passed?

CHAPTER XXXII.

In her furred traveling-dress, Estella seemed more delicately beautiful than she had ever seemed yet, even in my eyes. Her manner was more winning than she had cared to let it be to me before, and I thought I saw Miss Havisham's influence in the change.

We stood in the Inn Yard while she posted out her luggage to me, and when it was all collected I remembered—having forgotten every thing but herself in the mean while—that I knew nothing of her destination.

"I am going to Richmond," she told me.

"Our lesson is, that there are two Richmonds, one in Surrey and one in Yorkshire, and that mine is the Surrey Richmond. The distance is ten miles. I am to have a carriage, and you are to take me. This is my purse, and you are to pay my charges out of it. Oh, you must take the purse. We have no choice, you and I, but so obey our instructions. We are not free to follow our own devices, you and I."

As she looked at me in my inner meaning in her words. She said them slightingly, but not with displeasure.

A carriage will have to be sent for, Estella. Will you rest here a little?"

"Yes, I am to rest here a little, and I am to drink some tea, and you are to take care of me the while."

She drew her arm through mine, as if it must be done, and I requested a waiter who had been staring at the coach like a man who had never seen such a thing in his life, to show us a private sitting-room. Upon that he pulled out a napkin, as if it were a magic clean towel which he couldn't find the way up stairs, and led us to the black hole of the establishment; fitted up with a tarnished mirror (quite a superfluous article considering the hole's proportions), an anchovy sauce-cruet, and somebody's pattens. On my objecting to this retreat, he took us into another room with a dinner-table for thirty, and in the grate a scorched leaf of a copy-book under a bushel of coal-dust. Having looked at this extinct conflagration and shaken his head, he took my order: which, proving to be merely "Some tea for the lady," sent him out of the room in a very low state of mind.

I was, and I am, sensible that the air of this chamber, in its strong combination of stable, and soup-stock, might have led one to infer that the coaching department was not doing well, and that the enterprising landlord was living above the horses for the refreshment department. But the room was all in all to me, Estella being in it. I thought that with her I could have been happy there for life. I was not at all happy there at the time, observe, and I knew it well.

"Where are you going to, at Richmond?" I asked Estella.

"I am going to live," said she, "at a great expense, with a lady there, who has the power —or says she has—to take me about and bring me introducing me, and showing people to me and showing me to people."

"I suppose you will be glad of variety and admiration?"

"Yes, I suppose so."

She answered me carelessly that I said, "You speak of yourself as if you were some one else."

"Where did you learn how I speak of others? Come, come, Pip," she returned, lightly, "you must not expect me to go to school to you; I must talk in my own way. How do you thrive with Mr. Pocket?"

"I live quite pleasantly there; at least—" Is appeared to me that I was losing a chance.

"At least?" repeated Estella.

"As pleasantly as I could any where, away from you."

"You silly boy," said Estella, quite composedly, "how can you talk such nonsense? Your friend Mr. Matthew, I believe, is superior to the rest of his family?"

"Very superior indeed. He is nobody's enemy—"

"Don't add 'but his own,'" interposed Estella, "for I hate that class of man. But he really is disinterested, and above small jealousy and spite, I have heard?"

"I am sure I have every reason to say so."

"You have not every reason to say so of the rest of his people," said Estella, nodding at me with an approving face that was at once grave and rallying, "for they beset Miss Havisham with reports and insinuations to your disadvantage. They watch you, misrepresent you, write letters about you, eavesdrop and misunderstand. You are the torment and the occupation of their lives. You can scarcely realize to yourself the hatred those people feel for you."

"They do me no harm, I hope?" said I.

Instead of answering, Estella burst out laughing. I felt extremely angular to me, and I looked at her in considerable perplexity. When she left off—and she had not laughed languidly but in a real enjoyment of me and my mystification—I said with her, "I hope I may suppose that you would not be amused if they did me any harm."

"No, no, you may suppose that," said Estella. "You may be certain that I laugh because they fail. Oh, those people with Miss Havisham, and their miserable opinions!" and she laughed again, and even now when she had told me why, her laughter was very singular to me, for I could not detect a singular emotion in it, and it seemed too much for the occasion. I thought there must really be something more here than I knew; and the saw the thought in my mind, and answered it.

"It is not easy for even you," said Estella, "to know what satisfaction it gives me to see those people thwarted, or what an enjoyable sense of the ridiculous I have when they are made ridiculous. For you were not brought up in that strange place, my dear, to be fooled by it. You had not your little will sharpened by their intriguing against you, suppressed and defenseless, under the mask of sympathy and pity, and what not that is soft and soothing.—I had. You did not gradually open your round childish eyes wider and wider to the discovery of that state secret of a woman who calculates her stores of peace of mind when she wakes up in the night.—I did."

It was no laughing matter with Estella now, nor was she summoning these remembrances from any shallow place. I felt that I was in the presence of a woman who had been practised on by the arts of which I was ignorant.

"Two things I can tell you," said Estella. "First, notwithstanding the proverb that constant dropping will wear away a stone, you may set your mind at rest that these people never will—never would, in a hundred years—impair your ground with Miss Havisham, in any particular, degree or way. Second, I am beholden to you as the cause of their being so busy and so mean in vain, and there is my hand upon it."

As she gave it me playfully—for her darker mood had been but momentary—I held it and put it to my lips. "You ridiculous boy," said Estella, "will you never take warning? Or do you kiss my hand in the spirit in which I once let you kiss my cheek?"

"What was it?" said I.

"I must think a moment. A spirit of contempt for the fawners and plotters."

"If I say yes, may I kiss the cheek again?"

"You should have asked before you touched the hand. Yes, yes, you may."

I leaned down, and her calm face was like a statue's. "Now," said Estella, gliding away the instant I touched her cheek, "you are to take care that I have some tea, and you are to take me to Richmond."

Her reverting to this tone as if our association were forced upon us and we were mere puppets, gave me pain; but every thing in our intercourse did give me pain. Whatever her tone with me happened to be, I could put no trust in it, and build no hope on it; and yet I went on against reason, against sense. Why repeat it a thousand times? So it always was.

I rang for the tea, and the waiter, reappearing with his sacrilegious towel, brought in by degrees some fifty adjuncts to that refreshment, but of tea not a glimpse. A tea-board, cups and saucers, plates, knives and forks (including carvers), spoons (various), salt-cellars, a mock little muffin confined with the utmost precaution under a large strong tin cover, bloaters in the bulrushes dignified by a soft loaf of butter in a quantity of parsley, a pale loaf, with a powdered head, two proof impressions of the bars of the kitchen fireplace on its countenance, and ultimately, with a fat family urn, which the waiter staggered in with, expressing in his countenance burden and suffering. After a pause of blowing and poking at this stage of the entertainment, he at length came back with a casket of precious appearance containing twigs, for the infusion in hot water, and so from the whole of these appliances extracted one cup of I don't know what, for Estella.

The bill paid, and the waiter remembered, and the hostler not forgotten, and the chamberlain taken into consideration with a word, the whole house bribed into a state of contempt and animosity, and Estella's purse much lightened—we got into the carriage and drove away. Turning into Cheapside and rattling up Newgate Street, we were soon under the walls of which I was thinking.

"What place is that?" Estella asked me.

I made a foolish pretense of not at first recognizing it, and then told her. As she looked at it, and then looked at me, her head, murmuring "Wretches!" I would not have confessed to my visit for any consideration.

"Mr. Jaggers, I say by way of putting it neatly on somebody else, "has the reputation of being more in the secrets of that dismal place than any man in London."

"He is more in the secrets of every place I think," said Estella, in a low voice.

"You have been accustomed to see him often, I suppose?"

"I have been accustomed to see him at uncertain intervals, ever since I can remember. But I know him no better now than I did before I could speak plainly. What is your own experience of him, that you associate with him?"

"Once habituated to his distrustful manner," said I, "I have done very well."

"Are you intimate?"

"I dare dined with him at his private house."

"I fancy," said Estella, shrinking, "that must be a curious place."

"It is a curious place."

I should have been chary of discussing my guardian too freely even with her; but I should have been chary of that subject so far as to describe the dinner in Gerard Street, if we had not then come into a sudden glare of gas. It seemed all white for me in all slight and alive with that inexplicable feeling I had had before; and when we were out of it, I was as much dazed for a few moments as if I had been in lightning.

So we fell into other talk, and it was principally about the way by which we were traveling, and about nothing that London lay on this side of it, and what on that. The great city was almost new to her, she told me, for she had never left Miss Havisham's neighborhood until she had gone to France, and she had merely passed through London then in going and returning, locked her in a carriage and had any charge of her while she remained here? To that she emphatically said, "God forbid!" and no more.

It was impossible for me to avoid seeing that she cared to attract me; that she made herself winning; and would have won me even if the task had needed pains. Yet this made me none the happier, for even if she had not taken that tone of our being disposed of by others, I should have felt that she held my heart in her hand because she willfully chose to do it, and not because it would have wrung any tenderness in her to crush it and throw it away.

When we passed through Hammersmith I showed her where Mr. Matthew Pocket lived, and said it was no great way from Richmond, and that I hoped she would see her sometimes.

"Oh, yes, you are to see me; you are to come when you think proper; you are to be mentioned to the family; indeed you are already mentioned."

I inquired was it a large household she was going to be a member of?

"No; there are only two—mother and daughter. The mother is a lady of some station, I believe, though not averse to increasing her income."

"I wonder Miss Havisham could part with you again so soon."

"It is a part of Miss Havisham's plans for me, Pip," said Estella, with a sigh, as if she were tired; "I am to write to her constantly and see her regularly, and report how I go on—I and the jewels—for they are nearly all mine now."

It was the first time she had ever called me by my name. Of course she did so purposely, and knew that I should treasure it up.

We came to Richmond all too soon, and our destination there was a house by the Green—a solemn old house, with three heaps and powder and patches, embroidered coats, trolled larkings, ruffles, and swords had had their court-days many a time. Some ancient trees before the house were still cut into fashions as formal and unnatural as the hoops and wigs and stiff skirts of the last century, and threw a dismal shade on the allotted place in the great procession of the dead were not far off, and they would soon drop into them and go the silent way of the rest.

A bell with a handle of rusty iron hung up in its time had often said to the house, Here is the green farthingale, Here is the diamond-hilted sword, Here are the shoes with red heels and the blue solitaire—sounded gravely in the moonlight, and two cherry-colored maids came flustering out to receive Estella. The door-way soon absorbed her hoops, and she gave me her hand and a smile, and said good-night, and was absorbed likewise. And still I stood looking at the house, thinking how happy I should be if I lived there with her, and knowing that I never should be happy with her, whether she lived there or not.

I got into the carriage to be taken back to Hammersmith, and I got in with a bad heart-ache, and I got out with a worse. Throughout At our own door I found little Jane Pocket coming home from a party escorted by her little lover; and I marveled how little lover, in spite of his being subject to Flopson.

Mr. Pocket was out lecturing; for he was a most delightful lecturer on domestic economy, and his treatises on the management of children and servants were considered the very best textbooks on those themes. But Mrs. Pocket was at home, and was in a little difficulty, on account of the baby's having been accommodated with a needle-case to keep him quiet during the unceremonious exercise (with a wooden leg in the Foot Guards) of Millers, and of more needles being missing than it could be regarded as quite wholesome for a patient of such tender years either to apply externally or to take as a tonic.

As Mr. Pocket was also busy with the case, I gave Mrs. Pocket practical assistance, and for having a clear and sound perception of things and a highly judicious mind, I had some notion in my heartache of begging him to accept my confidence. But happening to look up at Mrs. Pocket as she sat reading her book of dignities after dismissing the case, I was struck by the vanity of baby, I thought, Well—No, I wouldn't.

ELISABETTA SIRANI.

1665.

Wert to begin—and end! so much—no more!
To touch with light, my pencil at last
Where life should cling: to feel the solid shore
Safe; warm, the reeking sea of storm and toil expel,
Peace seem'd appointed: then, with all the store
Of magic weight of the gland's acute cell,
Like a discouraged wave on the bleak strand,
Whose fresh appeal, some temple (where no glad Priest
To gather ocean's sparkling gift should stand),
Shining for ever, would waive, then yield
Deep in the marble harbors bathed with blood
And quiet sunshine, darting from that coast
Among the tuneful pines the dull-blind rocks
Thunder their call to die, a dimpling,
Death purpose: which the scornful shore-cliff mocks,
Rent in the sands: and all its scarcely
In vain,—there food to feed, preclusive, stony flocks
Of the same gull, wavering, that were shrouded
Of idle foam, swift seating to be rent
Sail, and [illegible]: yet it came to this,
For I am dying. All that matter'd was here—
That must have been!... the days, to hard to miss,
So vain to miss!... Love, life, that would be mine
In on me as my work; and about it then
The world's ever it, ... last! And she never doubt
I should have lived to know them all again,
Not from the blurred memorial alive with toil
For special love those forms betelet so plain
Beforehim. When my pictures, fresh and cool
Bologna, to the church doors, led their train
Of kindling hearts! ... Ah, yet I come to this,
Too much remembered—standing at your side
Unseen, unheard, [illegible] and welcome back those eyes and lips, deserted
Long since in favor of the [illegible] dark.
And so believed them! Think!... Bologna's pride
My pupilage!... Guido Reni's mantle was ...
And I, the maiden artist, prized among
The wearers, ... Ah, [illegible] was divine
For earth to realize! I die so young,
All this success to fail, God, the [illegible] Thine.
Not man's, then ... better so! That throbbing throng
Of human faces [illegible] Thine were yours,
Believed me, the inexorable Fate
(For all our vows' affections) scarce endures
Above one. Alas! I go, then, where
Out from among you? Nay, my work insures
Fit praise somewhere—the gift must wait!
Had I lived longer, life would sure have set
Earth's gift of fame for me, and I, for it,
Death must make safe the heavenly guerdon yet.
Take, then, solace for immortality ...
There was my error! Father, never let Doubt of reward confound our charity!
Besides, I have done much: and what is done
Of work, that work is my heart conceived—my hand
Made fast ... cold, mutely, silent, and weeping non
Of my completion ... my voice with bold brand,
Yet keep my life upon them;—as the sun,
After fallen below the limits of the land,
Still sees on every form of purple cloud
His painted procession.

Flaring August's here,
September's coming! Summer's bridetrl shroud
Is borne away in triumph by the year:
Red Autumn drops from all his branches bow'd,
His careless wealth upon the ground.
We must be careful. Set the ornament wide.
One last look o'er the plains I have loved,
One last long look!..... Bologna, O my pride
Among thy palaced streets! Thy days have moved Pleasantly o'er us. What has been denied
To our cadences? Life goes unproved.
To make the best of all things, is the best
Of all meats to be happy. This I know,
But can not phrase it finely. The night's rest
The day's toil sweetens. Flowers are warm'd by snow.
All's sweet, in fact. Work on the ground. Joy's nest
Itself is salted with a touch of woe.
There's nothing comes to me my not be borne,
Except a too great happiness. But this Comes rarely. Tho' I know that you will mourn

The little maiden helpmate you must miss,
Thanks be to God, I leave you not forlorn:
There should be comfort in this dying kiss.
Let Mothers keep my colors for herself,
I'm sorry that Lucia went away
At some sunkissen. There's a cheerful elf
Sold her my scarlet ribbons, mother; my
I thought of that. My pallor on the shelf,
Surprised, no doubt, at such love lordship.
In the small window, on the east, stands
My picture for the Empress Eleanor,
Still waiting some fine touches on the weak hands
Most dear to others. Yet there's time before
The year ends. And the Empress's own commands
You'll find in writings. Further, I have left a more
Like mine then Anne's: let her finish it.
Oh, — and there's Mass on Sunday afternoon!
You'll find my work done for him: something fit
To hang among his saints. Ah, that's the plan
My fancy took to please our friend's dull wit,
Scarce better than his old tin fishing can. . .
St. Margaret, stately as a ship full sail,
Leading a dragon up on a golden chain.
The ribbon flutters gayly in the gale:
The monster follows the Saint's guiding hand,
Wrinkled to one grim smile from head to tail:
So he has helped him to learn grave friend.
—— Where are you, dear ones? . . .

'Tis the dull, faint chill,
Which soon will shrivel into nothingness!
Dear brother, sister, father, mother—still Stand near me! While your hands in fact remain
Within my sense, vague fears of unknown ill
Are stiff or crowded out, and "tis vain
Great Giulio Romi; great Antonio; great
Bartolomeo, kindly. When I'm gone,
And in the school-room, as of old, you meet,
. . . Ah, yes! you'll miss a certain merry tone,
A cheerful face, a smile that stood for guide
The vague plans in the hunched picture grown
By my school-fellows. I'm sorry I died.
That might should utter there. Mere life, at least,
Could make beauty through the dim shadows
Across it. Safely the warm years increase
Among us. I have never cared for feasts
From our small table at earth's general feast.
To Father Jerome: never loved but you.
Dear family of friends, except my sex:
Nor may those fears that my Lieutenant knew
His quiver's in the quiet of my heart.
I die a maiden to Madonna true,
And would have so continued. . . There, the smart,
The pang, the faintness! . . .

Ever, as I lie
Here, with the autumn sunset on my face,
And keep in my ears (while I sigh
Together, slipping softly from the place
We play'd in, melancoly) prayer to pray
A low warm humming summers in my ears,
Old summer afternoons faint fragments rise
Out of my broken life. . . . A little maiden
Shadows like a moon in mellow skies:
She there I am with the dear sisters and she there's
The Grand Duke Cosmo with the Destinies:
Or, Margaret with her dragon, or Antonio
Along the Via Urbana come and go:
Bologna with her towers: . . . Then all grows dim,
And shapes itself anew, softly and slow.
To clouds of glories thro' which the silver hymn
Eludes the sensitive silence; while below
The sunset window, the quiet room, the dim,
And sleepy sunbeam, powders with waved gold
A moving figure mist along the gloom,
Whereby to find its way, thro' manifold
Magnificence, to Guido Reni's throne
Which sat in steadfast splendor, I behold.
And all the while, I have no income home,
Till dizzy grows the brain, and dark the eye
Beneath its eyelid. When the end is near,
There, by his tomb (our master's) let me lie,
Somewhere not too far off: beneath the dome
Of our own Lady of the Rosary:
Safe, where old friends will pass; and not near them!
Owen Meredith.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

ELECTIONS DURING THE WEEK.

The election for State officers and members of Congress in Rhode Island took place on 3d, and resulted in the complete overthrow of the Republicans. The Opposition gain two members of Congress.

We are to-day without full returns from Connecticut, but the Republican majority for Governor will not probably fall short of 4,000. Last year it was 541, a gain of over 1100.

At the city election in Cincinnati, on 2d, the Unionists are reported to have carried their ticket by 2000 majority.

The Brooklyn charter election, on 1st, resulted in the success of the Democratic Mayor, Corporation Counsel, and for Mayor, by a majority of 5037, or 1002 less than the Democratic majority at the gubernatorial election. The rest of the city for President, last fall, was: Lincoln, 15,137; Prolano, 10,619; Douglas, 6,004. Lincoln's vote in the Democratic town an apparent gain in their majority upon last fall of 4,518.

At the municipal election in Richmond, Virginia, on 2d, the Union candidate for Mayor was defeated by a decisive majority.

The city of Portland, on 2d, elected William W. Thomas Mayor by 175 majority over his Democratic competitor. Last year Democrats carried Portland by 31 majority. The City Council is also largely Democratic.

A LETTER FROM GENERAL SCOTT.

Some sort of a row has been made in Virginia about the delivery of guns from the Bellona Arsenal to the Governor, General Scott writes the following letter:

"WASHINGTON, March 27, 1861.

"DEAR SIR.—On inquiry here, at the Ordnance Department, I learn that the guns of the Bellona Arsenal, about which you write, are by contract to be delivered at Rockville, on the Maryland line of canal boats, thereby saving expense of landing and reshipping before being sold for. If stolen while there, they will be a total fall whole on the founders. The guns are only sent to Fort Monroe as a safe place of deposit—being as little would answer for the defence of that work as for the defence of Richmond. The subject was yesterday before the Secretary of War, on an inquiry from some quarter unknown to me, and I have not time to learn the character of the party. The object of inquiry in the case results from the founders' want of the earliest money.

"I write as a mere outsider in respect to such matters, for my position happily exempts me from the handling of money—from all contracts and disbursements.

"With great respect, your obedient servant,

"WINFIELD SCOTT."

THE NEW CONFEDERATE LOAN.

According to the Montgomery correspondence of the Charleston Mercury, the measures now both North and South, are to appear to take the Confederate loan that they can not wait for the opening of bids:

"When the contract was made that Congress had authorized a loan, and before proposals were invited, a Mississippian placed $50,000 in the hands of his bankers, made subject to the draft of the Treasurer of the Confederacy. This gentleman is not alone in his patriotic tender of money at the time it was supposed the Government was in need of it, for similar offers came from other States. I learn to-day that one man has offered $100,000, and another $30,000, to Mr. Memminger for which sum no interest is required. It is well known here that offers of money have been received from New York, Philadelphia, New Orleans, and other cities in the United States and in the Confederate States, to an amount that would cover the entire authorized loan. Mr. Memminger has concluded—and very wisely too—that the citizens of the Confederate States are entitled to the preference in this investment, and the bonds will be scattered among them as equally as possible."

AFFAIRS AT FORT PICKENS.

Lieutenant Gilman, one of the officers at Fort Pickens, arrived at Washington on 3d from Pensacola, having left there on the 31st of March. He states that no reinforcements had been landed from the Brooklyn or any other vessel, but that she had gone to Key West for provisions. He states that the Confederate troops were arriving there in large numbers, and in a few days would have five thousand, well provisioned. He says it is impossible for the Government to hold Fort Pickens without the Confederate authorities knowing it, and whenever they attempt a hostilities will be opened upon it. He says he met large numbers of troops on the route for Pensacola; that General Bragg and Governor Moore of the Confederate Government much longer before they commence operations. He says it is generally believed that Fort Pickens was to be abandoned. Such assurances were given out there.

A LETTER FROM THE "SABINE."

The Times publishes a letter written on board the frigate Sabine, dated Hampton Roads, March 30, which we insert into the omission of affairs at that point, both on ship and shore, on the 29th. The writer says that the vessels and boats station were short of provisions, and the men on account of the supposed neglect of the authorities at Washington, were somewhat disheartened; but since then the supplies which have been dispatched from the port have doubtless reached their destination. The letter says nothing relative to the evacuation of Fort Pickens, except to exhibit the difficulty of such an enterprise.

ANOTHER VESSEL FIRED INTO.

Important information has been received at Charleston. The soldiers on Morris Island, unable probably to restrain longer their martial ardor, and burning once more to signalize their bravery and prowess, yesterday, during the prevalence of a severe gale, fired into a schooner which was attempting to enter the harbor. The schooner was struck by a shot, which went through her, immediately turned and stood off to sea, and has not since been seen. It was subsequently ascertained that she was from New Jersey, loaded with ice. The only conjecture that can be had is that she carried no colors—which it is quite likely she had not on board. The Charleston authorities dispatched a steamer to Governor Pickens for an explanation, but the result of the interview is not known. It is understood, however, Lieutenants Snyder and Talbot came off from Fort Sumter and said to the captain of the vessel (a pilot) or: and in the evening Lieutenant Talbot left with dispatches for Washington, and Lieutenant Snyder returned to the fort. Whether the schooner which was fired into subsequently put into any other port, has not been ascertained, both in Charleston and Washington, that supplies and mail matter had been cut off from Fort Sumter, by order of Jefferson Davis.

THE GARRISON AT FORT MORGAN.

The Mobile Tribune of the 27th has the following: "The garrison at Fort Morgan, Alabama, is to be reduced in a thousand men. At present we suppose there are at least seven or eight thousand men at that point. It is said that they are rapidly being instructed in all the garrison duties. They will then be ready for active service, when, if we should put them through what is vulgarly termed 'a course of egress.' That is about what we intend to do; and, if he did, he would find it a very difficult feat."

RUMORED MEXICAN FOWLY UPON TEXAS.

We have heard from Mexico, through General Gonzal Ampudia, with three thousand Mexicans, was at last accounts within a few days' march of Brownsville. The papers report that his object was to plunder Brownsville and Matamoros, and then retire. It is also reported that Ampudia has aroused the Mexicans with the design of renouncing Texas back to Mexico. Ampudia was as the Federal Government no longer supports Texas, nor at the time to retake her. The Texans were preparing to repel the invasion.

HOW ARKANSAS STANDS.

A letter dated Little Rock, March 22, says: "Our Convention has adjourned, subject to the call of the Union. Sebald down what we consider our grievances—a plan for adjustment—Joined Virginia Convention 1st April in Washington or Frankfort on the 27th day of May next, and elected five delegates to represent us in that Convention. If we are not first Monday in August next, we take the vote of the people for 'co-operation' or 'secession,' and if the latter, then determine our action. We had all odds to contend against. Every influence was brought to bear on us. Disappointed politicians and aspiring ones crowded the Convention to sway its action, but to no purpose. I think we have done well."

A NEW CUSTOM-HOUSE REGULATION.

To guard against the fraudulent entry and unauthorized out of bond for the purposes of transportation to States which do not acknowledge the authority of the United States Government, thus defrauding the Government of its proper revenue, the Secretary of the Treasury has issued the following order to the Collectors of Customs at the various Atlantic ports. The guards are instructed to be vigilant, and in order to introduce them into Southern ports under their charge favorable and prompt facilities for the inconvenience of paying duties at all, was getting to be quite too numerous to be longer tolerated. The following is a copy of the order:

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 28, 1861.

"The control of the warehouses of the Government in the several ports of the States of South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, and Florida having been usurped under the alleged authority of those States, and the collection of the revenue therein under the authority of the United States having been forcibly prevented from their exercise, all goods, wares, and merchandise, and experimentence of the entries for warehousing and withdrawing will be peremptorily refused, continue the privilege of bonding for transportation to those ports.

"Collectors of the Customs are accordingly hereby instructed that no entries for transportation to those ports can be permitted until otherwise directed by the Department. By order of the Secretary of the Treasury.

"S. P. CHASE, Secretary of the Treasury.

"A. SCHELL, Ex. Clerk, Collector's Office."

ACTIVITY IN OUR NAVY-YARD.

The greatest activity prevails at the Navy-yard and forts in the harbor of New York. Large numbers of heavy pieces of ordnance, and speedy preparations on board of vessels of war, were in progress. Every day's delay increases of importance is on foot. Whether it relates to our domestic affairs, or to the recent demonstrations on the part of Spain, is left to conjecture.

WHAT SECESSION HAS COST SOUTH CAROLINA.

A Message from Governor Pickens to the Convention of South Carolina contains many details respecting the military affairs of that State. He informs them that 600 men will be required to garrison Fort Sumter, to be enlisted for war, and that the expenditures of the State have been $500,317.

FUGITIVE SLAVE CASE AT CHICAGO.

A colored man named Harris, with his wife and two children, was arrested at Chicago on 2d, on a warrant issued by United States Commissioner Conson, and sent by special train to Springfield, to be examined. The man is claimed by Mr. Patterson, of St. Louis County, Missouri, and the warrant was issued on the affidavit of that gentleman, whose they escaped. As it was almost entirely unknown that slaves were held in Illinois, the circumstance is little difficulty; but after the affair became known the usual intense excitement was aroused, and large numbers gathered at the depôt at the time for regular morning train left, the crowd supposing the fugitives to be on board. One or two shots were fired at the train. Beyond this there was no disturbance.

A TERRIBLE OUTRAGE.

The Nashville Union of 26th March says: "We have the particulars of a most deplorable outrage committed by a negro man in Sumner County, and his summary execution by the citizens of the neighborhood. The facts, as we are informed, are as follows: Mr. W. C. Moore, who resides at Somerville, in Sumner County, on the Louisville and Nashville Railroad, had recently purchased a plantation in Alabama, and was preparing to remove to it. One of his negroes escaped one supposed entire willingness to go, and it became necessary to use force with that one. Mr. Moore was bulldozing him for the purpose of sending him off with the rest of the negroes. The boy, it appears, had prepared himself for a murderous assault upon his master, so he had a knife concealed in his right sleeve, and while the bandcuff was being fastened upon his left wrist, he struck at Mr. Moore's breast, inflicting a terrible but not fatal wound, which he followed up with another stroke, which was parried by Mr. Moore's left arm. By this time Mr. Saunders and the father of Mr. Moore came to the rescue, when the negro leaped into the former and commenced cutting him, and then upon the latter, cutting his throat from ear to ear, and then turned upon Mr. Moore, his body, and killing him instantly. The alarm having been given, Mr. Moore was soon surrounded by the bloody scene, and it was found necessary to shoot the negro before he could be secured. He died in a few hours. He was then taken and hung immediately. It is thought the wound of the negro will not prove fatal."

A SENSIBLE LETTER.

Hon. C. B. Sedgwick has written the appended reply to a letter of remonstrance from a Congress asking his influence to obtain a subordinate clerkship in the New York Custom-house for his son, a youth to be "put near enough to publish, and never knew of his being guilty of falsehood":

"Rev. Mr. P., My dear Sir: If the Spectator, March, 38, ... won't let me steal, don't, for God's sake, put him in the New York Custom-house. I have two sons. Both were quite like there, and got other habits not half so virtuous. If you are inclined to do anything for my son, instead of being careful and prayerful that it be removed from him. I will give him a letter, provided any friend of mine is appointed collector.

"Very truly your friend and the friend of your boy,

"C. B. SEDGWICK."

A DI VERNON IN WISCONSIN.

The Wisconsin State Journal, of the 30th ult., says: "About two o'clock this afternoon, as people along Kayand and Pinkney streets were startled by a horse, with a young lady on his back, coming down the street at the direction of the American House. She had evidently lost control of him, and was compelled to cast on her shoulders to the ground and seriously hurt, if not killed outright. Coming down Pinkney street, the horse passed by the crowd of wood wagons and other vehicles, and dashed furiously into the square in front of the new Academy. A great rush of people immediately filled the stable, fearful that the girl would be found in the wreck of some rents in her riding dress, she was unhurt. She had kept her wits about her, managed her steed and effected. All that troubled her, she declared, during the runaway was the discouragement of her party, who had agreed to try the horse again without delay. It proved to be a fast horse, owned by Mr. Bullard, and for one person to ride, he is so wild and unmanageable, but which the girl, Miss Ellen Dousman, of Fox Lake, had determined to ride at the State Fair. She was practicing for the occasion. Miss Ellen is a Governor Farwell's house, when she lost control of the bridle, and the horse took to his heels. He ran about a mile. The horse was very much excited, and when the young lady attempted to dismount her from mounting him again. She very coolly replied that she proposed to ride him to the fair on the morrow. Remaining the horse, she rode out in the street, when he left the fair ground. She got on him by the bits, and led him into the stable, where, after some stroking, there and she mounted him, and rode off very quietly, and Miss Dousman rode him away in triumph. Miss Dousman is a fine equestrienne and rides splendidly, with a keen black eye and cross cheeks, and what very pretty, besides being a fine Julia Cæsar."

PERSONAL.

Judge McLean, of the United States Supreme Court, died at Cincinnati on 4th, in the seventy-seventh year of his age. There are now two vacancies in the Supreme Court Bench, namely, that of Judge Daniel of Virginia, and McLean of Ohio. Judge McLean was born in 1785, at Cincinnati in 1815, was made Postmaster-General by President Monroe and was appointed in the office by J. Q. Adams, but displaced in 1829 by General Jackson, who made him Judge of the Supreme Court, which he has filled for more than thirty years.

Mr. Clay, in 1824, was defeated to sell at auction on the 40th of April, his stock and farm and household appointments, preparatory to the great act of leaving for the Court of St. Petersburg. Mr. Clay has long been a distinguished breeder and raiser of stock.

Governor Houston has sent a message to the Legislature recommending the calling together of a State Convention to sustain him, and claiming still to be Governor. The Legislature has not yet taken action on it.

A Washington correspondent says that G. W. Lane, recently confirmed as Postmaster, has strong claims to the office of Lieutenant-Governor, and declared that it only opened Court at Austin, in the Union dress of that State.

Captain Berrymon, Commander of the United States sloop Plymouth, died at Kenosha, on Tuesday, of brain fever.

The three Confederate States envoys to the European courts are now en route. Mr. Dudley Mann sailed from this port on Saturday, on board the Canada, while Messrs. Rost and Mann Page sailed from Quebec yesterday for Havana, where they will embark on board the British steamer for Southampton. Mr. Rost and the Confederate Ambassadors will be dispatched abroad with as little delay as possible.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

DEATH OF THE QUEEN'S MOTHER.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent died at Sunday morning, March 16, at 9½ o'clock, at Frogmore, in the presence of Mr. Birch, Sir James Clark and Her Royal Highness the Prince Consort, and some of the other members of the Royal family. The following announcement was communicated to the Lord Mayor in an official letter from Mr. C. C. Lewis, the secretary of State, also requesting his lordship to direct the great bell at the Royal Exchange to be tolled, as is customary on the death of members of the Royal family:

THE "GREAT EASTERN" COMING HERE AGAIN.

A letter from England to the Herald says: "The Great Eastern is by her fully ready to sail to New York on the 1st of May. The decision, I learn from a private source, has been taken, and the order will be communicated on Monday. Various other ports, all the way from Scarborough to Portsmouth, have been mentioned as those at which new loaded toward their egg-shell harbors. There is but one Great Eastern and one Brunel to build her, and the two are made for each other. I trust the little ebony steamer that built her last year in the exercise down your coast will be stood for by our good management and good fortune."

FRANCE.

THE DEBATE ON THE ADDRESS.

In the Corps Legislatif M. Jules Favre had moved his amendment to the address, declaring that the intervention of the French troops from Rome. He strongly urged the necessity for such withdrawal, and declared that the maintenance of the States would be impossible. M. Rouher said that the French Government would neither sacrifice the Pope to the unity of Italy, nor the unity of Italy to the Pope. The aim of France was to reconcile the two interests. The combination proposed at Villa France was the true solution, and it should be accepted as such. He alluded at length to the difficulties attending the question. The amendment was then rejected by 240 to 6. An amendment in favor of the temporal power of the Pope was offered, but subsequently withdrawn. Count de Morny urging the Legislature to leave the solution of the question to the Emperor. The entire address was finally agreed to by a vote of 213 against 15.

THE ITALIAN QUESTION.

At latest dates it was currently reported in Paris that the Emperor of Austria had sent an autograph letter to the Emperor of the French, stating both that his position in Italy is untenable, owing to the constant encroachments of Piedmont. His Majesty likewise expresses himself unable to understand the policy of France with regard to Italy, and especially adverts to the speeches of Prince Napoleon in the Senate and M. Billault in the Corps Legislatif, and requires a distinct answer to this question: Does the Emperor of the French mean to support Piedmont in its aggressions against Rome? The presence of the Piedmontese in the Papal capital calls Austria into Majesty as not look upon as a preliminary to an attack upon Venice—the argument that would justify the Victor Emanuel in taking possession of Rome would equally bear him out in attacking Venetia. Consequently, Austria requires an explicit answer as to what course the French Emperor means to pursue. It has been even hinted that a temporary occupation of Rome, the treaties of Zurich and Villafranca must be considered as annulled, and Austria contingent consider herself bound by a compact so glaringly violated, and would consider herself free to act. Austria's policy was entirely free to act in the manner best calculated to protect her openly threatened interests in the Peninsula.

THE BONAPARTE-PATTERSON CASE.

The Herald correspondent writes: "The Bonaparte-Patterson case is, it is said, to be brought on on appeal. Madame Patterson alleges that she left in Baltimore her marriage papers, which she feared to bring to France, thinking that they might be taken from her by the police, which would fully establish her fact that her marriage was contracted in good faith on her part. The law has been on this side and no one has ever desired to prove. As to winning the suit, they never had the least fear. It was simply wished to see upon the record of the judicial tribunals evidence which would establish that Napoleon Bonaparte, who is an officer in the French army, and whose future lot is cast in France, the stain of illegitimacy will be for ever against him, and since the commencement of these proceedings has been made clear and legal in France and in Paris. In addition to his pay, Captain Bonaparte has an income allowed him by his grandmother of 100,000 francs, besides which, and during on these fine, sunny spring afternoons, may be seen driving in the Champs Elysées and Bois de Boulogne.

TRADE IN FRANCE.

The Paris correspondent of the London Times says: "Commercial operations are still dull. Uneasiness, created by political events, has not subsided on the American, Europe and Americas, the ill-founded apprehension entertained by many that the manufactures on the part of approaches for carrying into full effect the commercial treaty with England, and the immense amount of money, impede the revival of trade. The Paris wheat and flour market was firm."

ITALY.

RESIGNATION OF THE MINISTRY.

A dispatch dated Turin, Wednesday, March 20, says: All the Ministers have tendered their resignations, which have been accepted by the King. Count Cavour, it is believed, will be charged with the formation of a new Ministry, in which all the different divisions of Italy will be represented.

In to-day's sitting of the Chamber of Deputies, Count Cavour announced that the whole Ministry had resolved on its resignation, and stated that he had advised the King to form a Ministry composed of the representatives of the kingdom. It was he said, the intention of the Government to place the Capital at the centre of gravity of the new political Government, which would be transferred to Florence. The Chamber of Deputies then adjourned until a new Ministry has been formed.

A dispatch dated Turin, the new Ministry is not yet announced. Rumor gives the following combination: Cavour, President of the Council and Minister of Foreign Affairs and Marine; Farini, Chancellor of State; Peruzzi, Minister of Justice; Minghetti, of Interior; Desanctis, of Instruction; Petri, of Finance; Fanti, of War; Jacini, of Finance; Pepoli, of Commerce; Poerio, Minister without portfolio.

WHAT ITALY WANTS.

The Italian Parliament, in addition to the speech of Victor Emanuel, tells him that it trusts in him as an Italian King, that Italian unity, significantly adding that its thoughts are sorrowfully turned toward absent Rome, and that it expressly aspires to the possession of her city of Rome, and that every other question of the Italian peninsula will be settled with satisfaction by the Italian people.

THE POPE DEFENDS HIMSELF.

At Rome, on the 18th ult., a consistory was held, at which the Pope held an address in defense of the assailing himself upon the present position of Italy and the Papacy. He declared confidently that the present storm of Italy was being opposed to civilization, and declared that it only opposed Church and trampled justice under foot. He stated that he would defend the spiritual sentences of the Church against able concessions, and would have gladly abided by the decision of a Congress of sovereigns, but that he would preserve the advice or submit to the unjust demands of a usurping power.

WILL HE GO TO VERCE?

The Perseverance of Milan asserts that the priests were exceedingly discontented at the Pope, who is about to be during him to proceed to Venice. Bellegrade was in Venice, Gregory replied that he was afraid that it would appear, however, that Austria bears the responsibility which rests in the hands of Providence. Upon this information is regarded as precluding all hope of a compromise between the Holy See and the new kingdom of Italy.

RUSSIA.

THE EMPEROR'S REPLY TO THE POLES.

The substance of the Emperor's reply to the address of the Polish subjects is published. The Emperor says that he will maintain the Polish nationality in all its rights, but, nevertheless, he graciously consents to regard it only as a matter of administration. He declares that abstraction to the reforms which are necessary throughout the Empire, and which he will not allow to be made the subject of his solicitude as are the Russians. But he has a right to expect that the moderate and loyal portion of Poland will be "misunderstood or paralyzed by importune or immoderate demands, which are only connected with the welfare of his subjects." He will not tolerate any serious disturbance of public order, and will not allow the foundation "for aspirations which should there seek for support." The Emperor concludes by saying that the deputies from Warsaw may put the Polish deputation was "authorized to make known to the Emperor the Sovereign's reply which has not abated the prevailing excitement. Prince Gortschakoff declared that the Emperor would grant no imperial mandate would speedily great reforms, and received the address in silence: "We accept; but we are far from being satisfied."

TURKEY.

COTTON CULTIVATION IN ASIA MINOR.

A company has been proposed at Constantinople under the name of the Ottoman Bank of Asia Minor, for promoting the cotton cultivation in Asia Minor. It is said to be supported by the Government, and the ultimate object of the proposal is the payment of the British Ambassador, Sir H. L. Bulwer, and the suppression of the Grand Vizier.

ST. DOMINGO.

RUMORED MOVEMENT OF THE SPANIARDS.

By an arrival at Key West on the 26th ult. it was reported that the Spanish flag had been hoisted at St. Domingo by the Spanish and French. The Spanish President had previously written to Havana, stating that if Spanish forces were not sent thither immediately the Spaniards would hoist the Spanish flag, whereupon five Spanish war vessels and 1000 men sailed from Havana and took formal possession of San Domingo, aided by a French corvette.

AMERICAN

ME SCENES.

PAUL LEE'S WIFE.

"WHO ever has been, and gone, and done this?" said Purvis Lee as he opened the door of Dr. Lee's office from the inside, early in the morning, and found hanging on the door-knob a basket with something in it.

"Baskets were made to put something in, and this has something in it, and no mistake, and I would like to know who has been and hung this basket on Dr. Lee's door. It is not her—no, that is fixed and certain. She could not, for it is not a day old. And it is not him—that's just as fixed and certain, for he's run away long ago, with no manner of doubt. So you see, Purvis, that's me, 'as settled that it was not the mother of it nor the father of it that brought it here' and hung it on this door-knob. You see, Purvis, that's me, we are taking circumstantial evidence this morning, and if we can't find out who did bring it here, we can find out who did not. It was not Paul, that's the doctor, for he staid with old Mrs. Boyd and her asthma till four o'clock, and I let him in here at this door, and there was nothing here then. And it was not Purvis, that's me, because—well—I know 'twas not. So it's settled that there are four persons in Bordenton who did not bring it here. But somebody it came, and here it is," and Purvis picked it very carefully, and it screamed very naturally.

"Take care, you chap, you'll raise the house, and Paul, that's the doctor, will scold Purvis, that's me, as if I was the fellow in the basket, that screamed on purpose to wake him after his night's watching. But no earthly can I divine this thing! Emily is not here, and if she was she would send it to the poor-house: and Aunt Hetty has her hands full, standing in every thing and the scolding inside, so that she could not look at it."

Purvis Lee was what is called the "black sheep" in his family. "I was something worse than the old screw loose," people said. He had sense enough to learn well at school; he had a better education than many who are successful in business and elegant in manners; but Purvis Lee had never been either. He was considered a sort of irresponsible being. He was kind-hearted, generous in a certain way as a dependent upon his brother, and it was a standing wonder how such an old, "half-baked" person could be brother to the popular and handsome Paul Lee, M.D. in Bordenton.

Purvis was in a difficulty this morning. I think such a very little will come in his way to be a comprehensive difficulty to any man unassisted by the other, if not better, half of humanity.

"Don't scream, you little beggar," said Purvis Lee, "and something may happen." Purvis was of the genius Micawber, and therefore he expected that something would "turn up." As if Providence ever answered reasonable expectations, just at that moment Phœbe Boyd appeared at the door of the office.

"Good morning, Miss Boyd," said the man with the baby, as he swung the basket to and fro to keep it still.

"How dost thou do, Purvis Lee?" said the young lady. Being a Quaker, or Friend, her faith forbade her to say good-morning; and she said Purvis Lee instead of Purvis, because Joseph John Gurney and other polite Friends thought it was more respectful and deferential to speak the whole name than the pet name alone, or as Friends say, the "first name." As they do not christen their children, they have no Christian names; and as they never say "Sir," they have no sir or surnames. I think they have made no inquiry to learn whether surname comes from an objection-able root, but as the wife takes the name with all other titles, or from sur, the French word for over and above.

"What, and thou there, Purvis Lee?" said Phœbe, longing to take the basket from his hands.

"It is only a baby that somebody hung on our office-door knob to-day. They must have been in a dreadful hurry, for it is not dressed, and I don't know what to do with it, any more than I would, know what to do with an elephant that had been hung on our door-knob."

"How I wish I could carry the dear little thing home!" said Phœbe, as she bent over the basket, looking just like a fairy, in a muslin dress the color of heliotrope blossoms, a little white silk shawl, and a cottage straw, with a dove-colored ribbon just resting the shade of her cheek. "But I came for mother's medicine, and I must return as soon as possible, for she had a very bad night. Here is the recipe."

"Well, you take the basket, and I will get you the remedy. Paul, that's Dr. Lee, don't like me to say anything over more. He says, 'Purvis' (that's me), 'these are remedies, not medicines.' But what am I to do with that in the basket?"

"When the mother rises her self she will show; and thou mayst mention to him that I feel a deep interest in the baby, and if my mother would consent; but—but—I would do any thing right for the privileges of loving and caring for this babe! Poor little outcast! But I must go. Thou wilt not forget, Purvis, to tell thy brother that I feel a deep interest in the babe."

I guess I shan't be likely to forget the only friend and acquaintance the little leaper has in Bordenton, always excepting Purvis Lee, that's me. I'll take it down stairs to Aunt Hetty. She won't like; she only scolds just what it was.

"Only a baby that somebody hung on our office-door, and I reckon it wants some breakfast. They eat when they are little and red like this, don't they?"

Aunt Hetty was sixty years old. She was neat and a scold; and Purvis Lee and most people who had to abide in her vicinity sometimes wished that she was good-natured and a slattern. But she had a weakness for babies. Poor Aunt Hetty had the ears of a baby, forty years ago, that won her whole heart and died; and her sister, who was its mother, never grieved as much for the translated little angel as did Aunt Hetty. In the bottom of her sea-chest covered trunk there is a red housewife with a soiled and bitten corner. Little Annie had played with it forty years ago. And there is a tiny green morocco shoe that has held its color surprisingly, seeing it is forty years old. Little Annie had worn this shoe one day—the day she was taken with "the three distemper," and Aunt Hetty kept the small memento while the other had preserved its fellow. The mother had gone to join her darling many years ago; but Aunt Hetty had lived to be a wonderful housekeeper, a desperate scold, and a great lover of babies, though few knew of the last-named gift.

"Put that basket down, you awkward thing! You will spill that baby on the floor, and knock the breath out of its poor little body. There, leave it, and carry up that water to the dining-room, and ring the bell for the doctor."

"Paul, that's the doctor, did not come home till four o'clock this morning; and Purvis, that's me, will not risk ringing the bell till he has slept his first nap out."

Aunt Hetty bade him take up the tray, and he obeyed; and then she rung the bell.

"He may get up and eat his breakfast, or he may sleep and let it alone. I am not any part. Now, you poor, dear little baby, I'll see to you."

When Purvis returned to the kitchen Aunt Hetty was busily engaged with a set of little garments that were in the basket lay on a chair by her side.

"The little beauty! The little darling! Its fingers are almost as long as mine, and its limbs are as perfect as a picture. Oh my! It's a baby that never belonged to common folks! and to think of its going to the poor-house!"

The tears dropped fast from Aunt Hetty's nose as she crooned in her labor of love. Purvis came up with a disposing air.

"Take yourself off, Purvis—you hain't no business here. Go up and see if Dr. Lee is at his breakfast. He will be down to the office when the table every morning at seven if the house was afire, and if he is there I want to know it."

Purvis regarded her for a moment. "Paul, that's Dr. Lee, is at his breakfast."

In due time Aunt Hetty ascended to the dining-room with the baby in her arms.

"Why, Aunt Hetty! Aunt Hetty! Who would have thought it of you? And then to come in open daylight! Why, Aunt Hetty! Oh, Aunt Hetty! think of it! To disgrace your young years and my old age!"

"You always talking nonsense, Dr. Lee; but somebody has to talk sense now."

Purvis was standing behind Aunt Hetty.

"It is not Aunt Hetty, Paul, but I found it on our door-step; no, hanging to our door-knob; they are always on the door-step in stories."

"So you have decided you be still a story, poor Purvis," said the doctor, overbrimming with fun, though he had watched and worked nearly all night to keep the breath in widow Boyd.

"Well, that is all I get, a nurse, or a housekeeper? I suppose I must keep you, for else else would have any thing to do with you? What am I to do? I can't keep it, I suppose; so long that I could not get on at all without your tyranny; so just tell me what, and I'll attend to it."

"I think," said the doctor, half pretending to the subject-matter before them, "that you had better get a nurse. This baby warn't made for the poor-house."

"Then it warn't made for our house," said the doctor.

"You ought by good rights to have a wife; but as you hain't got none, we must do the next best way. If we had a little girl, I think I could manage with the baby and the baby."

"Tis hard to part you, Aunt Hetty, and at your time of life, too; but you must take your punishment, and find a nurse for it."

"To the poor-house!" screamed Aunt Hetty. "I'll spend all my savings first. I'll bire a room!"

"Oh, and Aunt Hetty!" said the doctor "that will be punishing me a little too severely. Suppose I take the thing down to Phœbe Boyd. The old lady owes me for having saved her life. She is pretty safe from another attack for the next three months, and Phœbe is all right always."

"I'll be satisfied with that," said Aunt Hetty; "but there will be a dreadful deal of talk if Phœbe takes it. It ought to be some married woman."

"Why, you are a married woman, Aunt Hetty, and yon proposed to take it."

"It ought to be a married woman, or an old maid like me, by rights."

"Now I have finished my breakfast, let me look. Purvis, harness my horse and buggy. Come, Aunt Hetty, you are a married woman, I think you yet. Whence came I? who am I?' will be questions for after-years. For the present, you will eat and sleep and squall down your punishments doings. A fine child! Aunt Hetty, I really don't know whether to praise you or blame you. I believe, on the whole, I'll praise. Run the State some service. Fold it up in a blanket, and put on your bonnet, and we will go down to the widow Boyd's."

"And the dinner?" said Aunt Hetty.

"I can't carry the baby. That is women's work. The dishes must wait ones in a lifetime. Come! hurry up! I'll send me, doctor. The attack is clean gone. Thee is worth thy weight in gold. The pressure on my chest is all gone."

"I'll it comes again," said the doctor. "Now you must bathe, and rub your chest with the flesh-brush daily, and eat half or a third as much as you want, and that plain bread and meat, or toast and milk, none of your made-up dishes, and then I can promise you that you won't be smothered this week."

"Oh, if I could ever pay thee!"

"I have brought my pay along," said the doctor. "It is out in the other room with your Phœbe, and my Aunt Hetty."

"Thee don't say that Aunt Hetty is here. Thee is making sport, doctor. The always is, for that matter. Hetty Marshall would not be away from home before the work was done up."

"I'll tell you, Mrs. Boyd. Somebody left a new-born babe at my door this morning. Hetty loves babies, and she could not bear that this should be sent to the poor-house, and she is out in search of somebody who will take the little creature and nurse it by hand for a while."

"Thee don't say so! What a dreadful world we live in! Has thee any notion who the baby belongs to?"

"Well, I think it belongs to Providence and me. At any rate, I shall take that view of it for the present. If my sister Emily were with me now, and would consent to adopt it, I'd take in the house, I should keep it at home. As it is, I want you to take it for a month."

"Thee don't say so! Why, doctor, people would talk."

"I never knew them to do any thing else," said the doctor.

"What would they say, doctor?"

"I don't care what others would say. I want to know what you say. Will you take the baby for two weeks—a week—till I can look about me?"

"Why thee has been so good to me that we must take it. Its mother is dead, and I will speak to Phœbe. We can't do too much for thee, doctor, after all thee has done for me."

"Pile on the gratitude, Mrs. Boyd; it is convenient, now I want you to serve me."

"Thee's such a strange man!" said the widow. The baby is a blessing to Phœbe Boyd, and a great joy it was to her; but it was a thorn in the side of the Quaker mother.

"I don't like Dr. Lee to be looking at thee as he does, Phœbe. All the world would not tempt me to have thee marry out of meetin'. Thee has done enough to trouble me with thy ways of speakin' and dressin'. That straw-bonnet of thine is not Friendly."

"What could be plainer, mother, than my strawbonnet? A drab silk, a muslin gown over the top, and tying under my chin. The rain does not spoil it, and if it gets soiled I can wash it. Now a Quaker silk bonnet, made of the rain sprinkles it, and one fly could spoil twenty dollars' worth of drab or white silk Quaker bonnets in a night. They frown and look sorrowful over their cold pasteboard sides; and they are like putting one's head in a tin pail in summer—hot when we want them cold, cold when we want them warm; liable to be spoiled every day they are worn, and every night when they are not worn; they are ugly and inconvenient, besides being very disagreeable to wear."

"Thee is not Friendly," said the mother, with a sigh.

"Mother, thou knowest I prize our Testimonies above price," said Phœbe. "Thou knowest that I do not like extravagance in dress, and that I do love plainness and simplicity. I would obey the light within. I would be a plain Friend."

"Then why does thee set thyself up above the best Friends that ever lived with thy thee, Phœbe? Why can't thee say thee, as others do?"

"I do not wish to speak ungrammatically because I am a Friend, but my principal reason for one of our greatest singularities in language is that it is grammatical."

"I don't know what grammar-buck," said Mrs. Boyd, or Ruth Boyd, as she was known among Friends; "but I know that no good comes of being proud, and so I say to you, when thee answers for every body in the meetin' but one or two public Friends."

"Thou sayest, mother, that I am proud because I use language a little more correct than others. Why dost not thou call Alice Osborne and Moses Chase proud? They are ministers, to be sure, but have they therefore an exclusive right to speak correctly?"

"We expect public Friends to say thou," said her mother. "They are ministers, and Friends expect it of them, but thee is not likely to be a minister, and must not set thyself above others."

"I have no such intention, mother."

"I must tell thee, Phœbe, that this baby must go. I can't have the way it is leading thee out of plain ways. When thee thinks Doctor Lee is going to call, thee combs thy hair low on thy temples, and thee puts on a collar with an edge, such as no plain Friend ever wore yet."

"Mother, I am young," said Phœbe, very greatly distressed.

The colloquy was cut short by the entrance of Dr. Lee.

"I am troubled about this baby," said Ruth Boyd. "I don't like to be over every thing."

"Well, my sister has come, and she says I must take the baby home, and hire or take a small girl," said Dr. Lee.

"And will thy sister Emily take care of the dear little fellow?" said Phœbe, the tears gushing from her eyes.

"She says so. Are you tired of him? Do you know I have brought a present for the little one this morning? I am going to have him named."

Dr. Lee did not say christened, because he knew too well the strength of Quaker prejudices.

"What will he call him?" said Ruth.

"Paul Lee," said the doctor.

"Thou art a brave man, and I thank thee," said Phœbe.

"Will you do up little Paul in his best bib, Phœbe, and let me drive you over to my house, that Emily may decide whether she will like to take such a lump of trouble? How he has grown in ten weeks!"

Phœbe looked at her mother for leave to go with the doctor. Ruth Boyd trusted Dr. Lee very much. She wanted to get rid of the cause, or excuse rather, for his frequent visits. She had seen the tell-tale blood fly into Phœbe's face, when he had driven up to the door. She knew that she was exposing her daughter to the fascinations of a fine man of forty, who seemed not a day over thirty. She dreaded that a child of hers should marry out of meeting. Phœbe already had a mind of her own about several things. The end of all her reflections was always the same. The baby must go away.

"Put on thy bonnet, Phœbe, and take the baby over; thee will have to give it up, then is not strong enough to be up nights, the way thee is."

Phœbe did as she was bid, and she was soon seated by the doctor in his buggy. He peeped under the cottage straw-bonnet, and saw the tears dropping fast on the wee face in her lap. He turned off on the Grove Road without her noticing the fact, and drove under the shadow of the rich old woods, which was very grateful, as it was the middle of July.

"Phœbe," said the doctor, in a low and very tender voice.

She looked up and was startled when she saw herself in the shadow of the beautiful woods called "The Grove."

"Phœbe, dear, said the doctor, Providence has given to us an outcast babe. I believe little Paul will come to be a good man if we do our duty by him, and I think we shall, for we both love him as our own."

"I hope we shall," said Phœbe, her tears falling fast.

"I am a great coward," said the doctor. "I want to tell you, Phœbe, that I love you dearly, deeply. It seems to me that men never know woman as I love you, and yet I begin by talking about our love for the baby. Phœbe, I want you to be my wife, and take care of Paul Lee as a man; but I don't want you to be mine because you love the babe, whose parents have forsaken it—I want you to love me, Phœbe. Do you think you can ever come to love me well enough to be my wife?"

Ever come to love him? What a question, when he had been the object of her almost idolatrous love ever since she knew him well, which had been from all his tender kindness to her mother. Phœbe had looked up to the doctor as we do to superior beings, with a reverent love, like that of the Catholic for the saint. "A child, few objects of interest. "The meeting" was small and dull. There was not a man in it who could by any possibility prove to be a gentleman. "Ever come to love Dr. Lee?" Her misery had been that she could not come to love, or even tolerate, any one else. Poor Phœbe had all her tender kindness for

"If copper were silver or silver were gold, it would be all very well for our pockets, but metals are not transmutable. Neither am I; but Leave you, Phœbe, and will never interfere with your religious liberty."

"I believe thee," said Phœbe.

The doctor reverently kissed her ungloved hand, and they drove up to Ruth Boyd's door.

"What time to-morrow?" said he.

"Three in the afternoon, if it is convenient to thee."

"Why did not thee leave the child?" said Ruth, sharply.

"Neither the doctor nor I thought it best." No more was said then.

Doctor Lee went home. His sister was a very vinegary old maid, who respected the Proprieties, and honored "they say" more than the whole moral law.

"Where is that baby?" said she.

"Where it was yesterday and day before," said the doctor. "I forgot that the baby belongs to Aunt Hetty, and I only tell you in confidence; but she placed it with Miss Boyd, and I can't take it away without her leave."

"I wish you would not talk nonsense to me, Paul," said the lady.

"Perhaps I had better not," said the doctor.

"Well, Emily, I will talk sense. You know you always said you would never stay a day in my house if I was married."

"To be sure I did! What business would I have here? I have trouble enough with Hetty."

"I am afraid I shall want to get married, and if you got fond of the babe it might make trouble, as I am fond of him, and have given him my name. I mean, in the event of my marriage you might find yourself awkwardly placed."

"I have kept house for you in Bordeston ten years last New Year's, and I have put up with you and Purvis"—

"That's me," broke in that worthy.

"—and Hetty; and now you are talking nonsense about being married, after picking up somebody's brat, that I consented to take care of rather than leave you out what you have been paying to those Quakers, who are stingy as—"

"You are, maybe," said Purvis.

"I know I am all nonsense—Purvis go to your work in the garden. And now, Paul Lee, I shall take house that child to-morrow. Hetty says you pay three dollars a week for taking care of it."

"Five," said the Doctor.

"To-morrow afternoon I'll go for it."

"Wait a little, and I'll bring it home," said the doctor.

"You will see whether I shall wait."

"There are a good many things in my dish," said the doctor to himself, "and half a dozen patients to see to-night."

"Shall I put out the horse?" said Purvis.

"Not at," said the doctor, quite miserable, for an accepted lover; and he went out and took his seat in his buggy.

"I can think here," said he to himself. "Emily must go away. She has been an old house on my head these ten years. She will torment Phœbe into her grave in a month. I won't try to piece impossibilities together; Hetty likes my little Quaker girl, and she loves babies better than my thing. I must decide."

Phœbe was at home thinking also. She had an aunt who needed a home, and her mother and brother could live very happily with her. There was only the misery of having a daughter marry out of the meeting for Ruth Boyd to bear. That evening, when Joshua came in from work, Phœbe thought she would speak. She trembled a good deal; but she strengthened herself by looking at little Paul.

"My darling outcast," said she to herself, and then she said, "Mother I must try three terribly tough, but I have made up my mind, and I tell thee and Joshua because you ought to know. I am going to be married to Dr. Lee, and take care of little Paul always. Aunt Rhoda will be glad to live with thee and Joshua, mother."

Joshua had sense enough to be angry with his sister for coming out of meeting, the mother had goodness enough to grieve. Both remonstrated; but Phœbe made no replies. She took the baby and retired to her own room early.

The next morning a sad group met at the breakfast-table. The widow had slept very little, and her eyes looked heavy and tearful. Phœbe was sad though determined, and Joshua was vulgarly angry.

This must end at once, thought Phœbe. At two P. M. the doctor called. Phœbe was dressed in a drab-colored barege, with a white crape handkerchief, surmounted by a white silk handkerchief. The baby was in parest white, and looked most lovely.

She tied on her little straw-bonnet, and took the baby in her arms, and said to the doctor, "I am ready." "To go to a Justice?" said he, in a low voice.

"I am ready to go to a Justice," said Phœbe, aloud.

"Phœbe," said Mrs. Boyd, "give me the baby. I will take care of him till thee comes back. I can't, as a Friend, consent to thy marriage, though Dr. Lee has been very good to me. But I can't see thee or to be married with a child in thy arms —it would be dreadful. What would Friends say?"

"I thank thee, mother," said Phœbe, putting Paul in her lap.

"And I thank you too," said Dr. Lee. "I hope to make a good husband and a good son, though you've me no consent to wed your daughter, Mrs. Boyd."

In an hour Dr. Lee and his bride returned to claim their baby; as much their own as if strangers had not cast it upon their charitable care.

"One more trial, darling," said Dr. Lee. "My sister is harder than your mother, for she won't hold the baby. See if she does!"

Miss Emily Lee was generally in every room of the house some dozens of times in a day. The doctor took Phœbe and the baby into the parlor. Miss Emily came in and opened the windows as evening was coming. She opened them spitefully, as if they were to blame for somebody being present who was not a welcome visitor to her.

"You need not flat and slam so," said Purvis Lee, who had the same trick of being inopportunely present that his sister had.

"This is my wife, Sister Emily," said the doctor. "Purvis"—("That's me," said his brother) —"this is Mrs. Lee, your sister-in-law, and I hope you will always treat her as a gentleman ought to do."

"Hurrah!" cried Purvis, dashing his hat on the floor, which he had previously ball under his arm. "I am glad you have been, and gone, and done it."

Miss Emily went out of the parlor as spitefully as she had opened the windows, and when the doctor took Phœbe up stairs to her room, the spare room of the house, and which joined his own, they found her there making many demonstrations in various directions, and of various kinds. Then they went down stairs. She was there also, but after overseeing herself in a glass, she said to Purvis, loud enough for all to hear,

"You will book my name for the Taunton stage, that goes at 4 o'clock in the morning, and tell them to call here first."

"With pleasure," said Purvis, making a face behind her back. Phœbe turned again and saw the motion being made, and I believe she took a lock of her brother's hair, in a great hurry, and I also think she did not feel it for a long while.

"That's me," said the black sheep.

The next day Phœbe, and a new baby, and little Paul took up their abode as friendship. They began it in good earnest and good faith. Phœbe helped Hetty about her housework, and Hetty helped Phœbe in the care of the children, and became a happy family, for Aunt Hetty left off scolding when she had a baby to love.

Mrs. Phœbe Lee was much used to the meeting that she was sorry she married her husband; neither did she say, as many did, on a bit of paper which was sent to every one, "I am sorry that I have transgressed the order established by Friends in my marriage, and I hope Friends will pass it by." No. She was a good Christian woman, and a loving wife, and mother to the outcast babe, as to her own; but the peculiarities of Friends gradually disappeared from her language and manners, and now there is only a pure modesty in her dress to distinguish her from others.

Dr. Lee is one of the happiest of men, for, besides having the dearest little wife in the world, he is not invaded by his sister, he is not scolded by Aunt Hetty, and Purvis is less a black sheep than formerly.

Ruth Boyd loves her daughter and her daughter's husband, though they have left the meeting, and Joshua is not so angry as he intended to be. He likes to have a good doctor in the family, for it saves money, and Friends are very remarkable for minding the main chance.

CANNIBALISM IN GALICIA.

THE inhabitants of Austrian Galicia are quiet, inoffensive people, and the worst of them are the Jews, who number a twelfth of the population, are the most intelligent, energetic, and certainly the most money-owning individuals in the province, though the Poles proper, or Masurs, are not devoid of natural parts.

Perhaps a remarkable a phenomenon as any other in that kingdom—for kingdom of Waldimir it was—is the enormous numerical preponderance of the nobility over the untitled. In Lemberg the proportions stood thus: 32,190 nobles to 2076 tradesmen.

The average of execution for crime is nine a year, out of a population of four and a half millions—by no means a high figure, considering the peremptory way in which justice is dealt out in that province. Yet, in the most quiet and well-disposed neighborhoods, occasionally the most startling crimes are committed, and murder is the least expected, and sometimes perpetrated by the very person who is least suspected.

Just twelve years have happened in the circle of Tornow, in Western Galicia—the province is divided into nine circles—a circumstance which will probably furnish the grandames with a story for their firesides, during these bitter Galician winters, for many a year.

In the circle of Tornow, in the lordship of Poremost, is a little hamlet called Polomyja, consisting of eight hovels and a Jewish tavern. The inhabitants are mostly wood-cutters, hewing down the firs of the dense forests of their village in the vast wold, and conveying them to the nearest water, down which they are floated to the Vistula. Each tenant pays no rent for his cottage, but is glad of it, but is bound to work a fixed number of days for his landlord: a practice universal in Galicia, and often productive of much discontent and injustice, as the proprietor exacts labor from his tenant on those days when the harvest has to be got in, or the land is in best condition for tilling, and just when the peasant would gladly be engaged upon his own small plot. Money is scarce in the province, and this is accordingly the only way in which the landlord can be sure of his dues.

Most of the villagers of Polomyja are miserably poor; but by cultivating a little vegetable, and keeping a few fowls or a pig, they scrape together sufficient to sustain life. During the summer the men collect resin from the pines, from each of which, once in twelve years, they strip a slip of bark, leaving the resin to exude and trickle into a small earthen-ware jar at its roots; and during the winter, as already stated, they fell the trees and roll them down to the river.

Polomyja is not a cheerful spot—nested among dense masses of pine, which shed a gloom over the little hamlet; yet, on a fine day, it is pleasant enough for the old women to sit at their cottage doors, scenting that matchless pine fragrance, sweeter than the balm of the Spice Islands, for there is nothing cloying in that exquisite and exhilarating odor—listening to the harp-like thrill of the breeze in the stiff gray tree-tops, and knitting quietly at long stockings, while their little grandchildren romp in the heather and tufted fern.

Toward evening, too, there is something indescribably beautiful in the fir-wood. The sun dives among the trees, and paints their boles with patches of luminous saffron, or falling over a level clearing, glorifies it with its orange dye, so visibly contrasting with the blue-purple shadow on the western rim of unreclaimed forest, deep and luscious as the bloom on a plum. The birds than are hastening to their nests, a gerfalcon, high overhead, is kindled with sunlight; capering and gamboling among the branches, the merry squirrel skips home for the night.

The sun goes down, but the sky is still shining with twilight. The wild-cat begins to hiss and squall in the forest, the heron to flap hastily by, the stork on the top of the tavern chimney to poise itself on one leg for sleep. Now then! an owl begins to wake up. Hark! the wood-cutters are coming home with a song.

Such is Polomyja in summer-time, and much resembling it are the hamlets scattered about the forest, at intervals of a few miles; in each, the public house is the most commodious and best built edifice, the church, whenever there is one, not remarkable for any thing but its bulbous steeple.

You would hardly believe that amidst all this poverty a beggar could be picked up any substance, and yet, a few years ago, Sunday after Sunday, there was a home-boarded venerable man at the church-door, asking alms.

Poor people are proverbially compassionate and liberal, so that the old man generally got a few pepers, and often enough a crust of brown bread to come into her cottage, and let him have some food.

Occasionly Swiatek—that was the beggar's name, were it worth mentioning—shall puchlace ornaments and beads; generally, however, only appealing to charity.

One Sunday, after church, a Mazur and his wife invited the old man into their hut and gave him a crust of pie and some meat. There were several children about the floor, and of nine or ten, attracted the old man's attention by her artless tricks.

Swiatek felt in his pocket and produced a ring, inclosing a piece of colored glass set over foil. This he presented to the child, who ran off delighted to show her acquisition to the neighbors.

"Is that little maid your daughter?" asked the beggar.

"No," answered the housewife, "she is an orphan; there was a widow in this place who died, leaving the child, and I have taken charge of her; one mouth more or not matter much, and the good God will bless us."

"Ay, ay! to be sure He will; the orphans and fatherless are under His own peculiar care."

"She's a good little thing, and gives no trouble," observed the woman. "You go back to Polomyja to-night, I reckon?"

"I do not," exclaimed Swiatek, as the little girl ran up to him. "You like the ring, is it not beautiful? I found it under a big fir to the left of the church-door, about two dozens there. You must turn round three times, bow to the moon, and say 'Zalee!' then look among the tree-roots till you find a ring."

"Come along!" screemed the child to its comrades; "we will go and look for rings."

"You are not such nonsense," said Swiatek.

The children scampered off into the wood.

"I have done one good thing for you," laughed the beggar, "the only one you, for a time, of the noise of those children."

"I am glad of a little quiet now and then," said the woman; "the children will not let the baby sleep at times with their clatter. Are you going?"

"Yes; I must reach Polomyja to-night. I am old and very feeble, and poor"—he began to fall into his customary whine—"very poor, but I thank and pray to God for you."

Swiatek left the cottage.

That little orphan was never seen again.

The Austrian Government has, of late years, been vigorously repressing brigandism among the lower orders, and establishing schools throughout the province.

The children were returning from class one day, and were scattered among the trees, some pursuing a field-mouse, others collecting juniper-berries, and some sauntering with their hands in their pockets, whistling.

"Where's Peter?" asked one little boy of another who was beside him. "We three go home the same way, and he is not together."

"Peter!" shouted the lad.

"Here I am!" was the answer from among the trees; "I'll be with you directly."

"Oh, I see him!" said the elder boy. "There is some one talking to him."

"Where?"

"Yonder, among the pines. Ah! they have gone further into the shadow, and I can not see them any more. I wonder who was with him; a man, I think."

The boys waited till they were tired, and then they sauntered on toward the wood to thank Peter for having kept them waiting. But Peter was never seen again.

Some time after this a servant-girl belonging to a small store kept by a Russian, disappeared from a village five miles from Polomyja. She had been with a young man, a soldier, on a long-deferred visit to her parents, but lying apart from the cluster of hovels, and surrounded by tree.

The day closed in, and her master w return anxiously, but as several hours elapsed out any sign of her, he—assisted by the—went in search of her.

A slight powdering of snow covered the and her footsteps could be traced at intervals she had diverged from the beaten track.

part of the road where the trees were thickest there were marks of two pair of feet leaving the path; but owing to the density of the forest at that spot and to the slightness of the fall of snow, which did not reach the soil, where shaded by the pines, the footprints were immediately lost. By the following morning a heavy fall had obliterated any further traces which daylight might have disclosed.

The servant-girl also was never seen again.

During the winter of 1849 the wolves were supposed to have been particularly ravenous, as they alone did people account for the mysterious disappearances of children.

A little boy had been sent to a fountain to fetch water; the pitcher was found standing by the well, but the boy had vanished. The villagers turned out, and those wolves which could be found were dispatched.

We have already introduced our readers to Polomyja, although the occurrences above related did not take place among those eight hovels, but in neighboring villages. The reason for our having given a more detailed account of this cluster of houses—such cabins they were—will now become apparent.

In May, 1849, the innkeeper of Polomyja missed a couple of ducks, and his suspicion fell upon the beggar who lived there, and whom he held in no esteem, as he himself was a hard-working, industrious man, while Swiatek was intimidated himself, his wife, and children by mendicity, although possessed of sufficient arable land to yield an excellent crop of maize, and produce vegetables, if tilled with ordinary care.

As the publican approached the cottage a fragrant whiff of roast goose met his nostrils.

"I'll catch the fellow in the act!" said the innkeeper to himself, stealing up to the door, and taking good care that he should be observed.

As he threw open the door he saw the mendicant hurriedly shuffle something under his feet, and conceal it under his long clothes. The publican was on him in an instant, had him by the throat, charged him with theft, and dragged him from his seat. Under one of his sickening former limbs beneath the pauper's clothes rolled forth the head of a girl about the age of fourteen or fifteen years, carefully separated from the trunk.

In a short while the neighbors came up. The venerable Swiatek was locked up, along with his wife, his daughter—a girl of sixteen—and a son, aged five.

The hut was thoroughly examined, and the mutilated remains of the poor girl discovered. In a vat were found the legs and thighs, partly fresh, partly stewed or roasted. In a chest were the heart, liver, and entrails, all prepared and cleaned, as nearly as though done by a skilful butcher; and, finally, under the oven was a bowl full of fresh blood. On his way to the magistrate of the district the wretched man, being himself repeatedly on the ground, struggled with his guards, and endeavored to suffocate himself by gulping down clods of earth and stones, but was prevented by his conductors.

When taken before the Protokoll at Dalkow, he stated that he had already killed and—assisted by his family—eaten six persons. His children, however, asserted most positively that the number was much greater than he had confessed, and their testimony is borne out by the fact, that the remains of fourteen different cups and suits of clothes, male as well as female, were found in his house.

The origin of this horrible and depraved taste was as follows, according to Swiatek's own confession:

In 1846, three years previous, a Jewish tavern in the neighborhood had been burned down, and the host had himself perished in the flames. Swiatek, while examining the ruins, had found the half-roasted corpse of the publican among the charred rafters of the house. At that time the old man was craving with hunger, having been destitute of food for some time. The scent and the sight of the roasted flesh inspired him with an uncontrollable desire to taste of it. He tore off a portion of the carcass and satiated his hunger upon it, and at the same time he conceived such a liking for it that he could feel no rest till he had tasted again. His second victim was the orphan above alluded to; since then—that is, during the period of no less than three years—he had frequently satisfied in the same manner, and had actually grown sleek and fat upon his frightful meals.

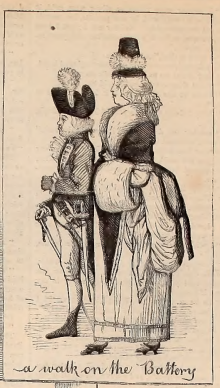
The excitement roused by the discovery of these atrocities was intense; several poor mothers, who had bewailed the loss of their little ones, felt their wounds reopened agonizingly. Popular indignation rose to the highest pitch; there was some fear lest the criminal should be torn in pieces himself by the enraged people, as soon as he was brought to trial; but he saved the necessity of precautions being taken to insure his safety, for, on the first night of his confinement, he hanged himself from the bars of his prison-window.

We gladly leave the matter here, thinking that perhaps it would have been hardly judicious to recall such an act of outrageous wickedness, were it not for the attention which has of late been directed to morbid diseases of the brain and [illegible] Such a case as that above recorded is [illegible] wife!

An OLIO of the Year 1800

Up-Town cit and his lady

Art of tying the cravat



a walk on the Battery

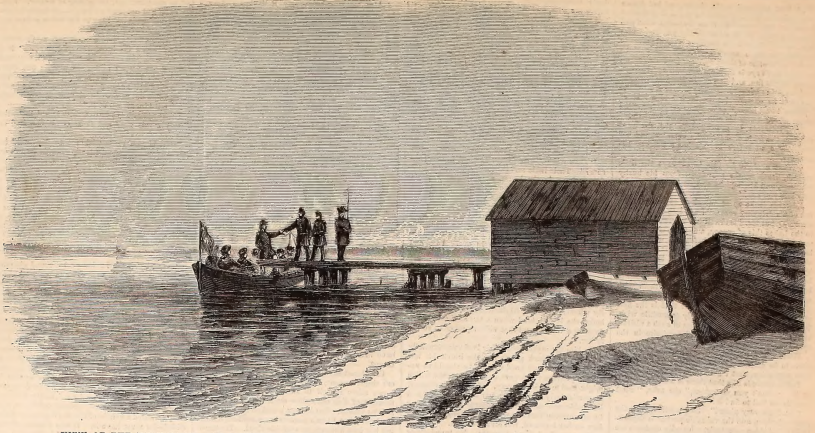
going to church

Fashionable Theatricals of 1800
(A SCENE FROM THE TRAGEDY OF DOUGLAS)

Gent of military turn of mind

Lady's Gentleman of 1800

A Belle of the period



VIEW OF THE BOAT-HOUSE AND LANDING AT FORT PICKENS, FLORIDA.—[FROM A SKETCH BY AN OFFICER OF LIEUTENANT SLEMMER'S COMMAND.]

BOAT-HOUSE AND LANDING AT FORT PICKENS.

WE publish herewith, from sketches kindly sent us by officers of Lieutenant Slemmer's command, a view of one of the ten flank casemate batteries at Fort Pickens, and a view of the boat-house at which all the interviews between the Secessionist leaders and the United States forces are held. One of our correspondents writes:

"FORT PICKENS, FLORIDA, March 18, 1861.

"Inclosed please find a drawing representing the Landing and Boat-house of Fort Pickens, Florida. This is the first and most familiar object that meets the visitor's eyes on coming to the fort, as it is the point where all must come who visit the island, and besides, as you come into the harbor, it is the only object that breaks the monotony of the beach for miles.

"On the left is the Quarantine Point, about seven miles distant. This is a projection from the main land. Pensacola lies across a bay to the left of the Quarantine. The central opening in the distant shore is the continuation of Pensacola Harbor to the eastward. The point on the right is 'Fair Point,' and at its base is an old Spanish fort, concealed by the boat-house. I will send you a sketch of it in a few days.

"The sentinel, at the moment I immortalized him, was watching the minnows.

"No strangers or secessionist friends are allowed to land at any point but this wharf. Here all interviews are held, and here Lieutenant Slemmer was thrice summoned to surrender—twice by Major Chase, in command of the united secession forces. The interviews on this wharf are frequent, and it was only yesterday that I met an old comrade who served with me in the Florida War, but who is now aid to Bragg; while the day before I met the embassador from Bragg, and recognized a former class-mate at West Point. Both are serving the secessionists, and came with letters from their commanders. We took a friendly glass while sitting on the wharf, and renewed assurances."

LOST!

A PARTING glance round the office, to assure himself all desks, closets, and iron safes are properly secured for the night, and the solicitor's confidential clerk locks up, and prepares for home.

ONE OF THE TEN FLANK CASEMATE BATTERIES AT FORT PICKENS, FLORIDA.—[DRAWN BY AN OFFICER OF LIEUTENANT SLEMMER'S COMMAND.]

With coat buttoned to the throat, and hat drawn over his eyes, Mark Edwards turns his steps toward Islington, and cheerfully faces the rough wind and drizzling rain, which unmercifully pelt and buffet him, as he vainly hails omnibus after omnibus to receive the same answer—"Full." But Mark makes no trouble of these out-door inconveniences, for his mind's eye is fixed on the well-covered breakfast table, bright fire, and best of all, the pretty young wife awaiting his return. The picture is so pleasant that he cheerily breaks forth into a line of "Home, sweet home," as he turns the corner of the street where stands his own trim little domicile.

Mrs. Edwards is peering into the darkness through the folds of the muslin curtains, and has the door open before Mark's hand touches the knocker.

"What a night for you, love!" says the little matron, brushing the rain-drops from his bushy whiskers, and kissing him compassionately; "what have late you are!"

Edwards looks up at the clock as he struggles out of his dripping coat: "I am late indeed!" he answers; but Mr. Pleadwell has started on his trip to the Lakes this afternoon, and there were a great many things to attend to before he went. And look here, I—this packet contains some valuable deeds and securities, which will be called for by the owner in a few days; so though it would have to go over one of them, but don't feel inclined to begin to-night. Where can I place them with safety?"

"Fanny suggests his desk, but that is the first article a burglar would be likely to meddle with. The wife's check pales at the idea of such a charge, and she considers. "That old escritoire in the spare bedroom, will not that do?"

Mark still hesitates. "I had so many injunctions to be careful, and not let them go out of my own possession, that I am afraid of even that."

Fanny reminds him that there is a secret drawer in it, that "no one remembers," she asks, "what trouble we had to find it?"

"Ha! the very place!" So his wife carries the candle for him, and the valuable packet is deposited in this hidden receptacle. Its only contents are a few highly scented letters, tied together with a piece of ribbon, the which Fanny, laughing and blushing, confesses are Mr. Mark Edwards's love effusions before marriage, carefully preserved to bear witness against him when he becomes cold and cross.

How is it that next evening his welcome is not such a smiling one as it usually is? A bitterly spiteful seemed depressed, and her eyes look as if they had been clouded with tears.

"Has you had any visitors to-day?" her husband carelessly inquires as he sips his tea.

The hesitating "No" is so faintly pronounced that the young man, hitherto preoccupied with business, looks up.

"That 'No' sounded like 'Yes!' Who has been here?"

"Only my brother George," Fanny answers in a low voice, and Mark, frowning, turns away, and takes up a book.

"My brother George" is his aversion, and the torment and trouble of his wife's family; always in difficulties, no sooner rescued from one scrape than running headlong into another, sometimes invisible for months, and suddenly reappearing to levy contributions on any relatives able or willing to assist him. Mark has repeatedly contemplated forbidding his visits; but then Fanny is so tender-hearted, and cherishes such a kindly belief in the prodigal's ultimate reformation, that her husband has not yet mustered sufficient firmness to enforce his wishes, although he knows where his wife's heart is most, and why she was called old velvet bonnet. Fanny seems to guess what is passing in his mind by her coming so softly to his side, and stroking his hair, and pressing her lips to his forehead, but neither of them say any thing, and Mark leisurely prepares for his task of conveying. When he has gone up stairs to fetch his papers, she lights an extra candle, and ensconces herself in a corner with her work-table, regretting as she does so that her "poor boy" must be bored with this odious writing when he ought to be resting. However, Mark soon comes down the stairs, three at a time, to ask, rather angrily, why she has moved his packet without mentioning it. With astonishment in her looks, his wife denies having done so, and inquires with him as to the spare bedroom, exerting her belief that he has overlooked the parcel. Not a thing is out of its place. The old escritoire stands exactly as they left it, the lock had not been tampered with, nor was the secret drawer open; and there, undisturbed, lie the love-letters; but the small brown-paper parcel, tied with pink tape, and sealed with the office seal, is gone!

The husband, suspecting he knows not what, looks almost sternly at his wife, whose answering glance is confused and full of terror.

"Tell me the truth, Fanny, my dear Fanny! Are you playing a trick to tease me? Remember, if I can not produce these papers, I am a ruined man! It would be worse than the loss of money; that I might replace, these I can not. Tell me at once where they are."

"Indeed, Mark, I know no more about them than you do yourself." They must be here; perhaps they have slipped behind the drawer."

Although next to impossible, the chance is not overlooked; hammer and chisel are soon fetched, and the back of the escritoire is knocked out, leaving no nook or cranny where the smallest paper could remain unperceived.

Almost beside himself, Mark leads his wife down stairs, and commences questioning her. Where is her key? On the ring; it has not been out of her possession. Has she been out? No. Is she quite sure of that? Quite.

Suspicions are crowding upon his mind; hints given before his marriage about Fanny Roberts's brother, and regrets uttered, even in his hearing, that a respectable young man like Mr. Edwards should lower himself by such a connection, are suddenly remembered and dwelt upon. He pauses before his wife, and sternly demands what errand had brought that brother of hers to his house. That brother of hers! What a speech! All Fanny's sisterly feelings are in arms, and yet her voice falters, for she is forced to own that it was the want of money. "And you told him I had been a-sleep in the house," Mark cries, accusingly. With a crimson face she angrily denies it. She did not mention Mark's affairs during their short interview. Is it likely she would do so? Or if she did, would George, poor foolish fellow that he is, steal up stairs and rob his sister's home? Ridiculous! Impossible!

"Impossible," Mark retorts, "without he possessed the key."

"It has not been out of my pocket," sobs Fanny.

"Then where," asks Mark, "are the missing papers?" Their little servant-maid away for a holiday—no one in the house, according to Fanny's own confession, but this young man. Where are the papers?

Receiving for reply a torrent of tears and protestations, he flings himself on the sofa, and tries to steady his nerves to the consequences of this extraordinary loss. And while Fanny goes and institutes an unavailing search in every box, and cupboard, and drawer where it could be possible to find such a parcel, he considers how it would be to explain how it could have withdrawn itself from the secret drawer to take refuge elsewhere. At his late return to the office next day? That packet must have been stolen. But how? When? By whom? Getting frightened at Mark's gloomy looks, she is delighted to see that he goes and institutes an unavailing search in every box, and cupboard, and drawer where it could be possible to find such a parcel, though it would be useless to explain how it could have withdrawn itself from the secret drawer to take refuge elsewhere. At his late return to the office next day? That packet must have been stolen. But how? When? By whom?

Getting frightened at Mark's gloomy looks, she is delighted to see that he goes and announces a visitor, and that visitor proves to be her father.

To him the mysterious affair is circumstantially detailed, and Mark points out the inevitable loss of his situation and good name if he should be unable to produce the papers, or even to say where they might lead to their recovery. To Fanny's dismay, he particularly dwells upon her brother's visit, and per haps unwarrantably enlarges upon the meaning by an entreaty that she will, if retaining any affection for her husband, tell all she knows.

But now the faith of womanhood, namely bear both his children accused of such a crime is more than his rather irascible temper will endure, and he enters a counter-accusation that Mark has, for some unworthy motive, removed the parcel himself. Words now become so hot and bitter that Fanny's distress is increased, not lessened by this charge, trembling, and sick with a bilious attack, she leads so earnestly with both, that Mark, more touched than he would like to confess, abruptly leaves them in the silent house. After some hours, the servant, the sound of his footsteps ceasing, the anxious wife creeps softly up the stairs, and is relieved to find him lying on the bed in uneasy slumber. Her father persuades her to rest too, but poor Fanny shakes her head, and still sits by his side, leaning her head on his arm and feeling more lonely and miserable than it had ever been her lot to feel before. What will poor Mark do? And what will become of her, if he persists in believing her guilty?

A footstep overhead startles them. "It is only Mark," says Fanny, after a moment's listening. "Poor fellow, I wish he had slept longer!"

In the modern six-roomed house every sound is distinctly audible, and Mark's movements in the chamber where stands the now shattered escritoire. After a short pause, he is heard slowly descending the stairs, and his wife prepares to resume her reclining position, and smoothes her disordered hair.

As he enters the room, Mr. Roberts lays his hand on his daughter's arm. "Look, child, look!" he whispers; and Fanny sees with astonishment that her husband is fast asleep, and holds in one hand the bundle of old love-letters.

Setting down his candle, Mark unlocks the front of his large and well-filled bookcase, and begins deliberately taking down, one by one, the handsome bound volumes of the "History of England," which grace the highest shelf; then he draws out a number of loose magazines, hidden there because of their untidy appearance; lays the old love-letters quite at the back of all, replaces the odd numbers, and resumes the volumes; not one, with carefully putting them even, locks the glass-doors, and is stalking away, when Fanny, with a cry which awakens him, snatches up the packet from the handsome bound volumes of the "History of England," which grace the highest shelf; then he draws out a number of loose magazines, hidden there because of their untidy appearance; lays the old love-letters quite at the back of all, replaces the odd numbers, and resumes the volumes; not one, with carefully putting them even, locks the glass-doors, and is stalking away, when Fanny, with a cry which awakens him, snatches up the packet from the bookcase, eyes, and wondering, he sees her eager fingers dragging Hume and Smollet from their proud position to assume the humbler one on the hearth-rug, and in the fender; the ones treasured Belle Assemblées are scattered in all directions; the highly prized love-letters recover their dignity, and lying then in the fender,

"My dear Sir," interrupted the lawyer, "there really is no money. I don't think I could squeeze out a fifty-pound note to save my own father from bankruptcy."

"Humph!" grunted Ralph, "it will bother me."

Crawshay's only reply was to put his hands in his pockets, and look more benevolent than before.

"How's Miss Annie?" he asked, after a pause.

"Oh, middling," replied Ralph.

An expression crept across his face which Crawsher did not observe.

"By-the-way, when did you see young Lucerne last?" he inquired.

"Six weeks back."

"Then you don't know what's occurred?"

"Eh? No. Nothing bad, I hope, to Lucerne; for he's a nice young fellow—plenty of money, and a good client."

"He's about making somebody a good husband," said Ralph, significantly.

"What?" cried Crawsher. "You don't mean — is it — is he going to marry our dear young lady?"

Ralph nodded. (A great vagabond was Ralph.) "I'm astounded! All settled?"

"Every thing."

"Humph! I'm right glad. A little business for me, too. I shall have Lucerne here shortly, no doubt, about the settlement. Ha! ha! But, stay, I'm forgetting your own particular matter."

"Oh, if there's not fifty pounds to be had—" Ralph was beginning, cavalierly.

"Oh, well, never mind that; we must see, you know. I've a client, the protégé of an old trader-man, who has lately died and left him a heap of money. I don't want to see you himself, for he's rather a funny customer. But come here the first thing in the morning, and I dare say we shall manage it. Good-by! good-by!"

"I think we shall be able to go back to Bramblestone afire and sound, Annie," said Ralph, when he had returned to his daughter.

"Thank God, papa!"

"There's no doubt he'll do it, I think," muttered Ralph, to himself. "He's running it rather close, though. I must have the money to-morrow."

Early the next morning Ralph was with Crawsher.

"Well," said the latter, "my man is in the other room."

"Can I have the money at once?" asked Ralph, with barely concealed anxiety.

"He'll give you the check in this room, my friend. I know he'll do it, for he said so; but he wants to see you."

He walked to the door of an inner room, and opened it.

"Walk in, Mr. Daunt. Will you be kind enough? Mr. Daunt, Mr. Mayner. Mr. Mayner —Eh! Bless me! what's wrong?"

Nothing, as far as Sydney Daunt was concerned, for the lawyer's communication had revealed to him (though he had said nothing to the lawyer) to w om he was asked to lend; but Ralph fell back, saying, huskily,

"Have we seen each other before, Sir?"

"I am Sydney Daunt," was the reply. "Twenty years since you and I were in Bramblestone church-yard. Nay, don't turn away, Mr. Mayner. Let that sad story drop. I have no desire for what men call revenge. You want a couple of thousand pounds—there is the check."

But even in that dire extremity, Ralph Mayner was the Ralph Mayner—the watcher of Bramblestone work-house; the cruel witness in Bramblestone church; his features grew ghastly, his limbs shaking in spite of him, so that he had to grasp the table for support.

"And do you think," he uttered, in a hoarse voice, "that I am become a weak, cry-baby thing like John Daunt, your father? Oh, this is beautiful! Here is a scene! Here is Christian vengeance! Shall I go upon my knees, and weep over you, young man? Shall I beg a blessing on you, and entreat forgiveness for the past? Hark ye, now! I would not turn limb from limb first! Sooner than take that check I'd burn myself bit by bit in yonder fire. I hate you! You have your triumph, you white-faced schools-girl; but it shall go no further. Even now, Ralph Mayner can despise you from the bottom of his soul, and can hurl at you a lasting defiance."

And he rushed from the room into the street, mad and desperate.

Many days had passed, and Annie had become uneasy on account of her father's lengthened absence. Toward afternoon she determined to seek him at Mr. Crawsher's office, which she knew to be in Gray's Inn. Being quite unacquainted with London, it is not strange that she lost her way, and, our pretty, fair-faced school-girl; but it shall go no further. Even now, Ralph Mayner can despise you from the bottom of his soul, and can hurl at you a lasting defiance."

And he rushed from the room into the street, mad and desperate.

Many days had passed, and Annie had become uneasy on account of her father's lengthened absence. Toward afternoon she determined to seek him at Mr. Crawsher's office, which she knew to be in Gray's Inn. Being quite unacquainted with London, it is not strange that she lost her way, and, our pretty, fair-faced school-girl; but it shall go no further. Even now, Ralph Mayner can despise you from the bottom of his soul, and can hurl at you a lasting defiance."

And he rushed from the room into the street, mad and desperate.

Many

THE NEW TARIFF ON DRY GOODS.

Unhappy condition of the Optic Nerve of a Custom House Appraiser who has been counting the Threads in a Square Yard of Fabric to ascertain the duty thereon under the New MORRILL Tariff. The Spots and Webs are well-known Opthalmic Symptoms. It is confidently expected that the unfortunate man will go blind.

THE LATEST MARTYR.

Horrible Phantasms disturb the Slumbers of the newly-appointed Custom-House Entry-Clerk, who has come into Office with the New MORRILL Tariff, and spent a Morning in the vain endeavor to make something out of it.

CONSULTING THE ORACLE.

PRESIDENT LINCOLN. "And, what next?"
COLUMBIA. "First be sure you're right, then go ahead!"

READS THE PAPERS.

Our Friend, MR. JONES, who is deeply interested in the condition of the country, takes all the Papers, and reads them thoroughly. The following Dispatches puzzle him somewhat:

The Cabinet have issued the orders for the Evacuation of Fort Sumter.—Herald.

It is at last decided that Fort Sumter shall be reinforced.—Times.

Orders were sent off last evening to Reinforce Major ANDERSON at all costs.—Tribune.

It is believed that Major ANDERSON Evacuated Fort Sumter by order of the Government last evening.—World.

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY.

SILAS MARNER, the Weaver of Raveloe. By the Author of "Adam Bede." 12mo.

FARADAY'S LECTURES ON THE CHEMICAL HISTORY OF A CANDLE.

FRAMLEY PARSONAGE. A Novel. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE. Illustrations. 12mo.

A DAY'S RIDE. A Life's Romance. By CHARLES LEVER. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

SEASONS WITH THE SEA-HORSES; or, Sporting Adventures in the Northern Seas. By JAMES LAMONT, Esq., F.G.S. With Map and Illustrations. 8vo, Muslin.

CARTHAGE AND HER REMAINS: Being an Account of the Excavations and Researches on the Site of the Phœnician Metropolis in Africa and other Adjacent Places. By Dr. N. DAVIS, F.R.G.S. 8vo, Muslin, $2 50.

THE ENGLISH SPORTSMAN IN THE WESTERN PRAIRIES. By the Hon. GRANTLEY F. BERKELEY, Author of "Life in the Forests of France," &c., &c.

THE HOUSE ON THE MOOR. A Novel. By the Author of "Margaret Maitland," "The Laird of Norlaw," "The Days of My Life," &c. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

WARD'S
Perfect Fitting Shirts,

MADE TO MEASURE AT $18 PER DOZEN,
OR SIX FOR $9.
MADE OF NEW YORK MILLS MUSLIN,
With fine Linen Bosoms, and warranted as good a Shirt as sold in the retail stores at $2 50 each.
ALSO, THE VERY BEST SHIRTS THAT CAN BE MADE AT $2 EACH.
SELF-MEASUREMENT FOR SHIRTS.
Printed directions, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of Shirts sent free everywhere, and so easy to understand, that any one can take their own in some for Shirts. I warrant a good fit. The cash to be paid to the Express Company on receipt of goods.

S. W. H. WARD, from London,
No. 387 Broadway, N. Y., up Stairs.

Thorley's Food for Cattle

Converts the poorest of hay or straw into a superior provender. A pamphlet mailed free. Depot for U. S., 21 Broadway, N. Y.
Agents wanted in every City and Town.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York, have Just Published:

TRUMPS. By GEO. WILLIAM CURTIS. Author of "The Potiphar Papers," "Prue and I," &c., &c. Illustrations by HOPPIN. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

The New Patent Law.
Foreign Inventors.

Under the new Patent Law the fee on presenting an application for a patent is but $15, and if the patent is allowed, $20 additional has to be paid. ENGLISH, FRENCH, BELGIAN, GERMAN, and AUSTRIAN INVENTORS are placed on the same footing as Citizens, as respects fees.

MESSRS. MUNN & CO., NO. 37 PARK ROW, NEW YORK, having had 16 years experience as PATENT SOLICITORS, will upon application, procure patents and afford all needful advice.

A Pamphlet on this subject is sent free.

John B. Dunham.

Overstrung Grand Square and Upright Pianos.

Established in 1850.

Are pronounced to be the best Pianos manufactured. Each Instrument warranted 5 years. Send for Circular. Warerooms and Manufactory, 75 to 85 East 13th Street, near Broadway, N. Y.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. V.—No. 225.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 20, 1861. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1861, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

ADVERTISEMENT.

In view of the momentous events which are impending, and of the possible outbreak of civil war, the proprietors of Harper's Weekly beg to draw public attention to the following list of engravings which have been published in this journal within the past few weeks, as evidence of the fidelity and thoroughness with which they are redeeming their pledge to "give a well-drawn, well-engraved, and well-printed illustration of every important event that occurs." Almost all of the illustrations of the Southern Forts have been made from drawings by United States Officers; and the proprietors of Harper's Weekly take this opportunity of informing Officers in the Army and Navy serving in the South that they will be glad to receive sketches of Forts and Scenes of Interest at the present crisis, and to pay liberally for such as they may use. Any officer in either service can obtain the Weekly gratuitously for six months by sending his address to this office.

Illustrations of the War.

SEVERAL SKETCHES OF MAJOR ANDERSON IN FORT MOULTRIE.
THE ENTRY INTO FORT SUMTER.
THE OCCUPATION OF CASTLE PINCKNEY.
MAPS OF THE CHARLESTON HARBOR.
PROFILE VIEW OF THE SAME.
THE MARINE SCHOOL AT CHARLESTON.
FORT SUMTER, FROM SULLIVAN'S ISLAND.
THE CUSTOM-HOUSE AND POWDER MAGAZINE AT CHARLESTON.
FORT MOULTRIE—CHARLESTON IN THE DISTANCE.
PORTRAIT OF MAJOR ANDERSON, U.S. ARMY.
PORTRAIT OF CAPTAIN FOSTER, U. S. ARMY.
PORTRAITS OF MAJOR ANDERSON'S COMMAND.

HON. CHARLES F. ADAMS, U. S. MINISTER TO ENGLAND.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

PORTRAIT OF GOVERNOR PICKENS.
PORTRAIT OF JUDGE MAGRATH, SECRETARY OF STATE.
PORTRAIT OF SECRETARY OF WAR JAMIESON.
PORTRAIT OF REV. DR. BACHMAN.
PORTRAITS OF THE SOUTH CAROLINA DELEGATION IN CONGRESS.
THE WASHINGTON ARTILLERY OF CHARLESTON.
THE CHARLESTON ZOUAVES.
FORT JOHNSON, CHARLESTON HARBOR.
THE "STAR OF THE WEST."
THE PRAYER AT SUMTER.
FIRING ON THE "STAR OF THE WEST."
THE BATTERY AT FORT MOULTRIE BEARING ON FORT SUMTER.
DISMANTLED GUNS AT FORT MOULTRIE.
FORT SUMTER, SEEN FROM THE REAR.
THE MAIN BATTERY AT FORT SUMTER.
THE CASEMATES AT FORT SUMTER.
THE SALLY-PORT AT FORT SUMTER.
THE GORGE AT FORT SUMTER.
THE INTERIOR AT FORT SUMTER.
A TEN-INCH COLUMBIAD AT FORT SUMTER.
INTERIOR OF THE SALLY-PORT AT FORT SUMTER.
OFFICERS' QUARTERS AT FORT SUMTER.
THE GOOD-BY OF THE SOLDIERS' WIVES TO FORT SUMTER.
MAJOR ANDERSON'S QUARTERS AT FORT SUMTER.
AN EMBRASURE—OUTSIDE AND INSIDE—AT FORT SUMTER.
MAJOR ANDERSON'S COMMAND AT FORT SUMTER.
THE CITY OF CHARLESTON.
FORT MOULTRIE, AS SEEN FROM FORT SUMTER.
MORRIS ISLAND, AS SEEN FROM FORT SUMTER.
FORT JOHNSON, AS SEEN FROM FORT SUMTER.
THE IRON-CLAD BATTERY ON CUMMING'S POINT, AS SEEN FROM FORT SUMTER.
FORT PICKENS, PENSACOLA, LOOKING SEAWARD.
PORTRAIT OF LIEUTENANT SLEMMER.
PORTRAIT OF LIEUTENANT GILMAN.
FRONT VIEW OF FORT PICKENS, SHOWING THE SALLY-PORT.
THE FLAG-STAFF BASTION AT FORT PICKENS.
THE SALUTE ON 22D FEBRUARY AT FORT PICKENS.
THE BOAT-HOUSE AND LANDING AT FORT PICKENS.
ONE OF THE FLANK CASEMATE BATTERIES AT FORT PICKENS.

THE CONFEDERATE BATTERIES OPPOSITE FORT PICKENS, FLORIDA.—DRAWN BY AN OFFICER OF LIEUTENANT SLEMMER'S COMMAND.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

THE CONFEDERATE BATTERIES AGAINST FORT PICKENS.
SEA BATTERY AT FORT MONROE, VIRGINIA.
INTERIOR OF SEA BATTERY AT FORT MONROE.
TESTING THE BIG COLUMBIAD AT FORT MONROE.
THE RIP-RAPS.
SHIPS IN THE NORFOLK NAVY-YARD.
FORT JEFFERSON, TORTUGAS
FORT TAYLOR, KEY WEST.
FORT SMITH, ARKANSAS.
UNITED STATES ARSENAL AT LITTLE ROCK, ARKANSAS.
THE NAVY-YARD AT NORFOLK.
THE NAVY-YARD AT WASHINGTON.
FORT WACHITA, TEXAS.
FORT ARBUCKLE, TEXAS.
FORT DAVIS, TEXAS.
FORT BROWN, TEXAS.
FORT LANCASTER, TEXAS.
POINT ISABEL, TEXAS.
THE ALAMO, SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS.
SURRENDER OF GENERAL TWIGGS, AT SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS.
THE WASHINGTON ARSENAL.
FORT ON CLARKE'S ISLAND.
FORT NORFOLK.
FORT WASHINGTON.
THE RICHMOND ARMORY.

The proprietors of Harper's Weekly beg to state that they have made the most extensive arrangements for the illustration of future movements at the South, and that the public may rely upon finding in Harper's Weekly an accurate and reliable picture of every scene of interest to which occurrences may direct attention. The increasing circulation of Harper's Weekly renders it a most desirable advertising medium.

HON. CHARLES F. ADAMS,

UNITED STATES MINISTER TO ENGLAND.

We publish on the preceding page, from a photograph by Brady, a portrait of the Hon. CHARLES F. ADAMS, who is to succeed Mr. Dallas at the court of St. James. Mr. Adams will fill one of the most important posts in the Government in the present crisis of the country.

He is the third member of his family who has represented the country in England. His grandfather, John Adams, was the first American Minister to the Court of St. James: it was to him that King George the Third delivered the famous speech, "I, only, Sir, of all men in England, as you may imagine, the sorriest to receive you here," etc. This was in 1785. Thirty years afterward, the son of John Adams, John Quincy Adams, was sent to England, and represented the country there for two years. He took with him his son, the present Charles F. Adams, who was eight years old at the time they arrived in London and went to an English school. Report states that he took his first lesson in the manly art of self-defence from some English fellow-pupils, whose sarcasms upon the United States were more than the young Yankee could tolerate.

Mr. Adams has lived a quiet, unobtrusive life. In 1848 he was a delegate to the famous Buffalo Convention, and was chosen President of that body: a post of which he discharged the duties with credit. He subsequently published the life and writings of his grandfather, John Adams—a work of great merit, which occupies a standard place in our political literature. Two years ago he was elected to Congress. He has not been a prominent member of Mr. Pike; but the first proposition for a compromise came from him: he represented Massachusetts in the famous perilous committee, and probably the most finished speech delivered in Congress on the crisis was his.

He is fifty-three years of age, and is in possession of a splendid fortune, part of which he derived from his wife.

FORT M'RAE, PENSACOLA.

We publish on the preceding page a view of FORT M'RAE, PENSACOLA, FLORIDA, from a sketch by an officer of Lieutenant Slemmer's command, who writes as follows:

"FORT PICKENS, FLA., March 29, 1861.

"DEAR SIR,—Inclosed is a sketch of Fort M'Rae, at the entrance of Pensacola Harbor, and directly opposite Fort Pickens, from which the view is taken. It is a little more than one mile and a quarter from Fort Pickens, and about one mile and three-fourths from Fort Barrancas. It shows from Fort Pickens 4 embrasures, having two tiers of casemate guns and one en barbette. None of the latter, however, are mounted, and but few of the former.

"The fort is on an island, being separated from the main land by a narrow, shallow cut (seen on the right), made—during the gale of September, 1858—from the bay through to the lagoons, seen in rear of the fort. In one place the water reaches to the walls of the fort; but near the southeast corner the sand has been thrown so high by the waves as to conceal several embrasures.

"To the south is seen the Water Battery, still unfinished and without guns. To the left of this is the house of the beacon-light keeper and Beacon-light, which is now seldom lighted. The small steamboat entering the harbor is the Crusader, which is kept running night and day by the 'harbor police,' for the purpose of cutting off any supplies that citizens, so disposed, might send either to the fleet or fort.

"In the fore-ground is seen the western extremity of Santa Rosa Island, on which Fort Pickens is situated.

"This portion—and, in fact, the whole island—is cut up by irregular sand-ridges, some of the hillocks rising as high as fifteen or twenty feet."

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, APRIL 20, 1861.

THE RIGHT OF SECESSION.

THE State of Virginia has decided not to secede; but has adopted, in Convention, a series of resolutions affirming among other things, the right of a State to secede from the Union at will. In like manner, the State of Missouri, which is overwhelmingly opposed to secession, and the State of Kentucky, in which no Convention has been called, both declare that in the event of forcible measures being taken by the General Government to resist the dismemberment of the Union, they will take sides with the seceded States.

It seems questionable whether the continued alliance of these States, on these conditions, is an unmixed gain. If the Union of forts is a confederacy of States which is liable to be dissolved at the will of any of the States, and if no power rests with the General Government to enforce its laws, it would seem that we have been laboring under a delusion these eighty years in supposing that we were a nation, and the fact would appear to be that the several States of the Union have really been united by no closer bond than that which connects us with Great Britain and France—a mere treaty stipulation, which any of the parties were at liberty to annul at pleasure.

It is of the essence of nationality that the Government of the whole shall be obeyed by each constituent part, and that the armaments of the nation shall bind each and every section thereof. If any one part can declare itself not bound by the national laws and obligations, then no part is bound, and such laws as a bad tariff; next, the conclusion of an unpopular treaty; next, the creation of a large debt; next, the declaration of a doubtful war. If the right of secession be admitted, each of these causes may be successfully invoked by any State to justify the repudiation of the laws, treaties, and pecuniary obligations of the government. What is this but anarchy?

The question, therefore, which is presented to the people of the Northern States by the people of the border States of Virginia, Kentucky, and Missouri is, whether or not they will accept organized anarchy as the normal condition of their political existence, as the price of retaining these States in the Union?

Suppose the Pope, as the sovereign of Rome, and Francis-Joseph, as the sovereign of Venetia, were to say to Victor Emanuel, King of Italy:

"Sire, you are anxious to unite Italy under one head. On certain terms we will confederate with you. You shall give us the benefit of your laws, your taxes, your army, your post-office, your national prestige, your power. You shall protect us against the foreign world, so that our citizens shall be safe wherever they go. You shall grant us the loan of your national credit, so that the money needed for our national public works can be raised. You shall put down robbers and pirates in our midst. In return for this we will give you our allegiance as long as we please; but from the hour we decide to withdraw it you shall have no right to coerce us, or to keep us within your dominion by force."

An Italian Parliament under King Emanuel would be likely to reply to this proposal by remarking that it offered him a one-sided bargain; that a compact which could be shuffled off by one of the parties at the will of the other was hardly worth making; that if Venetia and Rome really sought admission into the kingdom of Italy, they must first admit that Italy was a nation, and that its laws must be enforced throughout its territory; and that whatever conditions Venetia and Rome sought to make with the parent State, they must not be mentioned until the vital consideration of a stable nationality and a universal acquiescence in the authority of the general laws of the kingdom had been settled forever.

This, in our friend's opinion, is the way the question would be viewed in Italy.

THE MISSION OF THE NEGRO.

A TIMELY book, pending the present excitement on slavery in this country, is SEWELL'S "ORDEAL OF FREE LABOR IN THE WEST INDIES." Every one knows that the negroes in the British West Indies were emancipated in 1838, and those in the French and Danish Islands in 1848. The negroes in the Spanish Islands are still in a condition of slavery. Mr. Sewell spent two years in traveling through those islands, making observations, collecting statistics, and comparing opinions; the result of his travels is to be found in the compact volume now appearing from the press of the Harpers.

Two opinions are entertained by two antagonistic sects with regard to British emancipation in the West Indies. The prevailing notion in this country is that emancipation was a mistake; that it ruined the islands, and did not benefit the negro; that it sacrificed the white man without helping the black. Another opinion, which is the common notion held in England, is that emancipation—with compensation to the planter—was a noble instance of national devotion to principle; that the islands were ruined, not by emancipation, but by the previous bad management and wasteful living of the planters; that the negroes, after idling for a generation, as was natural to a race suddenly freed from a bondage of centuries, are now slowly reviving to usefulness, and acquiring habits of labor, industry, and virtue.

The partisans of both these opinions will find material to sustain their views in Mr. Sewell's most conscientious and dispassionate work. That the author has opinions of his own there can be but little doubt. He writes, however, so impartially that we are inclined to think that both the slavery and the anti-slavery leaders will, on the strength of isolated passages and statements, claim him as an ally.

The work will doubtless furnish material for a library of controversial essays on the vexed question.

THE BORDER STATES.

THERE are no States in the Union or out of it which are so deeply interested in the maintenance of peace, order, and good government as Maryland, Virginia, Tennessee, Kentucky, and Missouri. For of all the States, Nature has done most for them. God created them the garden of the continent. Blessed with a soil of unusual fertility, and a climate exquisitely adapted to the requirements of heat and cold, they enjoy the advantages of both the northern and the southern meridians, and have, if their people do not prevent Providence, a greater fitness than any part of the country. They can grow every thing, from the northern potato and apple to the southern cotton-plant, the grape, and the fig. Their soil overlies mines of gems of various kinds, iron, gold, copper, lead, and coal. They stretch in an unbroken line from the great waters of the interior to the great ocean which washes the continent. If they maintain peace and good government, their latitude must render their railroads the great avenue between the West and the East. Their climate is such that it is a miracle they have not absorbed the whole population of the continent. To a dweller in frozen Michigan or torrid Louisiana, life under the genial sun of Virginia seems a dream of impossible bliss. In the shade of the grand old woods of that noble State, with no winter snow-storms, no summer dog-days, no deadly epidemics, no frightful labor-problem for existence, but just such a rotation of seasons as gives a relish to each, and tempts the earth to bring forth her regular increase, GEORGE WASHINGTON beguiled his declining years with visions of the future glories of his native soil, and of the possible predominance of the Potomac over all other rivers of America. Can such a State seek to emulate the desolate and barren regions in Mexico and Central America, to which God, in His Providence, was originally as bountiful as to her?

BETTER THAN DOLLARS.

Is there any thing better than dollars? Actual dollars, bankable, redeemable in gold on presentation?

"No, Sir," says our old friend, COTTON PORK, Esquire, "there is not. Young people talk sentiment about honor, and principle, and patriotism, and that sort of thing; but there is nothing reliable in the world but dollars." And Cotton Pork is sincere. He acts up to his principles. He married a sickly, cross-grained wife whom he did not love, but who had dollars, in preference to a sweet girl whom he loved—far as he could—but who had none. He commits acts in business daily which are not honorable, and endeavors to justify them by the plea of nationality and a universal acquiescence in the authority of the general laws of the kingdom. It has been settled forever.

Cotton Pork is a Northern man. Mostly from New England, though often transplanted to New York, and doing well in our climate. Some varieties of his genus have been tried at the South, but they don't thrive there. They can't stand so much sun.

At the South—an odd region—dollars are well thought of, to be sure, but still they don't govern. People don't measure each other on plantations by the bankable fund they own; nor is public policy exclusively adjusted to the dollar standard. It seems ridiculous, but people talk and think much more about honor at the South than about dollars. Our friend Cotton Pork is, of course, ready to prove that they are a very deluded race; that they don't agree even among themselves as to what honor requires; and that they would have done much better to have kept their eye always fixed on the main chance. But he don't convince them. In South Carolina they go to prodigious expense, sacrifice the trade of their port, mulct their rich men, and drive their poor out of employment; but they stick firmly to their point of honor. In New York Cotton Pork pooh-poohs the firing on the Star of the West, demands the evacuation of Sumter, declares himself ready to vote for slavery in New York, but talks like a mild Abolitionist. He is told that New Orleans is going to import pork or ny cloth. In Louisiana private citizens subscribe for five millions of the new loan of the Southern Confederacy at par—knowing the prospect of the security; in New York Cotton Pork, Esq., condescends to come to the relief of his country by taking United States Treasury notes at twelve per cent. discount, which, as currency is not worth over six, is not so very expensive patriotism.

Yet Cotton Pork is a patriot—in one way. He is dead against civil war. "What," says he, "imbrue our hands in our brothers' blood—and knock Central down to 50? Deluge the country with blood—and send to our trade in pegged boots? Spread havoc through peaceful vales—and deprive us of a market for gunny cloth? Carry the sword and torch into happy plantations—and write off our outstanding Southern claims? Stain the national flag with American blood—and hand over the Southern market to foreigners? Never, never, never!" The good man's bosom swells at the theme, and he denounces fighting with the energy of a Quaker. Strange, how differently they talk down South! They spend no energy in denouncing civil war. They do not want to fight. They seek peace. But if it comes, they will make no wry faces. It will cost them much, but they utter no such philanthropic shrieks as proceed from the mouth of Cotton Pork. They seem to think that there are things worse than fighting in this world—and better than dollars. An odd people, surely.

THE LOUNGER.

CHURCH'S NEW PICTURE.

IF the last number of Thackeray's "Philip" there is some very pleasant talk about artists, apropos of our old friend in "The Newcomes," J. J. Ridley, who lived in the Fitzroy Square Academician. Thackeray has a fond hankering for art and artists. He always describes them well. He knows the Bohemian life in which they are wont to dwell. There is a freshness, a simplicity, a sweetness and pathos in the pursuit of art and the character of artists which especially interest and charm a man who is much in what is technically called the world. Besides, Thackeray's homage to the studio has a genuine regret in it. He has not wanted to be a painter; and they are his own sketches, the same old familiar faces, with which we are regaled in the "Roundabout Papers."

"To be a painter," says Thackeray, in the character of Arthur Pendennis, "and to have your hand in perfect order, I hold to be one of life's summa bona. The happy mixture of hand and head work must render the occupation supremely pleasant. In the day's work must occur endless delightful difficulties and occasions for skill over the details of that armor, that drapery, or what not, the sparkle of that eye, the downy blush of that cheek, the jewel on that neck, there are beauties to be fought and victories to be won." And so on to the end of a pleasant paragraph. And who has not thought so a thousand times as he ascended (painters are apt to dwell near heaven) to the studio? As he passed in among the canvases and breathed the atmosphere of art? Who has not thought of Noma entering the sweet-scented wood to commune with the nymph? As he came out again, and descended to earth and mixed the streets once more, who has not felt as Mignon felt wandering over Germany but yearning for Italy? What was the longing and fragrant memory of youth and travel? Answer, Cape Greco; answer, Lepre; answer, hilarious nights when, as Topas modestly declared, all baggage was at the risk of the owner.

Thinking these things in the luxurious chair in the upstairs studio, idly regarding the buffalo plunging headlong from the wall, and the butterfly, burning spot of splendor by his side, we have had yet little time to see the picture which we have all known was painting for us: the new work of the year, which is as surely and sternly required of a famous painter as of a successful novelist. There it is, at last. It is about the size of the Heart of the Andes, but rather smaller. It is as solid a picture as we ever painted, but there is nothing before you but air, light, and water. In the centre of the middle distance, a huge iceberg, a drifting glacier at sea: beyond it, at the left, the scene opens out into the solemn, dark distance of a sullen sea, with two distant piles and peaks of ice, leading the eye away, away, to the cloudy gloom that muffles the horizon; while beyond it, at the right, in pale blue, luminous shadow, the shining crags, and angles, and buttresses of ice, mingle in receding obscurity—an awful gorge of death and shadowy splendor. In the fore-ground, at the left, a vast jagged cliff of splintering, shattered, crystal green and blue ice stretches from the bottom to the top of the canvas; immediately in front there is a rough and fissured plain of ice, then an opening of water; and at the left foreground a fantastic fret-work worn by ceaseless currents in the ice, floating isles of emerald, many arches, among which a rock is caught and held, bewilderment of shifting hues. Between the plain of ice and the iceberg the main distance, a bay makes up from the outer sea—a bay secluded in mid-ocean by icy constructs, that turn, and grind, and crash, and roll thundering under, leaving the secluded bay a wild yeast of tossing sea. The long line of ocean swell comes rippling up the reach. There is no sign of human life. All is silence, solitude, and desolation. If the smooth snow-peaks, flushed with sunset, that you see from the terrace at Berne, should meet you nearer, drifting along the coast of Labrador, you would see what you know in Church's picture.

Much of the charm of such a work lies of course in the exquisite delicacy and play of tint. The transparent gleams; the glimmering vistas of cold, rich light; their shifting, evanescent hues of pools and shining points; the vast, thick ribs of dull green crystal; the ghostly glare—these cast a phantom and spectral spell. But some absolutely talent that last year did not hesitate to cope with all the intricacy of tropical luxuriance now revels in Arctic magnificence; and the same conscientious fidelity, the same sensitive apprehension of color and light, the same calm self-reliance of the artist, will unquestionably conquer the same success.

THE RIGHT OF REVOLUTION.

THERE is one axiom in which all humane and thoughtful men are agreed; and that is, that war, being among the most fearful of evils, should be postponed as long as the welfare of society allows and that therefore revolution should be considered as the last and most solemn and dreadful appeal. The conscience of mankind sits in perpetual judgment upon every national movement which involves the shedding of blood, and will brand forever the author of dispute. It holds that a revolution must be clearly shown to be necessary before it can be justified; the hopelessness of legal remedy must be perfectly plain, before the cry for revolution becomes other than a summons to blood and pillage.

When great wrongs have been endured in personal rights or property interest, which it is the object of Government to protect, and the Government declines to defend them, or even insists upon inflicting the wrong—then, when argument, appeal, entreaty, have failed, there remains but one method, and the Government itself is guilty of provoking the struggle. But this can only be true of an unchangeable government. Wherever the Government is constantly and directly responsible to the people, there, if Parliament, by its vote and by its action, is the instrument, there by the limit resort to arms. The Government, of course, could do only what could be legally done if the Government did at the time of the Charitist riots, maintain general order and insist upon the observance of the laws.

Nor can it be any such thing allowed by men of sense as a prospective revolution; or an appeal to arms to settle difficulties that may arise, but have not arisen. But this is precisely what is the destruction of human society. If, however, a large body of men, discontented with the operation of a political measure, proposed to obtain a fundamental law to the extent of terminating the Government, but strictly according to the terms prescribed by the Constitution itself, by which alone it can be made lawful, no man who honestly believes in the government of the majority, or the practical principle of republics, would wish to prevent such a change. You may go out of my house, certainly, but you must not pull the house down as you go. In other words, you may change the government, if you wish, by orderly constitutional means, because otherwise you injure those who wish to retain it, and whom you do not wish to injure. Under a popular representative government, which provides for its own change, any change which, if seriously desired by any considerable number of citizens, can always be obtained. Why, then, appeal to anarchy?

These are truths which no calm and intelligent man in any part of this country could seriously dispute: and if we all had them sincerely at heart, no trouble could arise among ourselves that might not be amicably settled.

A GALLERY OF CASTS AT LAST.

THE Lounger has often enough spoke of the noble Meng's Museum of casts in Dresden, which contains the most accurate reproductions in plaster of the finest statues in the world. The collection is unique and invaluable; for a plaster cast of a statue is the next perfect of all things to the statues in art. It was a very feasible thing for many of our wealthy men who would build themselves such a pretentious mansion as Astor in the Library, Cooper in the Institute, and Vassar in the College have built, to found a gallery of casts, which should give us in New York an accurate knowledge and enjoyment of what we must now wise cross seas and travel thousands of miles to behold.

The beginning has at last been made. Thanks to the energy and tact of Henry T. Tuckerman, the fine collection of casts which belonged to the Sculptor Crawford has been secured, and will be held upon for free public view and study under the auspices of the Central Park Commission. Those who were travelers in Italy of late years will remember this noble selection, and will appreciate the value of such a nucleus. Like the Egyptian Museum of Dr. Abbott, and the Astor Library, it is one of the natural ornaments of a metropolis; and it is one of those possessions whose value every man of taste and means may increase, by adding casts of such works as are not already included. In this way, rapidly and at the smallest expense, the finest gallery of the kind in the world may be secured.

POSTERITY vs. THE POST-OFFICE.

AT last New York is to have a Post-office. The disgraceful shed in which the letter business of the city has been transacted is to give way to a new and, we all hope, an entirely adequate building. The long and loud quarrel over the site has been settled by the Postmaster-General, who retains the present one. The merchants, all who do business in the immediate vicinity, have been clearly of opinion that for every conceivable reason the site should not be changed. But the other merchants and all who do business further up town, have been equally of opinion that for the same number of equally weighty reasons the Post-office should be transferred to some other spot. Thus our excellent friend the Evening Post, which is posted directly opposite the corner of the present office, has been firmly persuaded that it ought to stay where it is; while our other excellent friend the Tribune, which rents the Park, has been sufficiently big in the faith that it ought to be moved up town, and placed somewhere convenient to the great centre of thing-ness, for instance, upon the north side of the Park.

But the final authority has decided what ought to have been plainest to the meanest of the new Post-office is to be built upon the site of the old. Of course such a decision is not made without ample reasons. And, of course, when the march of the business-city may be up town, the lower part of the town will always be occupied by stores and commercial establishments of all kinds, which are their friends and servants. Moreover, the kind of trade which is likely to remain in that neighborhood is the banking business. The banks, with the banks, has a heavy correspondence. Besides, although the Park may, by-and-by, be more of a practical residence than it now is, the Fifth Street—our practical centre is what's wanted—yet who should posterity win all the prizes? Posterity has a capital chance and plenty of plums, as it is. Posterity has drawn the Astor Library as a very pretty prize it is. Why should Posterity grudge us a convenient Post-office? Posterity will doubtless dwell upon the glories of Washington's last words, some of us, who have got the start of Posterity in point of time, upon Brooklyn Heights. We want our rivers where they are and not Hudson-bloken. All in good time. Why will not Posterity consent to be satisfied with its fair share and be packed? Is there to be no end to its little heir-loons? Then let it tell us how many letters it writes? Does Posterity correspond with China? (If it does, perhaps it will be time enough to say which is more than the Post-office could, or would do, of late.) Does Posterity correspond with any thing but the future? Has Posterity ever had its head pestered with an incessant clamor of applicants. But of all vociferous solicitation this of Posterity is the most unpardonable.

A LITTLE CHARITY.

IT is never worth while to get out your forty-pounder to blow up a mosquito. A brush of the finger answers the purpose. Likewise it is always amusing and unnecessary to expend wrath upon my obvious mistakes. Let us reserve wrath for serious and important things. A friend writes to the Weekly that he "must hope, for the honor of your literary critic, that it was a typographical error" that in the close of the seventeenth century, when evidently the close of the sixteenth was intended, otherwise his information with regard to the progress of literature "is worth, as it is, many shillings and unnecessary to expend wrath upon my obvious mistakes. Let us reserve wrath for serious and important things. A friend writes to the Weekly that he "must hope, for the honor of your literary critic, that it was a typographical error" that in the close of the seventeenth century, when evidently the close of the sixteenth was intended, otherwise his information with regard to the progress of literature "is worth, as it is,

Now, what a superfluity of lofty correction is here? If a man of ordinary reading says that at the time of the Reformation, or about the 15th century, when evidently the close of the sixteenth was intended, otherwise his information with regard to the progress of literature "is worth, as it is, manifestly a slip either of the pen or the types, why not have the same charity?

MUSIC OF THE FUTURE.

WAGNER'S Opera, the Tannhäuser, has been produced in Paris, and failed entirely. Money was spent in profusion, every advantage of scenery and costume was given to the piece, and the orchestra were perfectly drilled, preliminary puffs, and the national sympathy of the great number of Germans resident in Paris, were not omitting: there was the most ample and careful preparation, as if one of Meyerbeer's great works were to be produced: the house was crowded on the first and second nights—but the third night has not come. The musical burst in the very crisis of the opera, whereby is meant the second and third act, spiritual change in the hero's mind, instead of thrilling Paris, made it laugh. That, of course, was the end. The Wagner composer of the future, "gay, pleasant Paris" is beaucoup-bored, we won't let our ears stand in their way." And so they pass it on to the Fatirs, scrupulously declining to hear.

Our Philharmonic Society will not be allowed to overture several times, and we are all more or less familiar with it. There are passages of great beauty and power, and the final triumphal march is certainly very grand. Even laughing Paris does not deny him genius. But there is undoubtedly a grandiose effect throughout which is unsatisfactory. You find yourself saying to the instruments, as Hamlet said to the players: Leave your thunder and your lightning. There is an elaborate anticipation and preparation; but when you ask when, in pity's name, is it coming, you learn to your dismay that the act has come and passed.

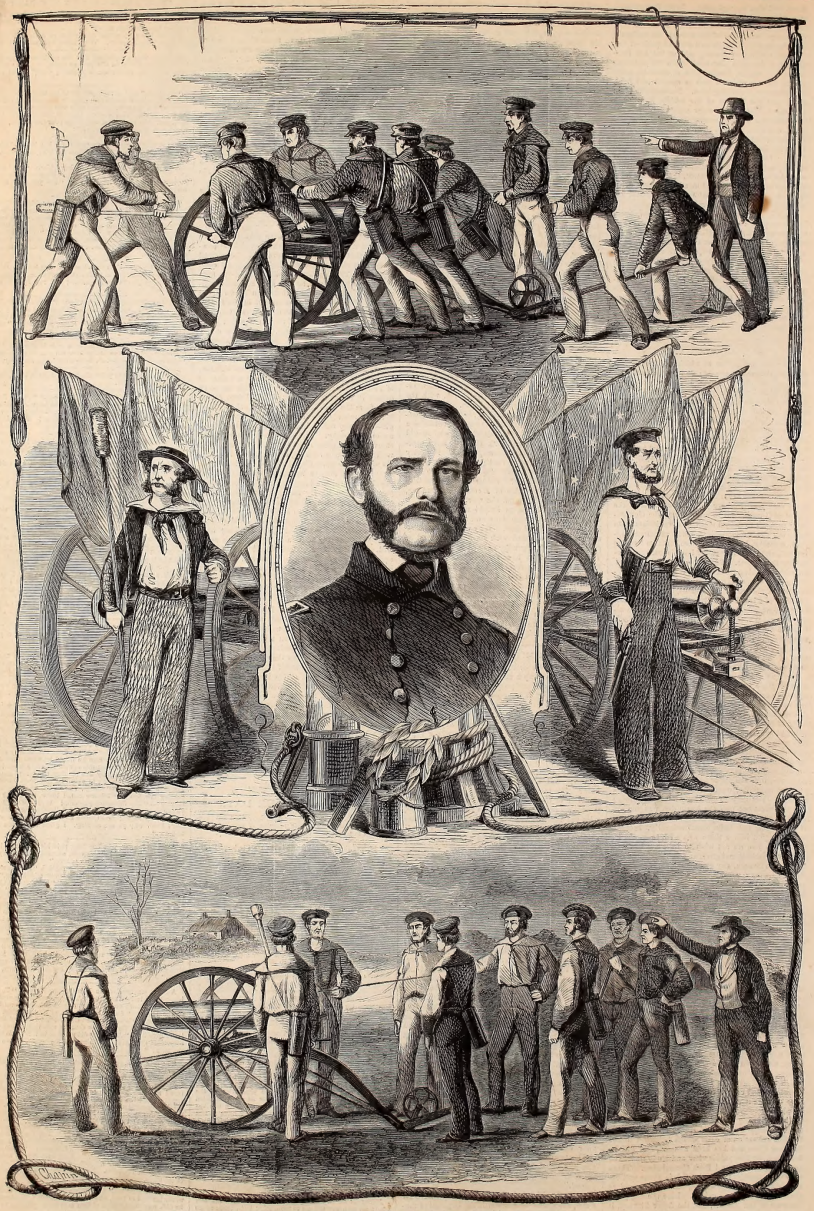
Still a Parisian judgment is only conclusive for Paris, after all. Meyerbeer is the imperative musical fashion in Paris, although he is a German. But, in general, Germany insists upon its own music so strongly that Paris rebels. Paris does not believe there can be a good German singer. "Mon Dieu! they don't know how to open their mouths!" Formes and Standigl, both made their names in London. Jenny Lind, knowing the Parisian jealousy, would never sing in the gay city. "Dear Sir," said she to a manager to the gay city, as we sit in the Opera Comique listening to Ugalde in L'Ambassadrice—and how smiling, and pretty, and fluent, and French it was!—"I think Jenny Lind knows too much to come to Paris: we should find her out!" This Lounger was fresh from Berlin, where he had just heard Jenny Lind in Fra Diavolo, and he replied with ardor, "But, my dear Sir, Jenny Lind despises Paris." The other Lounger smiled, as Cleopatra smiled when told that a poor Italian woman of the Nile had told her that she wouldn't be queen of Egypt. A Frenchman's idea of heaven is Paris, only more so.

So if Wagner has failed in Paris, there may be many reasons for the failure besides the music.

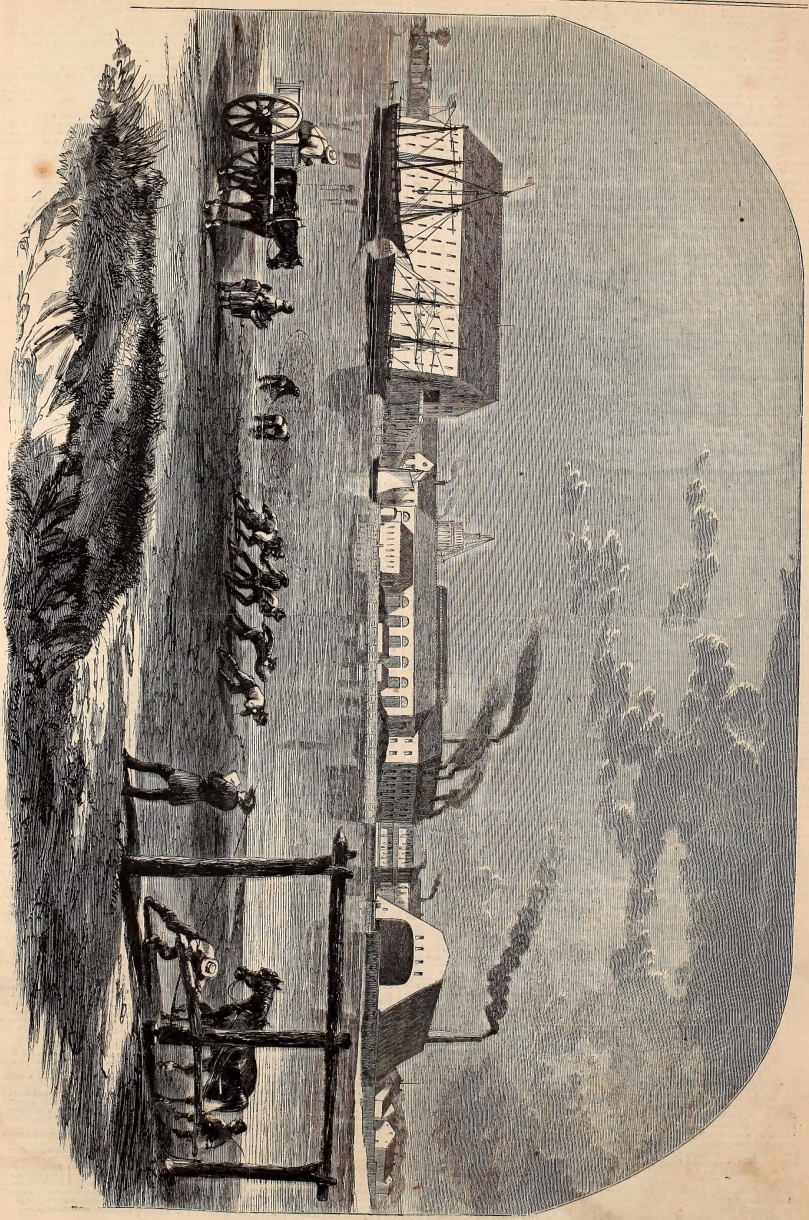
THE CALM CAVOUR.

WHEN the calm Cavour says that the Pope's temporal must be separated from his spiritual power, and that Rome must be the capital of united Italy, he is only saying what all dreams are coming true. The cautious Sardinian minister says nothing so bold until he has seen how his words have been made good. No one can be no doubt that we shall soon see another act in the Italian drama. The Pope, in his turn, protests. Cardinal Antonelli has issued such a pamphlet. The Bishop of Poictiers, in France, launches his mimic thunders at the Emperor. Austria threatens in Venetia; but Cavour, always moderate, wise, does not hesitate to raise his fatal hand and write Mene, mene upon the walls of the political Vatican.

It does not seem impossible that the most acute of Italian statesmen is of the inevitable course of events in his country. From the Alps to Taranto, from the Gulf of Venice to the Gulf of Genoa, is to be one and free. Then comes the great struggle—after the battle is fought comes the organization of victory. And it is often more trying than defeat to great causes; and a wise man may well tremble when his cause succeeds. But with the spirit which has accomplished the most ast



COMMANDER DAHLGREN, U.S.N., AND THE DAHLGREN GUN.—[FROM PHOTOGRAPHS.]—SEE PAGE 246.



THE WASHINGTON NAVY-YARD, WITH SHAD FISHERS IN THE FOREGROUND.—[See Page 246.]

COMMANDER DAHLGREN AND HIS GUNS.

In a recent number we published a picture of Captain Rodman's big Columbiad at Fort Monroe. We now publish on page 244 a series of pictures illustrating the Dahlgren gun, with a portrait of Commander Dahlgren.

This distinguished officer of the United States Navy is a native of Pennsylvania. He entered the service as a Midshipman in 1826, became a Lieutenant in 1837, and a Commander in 1855. For the last fifteen years he has been engaged at the Navy-yard at Washington in superintending the construction of artillery. The service owes to him, first, the heavy guns which bear his name, and also a very efficient armament for boats, consisting of 12 and 24-pound bronze howitzers of light pattern, which throw shells, shrapnel, and canister. Before his time boats were armed merely with shot guns, carronades, and land pieces, which were obviously unsuitable for service at sea. His vigilance and energy have now provided our boats with an admirable system of ordnance, and contributed not a little to the general efficiency of our naval gunnery.

The large Dahlgren guns with which our new steam frigates are armed are regarded as the most perfect models yet constructed. The weight of metal between the muzzle and the trunnions is reduced, and is placed about the breech, where most strength is required. In length, weight, and height the 8-inch Dahlgren does not differ materially from the 32-pounder. Its dimensions are as follows:

Length of bore	10 feet 3 inches.
Weight	63 cwt.
Ranges at 5°, 10°, 15°, with 9 pounds powder,	1°7

The navy 32-pounder sends a ball or shell 1930 yards, when fired at an elevation of 5° with nine pounds powder. The great 9 and 11-inch guns are still an experiment.

The fuse used in the Dahlgren howitzers was invented by Colonel Borman, of the Belgian Artillery. Our correspondent writes: "When the charge is to be placed in the gun, the time for explosion—from a quarter of a second to five seconds —can be calculated by cutting away the soft metal of which the cover to the fuse chamber is composed at the time, as marked upon the fuse. The discharge of the gun ignites the fuse, which, burning the time marked, reaches the chamber of grained powder, which explodes the thin covering between the bottom of the shell and explodes the whole. I have seen the Dahlgren howitzer discharged four times within twenty seconds. Each charged case contains eighty musket balls; this would give nearly a thousand balls per minute from a single piece—and then, too, the shell is exploded at will at any given point."

THE WASHINGTON NAVY-YARD.

We publish on page 215 a view of the Washington Navy-yard, showing the shed-dishers in the fore-ground pursuing their peaceful calling, and the engines of dread war in the whole back-ground of the picture.

The Washington Navy-yard lies on the north bank of the Anacostia, a branch of the Potomac, about one mile from the junction. The waters of this stream are of considerable width, and though the channel is very narrow, it has been practicable for the largest ships of war; but from neglect it is now so shoaled that vessels must only pass at high-water and with great care can vessels of 17 and 18 feet get to the navy-yard. This navy-yard was located very near the city itself, and being at the seat of Government, has been more used for building and fitting ships than its remoteness from the ocean might be supposed to make convenient. The Chesapeake was prepared here for sea in 1807, previous to her encounter with the Leopard. In 1814, when the British occupied Washington, a fine frigate, in process of building, and the Argus, 18, were burned to prevent their being taken. The Columbus, 74 (1819); frigates Potomac (1821), Brandywine (1825), and Columbia (1836); sloops-of-war St. Louis (1828), and St. Mary's (1844); schooners Grampus, Shark, and Dolphin; and the steam-frigate Minnesota (1855), were all built here.

The yard is best known, however, for its facilities in preparing supplies for the Navy of a peculiar description.

All the anchors and chain cables for the Navy are made here, and under the eye of that faithful old son of Vulcan, Mr. Tucker. This has been his province for nearly half a century, and though scarcely as active as he has been, he is yet to be seen, early and late, in the active performance of his business, and the full vigor of a green old age.

The range of buildings for the manufacture of steam-engines is perhaps unsurpassed in this country for its extent, convenience, and excellent machinery. Here was made the engine of the Minnesota; and if it sustains the same standard of work in future, the establishment need not fear competition in that line. Here, too, was cast the engine of the Richmond was executed, and now the machinists are busy putting up that of the Pensacola, a new design by Mr. Sickles. Here presides Mr. Bright, an able and industrious engineer, who was trained in the yard.

In the same buildings are manufactured all the bronze howitzers for the Navy, also supplies of various kinds, such as fuses and rockets, shrapnell, shell, etc., for the howitzers, caps and ammunition for the small-arms.

This is under the direction of Captain Dahlgren, by whom all the product establishments was designed and put into operation during the last ten or twelve years, except the Laboratory, which owes its existence to the late Mr. Coster, an accomplished pyrotechnist.

The several parts of this branch are the Mechanical Department, the Laboratory, the Gun Foundery, carriage-makers, etc.

One of the most important is the experimental Battery, where may be seen every model of artillery, new or old, rifled or smooth, and where have been first put into practice the important changes that are noticeable in the new steamers of the Navy.

The entire yard is under the command of Captain Buchanan, and its beautiful condition is not only creditable to his personal taste and industry, but is evidence that an officer so distinguished for his ability on board ship can be equally so in a yard. His many friends in the city will rejoice to record him in and out of his profession.

Here, too, in the extensive and excellent building and library of the Navy, as indeed of every other navy-yard in the United States, may be observed the results of able and faithful management by the several officers in charge of the Bureau of Yards and Docks—Commodore Jos. Smith—one of the few who have survived the perils of 1812, and the labors of continued service since that epoch. He played an active part in the stubborn fight on Lake Champlain, and now seems barely touched by the intervening period of half a century.

THE UNITED STATES FLEET OFF FORT PICKENS.

We publish on pages 248 and 249 a picture of the steam-frigate Powhatan now lying off Fort Pickens, at Florida. She is a vessel of 3765 tons, and besides the frigate Sabine, the sloop of war St. Louis, the steamers Crusader and Wyandot, and a supply ship. They lie about three miles off the shore, and form a beautiful picture as seen from Fort Pickens.

The following list will give the strength, and the names of the officers of the respective vessels:

FRIGATE "SABINE"—FIFTY GUNS.

Captain—Henry A. Adams. Lieutenant and Executive Officer—J. R. Mullany. Lieutenants—George F. Wyman, W. A. Murray, Robert B. Hitchcock. Surgeon—Antonio. Acting Master—Wm. F. McCann. Surgeon—M. D. Delaney. Assistant Surgeon—Edward C. Harrison. Paymaster—John F. Steele. First Lieutenant of Marines—Jos. Goldsborough Atkinson. Gunner—James M. Cooper. Carpenter—Wm. D. Jenkins. Sailmaker—Wm. Bowen. Acting Midshipmen—John Parker, Vol. Voorhees, Daniel Dunsmore, Wm. S. Roche, John Skinhead, J. R. Sweeney, Thomas Harvey. Captain's Clerk—B. H. Lane. Purser's Clerk—John M. Falk.

STEAM-SLOOP "BROOKLYN"—TWENTY-FIVE GUNS.

Captain—William Walker. Lieutenants—James A. Doyle, J. C. Williamson, Henry W. Lamdin, Charles Jeffers, William Mitchell, H. A. Adams. Surgeon—Lewis Minor. Paymaster—Charles H. Lanier. Assistant Surgeons—T. W. Leach, M. P. Christian. Lieutenant of Marines—Commander Reid. Gunner—John Lamb. Carpenter—Wm. B. Brooks, Marshall P. Jordan, James W. Whitaker. Acting Sailmaker—A. Meyer, Jun., John K. Neill.

SLOOP "ST. LOUIS"—TWENTY GUNS.

Captain—Charles H. Poor. Executive Officer—Lieutenant J. D. Todd. Lieutenants—W. W. Low, M. P. Jones, G. B. Balch, Edward Barrett. Acting Master—Paymaster—G. T. Pierce. Assistant Surgeon—J. O. Thrall. Marine Officer—Lieutenant H. L. Graham. Boatswain—P. A. Chasen. Gunner—J. W. Searle. Carpenter—Thomas E. Dunning. Sailmaker—D. Wikeman. Clerks—Captain's, W. Gordon; Paymaster's, W. Shubrick.

STEAMER "CRUSADER"—EIGHT GUNS.

Lieutenant Commanding—T. A. M. Craven. Lieutenants—J. M. Duncan, J. E. Jewett, and A. E. K. Benham. Third Assistant Engineers—J. B. Greenough. Master—Rush R. Wallace. Engineers—First Assistant, A. Gerdt; Third Assistants, L. Campbell, O. R. Lockey, and J. D. Lining.

STEAMER "WYANDOT"—FIVE GUNS.

Lieutenant Commanding—Abner Read. Lieutenants—J. R. Eggleston, J. M. Stribling. Assistant Surgeon—Algernon S. Garnett. Engineers—First Assistant, W. H. Shock; Third Assistants, M. H. Plunkett, K. Wilson. Purser—Emery J. Brooks.

STORE-SHIP "SUPPLY"—TWO GUNS.

Captain—Alexander Gibson. Lieutenants—C. H. B. Caldwell, James S. Maxwell, Alfred Hopkins. Master—J. Bowen. Surgeon—A. W. Smith. Paymaster—E. W. Dutch. Clerks—Captain's, John Van Dyke; Paymaster's, A. C. Hoxie.

THE DEPARTURE OF THE "ATLANTIC" AND "BALTIC" WITH TROOPS.

On Saturday, April 6, the Atlantic sailed under sealed orders, with several hundred United States troops and military stores on board; and on Monday following the Baltic also sailed with the like freight. We give on page 245 a couple of pictures illustrating the shipment of military stores, etc., on board these vessels. The Herald reporter thus describes the scene:

ON BOARD

the ship every thing betokened the mission on which she was bound. Her decks were piled high with that equipage of war; the decks were covered with loose plank, around the sides of the vessel were piled boxes of all practicable cubic, while piled up for future disposition were boxes of shell and other warlike implements, among which were the different pieces of artillery belonging to each of the gillery. The upper deck, at the bow, was devoted to the service of cattle for the use of the troops that were to be received on board. These were constructed with regard both to strength and convenience. The cattle pens were very carefully padded, so as to secure the animals from injury during the journey. Eighty of these pens were constructed, completely filling up the front part of the vessel. Every passage was supplied with a guard to all practicable to secure the comfort of the animals.

The sleeping accommodations for soldiers are little better than the horse-stalls—rough boards carelessly nailed together and the bedding on which the men are to stretch themselves, and more than stretch themselves they can't, there being very close quarters for one, when two are intended to be put. It is intended that each of these stalls shall hold three men, and as they are very narrow, very high, and packed together as close as it is possible to do so, they will be able to get a good night's rest in a very small space. The cabin, state-rooms, and other portions of the vessel remain unchanged.

In the fore-part of the hold an immense quantity of provisions are stored—flour, meats, hogs, barrels, and parcels are carefully stored away, and there is little fear of their provisions falling short, at least for some time; the rest of the hold is filled with the guns, carriages, forges, and stores that may be needed at whatever place the army may land.

THE EMBARKATION

of the troops and stores was conducted in the usual military style. Some curiosity was manifested as to how so many horses (seventy-eight) were to be got on board, as the steamer was lying several feet to the dock, but the presence of two strongly-built stalls soon explained that. The horse was quietly placed in one of the stalls, and almost before he had time to know where he was, the stalls-sending carpenters had placed him with his companions on board the ship. The time employed in putting all the animals on board vessels was incredibly short, only a few moments being given to each. The guns and their heavy carriages were also stowed away quickly, and the baggage next received the proper attention.

The sailing-ship Le Roy, a large three-o'clock came alongside; her deck was densely crowded with soldiers from Fort Hamilton, and there was some little delay in getting them on board the larger vessel. They presented a strange sight, with their knapsacks, water-bottles, cans, and other accoutrements. They are nearly all young men—fine, healthy young fellows, and full of spirit.

THE SAILING OF THE "BALTIC."

The work of shipping stores on the Baltic was proceeded with with unusual vigor during the whole of Sunday night and yesterday, until the last moment of departure. The stalwart shipped enthusiastic enthusiastic cheers, and waving hats, and farewell cheers, and for some time, a large number of gunny bags were in the like. These gunny bags possess a warlike character, inasmuch as they are used in throwing up redoubts, and are also very serviceable in protecting a boat's crew in approaching a fortress.

Among the commodities shipped was a remarkable quantity of spirituous liquors in kegs, the labels attached to which were oftentimes rather ludicrous, especially such as the following: "A present from Washington."

During the afternoon the workmen were principally engaged in shipping provisions and ammunition on board the Baltic. A number of Bengalese lights were also shipped. Several fine horses, the property of R. L. Maloy, T. W. Smith, and Cattin came to the dock with 500 troops. The R. L. Maloy placed them on board Governeur's island, and board the Baltic, after which the steamship moved slowly out from the dock, and down the river, then turned around, and gaining the middle of the river, turned toward the Bay and went out to sea. The steamer had the Normans at noon, accompanied by the steam-tug Fanders, which has been chartered by the Government.

YE KNYGHTE, YE SQUIRE, AND YE LADYE.

A METRICAL ROMANCE OF THE MIDDLE AGES.

SIR WALTER DE GREY was a gallant young knight
As ever was seen at a feast or a fight—
Had fired all the battle-fields over the land,
Were it blood to be spilled or good wine to be poured.
He had robbed with six sword-strokes bestowed on his crust—
Twice that number of pints might he stowed 'neath his vest.

And little the marvel that Walter was tough,
For the life of a reiver in that day was rough.
The most of his time in the saddle was spent,
Or, when arms tired his arms, he retired to a tent,
Or lay in the forest intrenched in rude fort,
A blow upon which was precursor of blows!
Of a south his armed heels he might proudly display,
For he won them their spurs upon Arcadian's day.
Though then but a squire, he so wrought in the fight
That Richard at bed-time said, "Walter, good knight!"
He had charged on Count Adolphus, without fears,
And had raised such a din about Saladin's ears,
That the fee to their Prophet cried, "Shield us, we pray
From the old devil, black and this young devil Grey!"

Sir Walter, of course, was a favorite with dames—
The seamen most always, and sure nobody blames;
But certain it is that bright plumes and bright swords
Have made bright eyes forget both the Lord and their words
And that down 'tis day there is nothing that charms
Like a gent "dight complete in good 'man at arms."

To tell truth of my knight, our Good Lady above
Came in for a very small share of his love;
If he knelt at her shrine 'twas more than I know,
But I'll vouch that he knelt him to many below;
He'd been saddle-mate, and was ever at least,
And their love—like their lances—but seldom knew rest.

Sir Walter for squire had as merry a knave
As ever had helmet of brass on his glaive.
Stout John was the man a young master to aid,
And a rover, or squire, or knight's body-guard made.
He had rolled the steps of an optician knight
Who sought to restore the old Squalchre's site,
Yet I grieve to say never gave it from loss—
They were crossed in their efforts by foes of the Cross!
But I can say nothing of merry-squire and spur
Where my good John had been—nor can you where he'd not!

Well!
As the knight and his squire scoured the country one day,
In quest of some straggler to succor or slay,
They espied a fair castle—the evening was nigh,
And our heroes were weary, and hungry, and—dry.
Quoth Sir Walter, "That will seat for the move of the night's night!"
So they spurred on like men decision and tact,
On the spur of the moment, determined to act,
Till they came to the gates—not a soul was exposed,
And the portcullis down, and the drawbridge closed;
But a horn hung outside—they had never heard toll
In that quaint Middle Age of a door with a bell;
Quoth John, "Let me!" and his traveler is wearied and worn,
He was he encountered for taking a horn!"
So he put to his lips, and he wound such a blast
That the church-yards all round thought that day was the last;
And a Gambler who long had lain still as a dump
Sprang up and demanded "Who was the trump."
While the Baron inside swore he hadn't a doubt
That his man were a devil, and "Bring him out!"
And the old warder sprang to unfasten his chains,
Lest the parties outside should blow out their brains.
A "you mock!" said the greybeard, as John entered through,
"More noise with one horn than the Fool Fiend with two!"

Inside of the castle was feasting and cheer—
It was wassail and wine, beef, brandy, and beer—
But the revelers ceased when the Baron arose:
"Fair Sirs, if it please, ere we go to repose
A few strokes of the harp my daughter shall play."
"We attend the fair harpist," said Walter de Grey.

Don't tremble, good reader, I mean not to tell
Of the beauties and charms of the fair Isabel;
For Sir Walter that night bored the poor sleepy John
With such tales of these witches that, when he had done,
The squire spoke him, briefly: "I see, though too late,
This casting was wrong—it will end in a mate."

That night my poor knight very little sleep knew,
And he woke up his squire ere the cock fairly crew.
"God save us!" cried John, "have this young demon's charms Turned thy head, that thus early we take to arms?"
Quoth the knight, "Save thy jokes, for they please
Me not half so well:
We fell on this castle—you wot what befell.
Unhelmed and unbarred, on my knees and in need,
I have called on my squire—shall I see him no more?"
"Nay, nay," said stout John: "and no cattle shall Say the squire leaves the knight till the knight leaves his squire.
You shall mount, and I'll make you quite rich in a trice
With the coin that rich men give to poor—good advice.
If you're saddled by love, and the boy's bridal rein
Binds you closely to cheek, it is useless to strain,
And fret, and grow restive, and, toss from the arena,
And take the field fair like a courser, of course."
"Alas! my squire's sagacity," said Sir Walter de Grey,
"I've heard horses whinny and dislike cry neigh."
Quoth John, "I have ridden beside thee in fight,
And each deed was indeed like a gallant Sir Knight;
Upon bombards we've charged in the far sunny South—
And was blench from the face of a fair lady's mouth?"

Sir Walter was silent, but soon he arose,
And in dressing that morning he donned his best clothes.
Perhaps I am wrong, but I've noticed this much:
When young men to their dress give artistical touch,
The think of the maidens as cloudy in the sky—
You may know that a wedding or funeral is nigh.
Well, Sir Walter had morning threw armor afar,
And instead of his fashion he wore a gallant
In the garden below soon a thinking was heard,
And the Baron, who roamed, damned an innocent bird.

I remember that once some young ladies next door
Had a warbling bird hanging out in front—
And they opened their window and flung out bouquets
On the brazen young ass who'd woke me with his Lays;
But I wander—I will, had he come beneath ours,
Have flung out some favors more weighty than flowers,
But tastes don't agree—to return to my theme,
I'll tell you the words that broke Isabel's dream.

THE KNIGHT'S SONG.

Oh, Lady, leave thy slumber new,
For birds their matins trill,
The gems of night shun Morning's brow:
Come down my Isabel!

The rose is breathing its sweet penyer,
And every lily-bell
Is ringing fragrance on the air:
Come down my Isabel!

And I have found an angel's tear—
This dew on the daisy,
To mirror back thy beauty clear:
Come down my Isabel!

I bent above a blushing flower,
And found the queen of the chalice
To bring the brightest to her bower:
Come down my Isabel!

The stars swing silent in the sky,
So doth the zephyr's swing,
It scarce can drown a lover's sigh:
Come down my Isabel!

The lady came down, the knight knelt in the dew,
What he said as he knelt there is nothing to you:
The set was imprudent, he spoiled his guitar,
And wounded to death a whole wilk a shrieking catarrh.

When Sir Walter and John after breakfast had met,
John never stirred out while the gram-pint was wet:
"Tell me now," said the squire, "have we gleanings!"
"Not a grain."

One would say by the face "twas a very dark knight."
And also by voice, for it was rough, and like thunder.
As the bell's that is tolled to tell tidings of woe:
"Alas for my love, and alas for its grief,
And alas for my lady, her fairness—the thief!
To the musty old church his fair daughter has given,
And to-morrow the knight will be wedded to Heaven!"

Loud laughed the stout squire, "If this blade good and knight,
I will swear she had rather be wed to a knight!"

"One hope," said Sir Walter, "one only remains,
And that hope my good squire must render its chains."
So they sought out the Baron, they found him at play
With two kittens—his fellows were tender, you'll say—
Sir Walter spoke deftly, "Thy daughter is fair
As the brow of the morning and pure as a prayer,
Through the land such hand can no lady be found."

The Baron called "puss" and he looked on the ground:
"What's this," whispered Walter, "why calls he the cat?"
"I opine," said the squire, "that he smelleth a rat!"

The Baron then spoke. "In his young knightly days
He'd been given," he said, "to some weak, wicked ways—
Such as sacking of churches and burning of priests,
And robbing the widows of their beautiful tresses:
But long since of his sins he repented sincere—
For the gifts of the Church he restored the whole lot—
And he'd deeded away both his castle and child,
To atone for the wrongs he in young blood ran wild,
And the abbot had promised that church bells should toll,
And
"If mass" he said for his soul;
And he hinted that now, since the day was well through,
The knight should go on, and he wished him a-dew!"

"By my soul," cried the squire, "what a villainous shame
It is meet that we met this poor innocent lamb!
How next shall we meet, ere we go, to rue your game?"
"Alas," said Sir Walter, "I fear to my shame
We must call it a draw!" "Nay," said John, "that were green,
Put a check on his Bishop and capture the Queen."

There was bustle next morning the castle about,
It was bustle within and more bustle without.
For, in cowl and in surplice, on foot and on horse,
The monks and the priests had turned out in such force,
That a perfect procession was formed the Baron arose:
"No Bishop before dragged behind such a train!"
All was pomp and display: Isabel was to go
As a bride to a convent—conventionally so—

For I've told you before that her heart and her hand,
With their aching and ache, and some acres of land,
Had been pledged to a groom of exceeding great worth,
But sensitively distant just then from the earth;
So the Bishop himself had consented to ride
At the bride's bridlerein, and to bridle the bride.

Good sooth, there was bustle enough on that morn:
You'd have thought by the clamor a Bedlam was born!
But the noise and confusion were doubled, I ween,
When Dame Margy cried that her young miss she missed.

The Bishop first spoke: "By the altar and pyx,
What spawn of the fiend has left us in this fix?
Steal a bride from the altar! a curse on his soul,
As sure as I've thought he had stolen my stole!"

One wag of a monk said that all had gone right,
"For the bridegroom had come like a thief in the night;"
But this joke of the clerks on such barren ground fell:
Thus the laugh was Amelus was sent to hell.

The old Baron swore by his beels and his head,
And his heart and his hair, and by every thing red:
And his blustered oath in oaths with him desperate flew;
That he shocked a poor innocent priest from his horse,
Even strangers, who know not his title and place,
Would have said by his speech he was bred at the Bar.

The Abbot he cursed—and the Abbot cursed well—
In the orthodox way, by bell, candle, and bell;
He uncorked several vials of desperate wrath,
And poured the contents on the fugitives' path.

But the curses and oaths—blessings they turned as fast
As bolts from the bow, or as leaves on the blast—
Could not catch the three sideways—John on his bay,
The knight on a roan, Isabel with her Grey!
And cooling long since they have hardened to stone.
Which yet block that road to the peril of bones.

MORALE.

Each tale has a purpose—the reader may use
This story or none for what purpose he chooses—
Draw what point he pleases from the points of my pen;
But one point I must point at all beedless young men:

If you fall into love first try hard to fall out,
If the pit be too deep don't go dawdling about,
Pop the question at once like a ball from a bow,
For the maid may say yes ere her father can "no;"
Or, should she refuse, don't write verses or die,
But ask her again, and be steady-by,
If engaged to another, to weaken the links
Just praise up your rival, but blind her to drinks;
If she's gone to get married, put on your best clothes—
She may alter her mind at the altar—who knows?
Though the knot has been tied, do not give up the prize,
But ask her to have you when that husband dies,
For love is like cannon—balls fetched round the same—
If once more is left you may yet win the game!

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE ALARM AT CHARLESTON.

On 8th inst. Lieutenant Talbot arrived at Charleston from Washington. He had a conference with Governor Pickens and General Beauregard, but was not allowed to communicate with Major Anderson at Fort Sumter. Lieutenant Talbot started back for Washington on 9th. It is understood that the purport of his conference with Governor Pickens and General Beauregard was to obtain permission to send unarmed steamers with provisions to Fort Sumter. Permission was refused.

It is stated that Lieutenant Talbot then communicated to Governor Pickens the intelligence that supplies would be sent to Major Anderson peaceably if they could, forcibly if they must. Immense preparations were immediately commenced outside to the emergency. Orders were issued to the entire military force of the city, held in reserve, to proceed to their stations without delay.

THE MIDNIGHT PANIC.

At midnight the community was thrown into a fever of excitement by the discharge of rockets from Citadel Square, the signal for the assembling of all the reserves ten minutes after. Hundreds of men left their beds hurrying to and fro toward their respective destinations. In the absence of sufficient armories, at the corners of the streets, engine houses, and other stores were opened, lanterns were formed, and all night the long roll of the drum and the clash of troops of the militia and city police in the cavalry pelmoding through the city betokened the close proximity of the approaching conflict. The Home Guard corps of old gentlemen, who occupy the position of military reserve, took through the city, escorting the soldiers, and doing other duty required by the moment. Hundreds of the citizens were all night, and a little thunderstorm prevailed until a late hour. The Seventeenth Regiment, 600 strong, paraded at 4 A.M. and had not left for the fortifications early in the morning.

REINFORCEMENTS FROM THE COUNTRY.

The regiments of a thousand men each were telegraphed for from the country. One of these, from Kershaw District, under command of Colonel Davis, was forwarded in the understanding not to be called out until the fight was positively in sight. Dr. Gibbs, Surgeon-General, was ordered to prepare ambulances, and make every provision for the wounded. All night long the streets were crowded, the sidewalks system and discipline with which the State is prepared for this exigency.

PREPARATIONS FOR THE FIGHT.

On 9th, the floating battery, finished, mounted, and manned, was taken out of the dock and anchored in the very mid Sullivan's Island. All vessels in the harbor received a notification from General Beauregard to be ready at the word of fire between Fort Sumter and Sullivan's Island, on which Fort Moultrie is situated. As a further measure, a steamer was situated near one of the batteries erected against the fort, supposed probably to interfere with its delivery of provisions, by the Charleston telegraphs state: Senator Wigfall, of Texas, and Lieutenant Wigfall, of Virginia (formerly several years of age), shouldered muskets and joined the army as privates. Numbers of old men have done the same. The people are anxious to fight, and may be seen riding with the cavalry.

About 1000 troops were sent to the fortifications on 9th, Wednesday, Sullivan's Island, Morris Island, Cummings, and Boyleston, have received appointments in General Beauregard's staff as Aids. Governor of the convention of Convention, after adjournment, volunteered as privates. About 7000 troops are now at the fortifications.

MAJOR ANDERSON SUMMONED TO SURRENDER.

At noon on 11th Major Anderson was formally summoned, by General Beauregard, the commander of the secession forces, to surrender Fort Sumter. Major Anderson declined to surrender, alleging that such a course would be incompatible with his duty to the government. The people of Charleston were intensely excited on the receipt of the demand to surrender the Fort. They ran to and housetops, and all the places from whence a view of the harbor could be had. Ladies thronged with men and women eager to witness the conflict, which was expected momentarily to begin. No battle shot, however, was fired on either side. But later in the day negotiations were resumed between the commissioners, and pending their conclusion hostilities have of course been postponed. The Federal fleet had not made its appearance off Charleston at last accounts.

The non-arrival of the squadron off Charleston is doubtless due to the heavy gale that has prevailed along the southern coast for the past three days. The gale from was so severe that a large number of vessels, including several steamers, were obliged to take refuge in Hampton Roads.

BEGINNING OF THE WAR.

On Friday, 12th, at 27 minutes past 4 A.M., General Beauregard, in accordance with instructions received on Wednesday from the Secretary of War of the Southern Confederacy, opened fire upon Fort Sumter. Forts Johnson and Moultrie, the iron battery at Sullivan's Island, and the Stevens Floating Battery, kept up an active cannonade during the entire day, and probably during the past night. The damage done to Fort Sumter is stated by the Charleston papers to have been considerable. Gone had been dismounted, and a part of the parapet swept away.

Major Anderson had replied vigorously to the fire which had been opened upon him, but the casualties which had represent the injury inflicted by him to have been but small. The united battery had been exhibited on both sides, and a large portion of the Charleston population, including few ladies, had congregated on the south battery to witness the conflict.

Down to our latest advices, the battle had been carried on solely by the batteries of the revolutionists and Fort Sumter. The Federal fleet, consisting of the Pawnee, Pocahontas, and another United States vessel, were said to be off the harbor, but had taken no part in the conflict. The Harriet Lane is said to have received a shot through her wheel-house.

The opinion prevailed in Charleston that an attempt would be made during the night to reinforce Fort Sumter by means of small boats from the three vessels seen in the offing.

No one had been killed by the fire of Major Anderson, and the casualties among the Confederate troops in the batteries were confined to a few. There was, however, no account of the loss, if any, among the garrison of Fort Sumter.

THE ATTACK SUSPENDED BY SURRENDER.

A telegraphic correspondence between the Montgomery War Department and General Beauregard, before the commencement of hostilities, had been peaceably. On April 8 General Beauregard telegraphed that a messenger from President Lincoln had informed him that provisions would be sent to Fort Sumter—peaceably if possible, forcibly if necessary. On April 9 the Secretary of War replied, on April 10, instructing General Beauregard to demand the immediate evacuation of the fort, and if this was refused, to proceed to attack the fort in the way he thought best. This latter dispatch was received and communicated by General Beauregard, and Major Anderson replied, on April 11, "At 3 o'clock this afternoon I will open fire, the sense of honor and my obligations to my Government prevent my compliance with your demand." The attack was then made, but it was not better us to pieces, we will be carried on to Montgomery, the Secretary of War telegraphed back that if Major Anderson would state definitely the time when he evacuate the fort, it should not be bombarded. To this Anderson would not consent, and upon the receipt of this intelligence the latest of these dispatches, that from General Beauregard to the Secretary of War, bears date April 13, and we suppose that the fort is a few hours after it was sent to Montgomery.

SECESSION OF ARIZONA.

Accounts from Mexico state that the citizens of Arizona, in convention at Mesilla, have voted that Terry Jury out of the Union.

THE GOVERNMENT'S ANSWER TO THE SOUTHERN COMMISSIONERS.

The Southern Commissioners left on Washington on 9th received from the State Department a reply to their note, seeking to initiate negotiations for the withdrawal of the seceded States from the Union, and a surrender to them of forts of the Government within the limits of those States. Several of course declines to receive them in their official capacity, but consented to receive them as individuals, published gentlemen, and declares the intention of the Government to defend its forts and property.

The Southern Commissioners to Washington on 11th left the Department of State, and proceeded to the office of Mr. Seward rejecting their offer to treat with reference to the troubles of the nation. They intend to remain in Washington, and have instructed the Secretary to report to the Confederate States Government.

THE LOAN.

The bids for five million dollars of Treasury notes were opened at Washington on 11th. The entire amount was taken at par for the loan. There were over $8,000,000 more offered than was called for.

NAVAL MOVEMENTS.

The Atlantic was chartered by the Government, and sailed on 6th with troops and munitions of war. The Baltic and Arctic sailed on 6th for Liverpool. Freight. Orders were issued on same day by the Navy Department that the Cumberland, Sabine, Constellation, Pawnee, Pocahontas, and the Jamestown, at Philadelphia, fitted for active service with all possible dispatch. The Powhatan sailed from Norfolk at 6 P.M. on Tuesday, bound South. She was said to be under the command of Lieutenant of the Charleston Navy-yard (at Boston, Massachusetts). Over 600 seamen and marines, with the Sixth Regiment, ready for sea, and waiting for her crew. The steam-frig- ate Minnesota, Captain Gerdon, sailed on the same day. Comodore Stringham is expected to arrive early in the week to assume command of all vessels, and to be active, and there are frequent discharges of men, only two hundred from Hudson's Navy-yard. The United States steamer Water Witch has gone into commission, and sails during the week. Her destination is unknown. Her crew consists of 150 men and officers.

PRESIDENT DAVIS GOING TO CHARLESTON.

Dispatches received from Montgomery state that President Davis left there on Monday last, 15th, en route to Charleston, being satisfied that Fort Sumter was to be the great strategic point of the struggle, and that it would be the power of the Confederate States Government to maintain itself. He said that Sumter deceased to be taken or to be ground.

REMOVED TROUBLE AT WASHINGTON.

The Government has come into possession of such definite information as to warrant them in acting, and on Tuesday, 16th, issued orders to remove about one-fourth of the militia of the District of Columbia, were ordered into service for the purpose of undergoing a rigid inspection. Major Ben. McCulloch, who has recently been a thriving business in Washington City, Maryland, and was left the former place on Tuesday with the expressed intention of joining the Texas Rangers, now in the field in the of the contemplated movement—the Texas "journey" be-

The Virginia Convention, on 16th, by a vote of 88 to 55, passed a resolution declaring that the Federal authorities have no power to deal with the subject of secession in any way, was voted down—114 to 15. A resolution was adopted—108 to 20—declaring that the Convention was willing that Virginia should be made to be resorted as independent Powers. An amendment declaring that in the event of a peaceful adjustment, the Constitution being rejected by the Non-Slaveholding States Virginia will secede, was voted down—89 to 74. On 17th, the twelfth and thirteenth of the pending resolutions were adopted. They oppose all Federal action for holding or retaking the forts in the seceded States, and declare that any action on the part of the United States Government or Confederate States tending to produce a collision pending the efforts for an adjustment of difficulties will be regarded as leaving them free to determine their own future policy.

THE LATEST FROM PORT PICKENS.

Lieutenant Slemmer has found means of communicating with the Government, and the surveillance exercised by the investing army. He explains why the troops were withdrawn from Brooklyn, conformably to the orders issued by the War Department some weeks ago. According to his view Fort Pickens can withstand any assault which may be made by the force now assembled there, by any which is likely to be collected by Jefferson Davis. He has provisions enough, and has declared that while he maintain his position and defend himself, without drawing a single additional man from the disposal in the other war. In case of an attack, which is not feared, notwithstanding the demonstrative display, the troops could be landed at a signal, just as easily as at this time. The intelligence was received by telegraph.

AFFAIRS AT KEY WEST.

The Brooklyn has returned from her trip to Key West and the Gulf, and has rejoined the other vessels of the fleet with various necessaries. The Commander of Fort Taylor, at Key West, had completed the installation of that place to haul down all their Confederate State flags, with a polite intimation that two different nationalities could not rule in the place.

THE TROOPS IN TEXAS.

Another of the Commanders in Texas is being away the United States troops—the steamer Coatzacoalcos—which left Indianola on 6th, left here on the 10th of March, and arrived at Pass Cabello Bar on the 21st. She was detained by the bar until the 26th, reached at Key West on the 4th inst., where she loaded two companies of infantry. Being unable to get coal there, she left for Havana, whence she sailed on the 5th. She brings one company of infantry and six of cavalry, number of the latter having been mounted and immediately sent to Washington. The troops left in Texas, numbering about two thousand, are said to be in good health, and abundantly supplied with provisions: and in view of recent events in Texas, the Secretary of War's policy in withdrawing will be removed.

MESSAGE OF THE GOVERNOR OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Governor Curtin, of Pennsylvania, on 10th, sent to the Legislature of that State a special message relative to national affairs, recommending the appropriation of half a million dollars for the proper military organization of the State. He also recommended the passage of a militia law known at the Capitol, and other modifications of the Militia law, by which the militia may be in the most complete state of readiness for any emergency which may arise. Governor Curtin declares, incidentally, that he has received a letter from President Lincoln, in which he states that he has information of a design to attack Washington.

THE MASSACHUSETTS LEGISLATURE.

The Massachusetts Legislature adjourned on 11th sine die. During the session it has authorized the Governor to increase the number of the volunteer militia and to purchase arms. It has also settled the long disputed boundary question between the State and Rhode Island, and has incorporated the Boston and Hoosac Tunnel and Western Railroad to Newport. These are its principal enactments.

SHOCKING MURDER.

We learn from the Louisville Times that an inhuman wretch, in an adjoining county to Washington, deliberately murdered his child. The child is but six years old, and of course having left it to be home after his father had gone to work in the field. When he left, while the father secreted himself in the woods near by, telling the boy before this, that he would return and accompany him home. He, to approach her from behind and secret her clothes on fire, which he did, and before she was aware her clothes were all burning. She then ran to him for aid, and of course burning her to death. The fiend does not state that the inhuman deed has been arrested.

PERSONAL.

The Legislature of Kansas has chosen as United States Senators Messrs. Pomeroy, Republican, and James H. Lane.

General Sumner has gone to take charge of the Pacific division, thus superseding General Johnston, who has been relieved at his own request. He is a kinsman of Mr. Floyd. Unpleasant reports have reached here of late of a disgraceful affair in the Navy-yard, and of certain conduct once carried on between high officers and Jefferson Davis. Such reports, however, are not to be credited. The affair committed suicide on the 8th inst. at a drinking saloon, by swallowing laudanum. Naternity of good abilities, having had every advantage which wealth could furnish, he started in life under favorable circumstances. He was but thirty-five years old.

The correspondent of the St. Louis Republican says that there is a Revolutionary soldier now living at Ironton, Iron County, Missouri, named Captain John Cox. He is old here in the county, and was a few months since enjoying good health. The old man relates with much interest the manner in which he came to be passed through in those times that 'tried men's souls.'"

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

LORD PALMERSTON ON OUR CRISIS.

The election of a member for Tiverton, in the room of Lord Palmerston, who had accepted the office of Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, took place on the 28th ult. Lord Palmerston offered himself for re-election, and was returned without opposition.

Lord Palmerston, in returning his thanks, after alluding to the condition of affairs in America, said:

"There is but one spot in the political horizon the contemplation of which must inspire us with regret and uneasiness. I allude to circumstances which are now taking place among our cousins in North America, leading to a contest which, whatever may be its immediate issue, is not for us to judge between the contending parties. It is not for us to express a wish to be whether successes ought to be made by which the Union may be maintained, or whether it is better for the future interests of that they should separate, and form respectively different associations and confederations. But this is the first great secessions and confederations that ever took place among civilized nations, and the fact that it is our cordial wish that, whatever may be the opinion we may entertain of the issue of the struggle, that result may be brought about by amicable adjustments, and that the world may be spared from the calamities attendant of seeing brothers arming against brothers, and parents against children, and that great state of society which happens which has hitherto been the admiration of mankind should be changed into a condition of things which is the scene of peace and industry polluted by the effusion of blood."

THE FIRST STREET-RAILWAY IN LONDON.

Mr. Train's first piece of street-railway in London was opened on the 23d of March, and he celebrated the event with a banquet, at which he delivered one of his characteristic speeches.

FRANCE.

SPEECH OF THE EMPEROR.

Napoleon addressed the following to the Corps Legislatif on the 23d ult. In returning thanks he said:

"I thank the Corps Legislatif for the sentiments which it expresses toward me, and for the confidence which it places in me. If that confidence honors me and flatters me, I think I deserve it from my constant solicitude of only looking upon questions in a point of view of the real interests of France.

"To love well the age, to preserve of the past all that is good, to prepare the future by sweeping off the path of civilization all the prejudices which obstruct it, or octopus which compromise it—that is how we shall beposed calm and prosperous days to our children.

"Despite the universal love of pacification, I by no means regret to see the great bodies of the State discuss the difficult questions of foreign policy. The country benefits from it in many respects. These discussions instruct it and enlighten it.

"I shall be always happy, believe me, to act in concert with you. Coming from the free suffrage, backed by the same sentiments, let us unite by id each other in proclaiming the grandeur and power of France.

The speech was received with enthusiastic cheering, but it is generally regarded as unsatisfactory.

ATTEMPT TO ASSASSINATE HIM.

The Paris correspondent of the New York Times says: "The news to-day at the Bourse of Napoleon's escape, at the head of a secret society having for its object the assassination of the Emperor, quite took Paris by surprise. The day of such enterprises, people had thought, was past. The abolition of the Imperial Guard, and the reduction of the army to Italy, were understood, and, in their view of the case, logical. But an attempt on His Majesty's life today, and by a Republican, is both illogical and insane. The Republican party has never had any support for resistance to a Regency, and the Legitimists are powerless and are declined to remain so. So good could therefore result from such an event, even if it had nearly the success with to serve. Blanqui and his accomplices will be 'consigned' in the penal colony."

ITALY.

THE ITALIAN PARLIAMENT.

Count Cavour has announced to the Italian Chamber of Deputies, that the relations between Austria remain unchanged. In a speech on the Roman question he claimed that Rome must be the capital of United Italy, and that she must go there with the consent of France. He said that the Italians would not go to Rome without power was the source of evil.

The discussion of the Roman question continued in the Italian Chamber of Deputies. The speakers generally advocated the removal of the capital to Rome, and condemned power. Several speakers on the left proposed the simple declaration that the Chamber was ready to vote the ceding up Napoleon to withdraw his troops.

Signor Cheves spoke on the transfer of the capital of the Kingdom of Italy to Rome.

Signor Ricasoli opposed the arguments brought forward. He maintained that it was urgent that Rome should be immediately occupied by the armies of Italy. This would take place in consequence of the law adopted by the Chamber relative to the disturbances in the States of the Church by law. We offer the spiritual power of the Pope all guarantees for the exercise of moral influence. The Italian Government can ever give to the Papacy. I hope public opinion will soon be disposed to accept this organization, and that France will agree with us in the matter.

RUSSIA.

THE EMANCIPATION MANIFESTO.

We have now before us the text of the manifesto of the Czar, announcing to his subjects the emancipation of the serfs. His Majesty tells them that on ascending the throne he resolved to do away with the evil of serfdom, and the judgments of their rank and condition—"from the warrior who nobly performed his military duty to the humble artisan who labored for the public good." He then declares that the spiritual relations which have hitherto existed between the lords and peasants remain intact, and that the full majesty of manners has disappeared, the condition of the serfs has unfavorably changed. It is, he has announced, therefore, that a great amelioration of their lot was a mission to which he was called by Divine Providence. The steps which have been taken in consulting the nobility, in the provincial assemblies, and in the discussion of various propositions, are successively detailed; and the mode of emancipation adopted (which is the same as that of which has been given in our column) is described at length. The co-operation of the nobility is expressly stated in the manifesto. "Russia," says His Majesty, "will never forget the devotion and sincerity of which you have given for the dignity of men and by the power of your influence, have spontaneously renounced the rights which the serfdom gave her shrinkage, had given them, and have laid the foundations of a new future for the peasants." They are then told that they must not abuse their liberty, particularly the regulations which have been deemed fittest for the great and wise.

The manifesto was read in all the churches of St. Petersburgh on Sunday, the 17th ult., and on the same day followed by solemn prayers for the preservation of the health and prosperity of the Czar and his family. The manifesto and the accompanying regulations are being sent as rapidly as possible to the Governors of the provinces, proprietors of land, and communes of peasants throughout the empire. The Czar, it is said, will not leave until the end of some weeks, it is said, must elapse before the requisite number can be distributed.

THE WORK AT SEBASTOPOL.

Colonel Gowen, the American contractor at Sebastopol, says in a letter to the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin:

"My enterprise in clearing the harbor from the sunken fleet is progressing favorably, and I hope to have it entirely completed during the present year. The harbor is now provided with docks of all dimensions, and the arsenals being built to raise whole." He then details what he has done in the way of excavating, and of improvements, and acknowledges the receipt of a beautiful gold snuff-box from the English Government for his services in this matter.

AUSTRIA.

THE DRUSES AGAIN.

It is stated that the Porte has consented to the proposition of the representatives of the five Great Powers, committee at Beyrout had demanded the prompt execution of the condemned Druses. The Porte papers publish a telegram dated Constantinople, the 15th inst., announcing that Druses at Damascus, Beyrout, and Sidon, had submitted notes to the Porte, stating the urgent necessity of the execution of the murderers of the Christians at Damascus, and the fears entertained respecting other Provinces, the Porte had consented to the request. It was also reported that the Conferences would shortly be resumed at Constantinople, at which a plan for the pacification of Syria, and France, Russia, and Turkey, for the creation of an independent State, to be governed or covered by Abd-el-Kader, under the protectorate of France.

JAPAN.

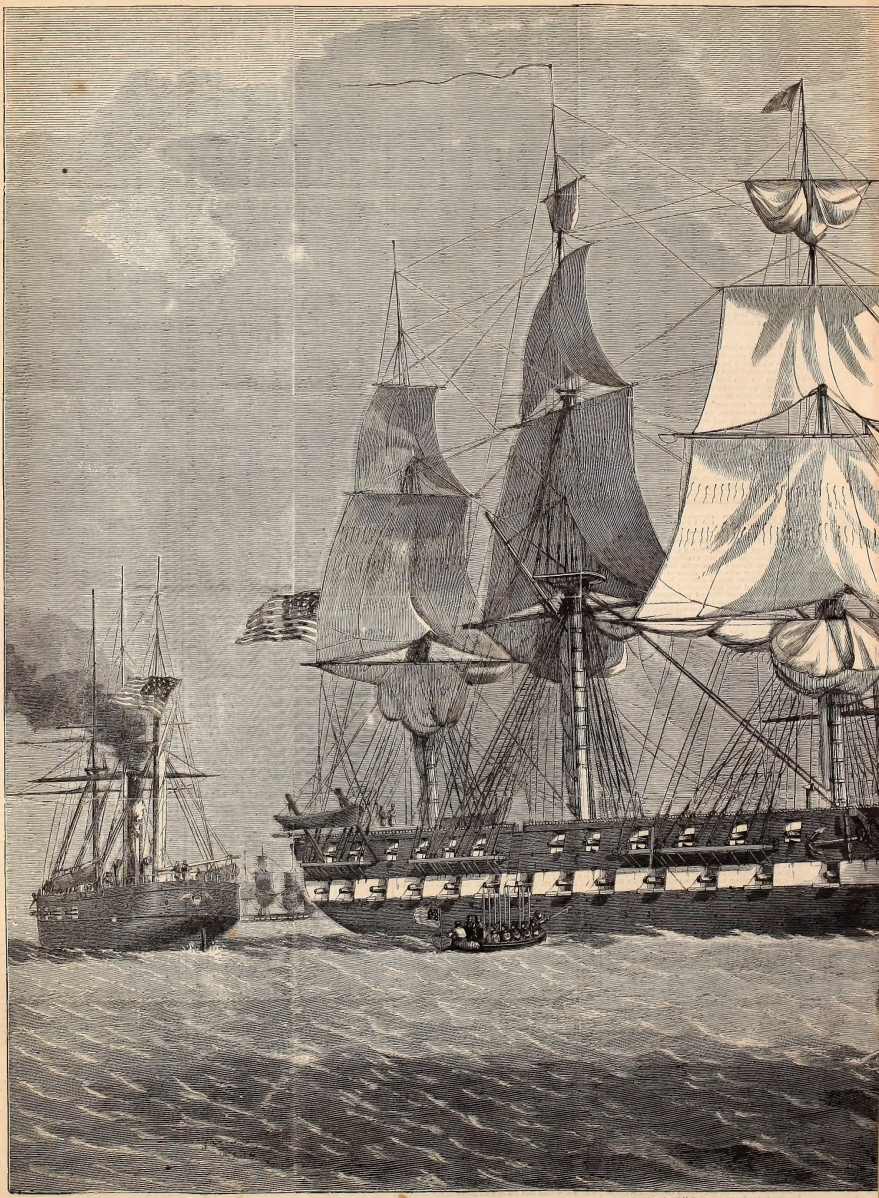
MURDER OF THE AMERICAN SECRETARY OF LEGATION.

It is reported from Japan that Mr. Heusten, the Secretary of the American Legation at Yeddo, had been murdered by assassins. Mr. Heusten and the British Minister had retired to Kanagawa. Another dispatch says the English Minister, Sir Rutherford Alcock, is Kanagawa, while the United States Minister remained at Yeddo.

SAN DOMINGO.

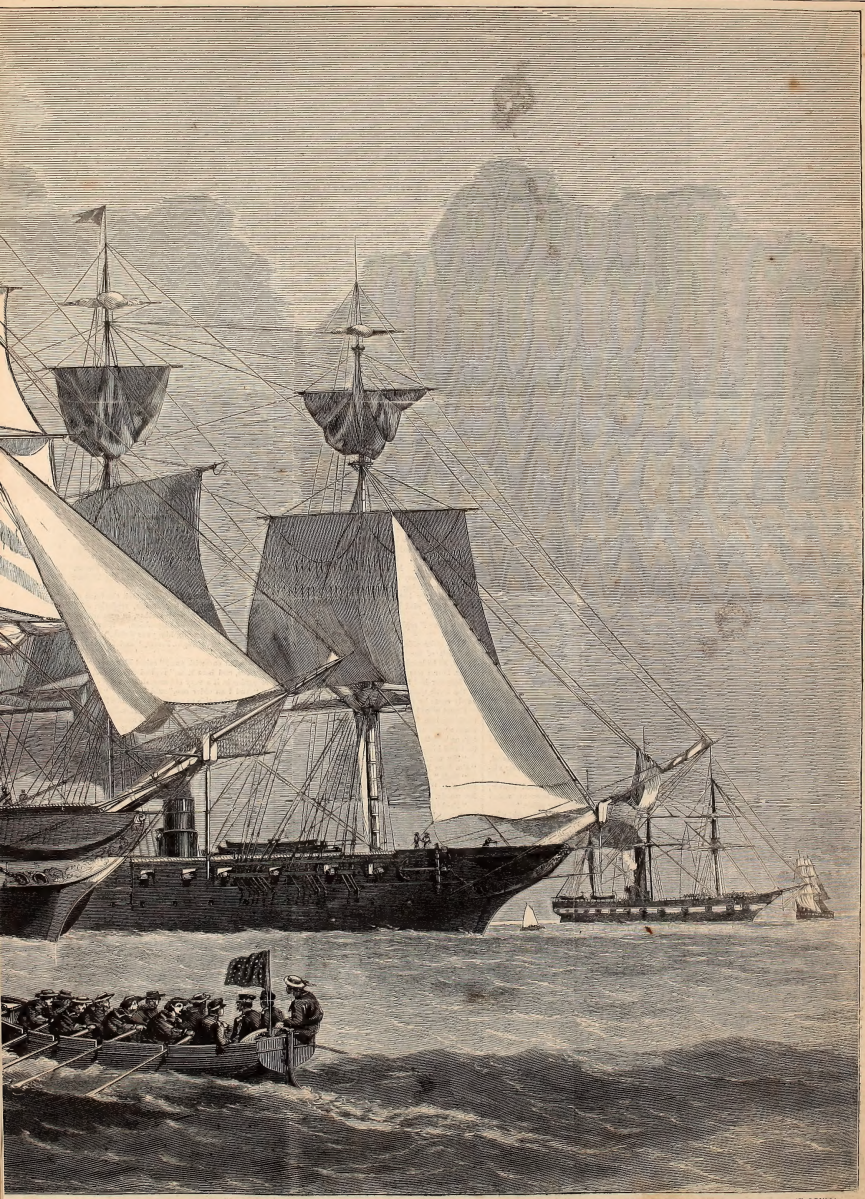
THE SPANISH EVACUATION OF SAN DOMINGO.

By way of Havana we have received definite intelligence in regard to the long-whispered-of descent on San Domingo. The Havana papers have at length spoken, and it is somewhat singular that they first mention made of the affair by that press should be the announcement of its consummation. We have the authority of the Diario de la Marina, of Havana, for the formal cession of Santana, ex-President of the ex-republic of San Domingo, for the annexation of that island to the dominions of Spain. It is stated once more under the dominion of the Spanish crown, and we now hold by seven thousand bayonets of her Catholic Majesty's army.



GUN-BOAT "WYANDOT." STORE-SHIP "SUPPLY." FRIGATE "SABINE."

THE UNITED STATES FLEET OFF FO



UNITED STATES STEAM-SLOOP "BROOKLYN." GUN-BOAT "CRUSADER." "ST. LOUIS."

PICKENS, FLORIDA.—[See Page 246.]

A CHARADE.

BY WINTHROP MARKWORTH PRAED.

COME from my First, ay, come!
The battle dawn is nigh;
And the screaming trump and the thund'ring drum
Are calling thee to die!
Fight as thy father fought,
Fall as thy father fell;
Thy task is taught, thy shroud is wrought;
So—forward! and farewell!

Tell ye, my Second, tell!
Fling high the Bantam's light;
And sing the hymn for a parted son,
Beneath the silent night!
The wreath upon his brow,
The cross upon his breast,
Let the prayer be said, and the tear be shed:
So—take him to his rest!

Call ye my Whole, ay, call!
The lord of lute and lay;
And let him greet the sable pall
With a noble song to-day;
Go, call him by his name;
No fitter hand may crave
To light the flame of a soldier's fame
On the turf of a soldier's grave.

LOOK AFTER BROWN.

THERE was not a busier man in all the little town of B—— than Mr. John Ferret: a lawyer by profession, he was every thing else almost by election, and really did nearly as much good as harm, and that is saying a great deal in his favor, considering he was a lawyer. Ferret was a constant patron of all the itinerant lecturers who visited B——, and a certain purchaser of every new invention pertaining to domestic economy or enjoyment. Patent stoves, patent bedsteads, patent frying-pans, and patent the thing, had irresistible charms for him; and the period of our tale he had become the proprietor of the Patent Niagara Shower Bath, warranted to wash a blackamoor white, so tremendous was the rush of its waters. This terrific machine was erected in a small breakfast parlor, as its dimensions exceeded the capacity of Mr. Ferret's dressing-room, and was, on the 10th of last December, a source of considerable amusement to Wapshot, the page in waiting to Mrs. Ferret. That young gentleman was delighted at the roar of the descending streams which followed the pulling of a cord resembling a bell-rope, and his speculations as to the effect to be produced upon his master were made manifest by the performances of a kind of war-dance, which ceased only on the entrance of Mrs. Ferret.

"Wapshot!" exclaimed the lady, "what are you about?"

"Oh, meem, only hear!" said the excited Button, pulling the string. "That's master's new shower-bath."

The fall of water was terrific.

"It certainly is very powerful; but Mr. Ferret will be the only sufferer," remarked the lady. "Thank goodness! it has nothing to do with the house arrangements this time."

The pleasant anticipations of Wapshot were doomed to disappointment, for a knock at the door, and its consequences, brought Mr. Ferret instantly in pursuit of his wife. In his hurry to communicate with his cara sposa, Mr. F. had evidently forgotten the progress he had made in his bathing costume, and being a bald-headed man (with the most imposing wig in B——), he had surmounted the apparatus which took a long, conical, oil-cloth cap, according to the "Directions for Use," which accompanied the bill and recipe for the Niagara.

"Bless me!" exclaimed Mrs. Ferret, in astonishment at her husband's singular appearance.

"And bless me!" rejoined Mr. Ferret, "since it comes to that—there's a letter addressed to you—I have opened it, as I did not know the handwriting (gray excuse the liberty)—and left by a gentleman who promises to call again in half an hour. It is from Mincing Lane."

"What, from dear old Uncle Richman!" cried Mrs. Ferret.

"It is, Barbara; and this is what he says:

"'DEAR MADAM,—The bearer of this is a friend of our house, and will be introduced to Mr. Ferret. The name of the bearer is Mr. Brown.—Yours, etc.,
GEORGE RICHMAN,
for
RICHMAN & Co.'

"The gentleman is to call again?" inquired Mrs. Ferret, and not waiting for a reply, added: "Dear Old Uncle! It's a long time since we heard from him. I'm so glad he has not forgotten us, and it's just like we can show him a civility. He is so very rich!"

"And we," remarked Mr. Ferret, laying great stress upon the personal pronoun—"we, his only relations; I say we, my dear, because with all your worldly goods you did me endow, and I looked upon your fortune as part of your marriage settlement. Ha! ha! Barbara!"

Mr. Ferret had not done laughing at his own happy conceit when Wapshot placed in his hand a telegraphic message, and which that intelligent servitor called a "electrify."

"From Richman, ship," said Mr. Ferret, and read aloud:

"From George Richman, London, to John Ferret, B——. Look after Brown."

"Our expected visitor, my dear. What's he mean by 'Look after Brown?'"

We have hesitated to confess that Mr. Ferret had any weakness beyond that love of novelty which, we are told in the Latin grammar, is common to all, but he had. Mr. Ferret was of a most suspicious nature, and trusted nothing and nobody until he had turned them inside out, as he expressed it.

"What's he mean?" answered Mrs. Ferret—"that we are to show Mr. Brown every possible attention. 'Look after Brown.'"

"Well, I don't read it so," said Ferret. "'Look after' means 'look sharp after Brown.'"

"What a suspicious creature you are, Ferret!"

"And you are so confiding you would trust the cat with the cream-jug," retorted Ferret.

"Didn't you annoy our neighbor from India by your ridiculous notion that he lured our ducks to lay in his garden?" said Mrs. F., with a sneer. "The man was so hurt at your insinuations that he left his lodgings, and has put at 'The George' ever since."

"So much the better," replied Ferret, declining, however, to satisfy his wife why it was more desirable for Mr. Mango to live at an inn than in lodgings; and adding, "However, I shall take care of Brown whenever he puts in an appearance."

They did not wait long for that pleasure, for Wapshot very soon after introduced a much sunburned, middle-aged gentleman at Mr. Brown to the pair of Ferrets.

Nothing could be kinder than his reception by the lady—nothing much colder than his introduction to the gentleman.

"And dear uncle—is he quite well?" said Mrs. Ferret.

"Quite so—apparently," said Mr. Brown, cautiously.

"No appearance of his distressing asthma and biennial gout?" asked Ferret, stimulated to join the conversation by Mr. Brown's slight hesitation in certifying to the unanimous concurrence of agreement.

"I was not aware he was so afflicted," replied Brown; "I am not an intimate friend of Mr. Richman. His house was the first consigned to my agency in Calcutta, and I applied to him to assist me in my inquiry for a Mr. Mango. I was told that he was living here, and that you would kindly introduce me."

"Dear me, how unfortunate!" said Mrs. Ferret, looking askance at her husband.

"Not at all! not at all!" exclaimed Ferret; "a man who allures silly creatures to desert their natural protectors—to forget the hand that feeds them—"

"You astonish me!" said Brown. "Mango was thought to be an eccentric man, but the soul of honor. May I inquire where he has lured into error?"

"Four Aylesbury ducks, Sir. Encouraged them to lay on his premises," answered Ferret.

Brown evidently thought Ferret insane, and considering his extraordinary costume, and the ridiculous defense against Mango, there was sufficient cause for the opinion. Brown therefore said, very mildly, "Oh, was that all! you have relieved my anxiety. And where is Mr. Mango, if I may?"

"At the George Inn," replied Mrs. Ferret; "but I hope you will take dinner with us to-day. We dine at five."

"You are very kind, Mrs. Ferret, but I must return to London this evening," answered Brown.

"Then oblige us by taking luncheon at twelve."

"I have a board to attend at twelve," said Ferret, glancing savagely at his wife.

"Mr. Brown will excuse your absence, I am sure," replied Mrs. Ferret, returning the look.

"I am sure I will," said Brown, with an emphasis which made Ferret start, and almost alarmed his jealousy.

"At twelve I will be punctual," said Mr. Brown, referring to his watch, which, to his apparent surprise, had stopped short.

"Pray, make use of mine," exclaimed Mrs. Ferret. "It was a present from my dear uncle, and rees capital."

"Goes! of course it does!" whispered Ferret, holding up the telegram at the back of their visitor.

"I thank you very much," answered Brown, "and will, with your permission, leave my watch with you. It is a strange thing, Mrs. Ferret—"

It was, and quite justified Ferret's remark, who, on learning that it had come from India, observed,

"The climate must be favorable to watches, if they generally grow to the size of the present specimen."

Mr. Brown merely looked at him in reply, and then addressing Mrs. Ferret, said, with some earnestness, "It is of English make, ma'am, and I hope to have something to tell you about it when I return."

"When he returns," whispered Ferret again, showing his teeth.

"Which will be at twelve," returned his wife, pointing significantly to her letter.

"To a minute," said Brown, "so for the present I wish you good-morning."

"John Ferret," said the lady, when Brown had left the house; "John Ferret, I blush for you! How can you be such a beast!"

"I am ashamed of you," retorted Ferret, "for being such a fool. Do you expect to see that watch any more? Not if either have a hands put to the one he has left you, and use it as a warming-pan. To call that a watch! A steam-engine of twenty horse-power, at least! Ah! you may well stare at it. However, it's your own doing, and if you lose your watch, don't ask me to buy another."

Mr. Brown's odd-looking time-piece seemed to interest Mrs. Ferret strangely, so much so that she burst into tears and left the room.

Mr. Ferret was rather pleased than otherwise at his wife's tribulation, receiving it as a testimony to his own superior discrimination, two things upon which he prided himself exceedingly.

A client was now announced, and Mr. Ferret, utterly unmindful of his singular head-dress, requested the new-comer to be shown into the breakfast parlor.

"Well, Spooner! an early bird this morning," said Ferret. "What's the matter? Sit down."

Mr. Spooner, who was at all times very nervous in Mr. Ferret's presence, was rendered increased trepidation at finding he had intruded upon the worthy lawyer's privacy, and it was not until he had been told to "go on," and to "fire away," that he ventured to observe that he had "come for a little advice."

"And shall have it cheap," said Ferret, encouragingly. "Thirteen and four-pence an hour isn't dear. Is it?"

"No, Sir; I suppose not."

"Five minutes past ten," continued Ferret, looking at his watch: "say ten, so fire away."

Mr. Spooner shook a good deal, and obeyed.

"I have been broken into, Mr. Ferret."

"What?"

"I was a victim to burglary last night. I was in bed."

"Nothing unusual in that," said Ferret.

"No, Sir—and asleep."

"And snoring?"

"No, Sir; thank goodness my worst enemy can't accuse me of that! I heard a noise in the washhouse. Up I gets—"

"And down you goes, of course; and there you saw—?"

"A man who cried out, 'Take care—'"

"Of Brown?" exclaimed Ferret, starting up.

"I can't say, Sir, but he threw a bottle-jack at me, and I threw a boot-jack in return, and—and—and knocked off this," said Spooner, producing a blue bag, which contained something bulky.

"Knocked off his head?" inquired Ferret.

"No; I wish it had been. It's only his hat;" and Spooner produced a somewhat sound bread-brimmed beaver, very much the worse for the service it had seen.

Now, strange to say, Brown's hat was just the same shape, and as "trifles light as air are to the jealous mind confirmation strong as proofs of holy writ," this hasty conclusion of Mr. Ferret being, as we have already observed, of a suspicious temperament, he instantly exclaimed,

"As I live, it's Brown's scoundrel, Brown."

"What a clever man you are, Mr. Ferret! you know the hat. The man was—"

"Tall," said Ferret. Brown was tall.

"No—short," said Spooner.

"No—tall," cried Ferret: "he can shut himself up like a concertina, so don't I."

"You think so?" asked the wondering client.

"Rather fat—"

"When compressed. Draws out long and thin," remarked Ferret, determined not to lose his man. "I know the fellow—he was here before I had breakfast. But I was up to him. Don't mind showing me the purport of the telegram." Read that. 'Look after Brown?'"

"Dear me! what information you have, Mr. Ferret. What is to be done?"

"Spooner, I wouldn't let that fellow escape for a thousand pounds. You shall identify him; he will be off directly. The police must not suspect we have found out any thing, or such is her infatuation she will be giving the vagabond warning. Now, you shall see, Spooner, what a brilliant thought! Get in here," said Ferret, undrawing the curtain of "Niagara."

"In there?" replied Spooner, hesitating to enter the bath.

"It's quite safe, only a very little damp: and the smell of the paint is quite refreshing," said Ferret, as he handed in his unwilling client.

Mr. Ferret was doomed to have a busy morning, for Spooner was scarcely behind a Companion of the Bath when Wapshot announced a stranger newly come by the train.

Ferret evidently made some preparation before receiving him, but the business which had brought the stranger to B—— evidently admitted of no delay, as he followed Wapshot into the room, and introduced himself.

"My name's Drabs, Sir," said the new-comer. "I'm from Pankers."

"Well," said Ferret, rather annoyed at the intrusion, "that's a great deal of information in a few words. Pray, Mr. Drabs, who is Pankers?"

"Pankers, Mr. Drabs, Pankers," is a metereopolitan parish, and I am its beadle—plain as I appear."

"A parochial peacock without its feathers," thought Ferret. "Travelling incog.—and for what purpose?"

"The fact is," said Drabs, settling down in an arm-chair—"the fact is, in our parish we have more wives and small children than we knows what to do with, and a unmitigated vagabond has left us five—"

"What—wives?" inquired Ferret.

"No; children," said Drabs, replied Drabs. "We've traced him down here, and I've been referred to you, as Clerk to the Guardians, to help us to get him back again. He ain't particular what he calls himself. Sometimes it's Downs, sometimes it's Crown, sometimes—"

"Brown," exclaimed Ferret; the one idea still uppermost in his mind.

"Well, let us think," said Drabs, sucking the knob of his stick, and cocking one eye up at the ceiling. "Well, I should say it's very likely he might a' called hisself Brown at some period or other."

"Then I've got him, Drabs," cried Ferret. "A human cuckoo that leaves his brood in any nest that will hold them! He'll be here directly."

"But are you sure he's my man?" asked Drabs, not to be too hasty in the matter.

"Tall!" said Ferret.

"Well, betwixt and between."

"Rather thin?"

"Not corpulent, certainly," answered Drabs, glancing at his own well-developed figure.

"It's the same man!" said Ferret. "I expect him here every moment. You shall pounce upon him like a hawk. Let me introduce you to another victim of Brown," said Ferret, drawing aside the curtain of the bath, "Mr. Drabs of Pankers, Mr. Spooner of B——. You'll soon know each other—mutual wrongs are like the thongs which bound the fasces." A classical figure of speech, in great favor with Mr. Ferret on public meetings.

The trap being set and baited, Mr. Ferret proceeded to his dressing-room to make his toilet, resulting in his anticipated triumph over the credulity of Mrs. Ferret, should Brown return, or not.

He was not quite so clever as he thought himself.

There was evidently a culmination of events threatening the House of Ferret this morning, for, to the terror of Wapshot (the real egg-sucker), Mr. Mango knocked at the door.

Mrs. Ferret was very pleased and surprised to see Mr. Mango, and told him so.

"You are most kind," said the old gentleman. "I have long desired to pay this visit—indeed it was my business here at B——, but Mr. Ferret's extraordinary conduct with regard to those Aylesbury ducks made it impossible."

"Pray think no more of that, my dear Sir. Mr. Ferret had been very ill with a fever and lost—lost—"

"His wits?" asked Mr. Mango.

"No, Sir, not his wits, but a remarkable fine head of hair, and the loss made him very irritable. Besides, I must own, that, though he is a most affectionate husband, he is the most suspicious man alive."

"What has made him so?" inquired Mango.

"I think it is his profession," replied Mrs. Ferret. "He is a lawyer; and, therefore, sees so much of the bad side of human nature, that he almost doubts if there be a good one. Pray think no more of that ridiculous matter."

"Well, for your sake," said Mr. Mango, "I will not. You know a Mr. Brown, I believe?"

"He called here this morning," replied Mrs. Ferret; "and—really I am ashamed to own it—but John suspects him of some design upon him. I would give a great deal to cure John of this unfortunate impression, as it is so distructive."

"Humph!" grunted Mr. Mango, and it was evident Mr. Ferret was no favorite with the old Indian. "But to go on," he continued, with reference to an interview I have had with Mr. Brown."

Mr. Ferret having completed his toilet, substituting a wig for which George the Peruvian had been envied, for his oil-cloth extinguisher, fancied he heard voices in the adjoining room, and stealing to the door, as gently as a cat, opened it without noise, and to his surprise saw Mr. Mango in conversation with his wife, and heard the hated name of Brown.

"Your maiden name," said Mango, "was Chubb."

"What's that to him?" thought Ferret; "I changed it."

"You were an orphan, and married a man older than yourself."

"Like his impudence," muttered Ferret; "he's been looking up the parish register."

"You had an uncle Godfrey, who years ago went to India—a bankrupt, worthless fellow."

"He had been unfortunate," replied Mrs. Ferret, "but my mother always said he was the kindest of brothers."

Mango paused for a moment, took the hand of Mrs. Ferret, and looking at her, tenderly said, "You are very like your mother, in openess of face and confidence of disposition. Brown has told me of your lending him your watch."

"Of course," thought Ferret, "and laughed at her stupidity."

"He left one with you?" asked Mango.

"Yes, and here it is," replied Mrs. Ferret; "I recognize in it a very old acquaintance."

"And I an older one," said Mango. "Do you mind trusting this to me for a short time?"

"Not at all, sir," answered Mrs. Ferret, giving Mango the wonderful piece of mechanism.

"I see it all," thought Ferret. "Brown has her watch: Mango gets Brown's, and Mrs. F. is done out of both."

"I know your uncle well," said Mango. "Some years ago I gave you a locket—I see it there. May I be allowed to look at it?"

"He will have the wedding-ring off her finger presently," thought Ferret, and began to consider whether he was not bound as a husband to present himself. The return of Mr. Brown left him no alternative.

Either the abruptness of Ferret's entrance into the room or the magnificence of his wig overpowered his visitors, and neither spoke for nearly a minute; while he, with his arms folded and figure erect, looked any thing but a welcome.

"John!" exclaimed Mrs. Ferret, at length, "what is the matter with you?"

A look was her only answer, and then Ferret took from the table the blue bag brought by Spooner, and producing the hat left behind by the burglar, threw it with great force at the feet of Mr. Brown.

"Is the man mad?" cried Mango.

Ferret, undisturbed by the remark, placed himself opposite to Brown, and in a hissing whisper, which would have made any tragedian's fortune, said: "A wife and five children are in Pankers' workhouse. Where is the husband? Where is the father?"

"How should I know, my dear Sir?" replied Brown, getting rather alarmed.

"Where indeed? a peaceable citizen was broken into last night. That hat was left behind."

"Well, Sir," remarked Brown, not in the least understanding how that information was confided so particularly to him.

"But we were warned in time," said Ferret, raising his voice to gallery pitch. "Thanks to the Electric Telegraph. Read that, Sir, from our excellent relative, Mr. Richman. 'LOOK AFTER BROWN.'"

"Mad! Decidedly mad!" cried Mango, buttoning up his coat and preparing to retreat; but poor Mrs. Ferret, almost hysterical with disgust and anger, clung round his neck and prevented his egress.

"And dare you, Sir," said Brown, as soon as his indignation would allow the words to escape his lips—"dare you, Sir, accuse me of burglary and desertion?"

"In unvarnished English—yes," bawled Ferret, "and I've witnesses there," pointing to "Niagara."

"Produce them!" shouted Brown.

"I won't till I please!" exclaimed Ferret.

"Mango, ring the bell. Let us see if there is a sane person in the house!" cried Brown.

Mango had already fixed his eye on the brass ring and cord depending from Niagara, and, without pausing to consider this somewhat unusual position for a bell-rope, pulled away with all his might.

Then came a rush of waiters, mingled with roars of alarm and agony from Drabs and the timid client, followed by a most unfortunate appearance in the centre of the room dripping and shaking themselves like two Newfoundland dogs after a bath in the river.

"Where?—Who?—What?" exclaimed all but Ferret; and he pointed with exultation to the saturated pair, "Behold my witnesses!"

"Plaintiffs, you mean," said Drabs. "At least I'm one. You shall pay for this trick, Mr. Ferret."

"Nonsense. That's your deserter, Fankers."

"No, it's not; not a feature of any one of the children about him," said Drabs, abruptly quitting the room.

"Spooner, then it's your man!" cried Ferret.

"Not the least like him. I'm a corpse, Mr. Ferret, a corpse!" My last injunction to my executors will be, 'Prosecute Ferret!'" said Spooner, leaving the room, the chattering of his teeth being distinctly audible until he reached the street.

Ferret was confounded.

"Well, Sir, a pretty fool you've made of yourself, John Ferret," said his brother-in-law, Bob, after Brown!

Look after yourself, I think, Sir."

"My dear, there is evidently some mistake," suggested Jemima.

"I beg your pardon, Mr. Brown," said Mango to that gentleman, and with whom he had been conversing in a low tone. "I was prepared to receive your statement as truth, and would have acted upon it; but when I find a respectable practitioner like Mr. Ferret accuse you of burglary and desertion of your family, I pause, Sir—I pause!"

"Say, Sir, what have I to gain?" asked Brown.

"That would be my question, Sir, was given to me by your nephew, William Chubb."

His nephew!" exclaimed Mr. and Mrs. Ferret.

"With this will," continued Brown, showing a legal-looking packet, "bequeathing his claims upon you—"

"Ten thou-sand pounds," said Mango. "I acknowledge the debt."

"Ten thou-sand pounds," and Brown rolled the words out as though every letter was a lump of gold, "out which he bequeaths to his cousin Mrs. Ferret here."

Mrs. Ferret subsided on to the sofa, and the hair of Ferret's wig stood on end—almost.

"What do you say, Sir?" gasped the astonished lawyer. "Ten thousand pounds, and the debt acknowledged."

"Just so," said Mango; "and I should have made no difficulty in the payment of the money, had not Mr. Ferret accused Mr. Brown of crimes which make me doubt the validity of those documents."

"Oh, don't say that," cried Ferret; "I didn't mean it."

"Pardon me," rejoined Mango. "I am sorry to put you to the trouble and expending to India for proofs. The process is tedious, very tedious, but necessary now."

"Oh, Jemima!" sobbed Mrs. Ferret, from the depths of the sofa pillows; "I told you to look after Brown."

"When you can bring me satisfactory evidence," continued Mango, walking toward the door, "I am prepared to pay."

"You don't mean to leave us, Mr. Mango, in this unsatisfactory manner?" cried Ferret.

Mr. Brown appeared about to follow Mr. Mango, but pausing, said,

"Mr. Ferret, my object was to have served you in this matter, but the insult I have received, the injury my character has sustained, must be atoned for. You, as a lawyer, know the course I shall adopt, and you know your own."

"Oh, yes," replied Ferret, in a most despondent tone; "the usual story about Brown vs. Ferret, defamation. Damages a thousand pounds."

"Oh, John! John! How could you doubt the meaning of that letter?" and Mrs. Ferret sat on the sofa like "Niobe all tears."

"You have been a good wife to me," said Ferret, throwing himself on the table and wrapping up his head in the crimson cover. "So young, and yet so wise! You'll find my will at the back of the wardrobe, wrapped up in my wedding waistcoat."

The wife—the woman could not withstand this, and as she threw her arms about the red bundle on the table, and called it her "dear Johnny."

"I've left you every thing, and have only to add a lawsuit, Brown vs. Ferret, damages a thousand."

"Oh! my dear Johnny, you are wandering!" exclaimed Mrs. Ferret, striving to unroll the mummy.

"It was destiny made me erect 'Niagara,'" continued the unhappy man. "An ancient gentleman hinted himself to a funeral pyre. I shall take a funereal shower-bath!"

Mrs. Ferret screamed and shook her husband violently while Mr. Mango returned and said, soothingly: "Come, Mr. Ferret, be a man. Proofs of Mr. Brown's respectability can be obtained easily."

"No, no! impossible!" interrupted Ferret; and then recollecting the probable consequences of such a denial, gasped, rather than said, "More likely more libel!"

It was fortunate that Wapshot interrupted this agonising scene by another telegram, and which the excited Mrs. Ferret seized and read aloud for the general edification: "Look after Brown. He is the best friend you have, and the most honorable man alive."

"Hoorah!" All is clear at last. The telegraph clerk had only sent one half the message, which had produced such confusion and misunderstanding. The doubts of Mango were only feigned to punish Mr. Ferret, and the old Indian proved the best of the genus uncle, making his niece richer than she had ever dreamed to be, and happier by laughing Ferret out of his proneness to suspicion.

The telegram was framed and hung over the mantle-piece in the breakfast parlor in memoriam of the eventful day recorded in these pages.

A PARCEL OF PREACHERS.

It is the object of the present paper to revive the remembrance of a few popular preachers, deceased. Those who are living speak for themselves; but it is noticeable how closely they confine themselves on the dead, and how very little originality is to be found among them.

One of the most remarkable of these was Rowland Hill, sixth son of Sir Rowland Hill, baronet, of Hawkstone. He first began to preach when he was at Cambridge, and he received seven censures from his superiors for going about and preaching in the barns and farm-houses of the villages near the University. When he left Cambridge, and had been ordained, he used to preach, sometimes as often as thrice a day, to large congregations. He used to stock his sermons with queer phrases and odd illustrations, and often amused his congregation with jokes.

On one occasion, when preaching at Wapping to a congregation composed chiefly of sea-faring men and fishermen, he greatly astonished his congregation by commencing the sermon with these words: "I come to preach to great sinners, notorious sinners—yes, to Wapping sinners." On another occasion, there came a heavy shower of rain, which compelled the congregation to take refuge in the chapel; Hill, remarking this, looked up and said: "Many people are greatly to be blamed for coming to chapel in wet weather, but I do not think those are much better who make it an umbrella." In 1803, the time of the first grand volunteer movement, Hill was at the head of a congregation of volunteers. Two psalms, of his own composition, were sung on this occasion; one of them was sung to the tune of "God save the King;" the other, after the sermon, to the tune of "Rule Britannia." It began: "When Jesus reigned in Britain's favored land."

Hill was earnest in manner, and imposing in appearance. He was very tall, and had a loud, sonorous voice, which he knew how to make a modest man, and to have particularly objected to being considered an enthusiast. Preaching once at Wotton, he said, "Brethren, I am not enthusiast enough to be an enthusiast, but I am not; mine are the words of truth and soberness. When I first came into this part of the country, I was preaching on a tender hill, I saw a gravel-pit fall in and bury three human beings alive. I lifted up my voice for help as loud as I was able, and called on the people at a distance of a mile; help came and rescued two of the poor sufferers. No one called me enthusiast then, and when I see immortal creatures ready to fall into eternal sinners, and about to entomb them irrevocably in an eternal mass of woe, and call about on them to escape, shall I be called an enthusiast now? No, indeed, I am not an enthusiast in so doing; I call on these aloud to fly for refuge to the hope set before them in the Gospel of Christ Jesus."

William Huntington, the coal-heaver, was a strong contrast to Rowland Hill, and was immeasurably inferior to him in every respect, though in every respect. Huntington was born in the Weald of Kent; his father was a day-laborer, earning seven or eight shillings a week. Huntington, in his published sermons, tells several anecdotes of his childhood, one of which shows his inordinate conceit and vanity. He had a great desire to act as errand-boy into the service of a certain Squire Cooke; but the Squire already had an errand-boy, with whom he was very well satisfied. Huntington bethinking himself that if all things were possible with God, it was possible for the Almighty to send him into Squire Cooke's service, and prayed for the discharge of this unfortunate boy, asked the Almighty in an "extempore way" (his own words) to give him the place. He says that his earnest promises how good he would be if this request were granted. Some time after a man came to his house, and told his father that the boy was to have been turned away for theft; and advised him to go and apply for the place. He did so, and (as a matter of course) obtained the situation. Shortly after came the theft was committed for Huntington's special behoof through Divine interposition is very shocking.

On another occasion, when this favored gentleman was older, he was again in want of a situation; a part of his history which appears to be highly probable, was informed that a certain Squire Peel, of Charren, in Kent, was in want of a servant. He went after the place, and on the way, he prayed to God about him the situation. When he arrived at the gentleman's house, he found a servant in the parlor, with whom the gentleman had been drinking; and the Squire immediately broke off with this man when he saw Huntington (very much to his subsequent regret, we have no doubt), and engaged that latter person. Huntington ascribed this, of course, to the great influence of his prayers, and the high regard in which the Almighty held him. He soon left this situation too (through a want of appreciation on the part of sinners), and tried to set up as a coke-burner; failed, as a gardener. He also tried gardener's situation, and lost it (so he says) for refusing to work on Sundays; he then became reduced to the necessity of laboring as a coal-heaver, and began to preach in earnest.

Huntington used generally to preach at Wellingborough; but he also visited his friends, and preached in their houses. In his sermons, The Bank of Faith and God, the Guardian of the Poor, printed with an account of his life, he mentions, as an instance of the Lord's care for him, that he had ordered a box of clothes to be left at the Star Inn, at Maidstone in Kent, and that he went for it with only a shilling in his pocket. When he arrived at Maidstone he found that the box had been sent on by the carrier, so he had to go back again without it. He had spent his shilling, was hungry and tired, and began to think that if he had faith and prayed, he might have any thing he wanted. Just then the thought seized him that he would go out of the foot-path into the horse-road; he did so, and instantly saw a sixpence lying in the road, and, a little further on, a shilling. He attributed his finding these to the regard the Lord had for him, and to the effect of his prayers and to his great faith.

On another occasion, a heavy fall of snow threw him out of work, and he thought he prayed the Lord to send the snow away. When he got up next morning he found it all melted. No doubt, if he had lived in the last great frost, he would have procured a thaw immediately.

Some of this man's printed sermons are very ludicrous. In one of them he relates that, being greatly in want of a pair of leather breeches, he prayed very earnestly to God for this favor. He went to London, where he met a person of his belonging to one of his friends. Not finding the shop, he called on another friend of his, a shoemaker, who told him that a parcel had been left there for him. He opened the parcel, and found that it contained a pair of leather breeches, which fitted him perfectly, although he had never been measured for them. He left a letter he wrote to the unknown donor, he declared that God must not only have put it into the heart of that charitable person to send him a pair of breeches, but must also have given him his (Huntington's) exact measure.

One Sunday, as he was rising early to go to Moulsey to hear a popular preacher who was coming to preach there, there came a voice which he took to be that of God, saying, "You must preach out of doors to-day, and you must preach from this text: 'Go therefore into the highways, and as many as you find, bid to the marriage.'" He went to the meeting. The preacher did not make his appearance, and Huntington got up and preached with such effect that the congregation fell down in a fit caused by "violent convictions," and was obliged to have a blister applied to her head. We strongly recommend this remedy for general adoption in similar cases.

At the latter part of his life, Huntington preached several sermons which were afterward printed separately. Among them is The Coal-heaver's Cousin rescued from the Bats. In one of these compositions he says, "In reference to a gentleman having made him a present of ten guineas, 'I found God's promises to be the Christian's bank-notes; and a living faith to be the means of realizing the Divine Bank-er; yea, and the spirit of prayer and the deep sense of want will give an heir of promise a filial boldness at the throne of grace, to draw upon heaven.' He was also in the habit of calling the Almighty his Bank, his Banker, and his Blessed Overseer.

A very different preacher from Huntington was the Rev. William Dodd, LL.D. He is represented to have been a man of elegant manners and refined tastes; a scholar and a wit. Perhaps he was all these—an indifferent poet he certainly was. He was born in the year 1729, at Bourne, in Lincolnshire. He was sent to Cambridge at the early age, and, in the year 1755, produced a translation of the Hymns of Callimachus, translated from the Greek into English verse, with explanatory notes, and the Encomium of Ptolemy, by Theocritus. Hymns to Diana, and several sermons, full of Christian precepts and religious sentiments. He greatly interested himself in public charities, and subscribed much of his money toward the founding of the Magdalen Hospital. He preached two or three times at Magdalen House before Prince Edward. He was also connected with Lord Chesterfield, who was so pleased with him that he confided to him the education of his eldest son. Dodd bought a house in Southampton Row, where he lived in a sumptuous manner. Wishing to obtain the living of St. George's, Hanover Square, he endeavored to get Lord Chesterfield to give the Lord Chancellor. An anonymous letter was also sent to Lady Chesterfield, offering a sum of money if she would procure Dodd the same living. It was discovered that the letter must have been written by Dodd himself, although he tried to throw all the blame on his wife. The fact was not credited, and failing into disfavor, his name was ordered to be struck off the list of Royal chaplains. It regards to his pecuniary affairs, he subscribed more liberally than ever to schools and charities; but continued to live so extravagantly, that at last he was afraid to go out in the street lest he should be arrested for debt. However, being severely pressed by his creditors, he became desperate, and forged the name of his pupil's guardian to a bond for four thousand two hundred pounds. The forgery was discovered, and he was arrested—taken from a gay supervivial party—and committed to Wood Street Compter. Public sympathy was lavished on him in the most absurd manner; every body talked of "the unfortunate Dr. Dodd;" and the following verses, supposed to have been written by himself, appeared in all the newspapers:

"Amidst confinement's miserable gloom,
Midst the hot horrors of the wretched room,
What comforts gracious Heaven! does then bestow
To soothe my sorrows and relieve my woe?
A wife beyond the first of womankind,
Tender, attached, and e'en to death resigned;
Dear youthful friends, in life's prosperous hour
As children zealous, to exert each power;
Men skilled in wisdom's most sagacious lore,
Solicitous to aid, to save—restore!
Lawyers and counselors, without a fee,
Studious to guide, direct, and set me free!
Nay—from the man I falsely deemed my foes,
The noble offer of all service flows.
While gratitude in gaine unknown draws nigh
Say (I am still mind) what more can reply?
Above the rest, my keepers, soothed to grief,
With sympathetic pity give relief.

Treat as a guest the sufferer they receive,
And make it even tranquil to be here.
Great God of mercy! if amidst my woes
A stream of such peculiar comfort flows;
Flows full, flows only from thy care divine,
May I not humbly, firmly, Lord, resign?
And trust the issue to thy care alone?
Yes, Lord, I trust—Oh, may thy will be done!"

This "revered sufferer" also had the coolness to insert the following letter in the principal newspapers: it is written quite as of course, and more with the air of an injured innocent than with that of a squandering, unprincipled forger:

"Dr. Dodd begs leave to present his most sincere and grateful acknowledgments to those many sympathising friends who have been so kind as to think of him in his distresses, and to assure them that, though his mind was too much engrossed and agitated with necessary and important business during his confinement in Wood Street, to admit the kind favors of their proffered visits, he shall now be happy, at any time, to receive their friendly and Christian consolation.

"Destitute at once with respect to his fate, and thoroughly resigned to the will of God, he can not but feel a complacency in the striking humanity of which he has experienced; and while he most earnestly entreats a continuance and increase of that 'spirit of grace, which he is told is poured forth for him,' he can not omit to assure all those who, by letter or otherwise, have expressed their concern for him in his trial, that, conscious of the purity of his intention from any purpose to do injury, and happy in the full proof of that intention, by having done no injury to any man in respect to this unfortunate prosecution, he fully reposes himself on the mercies of his God, and on his own wish to live or die, in all that may best tend to the glory of that God and the good of mankind.

"Tuesday Ev., 11."

He was tried, found guilty, and sentenced to death: his fate created a great sensation among all classes. The Lord Mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, got up petitions beseeching commutation of the sentence, and a monster petition, thirty-seven yards long, and signed by twenty-three thousand persons, was presented with the same object. A young man named Joseph Harris, convicted of highway robbery, was sentenced to die with Dodd; but the Lord Mayor, aldermen, and commons, did not present any petition praying for commutation of the younger and probably less criminal offender's sentence, nor was a single quarter of a yard of public sympathy unfolded in his behalf. However, the Lord Mayor, his magnificent brethren, and the thirty-seven yards of paper, and the twenty-three thousand signatures, could not save Dr. Dodd. He was hanged with the lay, unclassical, and altogether inelegant Joseph Harris.

Orator Hunter, another well-known preacher, was a member of St. John's College, Cambridge, where he distinguished himself by his abilities and perseverance. His pulpit was covered with black cloth, ornamented with gold; his cushions, vulgates, and liturgies were printed in red and black; he stuck medals which he dispensed to his admirers, round the room; a sun over the pulpit, with the motto Ad Summa, and the inscription, Invenium viam aut faciam (I will find a way or make it). His sarcasm is considered to have been very, and he "won his" for brilliant jokes in his sermons. He was a great enemy of Pope, whose satire on him is well known:

"Unbowed in this untoward time, lo! Healey stands,
Tuning his voice and balancing his hands;
How fluent nonsense trickles from his tongue!
How sweet the periods neither said nor sung!
Still break the benches, Henley, with thy strain,
While Bladen, Hare, and Gibbs roar again in vain.
Oh, great restorer of the good old stage,
Preacher at once and Zany of thy age!"

He usually chose a text from the Old or New Testament, and adapted it to the topics of the day, or to a satire on persons personally obnoxious to him; but sometimes his discourses resembled a kind of poetical prose rather than a sermon. His manuscript sermons are preserved in the library at the Guildhall, London; his handwriting is very irregular, and the whole is pronounced to be much erased and blotted that it is not easy to decipher them. We see from his sermons that he was a good scholar.

One of his Orations, preached October 21, 1730, is entitled, "A Sober Enquiry into the History and Adventures of Whittington and His Cat." The text chosen for this discourse was, "A cat may look at a king" (English Proverb). It is chiefly satirical or political, and the preacher begins with the story of Whittington and his cat, and in pointed satire likens cats to the magistrates and judges. "A cat is a creature extremely political: it does indeed, like other civil magistrates, look not only grave but sleepy; but when it winketh, little knows the mouse what is in it." The next paragraph is a satire on the Church. He says: "There is no mention of cats in the Scripture; since our clergy spoken of, the Church militant also are common, but many of them are poor, for the Church cats, pretending only to play with them, starve the mice." The rest consists of satires on the topics of the day, which would not interest the reader nowadays.

Hanley sometimes prayed in a devout and impressive manner, but sometimes his prayers were ludicrous and even blasphemous. In one of his sermons, discovering that the petitioners would be damned, he prayed that the Dutch might be "undamned." In another of his sermons he undertook to prove that the petitioners were the ancients, and, in corroboration, quoted that chapter of the Old Testament in which Samuel's mother is said to have hidden him "in a petticoat," obviously a "petticoat." He usually hired a body of strong men to attend his sermons and dispose of any body inclined to discuss a point with him; but on one occasion, having challenged any two Oxonians to argue with him on the superiority of his doctrines and teaching over those of the Church of England's ministers, two Oxonians appeared, attended by a larger body of prize-fighters than he was provided with, and he slunk away by the back door.

* The Historical Register for 1736.

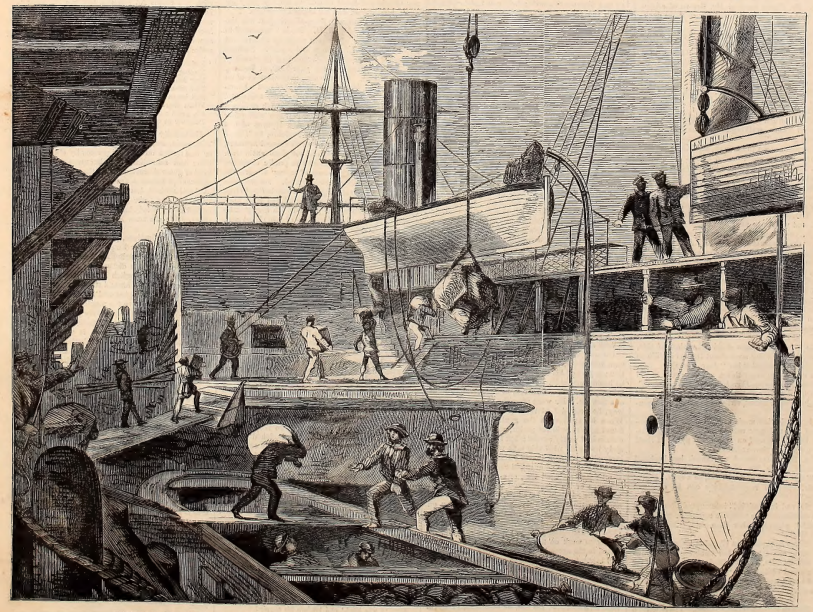
UNITED STATES FLYING ARTILLERY GOING ON BOARD THE STEAMSHIP "ATLANTIC" AT NEW YORK, APRIL 6, 1861.—[SEE PAGE 246.]



SHIPMENT OF MILITARY STORES ON BOARD THE STEAMSHIP "BALTIC" AT NEW YORK, APRIL 8, 1861.—[SEE PAGE 246.]

THE BEGGAR'S SOLILOQUY.

I.

Now, this, to my notion, is pleasant cheer,
To lie all alone on a ragged heath,
Where your nose isn't sniffing for honor or beer,
But a peat-fire smells like a garden beneath.
The cottagers bustle about the door,
And the girl at the window fits her strings.
She's a dish for a man who's a mind to be poor;
Lord! women are such expensive things.

II.

We don't marry beggars, says she: why, no:
It seems that to make 'em is what you do;
And as I can cook, and scour, and sew,
I needn't pay half my victuals for you.
A man for himself should be able to scratch,
But tickling's a luxury—love, indeed!
Love burns as long as the heifer match,
Wellock's the candle! Now, that's my creed.

III.

The church-bells sound water-like over the wheat;
And up the long path troop pair after pair.
The man's well-brushed, and the woman looks neat,
It's man and woman every where!
Unless, like me, you lie here flat,
With a donkey for friend, you must have a wife:
She pulls out your hair, but she brushes your hat.
Appearances make the best half of life.

IV.

You nice little madam! you know you're nice.
I remember hearing a parson say
You're a plateful of vanity pepper'd with vice;
You chap at the gate thinks Father way.
On his waistcoat you read both his head and his heart:
There's a whole week's wages there figured in gold!
Yes! when you turn round you may well give a start:
It's fun to a fellow who's getting old.

V.

Now, that's a good craft, wearing waistcoats and flowers,
And selling of ribbons, and scenting of lard:
It gives you a house to get in from the showers,
And food when your appetite jockeys you hard.
You live a respectable man; but I ask
If it's worth the trouble? You use your teeth,
And spend your time, and what's your task?
Why, to make a slide for a couple of fools.

VI.

You can't match the color o' these heath mounds,
Nor better that peat-fire's agreeable smell.
I'm clothed like with natural sights and sounds;
To myself I'm in tune. I hope you're as well.
You jolly old cot! though you don't own coal:
It's a generous pot that's built with peat.
Let the Lord Mayor o' London roast oxen whole:
His smoke, at least, don't smell so sweet.

VII.

I'm not a low Radical, hating the laws,
Who'd the aristocracy rebuke.
I talk o' the Lord Mayor o' London because
I once was acquainted with his cook.
I served him a turn, and got pensioned on scraps,
And, Lord, Sir! didn't I envy his place,
Till Death knock'd him down with the softest of raps,
And I knew what was meant by a tallowy face!

VIII.

On the contrary, I'm Conservative quite;
There's beggars in Scripture 'mongst Gentiles and Jews:
It's nouseus, trying to set things right,
For if people will give, why, who'll refuse?
That stopping old custom wakes my spleen:
The poor and the rich both in giving agree:
Your tight-laced chapman's the Radical mean:
There's nothing in common 'twixt him and me.

IX.

He says I'm no use! but I won't reply.
You're lucky not being of use to him!
On week-days he's playing at Spider and Fly,
And on Sundays he sings about Cherubim!
Nulling shillings to counters is his chief work:
He nods now and then at the name on his door:
But judge of us two at a hour and a smirk.
I think I'm his match: and I'm honest—that's more.

X.

No use! well, I mayn't be. You ring a pig's snout,
And then call the animal glutton! Now, he,
Mr. Shopman, he's naught but a pipe and a spout
Who won't let the goods o' this world pass free.
This blessing blue weather all round the brown crop,
He can't enjoy! all but each he hates.
He's only a snail that crawls under his shop;
Though he has got the ear o' the magistrates.

XI.

Now, giving and taking's a proper exchange,
Like question and answer: you're both content.
But buying and selling seems always strange;
You're hostile, and that's the thing that's meant.
It's man against man—you're almost brutes,
There's here no thanks, and there's there no pride.
If Charity's Christian, don't blame my pursuits,
I carry a touchstone by which you're tried.

XII.

—"Take it," says she, "it's all I've got:"
I remember a girl in London streets:
She stood by a coffee-stall, nice and hot,
My belly was like a lamb that bleats.
Says I to myself, as her shilling I seized,
You haven't a character here, my dear!
But for making a rascal like me so pleased,
I'll give you one, in a better sphere!

XIII.

And that's where it is—she made me feel
I was a rascal: but people who scorn,
And tell a poor patch-breech he isn't genteel,
Why, they make him kick up—and he treads on a corn.
It isn't liking, it's cunst ill-luck,
Drives half of us into the begging-trade:
If for taking to water you praise a duck,
For taking to beer why a man upbraid?

XIV.

The sermon's over: they're out of the porch,
And it's time for me to move a leg;
But in general people who come from church,
And have called themselves sinners, hate chaps to beg.
I'll wager they'll all of 'em dine to-day!
I was easy half a minute ago.
If that isn't pig that's baking away.
May I perish?—we're never contented—heighoe!

GEORGE MEREDITH.

"DEAR JOE, HOW ARE YOU?"

THE LAST HYMN.

"Yet once more on the organ play
To me, old neighbor mine;
Try if my heart may be refreshed
Still by its tones divine—"

The sick one prayed, the neighbor played,
So played he ne'er before;
So glorious are the tones that he Knows his own touch no more.

'Tis some unearthly blessèd strain
Bursts forth as he doth play—
He stops with awe—the list'ner's soul
Hath gently passed away.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1860, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.]

GREAT EXPECTATIONS.

A NOVEL.

By CHARLES DICKENS.

Splendidly Illustrated by John McLenan.

☞ Printed from the Manuscript and early Proof-sheets purchased from the Author by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."

CHAPTER XXXIII.

As I had grown accustomed to my expectations I had insensibly begun to notice their effect upon myself and those around me. Their influence on my own character I disguised from my recognition as much as possible; but I know very well that it was not all good. I lived in a state of chronic uneasiness respecting my behavior to Joe. My conscience was not by any means comfortable about Biddy. When I woke up in the night—like Camilla—I used to think, with a weariness on my spirits, that I should have been happier and better if I had never seen Miss Havisham's face, and had risen to manhood content to be partners with Joe in the honest old forge. Many a time of an evening, when I sat alone, looking at the fire, I thought, after all there was no fire like the forge fire and the kitchen fire at home.

Yet Estella was so inseparable from all my restlessness and disquiet of mind, that I really fell into confusion as to the limits of my own part in its production. That is to say, supposing I had had no expectations, and yet had had Estella to think of, I could not make out to my satisfaction that I should have done much better. Now, concerning the influence of my position on others, I was in no such difficulty, and so I perceived—though dimly enough, perhaps—that it was not beneficial to any body, and, above all, that it was not beneficial to Herbert. My lavish hal its led his easy nature into expenses that he could not afford, corrupted the simplicity of his life, and disturbed his peace with anxieties and regrets. I was not at all remorseful for having unwittingly set those other branches of the Pocket family to the poor arts they practiced: because such littlenesses were their natural bent, and would have been evoked by any body else, if I had left them slumbering. But Herbert's was a very different case, and it often caused me a twinge to think that I had done him evil service in encouraging his expensefurnished chambers with incongruous upholstery work, and placing the canary-breasted Avenger at his disposal.

So now, as an infallible way of making little ease great ease, I began to contract a quantity of debt. I could hardly begin but Herbert must begin too, so he soon followed. At Startop's suggestion, we put ourselves down for election into a club called The Finches of the Grove: the object of which institution I have never divined, if it were not that the members should dine expensively once a fortnight, to quarrel among themselves as much as possible after dinner, and to cause six waiters to get drunk on the stairs. I know that these gratifying social ends were so invariably accomplished that Herbert and I understood nothing else to be referred to in the first standing toast of the society, which was: "Gentlemen, may the present promotion of good feeling ever reign predominant among the Finches of the Grove."

The Finches spent their money foolishly (the hotel we dined as was in Covent Garden), and the first Finch I saw, when I had the honor of joining the Grove, was Bentley Drummle: at that time floundering about town in a cab of his own, and doing a great deal of damage to the posts at the street corners. Occasionally he shot himself out of his equipage head-foremost over the apron; and I saw him, on one occasion, deliver himself at the door of the Grove in this unintentional way—like coals. But here I anticipate a little, for I was not a Finch, and could not be, according to the sacred laws of the society, until I came of age.

In my confidence in my own resources I would willingly have taken Herbert's expenses on myself; but Herbert was proud, and I could make no such proposal to him. So he got into difficulties in every direction, and continued to look about him. When we gradually fell into keeping late hours and late company, I noticed that he looked about him with a despondent eye at breakfast-time; that he began to look about him more hopelessly about mid-day; that he drooped when he came in to dinner; that he seemed to descry Capital in the distance rather clearly, after dinner; that he all but realized Capital and banked it toward midnight; and that at about two o'clock in the morning he became so deeply despondent again as to talk of buying a ville and going to America, with a general purpose of compelling buffaloes to make his fortune.

I was usually at Hammersmith about half the week, and when I was at Hammersmith I hunted Richmond; whereof separately by-and-by. Herbert would often come to Hammersmith when I was there, and I think at those seasons his father would occasionally have some passing perception that the opening he was looking for had not appeared yet. But in the general tumbling up of the family, his tumbling out in life somewhere, was a thing to transact itself somehow. In the mean time Mr. Pocket grew grayer, and used oftener to lift himself out of his perplexities by the hair. While Mrs. Pocket zipped up the family with her footstool, read her book of dignities, lost her pocket-handkerchief, told us about her grandpapa, and taught the young idea how to shoot, by shooting it into bed whenever it attracted her notice.

As I am now generalizing a period of my life with the object of clearing the way for before me, I can scarcely do so better than by at once completing the description of our usual manners and customs as Barnard's Inn.

We spent as much money as we could, and got as little for it as people could make up their minds to give us. We were always more or less miserable, and most of our acquaintance were in the same condition. There was a gay fiction among us that we were constantly enjoying ourselves, and a skeleton truth that we never did. To the best of my belief, our case was in the last aspect a rather common one.

Every morning, with an air I never saw, Herbert went into the City to look about him. I often paid him a visit in the dark back-room in which he consorted with an ink-jar, a hat-peg, a cool-box, a string-box, an almanac, a desk and stool, and a ruler; and I do not remember that I ever saw him do any thing else but looking about him. If we all did what we undertake to do as faithfully as Herbert did, we might live in a Republic of the Virtues. He had nothing else to do, poor fellow, except at a certain hour of every afternoon to "go to Lloyd's"—in observance of a ceremony of seeing his principal, I think. He never did any thing else in connection with Lloyd's that I could find out, except come back again. What he felt his case unusually serious, and that he positively must find an opening, he would go on 'Change at the busy time, and walk in and out, in a kind of gloomy confidence, for a quarter of an hour, among blood magnates. "For," says Herbert to me, coming home to dinner on one of these special occasions, "I find the truth to be, Handel, that an opening won't come to one, but one must go to it—so I have been."

If we liked, we less attached to one another, I think we must have hated one another regularly every morning. I detested the chambers beyond expression at that period of separation, and could not endure the sight of the Avenger's livery; which had a more expensive and a less remunerative appearance then than at any other time in the four-and-twenty hours. As we got more and more into debt, breakfast became a hollower and hollower form, and, being on one occasion at breakfast-time threatened (by letter) with legal proceedings, "not unwholly unconnected," as my letter-writer might put it, "with jewelry," I went so far as to seize the Avenger by his blue collar and shake him off his feet—so that he was certainly for a few days, like a hooked Cupid—for presuming to suppose that we wanted a French roll.

At certain times—mean'ng at uncertain times, for they depended on our luncheon—I would say to Herbert, as if it were a remarkable discovery:

"My dear Herbert, we are getting on badly."

"My dear Handel," Herbert would always say to me in all sincerity, "if you will believe me, those very words were on my lips, by a strange coincidence."

Then, Herbert," I would respond, "let us look into our affairs."

We always derived profound satisfaction from making an appointment for this purpose. I always thought myself, this was business, this was the way to confront the thing, this was the way to take that by the throat. And I know Herbert thought so too.

We generally ordered something rather special for dinner, with a bottle of something similarly out of the common way, in order that our minds might be fortified for the occasion, and we might come well up to the mark. Dinner over, we produced a bundle of pens, a copious supply of ink, and a goodly show of writing and blotting paper. For these we somehow got very comfortable in having plenty of stationery.

I would then take a sheet of paper, and write across the top of it, in a neat hand, the heading "Memorandum of Pip's debts;" with Barnard's Inn and the date very carefully added. Herbert would also take a sheet of paper, and write across it with similar formalities, "Memorandum of Herbert's debts."

Each of us would then refer to a confused heap of papers at his side, which had been thrown into drawers, worn into holes in pockets, half burned in lighting candles, or taken for weeks into the looking-glass, and otherwise damaged. The sound of our pens going refreshed us exceedingly, inasmuch as I sometimes found it difficult to distinguish between this effusive business proceeding and actually paying the money. In point of meritorious character the two things seemed about equal.

When we had written a little while, I would ask Herbert how he got on? Herbert probably would have been scratching his head in a most rueful manner at the sight of his accumulating figures.

"They are mounting up, Handel," Herbert would say; "upon my life, they are mounting up."

"Be firm, Herbert," I would retort, plying my own pen with great assiduity. "Look the thing in the face. Look into your affairs. Stare them out of countenance."

"So I would, Handel, only they are staring me out of countenance."

However, my determined manner would have its effect, and Herbert would fall to work again. After a time, he would give up once more, on the plea that he had not got Cobbs's bill, or Lobbs's, or Nobbs's, as the case might be.

"Then, Herbert, estimate it; estimate it in round numbers, and put it down."

"What a fellow of resource you are!" my friend would reply, with admiration. "Really your business powers are very remarkable."

I thought so too. I established with myself on these occasions the reputation of a remarkable man of business—prompt, decisive, energetic, clear, cool-headed. When I had got all my responsibilities down upon my list, I compared each with the bill, and ticked it off. My self-approval when I ticked an entry was almost a luxurious sensation. When I had no more ticks to make, I folded all my bills up uniformly, docketed each on the back, and tied the whole into a symmetrical bundle. Then I did the same for Herbert (who modestly said he had not my administrative genius), and felt that I had brought his affairs into a focus for him.

My business habits had one other bright feature, which I called, "leaving a margin." For example; supposing Herbert's debts to be one hundred and sixty-four pounds four-and-twopence, I would say, "leave a margin, and put them down at two hundred." Or supposing my own to be four times as much, I would leave a margin, and put them down at seven hundred. I had the highest opinion of the wisdom and prudence of this same margin. I am sure I have to acknowledge that, on looking back, I deem it to have been an expensive device. For we always ran into new debt immediately, to the full extent of the margin, and sometimes, in the sense of freedom and solvency it imparted, got pretty far on above the margin, too.

But there was a calm, a rest, a virtuous hush, consequent on these examinations of our affairs, that got even me, for the time being, into opinion of myself. Soothed by my exertions, my method, and Herbert's compliments, I would sit with his symmetrical bundle in my hand, at the table before me among the stationery, and feel like a Bank of some sort, rather than a private individual.

We shut our outer door on these solemn occasions, in order that we might not be interrupted. I had fallen into the habit one evening, when we heard a letter dropped through the slit in the said door, and fell on the ground.

"It's for you, Handel," Herbert would say, and coming back with it, "and I hope there is nothing the matter." This was in allusion to its heavy black and border.

The letter was signed TRABB & Co., and its contents were simply, that I was an honored Sir, and that they begged to inform me that Mrs. J. Gargery died yesterday. That on Monday last, at twenty minutes past six in the evening, and that my attendance was requested at the interment on Monday next at three o'clock in the afternoon.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

IT was the first time that a grave had opened in my road of life, and the gap that the gap it made in the smooth ground was wonderful. The figure of my sister in her chair by the kitchen fire instantly started out of it. The place it could possibly be without her was something my mind seemed unable to compass; and whenever she had seldom or never been in my thoughts of late, I had now the strangest ideas that she was coming toward me in the street, or that she would presently come down from one of the rooms, too, with which she had never been at all associated, there was at once the blankness of death and a perpetual suggestion in the gap in of her voice or the turn of her face or figure, as if she were still alive and had been often there.

Whatever my fortunes might have been, I could scarcely have set myself right sooner with a more genuine remorse. But I suppose there is a shock of regret which may exist without much tenderness, and I believe it influenced me in this (for I doubt to the want of the softer feeling) I was seized with a violent indignation against the assailant from whom she had suffered so much, and felt that, on sufficient proof, I could have revengefully pursued Orlick, or any one else, to the last extremity.

Having written to Joe, to offer consolation, and to assure him that I should come to the Forge, I passed the intervening time of my stay in the curious state of mind I have glanced at. I went down early in the morning, and nighted at the Blue Boar in good time for the mail. I left the Forge It was fine summer weather again, and, as I walked along, the time when I was a little helpless creature, and my sister was not there to be vividly returned. But they returned with a gentle tone upon them that softened even the edge of Orlick. For the very breezes from the beans and clover whispered to my heart that the day must come when it would be well for my memory that other walking in the sunshine should be softened as they thought of me.

At last I came within sight of the house, and then I immediately saw that Trabb's boy had put in a funereal execution and taken possession. Two dismally absurd persons, each ostentatiously exhibiting a crutch done up in a black bandage—as if that instrument could by any communicate any comfort to my body—were posted at the front door; and in one of them I recognized a person who had formerly been fined for turning a young copie into a saw-pit on their bridal morning, in consequence of intoxication rendering it necessary for him to ride home locked clasped round the neck with both arms. All the children of the village, and most of the women, were admiring these sable warders, and the dining-windows of the house and forge; and as I came up, one of the two warders (the post-boy) knocked at the door—implying, I think, that I was too much exhausted by grief to have strength remaining to knock for myself.

Another sable warder (a carpenter, who had once eaten two geese for a wager) opened the door, and showed me into the best parlor. Here Mr. Trabb had taken upon himself the best table, and had got all the leaves up, and was holding a kind of black Bezar, with the aid of a quantity of black pins. At the moment of my arrival he had just finished putting somebody's hat into black long-clothes, like an Afghan baby; so he held out his hand for mine. But I, misled by the action, and confused by the occasion, shook hands with him with every testimony of warm affection.

Poor dear Joe, in a little black cloak tied in a large bow under his chin, was seated apart at the upper end of the room; where, as chief mourner, he had evidently been deposited by Trabb. When I bent down and said to him, "Dear Joe, how are you?" he said, "Pip, old chap, you know'd her when she were a fine figure of a—" and stopped my hand, and said no more.

Biddy, looking very neat and modest in her black dress, went quietly here and there, and was very helpful. When I had spoken to Biddy, as I thought it no time for talking I went and sat down near Joe, and there began to wonder in what part of the house it—she—my sister was. The best parlor being full with the smell of sweet cake, I looked about for the table of refreshments; it was scarcely visible until one had got accustomed to the gloom, but there was a cut-up plum-cake upon it, and there were cut-up oranges, and sandwiches, and biscuits, and bottles of wine, and I knew very well as ornaments, but had never seen used in all my life, one full of port and one of sherry. Standing at this table, dusting the associates of the service Pumblechook, in a black cloak and several yards of hat-band, who was alternately stuffing himself, and saying serious mouthfuls to me to catch my attention. The moment he succeeded he came over to me (breathing sherry and crumbs), and said in a subdued voice, "May I dear Sir?" and did. I then described Mr. and Mrs. Hubble—the last-named in a decent speckled pocket-handkerchief—as "Mr. and Mrs. Hubble to "follow," and were all in course of being tied up separately (by Trabb) into ridiculous bundles.

"What has occurred, Sir," Joe whispered me, as we were being what Mr. Trabb called "formed" in the parlor, two and two—and it was dreadfully like a preparation for some grim kind of dance—"what is Mortimer, Sir, as I would in preference have carried her to the church myself, slong with three or four friendly ones who could be spared, in willing hearts and arms; but it were considered wot the neighbors would look down on such, and would be of opinion as it were wanting in respect."

"Pocket-handkerchiefs out, all!" cried Mr. Trabb at this point, in a depressed business-like voice. "Pocket-handkerchiefs out! We are ready!"

So we all put our pocket-handkerchiefs to our faces, as if we were howling, and Biddy did not two and two; and Joe and I; Biddy and Pumblechook; Mr. and Mrs. Hubble. The remains of my poor sister, in the handsomest shell the kitchen door; and, it being a point of Undertaking ceremony that the six bearers must be chilled and frozen with the horrible black velvet housing with a white border, the whole looked like a blind monster with twelve human legs, shuffling and limping beneath, under the guidance of two keepers—the post-boy and his comrade.

The neighborhood, however, highly approved of these arrangements, and we were much admired as we went through the village: the more lugubrious and vigorous of the performance making dashes now and then to cut us off, and lying in wait to intercept us at points of vantage. At such times the more exuberant among them called out to the excited mariner, on our emergence round some corner of expectancy, "Here they come! Here they are!" and we were all but cheered. I think the progress I was much annoyed by the abject Pumblechook, who, being behind me, persisted all the way, as a delicate attention, in walking on the grass-plot between the sable warders and my cloak. My thoughts were further distracted by the excessive pride of Mr. and Mrs. Hubble, who were surpassingly conceited and vainglorious in being members of so distinguished a procession.

At last the range of marshes lay clear before us, with the sails of the ships on the river growing out of it; and we went into the church-yard close to the Forge, among the unknown graves. Philip Pirrip, late of this parish, and Also Georgiana, Wife of the Above. And there my sister was laid quietly in the earth at the lark-song hour, high above it, and the light wind strewed it with beautiful shadows of clouds and trees.

As the day was warm, the clergyman came out into the church-porch to read the service, and Pumblechook while this was doing I desire to say no more than it was all addressed to me; and that even when Biddy and the clergyman read which I remind humanity how it brought nothing into the world and can take nothing out, and how it behoveth like a flower and never continueth long in one stay, I heard him accept a reservation of the case of a young gentleman who came unexpectedly into large property. When we got back, he—as if I were the person to be set right by what my sister could have known I had done her so much honor, and to hint that she would have considered it a slight upon somebody at the price of her death. After that he drank all the rest of the sherry, and Mr. Hubble drank the port; and the two talked (which I have since observed to be customary in such cases) as if they were of quite another race from the deceased, and were noticeably condescending. Finally, he went away with Mr. and Mrs. Hubble—to make an evening of it, I felt sure, and to tell the Jolly Bargemen that he was the founder of my fortunes and my earliest benefactor.

When they were all gone, and when Trabb and his men—but not his boy: I looked for him —had crammed their mummery into bags, and were gone too, the house felt wholesomer. Soon afterward Biddy, Joe, and I had a cold dinner together; but we dined in the best parlor, not in the old kitchen, and Joe was so exceedingly particular what he did with his knife and fork, and the salt-cellar, and what not, that there was great restraint upon us. But after dinner, when I made him take his pipe, and when I sat down together on the great block of stone outside it, we got on better. I noticed that after the funeral Joe changed his clothes so far as to make a compromise between his Sunday dress and working dress; in which the dear fellow looked natural and like the Man he was.

He was very much pleased by my asking if I might sleep in my own little room, and I was pleased too; for I felt that I had done rather a great thing in making the request. When the shadows of evening were closing in, I took an opportunity of getting into the garden with Biddy for a little talk.

"Biddy," said I, "I think you might have written to me about these sad matters."

"Do you think so, Mr. Pip?" said Biddy. "I could have written if I had thought that."

"Don't suppose that I mean to be unkind, Biddy, when I say I consider that you ought to have thought that."

"Do you, Mr. Pip?"

She was so quiet, and had such an orderly, good, and pretty way with her, that I did not like the thought of making her cry again. After looking at her downcast face for a few eyes, as she walked beside me, I gave up that point.

"I suppose it will be difficult for you to remain here now, Biddy dear?"

"Oh! I can't do so, Mr. Pip," said Biddy, in a tone of regret, but still of quiet conviction. "I have been speaking to Mrs. Hubble, and I am going to her place now. I hope she shall be able to take some care of Mr. Gargery, together, until he settles down."

"How are you going to live, Biddy? If you want any mo—"

"How am I going to live?" repeated Biddy, striking in, with a momentary flush upon her face. "I'll tell you, Mr. Pip. I am going to try to get the place of mistress in the new school lately finished in the village. I can be recommended by all the neighbors, and I hope I can be industrious and patient, and teach myself while I teach others. You know I can, Mr. Pip," pursued Biddy, with a smile, as she raised her eyes to my face, "the new schools are not like the old, and I learnt a good deal from you after that time, and have had time since then to improve."

"I think you would always improve, Biddy, under any circumstances."

"Ah! Except in my bad side of human nature," murmured Biddy.

It was not such a reproach as an irresistible thinking aloud. Well! I thought I would give up that point too. So I walked a little further with Biddy, looking silently at her downcast eyes.

"I have not heard the particulars of my sister's death, Biddy."

"They are very slight, poor thing! She had been in one of her bad states—though they had not better of late, rather shorter worse—for four days, when she came out of it in the evening, just at tea-time, and said, quite plainly, 'Joe.' As she had been quite dumb and any word for a long while, I ran and fetched in Mr. Gargery from the Forge. She made signs to me that she wanted him to sit down close to her, and wanted me to put her arms round his neck. So I put them round his neck, and she laid her head down on his shoulder quite content and satisfied. And so she remained for a little while again, and died so, and once 'Pip.' And so she never lifted her head up any more; and we just sat an hour later when we laid her down on her own bed, because we found she was gone."

Biddy cried; the darkening garden, and the lane, and the stars that were coming out were blurred in my own sight.

"Nothing was ever discovered, Biddy?"

"Nothing."

"Do you know what is become of Orlick?"

"I should think, from the color of his clothes, that he is working in the quarries."

"Of course you have seen him then?—Why are you looking at that dark tree in the lane?"

"I saw him there on the night she died."

"That was not the last time either, Biddy?"

"No: I have seen him there since we have been walking here." —Is it of Orlick, then, Biddy, laying her hand upon my arm as I was for running out; "you know I would not deceive you; he was not there, to my knowledge, last night."

It revived my utmost indignation to find that she was still pursued by this fellow, and I felt inveterate against him. I told her so, and told her that I would put a stop to any money or take any pains to drive him out of that country. By degrees she led me into more temperate talk, and she told me how Joe loved me, and how Joe never complained of any thing—she didn't say of me; she had no need; I knew what she meant —but ever did his duty in his place in his way of life with a strong hand, a quiet tongue, and a gentle heart.

"Indeed it would be hard to say too much for him," said I; "and Biddy, we must often speak of these things, for of course I shall be often down here now. I am not going to leave poor Joe alone."

Biddy said never a single word.

"Biddy, don't you hear me?"

"Yes, Mr. Pip."

"Not to mention your calling me Mr. Pip—which appears to me to be in bad taste, Biddy—what do you mean?"

"By this?" said Biddy.

"Now, don't echo, Biddy." I retorted. "You used not to echo, Biddy."

"Used not!" said Biddy. "Oh, Mr. Pip! Used!"

Well! I rather thought I would give up that point too. After another silent turn in the garden I fell back on the main position.

"Biddy," said I, "I made a remark respecting my coming down here often to see Joe, which you received with a marked silence. Have the goodness, Biddy, to tell me why."

"Are you quite sure, then, that you WILL come to see him often?" asked Biddy, stopping in the narrow garden walk, and looking at me under the stars with a clear and honest eye.

"Oh, dear me!" said I, as if I found myself compelled to give up Biddy in despair. "This really is a very bad side of human nature! Don't say any more, if you please, Biddy. This shocks me very much."

For which cogent reason I kept Biddy at a distance during supper, and when I went up to my own old little room took as steady a leave of her as I could, in my murmuring soul, deem reconcilable with the church-yard and the event of the day. As often as I was restless in the night, and that was every quarter of an hour, I reflected what an unkindness, what an injury, what an injurior Biddy had done me.

Early in the morning I was to go. Early in the morning I was out, and looking in, unseen, at one of the wooden windows of the Cock. There I stood, for minutes, looking at Joe, already at work, with a glow of health and strength upon his face that made it show as if the bright sun of the life in store for him were shining on it.

"Good-by, dear Joe!—No, don't wipe it off —for Heaven's sake give me your blackened hand! I shall be down soon, and often!"

"Never too soon, Sir," said Joe, "and never too often, Pip!"

Biddy was waiting for me at the kitchen door, with a mug of new milk and a crust of bread. "Biddy," said I, when I gave her my hand at parting, "I am not angry, but I am hurt!"

"No, don't be hurt," she pleaded, quite pathetically; "let only me be hurt, if I have been ungenerous."

Once more the mists were rising as I walked away. If they disclosed to me, as I suspect they did, that I should not come back, and that Biddy was quite right, all I can say is—they were quite right too.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Dollar Copying Press.

AGENTS Wanted to sell VAN ANDEN'S PATENT PORTABLE DOLLAR COPYING PRESS. It weighs but eight ounces. Can be carried in the pocket, and copies with greater facility, and as perfectly, as the iron press. Good Agents make from $50 a day. Send for Circular. Address, with 72 stamp, WATKES & VAN ANDEN, 141 William Street, New York.

WEDDINGS for the UNION—Supplied with CARDS, NOTES, Satin Ties, Envelopes, &c., of the latest styles, at fair prices, by A. DEMAREST, Engraver, 77 Nassau Street, N. Y. Samples by mail.

Gibbon's Artillerist's Manual.

The Artillerist's Manual. Compiled from various Sources, and adapted to the Service of the United States. Illustrated by Engravings and Woodcuts. By Capt. John Gibbon, U. S. Army. 1 vol. 8vo, 570 pages, Half Roan, $6 00. Sent free by mail on receipt of price.

D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher, 192 Broadway.

Look to your Gardens and Fields.

FRANK G. JOHNSON'S FAMED POWDERED COAL TAR,
For Exterminating
INSECTS AND VERMIN
IN FIELD AND GARDEN.

It will save your VINES;
It will save your PLANTS;
It will save your TREES;
It will save your POTATOES;
It will save your WHEAT;
It will save your COTTON;
It will save your TOBACCO;
It will save your FRUIT TREES;
It will save your ROSE BUSHES;
It will save every plant in the Garden from the destructive ravages of all kinds of Insects and Vermin.

Responsible Men wanted in every County in the United States to engage in the sale of this sovereign remedy. To such very liberal terms will be given. For full particulars and plan of agency, address JOHN G. WELLS,
Cor. Park Row and Beekman Street, New York.

BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES

Brown's Bronchial Troches.

Whoever is troubled with Coughs, Hoarseness or Sore Throat, will find these "Troches" a most admirable remedy. Indeed, at the season of the year, those at all inclined to bronchial complaints should not be without them. They are prepared by Messrs. John I. Brown & Son, who, as Apothecaries, rank among the first in the city, and are sold by all the principal druggists.—Boston Journal.

303 CANAL STREET. 303

New Department.

Infants' Embroidered Robes, Cloaks, Blankets, Caps, Slips, Nursery Baskets, &c. Complete Wardrobes on hand and made to order.

Mixed Cloths, Silks and Marseilles Sacques, Dresses and Walking Coats.

Boys' Suits in Cloth, Silk, Poplin and Marseilles.

THOMAS REYNOLDS,
253 Canal Street. 303

DR. BROWN'S
Patent Baby-Tender.

The Great Institution for Children.

Warehouse 652 Broadway.

J. Silas Brown & Co.

Send for our Circular.

"Matrimony made Easy."—A new work, showing how either sex may be suitably married, irrespective of age or appearance, which can not fail—free for 25 cents. Address T. William & Co., Publishers, Box 2309, Philad.

Burnett's Kalliston,

For removing Tan, Sunburn, Freckles, Redness and Eruptions of the Skin, and for rendering the complexion clear and beautiful.

The following testimonial furnishes conclusive evidence of the efficacy of this famous cosmetic:—

MARLBORO', July 11, 1855.

Messrs. Joseph Burnett & Co.:

GENTS:—The packages of Kalliston came to hand last evening, and I am glad to have an opportunity to state to you how much we value it. My family have used it almost daily for more than two years, and now they think they can not do without it.

A single application has repeatedly removed the freckles from the face of my little boy, leaving his skin smooth and fair. And in all cases of sunburn or irritation of the skin from whatever cause, it has thus far proved itself a perfect and very pleasant remedy.

I can, if you desire, refer you to several cases of obstinate eutaneous disease, in which I know the Kalliston has had a wonderfully good effect; one in particular, the daughter of Mr. P——, one of my neighbors, had suffered for many years from eruptions and painful inflammation of the skin (probably the effect of bad vaccine virus), leaving it in several places puckered and quite red. A few weeks ago I recommended to him your Kalliston; he has since informed me that the effect of its use has been very marked and beneficial, that the skin has become soft and smooth, and the inflammation and redness has nearly disappeared.

In an important case, and I will tell you more about it when I see you.

I owe it to you to state that I did not believe in the efficacy of any cosmetic until I tried your Kalliston, and I cheerfully give my testimony in its favor.

Yours respectfully,
JOHN M. BOYD.

Prepared only by Joseph Burnett & Co., Boston.

Sold by dealers generally, at 50 cents a bottle.

Hard Times made Easy!

GOOD NEWS FOR THE UNEMPLOYED!

ONE THOUSAND CHANCES TO MAKE MONEY!
ONE MILLION DOLLARS' WORTH
OF WATCHES, JEWELRY,
AND
SILVER-PLATED WARE,
to be disposed of on an
ENTIRELY NEW AND ORIGINAL PLAN.

2,500 AGENTS WANTED
All persons desirous of securing an Agency in this
NEW ENTERPRISE
Should send on their names at once, inclosing a 3 cent stamp to pay postage, and receive by return of mail
A PREMIUM CATALOGUE
containing
OUR INDUCEMENTS,
which afford
A RARE CHANCE TO MAKE MONEY
without risk, together with
FULL PARTICULARS
Address at once
NOVEL PLAN!!

To insure prompt and satisfactory dealings, direct all orders to
GEORGE G. EVANS,
No. 439 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

VALUABLE TO ALL.—Who use the Pen or Pencil. SHAVEY'S PATENT Self-Sharpener, Pencil Sharpener, &c., all neatly combined in one nautical form.

"It is a most ingenious contrivance, and interesting to many purposes entirely."—Independent.

"It combines more useful attributes than any other article of its size within my knowledge."—Dry-Goods Bulletin, of Connecticut.

1 Sample sent postage paid for 75 c., or 3 styles for $1 50. Send for Circular. A. G. SHAVEY, New Haven, Ct.

The Working Farmer
AND
Harper's Weekly,
$2 40 per Annum.

Address CHARLES V. MAPES, Mapes' Agricultural Warehouse, 136 and 138 Nassau Street, N. Y.

FIRST PIANO BOOK FOR CHILDREN.

THE CHILD'S FIRST MUSIC BOOK. An Introduction to the Art of Playing the Piano Forte. By J. T. Crowen. A new and improved edition of this work, containing famous simple airs of easy compositions, with short and pleasing exercises adapted to the use of young beginners. Sent, post-paid, to any address, on receipt of Fifty Cents, by DITSON & CO., Boston.

WANTED—MEN, WOMEN, AND BOYS in every Town, City, and Village in the United States, to act as Agents for the sale of Sherman & Co.'s Gift Jewelry Envelopes. Agents can make from 2 to 5 dollars a day. Being largely engaged in the manufacture of a superior quality of Jewelry, we are enabled to offer to our customers a greater variety and better value than any other similar establishment. For further particulars enclose a stamp, and address, SHERMAN & CO., 229 Broadway, corner of Barclay Street, New York.

H. WORCESTER'S
IMPROVED PIANO FORTES,
Manufactory & Salesroom,
14th St., cor. 3d Av., N. Y.

Roman Eye Balsam.

Redness or rawness of the Eyelids, commonly called Sore Eyes, can be effectually cured by a few applications. Price 25 cents.

Prepared and sold by A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists, 100 Fulton Street, N. Y.

Benson's Spring Fashions.

Now Ready,

A splendid collection of Cloth, and Silk, French Sacks, Paletots, and Basques.

Also, the latest Novelties in Gored Circulars at

J. T. BENSON'S,
310 Canal Street, N. Y.

Great Work on the Horse!

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES:
WILLIAM GEORGE FERNIE, M.R.C.V.S.,
Professor of Pathology and Operative Surgery in the Veterinary College of Philadelphia, Professor of Veterinary Medicine in the late Agricultural College of Ohio, Secretary of the American Veterinary Association, Philadelphia, etc., etc.

WILL TELL YOU Of the Origin, History and distinctive traits of the various breeds of Europe, Arabia, Africa and America. Horses, with the physical formation and peculiarities of the animal, and how to ascertain his age by the number and condition of his teeth; illustrated with numerous explanatory engravings.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES
WILL TELL YOU Of Breeding, Breaking, Stabling, Feeding, Grooming, Shoeing, and the general management of the Horse, with the best modes of administering medicine, also, how to treat Biting, Kicking, Rearing, Shying, Stumbling, Crib Biting, Restiveness, and other vices to which he is subject; with numerous explanatory engravings.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES
WILL TELL YOU Of the causes, symptoms, and treatment of Sprains, Sore Throat, Distempers, Catarrh, Influenza, Bronchitis, Pneumonia, Pleurisy, Broken Wind, Chronic Coughs, Thumps and Whistling, Lumps, Sore Mouth and Ulcers, and Decayed Teeth, with other diseases of the Mouth and Respiratory Organs.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES
WILL TELL YOU Of the causes, symptoms and treatment of Worms, Bots, Colic, Strangulation, Stone Concretions, Ruptures, Palsy, Diarrhœa, Jaundice, Hepativirsses, Bloody Urine, Stones in the Kidneys and Bladder, Inflammation, and other diseases of the Stomach, Bowels, Liver and Urinary Organs.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES
WILL TELL YOU Of the symptoms, and Treatment of Bone, Blood, and Bog Spavin, Ring-Bone, Sweenie, Shoulder, Broken Knees, Wind Galls, Foundered, Sole Bruise and Gravel, Crooked Hoofs, Scratches, Canker, Thrush, and Corns; also, of Magrims, Vertigo, Epilepsy, Staggers, and other causes of the Fell, Legs and Head.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES
WILL TELL YOU Of the causes, symptoms, and Treatment of Farcin, Fell Evil, Glanders, Farcy, Scarlet Fever, Mange, Surfeit, Locked Jaw, Rheumatism, Cramp, Galls, Diseases of the Eye and Heart, &c., &c., and how to manage Castration, Bleeding, Trephanning, Rowelling, Firing, Hernia, Amputation, Tapping, and other surgical operations.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES
WILL TELL YOU Of Barry's Method of taming Horses; how to Approach, Halter, or Stable a Colt; how to accustom a horse to strange sounds and sights, and how to Bit, Saddle, Ride, and Break him to Harness; also the form and law of Warranty, and the whole being the result of more than fifteen years' candid study of the habits, peculiarities, wants and weaknesses of this noble animal.

The book contains 384 pages, appropriately illustrated by nearly One Hundred Engravings. It is printed in a clear and open type, and will be forwarded to any address, postage paid, on receipt of price, half bound, $1 00, or, in cloth, extra, $1 25.

$1000 A YEAR can be made by men everywhere, in selling the above, and other popular works of merit. Our inducements to all such are exceedingly liberal.

As our books are unrivaled in their mechanical execution, as well as the value of their contents, a certain and rapid sale follows their introduction everywhere.

For single copies, or for terms to agents, with other information, apply to or address

JOHN B. FORTER, Publisher,
No. 617 Sansom Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

THE HYDROPATH, the great invention of the age, for extinguishing fire, without injuring anything, quicker than by any other means, cleansing trees from insects, wetting sidewalks, &c., &c. Call or address, enclosing stamp for illustrated circular containing full particulars. American Hydropult Co., 183 Broadway, and 43 Park Row, N. Y.

HAVING been restored to health by a very simple Remedy, I am anxious to make known to others, who may be suffering from Debility, Nervousness, Loss of Memory, &c., the method and means of cure. Simply enclose stamp to D. H. WELLINGTON, Box 3315 Boston, Mass.

$100 PER MONTH MADE WITH STENCIL TOOLS.—I sell the cheapest and best. Send for my circular, which fully explains the business. Address JOHN MILLIKEN, Lawrence Mass., or No. 79 Third Street, St. Louis, Mo.

ANDREWS' YEAST POWDER.
"Excellence."
Is economical and perfectly pure. All the best families use it! It is ready for use in one minute! It makes Tea Biscuit, Dumplings, Pancakes, splendidly light and wholesome. Inquire for the "Excelsior" Yeast Powder. The Best Stores will get it for you. If you want the Best buy our Brand! Depot 158 and 158 Cedar Street, THOMAS ANDREWS & CO.

Jewelry, Jewelry.

HEADQUARTERS for all kinds of Jewelry in the One Dollar Stores and Envelope Business. For particulars address, WM. A. WARD, Box 2432 P.O. Manufacturing Jeweler, 305 Broadway.

No Chimney!

Burners that will fit any Coal Oil Lamp, and burn Coal Oil or Kerosene without a chimney. Burner sent by mail on receipt of 25 c. Manufactured by the Lamp burns pure Coal Oil, Camphene, &c., without wick or chimney. Sample Lamp $3 00. Send stamp for Circulars. Address CALLENDER & PEECE, Dealers in Lamps, Oils, &c., 170 Broadway, New York.

6000 AGENTS wanted, to sell SIX new INVENTIONS. Sales are very rapid, and of great value to families; all pay great profits to Agents. Send four stamps and get 56 pages particulars.

EPHRAIM BROWN, Lowell, Mass.

LE BON TON—THE BEST LADIES' FASHION BOOK in the World. Contains copies, with two valuable patterns, posted for 13 cents.

S. T. TAYLOR & SON, 407 Broadway, N. Y.

WEDDING CARDS.

Specimens by Mail on receipt of stamps to prepay postage.

EVERDELL, 302 Broadway, N. Y.

NOBLE HEATH, No. 340 Broadway, N. Y., made his father's great work, HEATH'S SELF-TEACHING A-B-AMITY, (prefaced by Dr. Mc. H., who has been a teacher, and is now a practical accountant of 14th Street & Co.) recommending this book.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—My Ointment will force them by nearly twenty in six weeks (on the smooth face) without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of an order. R. G. GRAHAM, No. 109 Nassau Street, N. Y.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK,
Have Just Published

LORD MACAULAY'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND, from the Accession of James II. With an Original Portrait of the Author and a Complete Index to the entire Work. 5 vols. 12mo, Muslin, $2 00. The volumes sold separately, at 40 cents each.

MOTLEY'S HISTORY OF THE UNITED NETHERLANDS: from the Death of William the Silent to the Synod of Dort. With a full View of the English-Dutch Struggle against the Power of the House and Inquisition of the Spanish Armada. 2 vols. 8vo, Muslin, $4 00.

THUMPS. A Novel. By Geo. Wm. Curtis, Author of "The Potiphar Papers," "Prue and I," "Nile Notes of a Howadji," "Lotus-Eating," "Lotus-Eating," &c., &c. Illustrated by HOPPIN. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

ONE OF THEM. By Charles Lever, Author of "Charles O'Malley," "Harry Lorrequer," "The Dodd Family," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above Works by Mail, postage paid, to any distance in the United States under 3000 miles, on receipt of the Price.

Close of the Twenty-Second Volume.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
For May, 1861.

CONTENTS.

A SUMMER IN NEW ENGLAND.—IV. BOSTON AND LOWELL. Illustrated by Darley.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—An engrained Puzzle.—On State Street.—Worth a Hundred Pigeons.—Boston Common.—Boston Girl.—Lecture on Matrimony.—The Artist's Studio.—A Popular Orator.—Statue of Columbus.—A Haddock.—Lobster Pot.—Fond near Cohasset.—The Apple-Peeler.—The Haymakers.—Our Good Old Times.—Recreation formerly.—Recreation nowadays.—The Circus.—Extreme Hope and Fear.

THE OLD LOVE AND THE NEW.

THREE MONTHS IN LABRADOR. By Charles Lanman. (Concluded.)

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Camp at Flatwater.—Settler's Cabin.—Map of Kaipokok Bay.—Indian Encampment.—Esquimaux of Ungava.—Ilgolette.—The Doctor's Midlap.—Esquimaux Kyacks.—Esquimaux Moutaineers.—Tadoulac.—Chateau Islands.—Profile Rocks at Hensley Harbor.—Fort at Chateau Bay.

DIGGING FOR CARTHAGE.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Excavation at Carthage.—Cape Carthage.—The African Coliseum.—Ruins of Temple of Daal Hammon.—Punic Inscription.

THE DEBATABLE BABY.

GEORGE ROGERS CLARKE.

GILEY FARM. By Anthony Trollope.—Illustrated by J. E. Millais.

CHAPTER I. The Commencement of the Great Giley Farm Case.

CHAPTER II. Lady Mason and her Son.

CHAPTER III. The Cleeve.

CHAPTER IV. The Family Council.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Giley Farm.—Sir Peregrine and his Heir.

A SINGLE WOMAN'S STORY.

THE ADVENTURES OF PHILIP. By W. M. Thackeray.

CHAPTER VIII. Will he pronounced to be Cynical by the Reader?

CHAPTER IX. Contains one Riddle which is solved, and perhaps others.

CHAPTER X. In which we visit "Admiral Byng."

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Cynical.—Lawyer's Fireside.—Riddles.—With Admiral Byng.

PRINCE NAPOLEON.

A WOMAN'S ADVENTURE.

MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.

LITERARY NOTICES.

EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.

LITE FOR THE MILLION.

EDITOR'S DRAWER.—(With Ten Illustrations.)

FASHIONS FOR MAY.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Spring Fashions, No. 1.—Spring Fashions, No. 2.

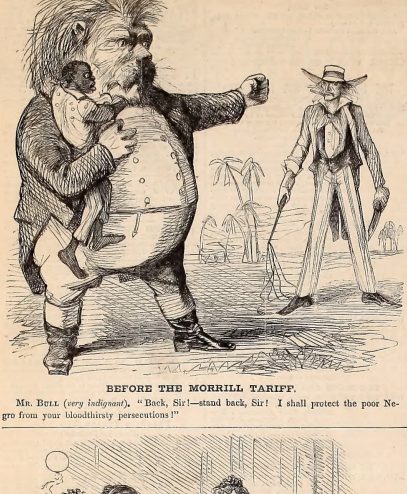
TERMS.

One Copy for one Year	$3 00
Two Copies for One Year	5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each)	2 00

And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of EIGHT SUBSCRIBERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MAGAZINE, together, one year, $4 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.



BEFORE THE MORRILL TARIFF.

MR. BULL (very indignant). "Back, Sir!—stand back, Sir! I shall protect the poor Negro from your bloodthirsty persecutions!"

AFTER THE MORRILL TARIFF.

MR. BULL (very indignant once more). "Take that, you Black Rascal! can't you attend to your task, and keep the flies off my Friend from the South? My Dear Sir! the only way to manage with those lazy Niggers is to drive 'em, drive 'em, Sir! with the lash, Sir!"

HELPING HIM ON!

CRUEL FAIR ONE (to Silent Partner). "Pray, have you NO Conversation?"

ADVERTISEMENTS.

A New Story

By Mrs. Ann S. Stephens.

Beadle's Dime Novels, No. 21

SYBIL CHASE;

Or, THE VALLEY RANCHE.

A TALE OF CALIFORNIA LIFE.

For Sale at all News Depots.

Complete, price Ten Cents.

Address BEADLE & COMPANY, NEW YORK.

WHEELER & WILSON'S SEWING MACHINES

At reduced prices, with Glass Cloth Presser, Improved Loop-Check, New Style Hemmer, Binder, Corder, etc. Office, No. 505 Broadway, New York.

"This Machine makes the 'LOCK STITCH,' and ranks highest, on account of the elasticity, p rmanence, b auty and general desirableness of the stitching when done, and the wide range of its applic tion."

[Reported American Institute, New York.

A PAIR OF REAL NOVELTIES, AND ONE WITHOUT A MATE.

THE "PAPER" TIE. THE "RELIEF" TIE

Patent applied for. Patented Jan 29, 1861

"A new Tie every A pair of "Reliefs" day." from tying Bows.

THE "LACE EDGE" TIE (exquisitely beautiful). SMITH & BROUWER, Sole Manufacturers, No. 38 Warren St., N.Y.

N. B.—We sell to WHOLESALE JOBBERS ONLY. Country Merchants can order our goods of ANY Jobber.

Wilkie Collins's Best Book.

Second Edition Now Ready.

The Crossed Path.

A Story of Modern Life and Manners.

By Wilkie Collins,

Author of "The Dead Secret," "The Woman in White," etc.

It ing by far the best book ever yet written by him, is published THIS DAY, and should be read by everybody, and is complete in one large duodecimo volume, bound in cloth, for One Dollar and Twenty-five Cents; or in two volumes, paper covers, for One Dollar.

Second edition in one week is published this day, and for sale by

T. B. Peterson & Brothers,

306 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

☞ Booksellers, News Agents, and all others, will please send on their orders at once for whatever they may want of the above.

☞ Copies sent per mail to any one, free of postage, on receipt of the price.

Now! when the Times are Hard!!

Is the time to purchase

BOOKS! BOOKS!! BOOKS!!!

A GIFT with every Book that is of the value of One Dollar and upwards is presented at the time of sale.

The GIFTS vary in value from Fifty Cents up to One Hundred Dollars, and are impartially distributed among purchasers.

D. W. Evans & Co.,

Pioneer Gift Book Store,

677 Broadway, New York,

Have especial satisfaction in calling the attention of the Public to their immense and varied Stock of Books, which is now larg r than ever. They would also remark, that th y have made VERY LARGE ADDITIONS TO THEIR PREVIOUSLY LARGE ASSORTMENT OF GIFTS, and are thus enabled to offer Greater Inducements than Ever!!!

We have always on hand all the NEW BOOKS, directly they are published, which we invariably sell at the Publishers' regular price. The gift is literally a GIFT, and is not paid for by the purchaser in any way whatever, except in so far as the recipient of the gift is the means of advertising us and our business. Gifts worth $500, at the lowest wholesale prices, are impartially distributed with every $1000 worth of books sold.

PARTICULAR ATTENTION is requested to our CATALOGUES, which contains a most valuable collection of standard publications in

EVERY DEPARTMENT OF LITERATURE, including the standard works of French, German, Spanish, and Italian authors; school and college text-books, scientific works, law and medical books. A fine assortment of JUVENILE WORKS.—Games, sports, etc.; Humorous works, containing no end of fun; all the standard Poets, in plain and elegant bindings, all sizes and styles; Travels and Adventures, a very large collection.

BIBLES and PRAYER-BOOKS, from the plainest to the most elegant styles, in velvet, antique, etc. The largest collection of works of Fiction (by all the great authors) to be found in the United States.

HYMN BOOKS for all the religious denominations, in every variety of size and binding; Gilt Books and Musical Instruction Books; all the standard works in Biography and History, etc., etc., etc.

IN SHORT, EVERY BOOK, no matter upon what subject, can be procured of D. W. EVANS & CO., with a GIFT in all ases where the book is of the retail value of One Dollar and upward.

THE GIFTS CONSIST OF GOLD AND SILVER WATCHES, Silver Plated Ware, costly sets of Cameos Mosaic, Fhrenwire, Coral, Garnet, Turquoise, and Lava Jewelry; Gold Lockets, Gold Pencils, Gold Pens, Portemonnaies.

GOLD BRACELETS, Gents' Boom Studs and Sleeve Buttons, Scarf Pins, heavy Gold Signet Rings, Pearl Silver-mounted Card Cases, Silver Fruit Baskets, Gents' Gold Chains, Ladies' Neck and Chacelaine Chains.

SEWING MACHINES, by all the best makers, heavy Gold Crosses, Silver Goblets and Pitchers, and a THOUSAND VARIETIES OF USEFUL AND ELEGANT ARTICLES.

OUR 72 PAGE CATALOGUE will be mailed to any address on application. Send for it, for if you don't wish to order anything, you will find it a very valuable book for reference, as it contains all the desirable books in print,

AND WILL COST YOU NOTHING.

D. W. EVANS & CO.,

PUBLISHERS AND GIFT BOOKSELLERS,

677 Broadway, New York.

WARD'S

Perfect Fitting Shirts,

MADE TO MEASURE AT $18 PER DOZEN, OR SIX FOR $9.

MADE OF NEW YORK MILLS MUSLIN,

With fine Linen Bosoms, and warranted as good a Shirt as sold in the retail stores at $2.50 each.

ALSO, THE VERY BEST SHIRTS THAT CAN BE MADE AT $2 EACH.

SELF-MEASUREMENT FOR SHIRTS.

Printed directions, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of Shirts, sent free everywhere, and so easy to understand, that any one can take their own measure for Shirts. I warrant a good fit. The cost to be paid to the Express Company on receipt of goods.

S. W. H. WARD, from London,

No. 387 Broadway, N. Y., up Stairs.

John B. Dunham.

Overstrung Grand Square and Upright Pianos.

Established in 1834.

Are pronounced to be the best Pianos manufactured. Each instrument warranted 5 years. Send for Circular. Warerooms and Manufactory, 75 to 85 East 13th Street, near Broadway, N. Y.

New Work by the Author of "ADAM BEDE."

Now Ready:

Silas Marner,

The Weaver of Raveloe.

By GEORGE ELIOT,

Author of

"Adam Bede," "The Mill on the Floss," and "Scenes of Clerical Life."

12mo, Muslin, 75 cents; Paper, 50 cents.

☞ Sent by mail, post-paid on receipt of the price.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

Harper's Weekly.

PRICE FIVE CENTS.

TERMS.

One Copy for Twenty Weeks	$1 00
One Copy for One Year	2 00
One Copy for Two Years	4 00
Five Copies for One Year	9 00
Twelve Copies for One Year	20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year	40 00

Harper's Weekly and Harper's Magazine, one year, $4 00.

Volumes I., II., III., and IV. of HARPER'S WEEKLY, handsomely bound in Cloth extra, Price $3 50 each, are now ready.

* To postmasters getting up a Club of Twelve or Twenty-five, a Copy will be sent gratis. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. Specimen Numbers gratuitously supplied.

☞ Clergymen and Teachers supplied at the lowest CLUB RATES.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. V.—No. 226.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 27, 1861. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1861, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE BOMBARDMENT OF FORT SUMTER.

WE devote most of our space this week to illustrations of this memorable event. On pages 264 and 265 will be found a general picture of the BOMBARDMENT, SEEN FROM FORT JOHNSON. On page 260 we give a picture of the INTERIOR OF FORT SUMTER during the terrible rain of shot and shell from the Confederate batteries; and on page 261 an accurate MAP OF THE HARBOR OF CHARLESTON, showing the relative position of Sumter and of the batteries by which it was surrounded. We now subjoin, by way of record, a brief account of the transaction.

On 8th April Lieutenant Talbot and Mr. Chew, messengers from the President, informed General Beauregard that the Government would supply Major Anderson with provisions—which were denied him by the South Carolinians—peaceably if they could, forcibly if they must. General Beauregard referred the message to his Government at Montgomery, and was ordered to reduce the fort. He summoned Major Anderson to surrender on 11th. The reply was:

"I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication, demanding the evacuation of this fort, and to say, in reply thereto, that it is a demand with which I regret that my sense of honor and my obligations to my Government prevent my compliance."

Accordingly at 4 27 A.M. on 12th fire was opened from Fort Moultrie on Fort Sumter. To this Major Anderson replied with three of his barbette guns, after which the batteries on Mount Pleasant, Cummings's Point, and the Floating Battery opened a brisk fire of shot and shell. Major Anderson did not reply, except at long intervals, until between seven and eight o'clock, when he brought into action the two tiers of guns looking toward Fort Moultrie and Stevens's iron battery. The fire continued brisk all day. At 7 P.M. a heavy rain-storm caused a cessation of hostilities till 11 P.M. Major Anderson appears to have employed the interval in repairing damages. At or about 11 P.M. the fire recommenced, and a shell was thrown into Fort Sumter from each battery every twenty minutes during the night. With daybreak the heavy bombardment recommenced from all the batteries; the fire was returned from Fort Sumter with vigor until about 8 A.M., when Fort Sumter was perceived to be on fire. Major Anderson's fighting then slackened, but the fire of the besiegers increased in intensity. At about 10 A.M. Major Anderson lowered his flag to half-mast in token of distress; perhaps as a signal to the United States vessels which were lying at anchor outside the bar, unable to get into the harbor so as to participate in the conflict. About half past ten one or two explosions took place in the fort; it has since been ascertained that these proceeded from the heating of piles of shells. Meanwhile the fire progressed rapidly; the whole roof of the barracks was a sheet of flame, and flames and smoke issued thickly from the casemates. At or about eleven Major Anderson ceased firing, and devoted his whole attention to putting out the fire. At about noon some of his men were noticed on the wharf of the fort handing in buckets of water; the besiegers' fire, which had never slackened, was at once directed upon them. In a few minutes afterward Major Anderson hauled down his flag. About then put off, containing ex-Governor Manning, Major D. R. Jones, and Colonel Charles Allston, to arrange the terms of surrender, which were the same as those offered on the 11th. These were official. They stated that all proper facilities would be afforded for the removal of Major Anderson and his command, together with the company arms and property, and all private property, to any post in the United States he might elect. Major Anderson stated that he surrendered his sword to General Beauregard as the representative of the Confederate Government. General Beauregard said he would not receive it from so brave a man.

The correspondent of the Press telegraphs on 14th:

"The last act in the drama of Fort Sumter has been concluded. Major Anderson has evacuated, and, with his command, departed by the steamer Isabel from the harbor. He saluted his flag, and the company, then forming on the parade-ground, marched out upon the wharf, with drum and fife playing 'Yankee Doodle.'

"During the salute a pile of cartridges burst in one of the casemates, killing two men and wounding four others. One was buried in the fort with military honors. The other will be buried by the soldiers of South Carolina.

"The scene in the city after the raising of the flag of truce and the surrender is indescribable; the people were perfectly wild. Men on horseback rode through the streets proclaiming the news, amidst the greatest enthusiasm.

"On the arrival of the officers from the fort they were marched through the streets, followed by an immense crowd, hurrahing, shouting, and yelling with excitement.

"The number of soldiers in the fort was about seventy, besides twenty-five workmen, who assisted at the guns. His stock of provisions was almost exhausted, however. He would have been starved out in two more days.

"The entrance to the fort is mined, and the officers were told to be careful, even after the surrender, on account of the heat, lest it should explode.

"Several fire companies were immediately sent down to Fort Sumter to put out the fire, and any amount of assistance was offered.

"The fort is burned into a mere shell; not a portion of wood-work can be found. The guns on one side of the parapet are entirely dismounted, others split, while the gun-carriages are knocked into splinters.

"The flames have destroyed every thing. Both officers and soldiers were obliged to tie on their faces in the casemates to prevent suffocation."

SWEARING IN VOLUNTEERS AT WASHINGTON.

WE publish herewith, from a sketch by our special artist in Washington, a picture of the SWEARING IN OF THE VOLUNTEERS called out by the President for the defense of the Federal Capital. The Washington Star describes the scene thus:

"As we went to press yesterday the volunteer companies were responding to the call of the War Department for volunteers to defend the city of Washington from assault. In the case of some of the companies a portion of the members declined to take the oath required by the Department of all soldiers mustered into the United States service, and the deficit in the ranks of said companies thereby brought them below the standard requirement as to numbers, and they were not received by the Government.

"The following is the form of the oath administered to the volunteers who were mustered into the service of the United States yesterday. It is nothing more than the usual army oath. It was administered by General Thomas, of the District of Columbia Militia:

"'I, ——, do solemnly swear that I will bear true allegiance to the United States of America; that I will serve them honestly and faithfully against all enemies or opposers whatsoever; that I will obey the orders of the President of the United States, and of the officers appointed over me, according to the rules of the armies of the United States: so help me God."

GENERAL THOMAS SWEARING IN THE VOLUNTEERS CALLED INTO THE SERVICE OF THE UNITED STATES AT WASHINGTON, D. C.

"The Washington Riflers were inspected and mustered into the service, and every man in the line took the required oath. So hortify sez the thing done by the entire company that the crowd of spectators outside the fence burst out into quite a demonstration of applause."

STEER N.W.

THE FIRST OFFICER'S STORY.

ABOUT two years ago I left the service. I was tired of it, and as I wanted some more exciting employment I joined a whaler. We were unlucky —somehow, I bring no luck any where—and we were nearly empty. We were cruising up here in the north, and thinking of making for home, as the weather had changed; and the ice forms precious quick in those latitudes when it once begins. The captain naturally wanted to hang on to the last for the chance of another haul.

One bright afternoon, just after eight bells, I made up the log, and took it to the captain's cabin. I knocked at the door, and as nobody answered I walked in. I thought it odd the captain hadn't answered me, for there he was, sitting at his desk, with his back to me, writing. Seeing he was employed, I told him I had brought the log, laid it down on the table behind him, and as he made no answer I walked out. I went on deck, and the first person I met was the captain. I was puzzled —I could not make out how he had got there before me.

"How did you get up here?" I said; "I just left you writing in your cabin."

"I have not been in my cabin for the last half-hour," the captain answered, but I thought he was chaffing, and I didn't like it.

"There was some one writing at your desk just now," I said; "if it wasn't you, you had better go and see what it was. The log is made up. I have left it in your cabin, Sir," and with that I walked sullenly away. I had no idea of being chaffed by the captain, to whom I had taken a dislike.

"Mr. Brown," said the captain, who SAW I was nettled, "I must have been mistaken, my desk is locked. But come—we'll go down and see about it."

I followed the captain into the cabin. The log was on the table, the desk was closed, and the cabin was empty. The captain tried the desk—it was locked.

"You see, Mr. Brown," he said, laughing, "you must have been mistaken, the desk is locked."

I was positive—"Somebody may have picked the lock," I said.

"But they couldn't have closed it again," the captain argued, "but to satisfy you, I will open it, and see if the contents are safe, though there is not much here to tempt a thief."

He opened the desk, and there—stretched right across it—was a sheet of paper, with the words "Steer N.W." written in an odd cramped hand.

The captain looked at the paper, and then handed it to me.

"You are right, Mr. Brown; somebody has been here. This is some hoax."

We sat there some time talking, and trying to guess what could be the object of such a joke—if joke it was meant to be. I tried to slyly look behind the man that I had seen at the desk with that of any of the crew. I could not do it. It is true I had at first taken the man for the captain, but now points of difference suggested themselves. I had not looked very attentively at the figure, but still I was under the impression that the coat I had on was brown, and the hair, which appeared under the cap, seemed, as I remembered it, to have been longer and whiter than the captain's.

Not to appear to suspect any one in particular, the captain determined to have up all the crew. We had them up, one by one. We examined them, and made of those who could write, write "Steer N.W.," but we gained no clew. The mystery remained unsolved.

That evening I sat drinking my grog with the captain in his cabin. We were neither of us inclined to be talkative. I tried to think of home, and the pleasure it would be to see old England again, but still my thoughts always wandered back to that mysterious writing. I tried to read, but I caught myself furtively peering at the desk, expecting to see the figure sitting there.

The captain had not spoken for some time, and was sitting in his face buried in his hands. At last, he suddenly looked up, and said,

"Suppose we alter her course to Northwest, Mr. Brown?"

I don't know what it was; I can not hope to make you understand the feeling in my mind that followed those words; it was a sense of relief from a horrible nightmare. I was ashamed of the childish pleasure I felt, but I could not help answering eagerly, "Certainly; shall I give the order?"

I waited no longer, but hurried on deck and altered the course of the vessel.

It was a most frosty night, and as I looked at the compass before going below, I felt strangely pleased, and caught myself chuckling and rubbing my hands—at what, I can not say—I didn't know then, but a great weight had been taken off my mind.

I went down to the cabin, and found the captain pacing up and down the small space. He stopped as I came in, and looking up, said, abruptly,

"I can see no harm, Sir, Brown."

"If this breeze continues," I answered, "we can hold on for thirty hours or so, but then I should think—"

"But then—we shall find ice. How's the wind?"

"Steady, north by east."

We sat down and finished our grog. I had the morning watch to keep next day. I was too restless to sleep after it, so I kept on deck the whole of the day. Even that did not satisfy me. I was continually running up into the tops with my glass, but every time I came down disappointed. The captain was as unquiet as myself. Something we expected to happen, but of what it was to be we could form no idea. The second officer, I believe, thought us both crazy; indeed, I often wondered, myself, at the state I was in. Evening came, and nothing had turned up. The night was bright, and the captain determined to carry on under easy sail till morning.

Morning came; and with the first gray light I was on deck. It was bitterly cold. Those only who have seen them can form an idea of the delicate tints of the morning sky in those Northern Seas. But I was in no humor to appreciate the beauties of nature. There was a mist low down on the horizon; I waited impatiently for it to lift. It lifted soon, and I could not be mistaken—beyond it I could see the shimmer of ice. I sent down to tell the captain, who came on deck directly.

"It is no use, Mr. Brown," he said; "you must put her about."

"Wait one moment," I said; "wait one moment, the mist is lifting more, it will be quite clear directly."

The mist was indeed lifting rapidly. Far to the North and West we could see the ice stretching away in one unbroken field. I was trying to see whether that appearance over to the East, and toward the West, when the captain, seizing my arm with one hand, and pointing straight ahead with the other, cried out,

"My God! there is a ship there."

The mist had risen like a curtain, and there, sure enough, about three miles ahead, was a ship seemingly firmly packed in the ice. We stood looking at it in silence. There was some meaning after all in that mysterious warning, was the first thought that suggested itself to me.

"She's hipped but, Sir," said old Shiel, who, with the rest of the crew, had been busily watching our new discovery. I was trying to make her out with the glass, when the flash of a gun, quickly followed by the report, told me that she had seen us. Up went the flag, Union downward. We needed no signal to know her distress. The captain ordered the second officer off into the boat. I watched him as he made his way over the ice with a few of the men toward the ship. They soon returned with eight of the ship's crew. It was a dismal account they gave of their situation. They might have saved their way out of the ice, but the ship was so injured that she could not have floated an hour. The largest of their boats had been stove in, the others were hardly seaworthy. They were preparing, however, to take to them as a last resource when our welcome arrival put an end to their fears. Another detachment was soon brought off, and the captain with the remainder of his crew was to follow immediately.

I went down to my cabin, and tried to think over the singular fate which had brought us to the rescue of this ship's crew. I could not divest myself of the idea that some supernatural agency was connected with that paper in the desk; and I consoled at the thought of what might have been the consequences if we had neglected the warning. The boat coming alongside interrupted my reverie. In a few seconds I heard a step.

I found the captain talking to a fine old sailor-like looking man, whom he introduced to me as Captain Squires, and whom the captain shook hands with me, and we remained talking some time. I could not keep my eyes off his face; I had a conviction that I knew him somewhere, though I could not tell. Every now and then I seemed to catch at some clew, which vanished as soon as touched. At last I turned round to speak to some of his men: I could not be mistaken—there was the long white hair, the brown coat. He was the man I had seen writing at the captain's desk!

That evening I and the captain told the story of the paper to Captain Squires, who gravely and in silence listened to our conjectures. He was too thankful for his escape out of such imminent peril to question the means by which it had been brought about. At the captain's request he wrote "Steer N.W." We compared it with the original writing. There could be no doubt of it. It was in the same old, cramped hand.

Can any one solve the mystery?

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, APRIL 27, 1861.

By the President of the United States:

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas, The laws of the United States have been for some time past and now are opposed, and the execution thereof obstructed, in the States of South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Florida, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas, by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the Marshals by law:

Now, therefore, I, ABRAHAM LINCOLN, President of the United States, in virtue of the power in me vested by the Constitution and the laws, have thought fit to call forth, and hereby do call forth, the Militia of the several States of the Union, to the aggregate number of 75,000, in order to suppress said combinations, and to cause the laws to be duly executed. The details for this object will be immediately communicated to the State authorities through the War Department.

I appeal to all loyal citizens to favor, facilitate, and aid this effort to maintain the honor, the integrity, and the existence of our National Union and the perpetuity of popular government, and to redress wrongs already long enough endured.

I deem it proper to say that the first service assigned to the force hereby called forth will probably be to repossess the forts, places, and property which have been seized from the Union, and, in every event, the utmost care will be observed, consistently with the objects aforesaid, to avoid any devastation, any destruction of, or interference with property, or any disturbance of peaceful citizens in any part of the country; and I hereby command the persons composing the combinations aforesaid to disperse and retire peaceably to their respective abodes within twenty days from this date.

Deeming that the present condition of public affairs presents an extraordinary occasion, I do, hereby, in virtue of the power in me vested by the Constitution, convene both Houses of Congress. The Senators and Representatives are therefore summoned to assemble at their respective chambers at twelve o'clock, noon, on Thursday, the fourth day of July next, then and there to consider and determine such measures as, in their wisdom, the public safety and interest may seem to demand.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand, and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the City of Washington, this fifteenth day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-one, and of the independence of the United States the eighty-fifth.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

By the President.
WILLIAM H. SEWARD, Secretary of State.

THE WAR.

WAR is declared. President Lincoln's proclamation, which we publish above, is an absolute proclamation of war against the Gulf States. The die is now cast, and men must take their sides, and hold to them. No one who knows any thing of the Southern people supposes for a moment that, having gone so far as to bombard Fulton Fortress and capture it, they will now succumb without a fight. No one who has seen the recent manifestations of popular sentiment in the North can doubt that the Northern blood is up, and that they will listen no more to talk of compromise, truce, or treaty, until they are fairly beaten.

Let us then forbear puling, and look the situation in the face. There are some among us still who whine about the evils of civil war. These are they who, with a burglar in their house, his hand on the throat of their wife or daughter, would quote texts on the loveliness of Christian forbearance and charity. Nobody —outside of lunatic asylums—doubts that civil war is an enormous calamity. On this point all are agreed. But as it has actually begun, and exists, what is the use of deprecating it? What should we think of a doctor who, summoned to visit a half-dying patient, should wring his hands hopelessly and bewail the malignancy of disease?

The United States Government has called into the field 75,000 militiamen, who, added to the regular force, will swell the effective army to nearly 90,000 men. It is understood that further calls are to be made upon the States, to the extent of 200,000 more. The plan, as understood by military officers, is to form three camps: one at the Federal capital, consisting of 50,000 men, who will constitute an army of observation on the Border States, and will be commanded by Lieutenant-General Scott in person; another of 75,000 men, which will be located in the valley of the Ohio, with a view to an ultimate movement down the Mississippi; and a third, of over 100,000 men, which will be situated in the suburbs of New York. Rumor asserts that General Wool will command the New York army, and General Sumner the army on the Mississippi; but of these matters of course nothing is known. In the mean time, the navy will be occupied in closing the ports of the seceded States. It seems to be expected that by August next there will not be a port in South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas, which will not be hermetically sealed by United States ships of war.

This is the Government programme. On the other hand, the Seceders are gathering soldiers vigorously on their side. It is stated that at the siege of Sumter over 7000 men were engaged, and that, simultaneously, 5000 were on duty opposite Fort Pickens. Letters from Montgomery say that 32,000 additional men are being mustered for an attack on Washington. As the population of the eight seceded States, exclusive of negroes, is over 2,000,000, it should be possible for Mr. Davis to collect 100,000 able-bodied troops on one point. With such a force, secretly if not openly favored by the Border States, a very formidable movement might be made on Washington.

OUR ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE WAR.

IN view of the momentous events which are impending, and of the actual outbreak of civil war, the proprietors of Harper's Weekly beg to draw public attention to the following list of engravings which have been published in this journal within the past few weeks, as evidence of the fidelity and thoroughness with which they are redeeming their pledge to "give a well-drawn, well-engraved, and well-printed illustration of every important event that occurs." Almost all of the illustrations of the Southern Forts have been made from drawings by United States Officers; and the proprietors of Harper's Weekly take this opportunity of informing Officers of the Army and Navy serving in the South that they will be glad to receive sketches of Forts and Scenes of Interest at the present crisis, and to pay liberally for such as they may use. Any officer in either service can obtain the Weekly gratuitously for six months by sending his address to this office.

Illustrations of the War.

SEVERAL SKETCHES OF MAJOR ANDERSON IN FORT MOULTRIE.

THE ENTRY INTO FORT SUMTER.

THE CONFLAGRATION OF CASTLE PINCKNEY BY THE CHARLESTON TROOPS.

MAPS OF THE CHARLESTON HARBOR.

FORT SUMTER, AS IT NOW STANDS.

THE MARINE SCHOOL AT CHARLESTON.

THE SUMTER, RUNNING THE BLOCKADE.

THE CUNARD-HOUSE AND POWDER MAGAZINE AT CHARLESTON.

FORT MOULTRIE—CHARLESTON IN THE DISTANCE.

PORTRAIT OF MAJOR ANDERSON, U.S. ARMY.

PORTRAITS OF MAJOR ANDERSON'S COMMAND.

PORTRAIT OF GOVERNOR PICKENS.

PORTRAIT OF JUDGE MAGRATH, SECRETARY OF STATE.

PORTRAIT OF COLONEL DE SAUSSURE OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

PORTRAIT OF REV. DR. BACHMAN.

THE SOUTH CAROLINA DELEGATION IN CONGRESS.

THE WASHINGTON ARTILLERY OF CHARLESTON.

THE CHARLESTON ZOUAVES.

THE CHARLESTON-CHARLESTON HARBOR.

THE "STAR OF THE WEST."

THE FLAG OF FORT SUMTER.

FIRING ON THE "STAR OF THE WEST."

THE RECOVERY AT LAST NIGHT'S MEETING ON FORT SUMTER.

DISMANTLING GUNS AT FORT MOULTRIE.

FORT SUMTER, SEEN FROM THE REAR.

THE MAIN BATTERY OF FORT SUMTER.

THE CASEMATES AT FORT SUMTER.

THE PARADE-GROUND AT FORT SUMTER.

THE GORGE AT FORT SUMTER.

THE INTERIOR AT FORT SUMTER.

A TEN-INCH COLUMBIAD AT FORT SUMTER.

INTERIOR OF BARRACKS AT FORT SUMTER.

OFFICERS' QUARTERS AT FORT SUMTER.

THE GOOD-BY OF THE U. S. SOLDIERS' WIVES TO FORT SUMTER.

MAJOR ANDERSON'S QUARTERS AT FORT SUMTER.

BOMBARDMENT OF FORT SUMTER—SCENE AT FORT SUMTER.

BOMBARDMENT OF FORT SUMTER.

THE FLAG-STAFF SHOT THROUGH DURING THE BOMBARDMENT.

PORTRAIT OF GENERAL BEAUREGARD.

THE CITY OF WASHINGTON, D. C.

THE "BALTIC" AND "ILLINOIS" SHIPPING TROOPS FOR THE SOUTH.

THE CITY OF CHARLESTON.

THE BOMBARDMENT, SEEN FROM FORT SUMTER.

MORRIS ISLAND, AS SEEN FROM FORT SUMTER.

SULLIVAN'S ISLAND, AS SEEN FROM FORT SUMTER.

THE IRON-CLAD BATTERY ON CUMMING'S POINT, AS SEEN FROM FORT SUMTER.

FORT PICKENS, FLORIDA, LOOKING SEAWARD.

PORTRAIT OF LIEUTENANT SLEMMER.

PORTRAIT OF LIEUTENANT GILMAN.

VIEW OF FORT PICKENS, SHOWING THE SALLY-PORT.

THE FLAG-STAFF BASTION AT FORT PICKENS.

THE SALUTE ON 22D FEBRUARY AT FORT PICKENS.

THE BOAT-HOUSE AND LANDING AT FORT PICKENS.

ONE OF THE ISLAND BARRACK BATTERIES AT FORT PICKENS.

THE CONFEDERATE BATTERIES AGAINST FORT PICKENS.

SEA BATTERY AT FORT MONROE, VIRGINIA.

PRINCESS ANNE BATTERY AT FORT MONROE.

TESTING THE BIG COLUMBIAD AT FORT MONROE.

FORT MONROE.

SHIPS IN THE NORFOLK NAVY-YARD.

FORT CLINCH, FLORIDA.

FORT TAYLOR, KEY WEST.

FORT SPRIGG, ALABAMA.

UNITED STATES ARSENAL AT LITTLE ROCK, ARKANSAS.

THE NAVY-YARD AT NORFOLK.

THE NAVY-YARD AT WASHINGTON.

FORT WASHITA, TEXAS.

FORT ARBUCKLE, TEXAS.

THE BRAZOS, TEXAS.

FORT BROWN, TEXAS.

FORT LAVACA, TEXAS.

FORT ISABEL, TEXAS.

THE ALAMO, SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS.

SURRENDER OF GENERAL TWIGGS, AT SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS.

THE WASHINGTON ARSENAL.

FORT ON CHANEY ISLAND.

FORT NORFOLK.

FORT WASHINGTON.

THE HOWARD ARMORY.

The proprietors of Harper's Weekly beg to state that they have made the most extensive arrangements for the illustration of future movements at the South, and that the public may rely upon finding in Harper's Weekly an accurate and reliable picture of every scene of interest to which occurrences may give rise.

The increasing circulation of Harper's Weekly renders it a most desirable advertising medium.

THE LOUNGER.

CIVIL WAR.

PEACE lounging is rather hard work in times like these. It is almost an interest in every human's heart is so intense that it is hard to escape the eagerness which is incompatible with true lounging. When one military neighbor may march at any moment to battle, and when you may march side by side with your military neighbor, the moment is so serious that we must help ourselves to a little song a little more rapidly and energetically than is the wont of loungers.

The grave events of the last few days will make every thoughtful citizen feel how unstable, even in the most enlightened and prosperous countries, are the foundations of public order. The Government, of all the governments upon the globe, which has done most, and which promises most for human liberty and the general welfare, has passed through a shock so tremendous that, whatever the immediate result, the consequences are incalculable.

Those who have taken up arms against the Government claim that there is no rebellion or revolution. They have insisted from the beginning that they were merely resuming rights with which they had never absolutely parted. And it was necessary for them to take this ground, because revolutions can be justified only by extreme peril to rights and liberties, and the discontented citizens have forborne to make any such charge. The confederacy is at some future time their rights might be in danger is the reason proffered to the world for the resumption of what are claimed to be powers still in their rightful dismissal.

Whether it is called a revolution or not, however, is of no practical importance now. No Government, under the Act of the United States in this country, can recognize more than two ways of changing the fundamental law: one according to the forms of self-government, the other by revolution. Unless, therefore, the Government of the United States, unconstitutionally elected according to the very letter of the Constitution, had formally submitted to its own dissolution, it could regard the action of the dissatisfied citizens only as revolution. If a majority of the people

THE INTERIOR OF FORT SUMTER DURING THE BOMBARDMENT.—[SEE PAGE 257.]

MAP OF CHARLESTON HARBOR, SHOWING FORT SUMTER AND THE CONFEDERATE BATTERIES.—[SEE PAGE 257.]

THE GREAT HOUSE ON THE SHORE.

I HAD no one to counsel me, and my trial was bitter. I had idolized my mother, and she had been dead only three years. It seemed such a little while to me! I had not even yet grown accustomed to her absence. Not unfrequently, when I came in, I ran with thoughtless effort to the door of the room where she always used to sit, and called "Mother!" before I remembered that there was none to answer. The sound of her voice stole often—was it from out of the grave?—to my ears. I could see, looking toward her chair in twilight, the sweet, patient face which slow disease had made so pale; the white, calm forehead, with the soft hair brushed away from the throbbing temples.

Short as the years had seemed to me, they had been long enough for my father to woo and win another bride. I was waiting for her home-coming now.

Had he forgotten—could he have forgotten—the old love and the old vows? Oh, how bitter my heart grew as I thought about it! My mother had been the wife of his youth; his first love, whom he wooed with a boy's tremulous tenderness. I had found in her desk, since her death, some of his early letters. What vows were in them! What words, whose strength and fire leaped over the years between and thrilled my heart with something of the glow they must have brought to that of their girl-reader! Were they mere words, then? Had the soul in them died with the dead years? It seemed so, for the husband of Margaret Raymond was bringing home another bride.

I had heard that this new wife was handsome and wealthy; I supposed she would be proud and fashionable also. I felt that I could not stand so distinctly, and scorned to give my neighbors a chance of enjoyment in the disagreement between Squire Ellingwood and his daughter. I would have gone out of the house with the slender fortune I had inherited from my dead mother, instead of remaining to see a stranger in the place that's dear. But I despised gossip, and was too proud to endure pity; therefore I staid in my father's house, and waited for the home-coming of his second wife with a slow hatred kindling in my heart. I professed to be a Christian, but I did not realize to what unchristian tempers I was giving room. I even flattered myself that I was meekly, fully good and self-sacrificing, because I refrained from open rebellion, and especially because I had omitted outward sign of regret. Thus, I had adorned the house with flowers—regal autumn blossoms —for it was already the first of October. I had a bright fire kindled in the open grate of the dining-room, and I had ordered a sumptuous dinner. Moreover, I had put on my gala robes, as for a festival. Silvery silk, glistening lace, was rose and fall with the beatings of my bitter, scornful heart.

I heard the carriage at last, and went to the door. My father was helping out a slight, veiled figure. In his care for her he seemed scarcely to see me at first; but he gave me a kiss, tender though hasty, as he came up the steps.

"She is very tired, Madge," he said. "Can you show her to her room at once?"

I offered the stranger my hand, but I hardly knew how to address her. Call her mother I would not, and I hesitated to wound my father by saying Madame or Mrs. Ellingwood; as I comprehended the matter by giving her no title at all.

"Your room is ready," I said, as I took her hand. "I think you will find it very nicely comfortable. I am sorry you are so fatigued."

I walked before her up stairs, and threw open the door of her room—the very room where my mother had died. In giving her this chamber I had taken a certain grim satisfaction. I thought a dead love would come between those young lips and my father's—that the love-words he strove to speak would grow cold with the chill of the grave. She looked in as I opened the door. I suppose it seemed pleasant to her, who did not know what ghost haunted it. The fire was bright on the hearth. Vases of deep-colored chrysanthemums, full of the varied autumn flowers, stood on the white-marble tops of the furniture. The bed was white, and the carpet crimson. The general blending of snow and fire was very pretty.

"How inviting it looks, and how kind you have been!" she said, in her low, lady-like voice, putting away her veil, and looking at me with a wistful expression in her great, innocent, brown eyes.

"Shall I stay to help you?" I asked, coldly.

Her eyes turned slowly and sadly away from my face.

"No, thank you. If you will have my trunks brought up I shall do very well."

I went down, gave the necessary order, and then sought my father in the drawing-room.

"Is Gertrude alone, Madge?" he asked, as I entered.

"Yes, Sir, she preferred to be."

I went and stood beside him, and he put his arm round my waist with all his old fondness.

"Nothing can ever come between us, Madge. No one can ever take your place in my heart, or your dear mother's either. Believe that, darling. I have not sought Gertrude because my first love had grown dim; but when your mother died it left a void in my heart and my home which I thank God for filling so worthily."

Soon he went out, to go up stairs I knew, to make up to her by his warmth and tenderness for whatever coldness she might have perceived in my greeting. How bitter and resentful I felt! It seemed only an aggravation of the wrong I thought he had done me for him to treat me with tenderness now, above all, for him to speak of his unchanged love for my mother.

When the bell rang they came down together—my father and his young wife, and for the first time I had an opportunity of deciding on her pretensions to beauty. Prejudiced against her as I was, I could but confess that she was very charming. A slender, yet perfectly formed little lady, with exquisite feet and hands, and motions so graceful that you would have known, by simply walking behind her, how refined a woman she was. Her face was peculiar yet beautiful. Except in her lips, which were bright crimson, she had not a particle of color; yet there was a kind of glow, such as a lamp imparts to the vase it shines through—a revelation of her soul. Her large, dark eyes were full of tenderness. Her hair was braided simply behind her ears, but no other style could have been so becoming to her small, elegantly shaped head. Her dress was perfection of its kind. I felt that here was not only was Squire Ellingwood's wife, but who had a fortune of her own—rich and handsome, yet matronly; a woman to whom servants and collar of point lace. Predisposed as I was to condemn her, I saw nothing with which it was possible to find fault. She took her seat at the head of the table, when my father led her to it, not ostentatiously, but with the quiet dignity of the future mistress. The dinner seemed insufferably long and tedious to me, but it was over at last and we returned to the drawing-room.

We sat there together, we three, before the bright fire, while the day went slowly down the hills. Her low seat was near my father's, to near that once or twice he reached over and laid his hand on her small white one, whereon, kindled by the firelight, the diamonds flashed like sparkles of flame. We did not talk much, and I was not restrained on them, for they both had natures fine and sensitive enough to feel the unexpressed antagonism of mine. At length she spoke to me:

"Are you too tired to go out of doors, Gertrude? The grounds are beautiful just at sunset."

How sunny and childlike her voice was which sprang to her lips, as she answered that she was quite rested now and would go for her shawl! I did not respond, but I rose and took the rose nearer to him, and held her a moment before he released her.

"You too, Madge," he said, turning to me. "Get your bonnet, and come with us."

"No, I thank you"—I tried to speak gayly—"you are too well acquainted with the grounds to need my assistance, and I am chilly. It is not necessary for me also to run the risk of taking cold."

He sighed. I think my manner wounded him a little; but he said nothing, and his face cleared when his Gertrude came down the stairs.

Soon they went out together, and I stood at the drawing-room window watching them. He was a tall, noble-looking man in the prime of life, a little past forty. His figure was manly and dignified, but his head was bent very tenderly down to the little creature clinging to his arm, with her warm, bright shawl drawn over her, and her light straw-hat resting on her brown braids.

"All men are alike, even the best of them," I said, bitterly, as I flung myself down on a chair to remain looking at the dead. What do they care for lips no longer ripe for kisses—for a brow on which the dust of the grave has settled? The first purity fades from the face, the comelier flesh, at each step, is enough to rivet their chains. It is idle to blame him. He but follows the law of his nature. But there is no excuse for me. Does she not believe in the immortality of the soul, that she is ready to rob a dead woman of her love and her husband? I thought I did, but I was not half so honestly in love. It is not natural she should care for a man more than twenty years her senior. She wanted a home, Mrs. Ellingwood—that was all. Much good may her name do her!"

I went up stairs and locked into their room. Already it bore the impress of occupation. Some one morning-dress hung over a chair, some tasteful trifles strewed the bureau. I sank upon my knees, and sobbed passionately. Does she pray?

"Mother!" I cried—"mother up in heaven! all else that is earthly may fail you—she may take your place in your husband's heart, your head, beside your hearth, in your very bridal chamber—she shall never win your daughter's love!"

Time passed on, and young Mrs. Ellingwood, as she was called, became almost the idol of the village. She was a liberal, kind-hearted woman, who were charmed with such an addition to their circle, to the rheumatic old widows, to whom she dispensed flannel and sound, practical advice; and for my father, it seemed to me that her hold on him grew every day stronger. And yet he was growing old strangely. His step began to lack sudden and terrible attacks of illness, which I did not understand. At such times he always chose to have her with him; and I was glad that she could move about the house with sad, white face, and eyes which seemed darkened with some unspoken grief. I should have pitied her, I know, but I could have loathed—could not love! him; but I never admitted to myself the possibility of that.

He changed much in these months of suffering. He had been always considerate; now he grew singularly, almost pitifully, gentle. He was very tender to me, and no word or look ever bore witness that he had ever been other than a loving father to me. If I had blamed him, I reproached myself for it now. He was all I had on earth, and my heart yearned to give him with an unutterable fondness.

One night—it was again October, just about a year after their marriage—I was roused at midnight by a step. I sprang up and looked toward the door. Just within it stood my step-mother. It was the first time she had ever entered my room. She held a lamp in her hand, and its rays streamed over her pallid face, as white almost as the dressing-gown she wore.

"Madge, dear Madge," she said, in a kind of awe-struck whisper, "hurry and dress yourself. I fear your father is dying. He has been subject for some time to severe attacks of heart disease; but he would not let you know it, because he wished to save you as long as possible from anxiety and suffering. He is worse now than I have ever seen him. Robert is gone for the doctor."

She had lighted my lamp as she spoke, and she went out of the room before I had collected my faculties sufficiently to answer her. Even in this bitter hour, when the father I had loved with such passionate tenderness lay dying, I found space in my heart for hatred and anger against her. Why had she not told me before? What right had she to keep the knowledge of his danger from me, his child?

I had no hope of his recovery for a single moment. I had heard of spirit-summonings which the mortal to whom they were sent had no power to gainsay or resist. A wild fancy took possession of me that so my mother, lonely in the land of strangers, had summoned me. I felt that he might of her soul would conquer. She would reclaim from the clasp of the living her lost bridegroom. Should I be willing to go?

I hurried down stairs. My father was leaning back in an easy chair. His face was ghastly with suffering, but he was still able to speak to me.

"Come hither, Madge, darling," he said, as he motioned to the place at his feet where his wife was kneeling.

I knelt down beside her—how could I help it then?—and his hands fell upon our two heads.

"You two shall have no quarrel," he gasped, "you two. For my sake you must love each other. Promise me that till one of you shall go forth as some good man's wife you will live together in this house where I shall leave you. Do you promise, Gertrude?"

Her head was not lifted, but her words came low and firm through her tears—"I do."

"And you, Madge? Promise quickly, if you would have me die in peace. Oh, my child, leave not this roof will be your safe shelter—Gertrude your companion."

The quivered, what could I answer? The struggle in my heart was fierce, but it was short. I hated her; I did not want to live with her; but I could not—no, I could not, pausing on the threshold of eternity for my answer.

"I promise, father," I said, solemnly.

For one instant his eyes rested with a brief, glad gleam. Then again his features were contorted with the terrible anguish of dissolution, and he was soon unable to utter a voice to say—

"I shall not be lonely in the land whence my summons comes. Margaret, my youth's love, waits for me. You will, Gertrude, my darling, for neither marry there nor are given in marriage, and we shall all love each other. You have made one heart of my life very happy."

Again the sudden, choking pause—the deathly agony overweeping the noble face—then a moan, a shiver, a long, half-whispered

"We were two daughters of one race:
She was the fairest in the face."

hummed Mrs. Ellingwood. "Your plea is irresistible."

She went up stairs, put on the same warm, bright shawl which she had worn the first day my father brought her home; and presently I stood at the window, as I stood that day, and watched two figures glancing about among the shrubbery.

"Poor fool!" I murmured, bitterly, sending my eyes after Ray Saltonstall, "does he not know it was only last year that she whispered just so sweetly in my father's ear?—that she would whisper just as sweetly to some new cavalier if he himself were gone? Never mind, chacun a son goût!"

If I was unhappy I did not confess it to my own heart, so why should I tell you? I meant to be very indifferent, and, to persuade myself that I was so, I sat down and commenced pulling the canvas threads out of a bouquet I had been embroidering on a broadcloth chair-cover. It was a steady, mechanical work, and it answered my purpose very well.

By-and-by they came back, and Mrs. Ellingwood went directly past the drawing-room door up stairs, Mr. Saltonstall came in, and sat down near my embroidery-frame. He looked steadily at me with those controlling blue eyes of his, and said,

"I have been making a request of Gertrude, which had some relation to you. I fear you have not treated her well, have you?"

My quick power blazed.

"Poor Mrs. Ellingwood!" I sneered. "It is melancholy that I should have behaved so badly as to force her to come to you with her complaints."

She has made no complaints. It was only from her hesitation at speaking to you on a certain subject that I judged; or rather, it was not only from that. I have thought all along that you did Gertrude great injustice."

"Surely not," I said, with bitter, scornful calmness. "I do her the utmost justice. I acknowledge her graces of fascination. Did she not begin her efforts for all his fidelity to a wife whom he idolized? I am quite prepared to admit her ability to attract."

"Miss Ellingwood, that is not what I meant. You are very wrong. Gertrude Blagden was not won unwooed; and when she turned away from younger—yes, and richer—suitors to marry your father, it was because he loved him as women seldom love, and never more than when he is a lifeless."

I was too much enraged to be kind or even prudent. I cried, scornfully,

"I could believe you. You offer a strong enough proof of your faith in her, I am sure, when you are ready to give all your life for her second love."

An expression I could not interpret flashed over his face. He came a little nearer to my embroidery-frame.

"Did you think that?" he asked. "Can it be that you supposed I was seeking Gertrude's love?"

"Surely." What else could I—could any one—have thought?"

"Then you have misjudged both her and me. It must be a loftier man than I who would woo Gertrude Ellingwood, or one who did not know how faithfully she had loved your father. It is you, Madge, who, with all your pride—in spite of the pride and passion of your nature—I love more than any thing else in the world. It was about this which I wished Gertrude to speak to you; for hitherto I have been a coward in your presence. Is it all in vain? Can I never be more to you than now?"

I knew in that moment how dear he was to me; but I could not answer him just then. I drew my hand from his clasp, and went up stairs to Gertrude. I found her in her chamber—the room where my mother had died. She was sobbing as she knelt before the bed. She did not hear my step; her blond agony shut out sight and sound. How I had misjudged that nature, outwardly so calm! I went up to her, and, for the second time in my life, I knelt down beside her.

"Gertrude," I whispered, "I have come to ask you to forgive me. I know now how wrong and how cruel I have been. Can you ever pardon me?"

"I have never blamed you, Madge. It was natural that you should feel as you did. I shall be only too grateful for your love now. I have been very lonely since your father died."

"If my love is worth any thing, thank Ray for the change. He has, in very truth, been a ray of sunshine to my heart."

"And you love him? Is it not so, Madge?"

"I can tell him that. He has a right to hear first."

I went down stairs, and found him where I had left him. I went up to him and put my hand in his. I answered his question.

"I could not give myself to you while the heart you sought might unwillingly be given. I think betrothal is like a sacrament—one should come to it with clean hands and a right heart. I have made my peace with Gertrude, and how you shall be all to me that you will."

"My Madge! my pride! my darling!"

"And so you love him very dearly?" Gertrude asked this that night, as we stood together in the twilight, waiting for the moon to come. I turned my face away from her kind eyes. My great happiness was so new, I felt shy in its presence. I did not like to answer that question to any but him; so I whispered, "Ray knows."

For ten years I have been out into the world with Ray, my conquering hero, my knight; better —my husband. Gertrude has passed them all in the great house on the Long Island shore, where she was brought a bride—where she will live a widow till the summons comes for her to pass through the opened gate which leads to the home country, where there is rest for all the dear departed—the fair, fair, silent land.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE CALL FOR VOLUNTEERS.

The Secretary of War has addressed the following circular to the Governors of States:

"WAR DEPARTMENT, WASHINGTON, April —, 1861.

"SIR,—Under the Act of Congress 'for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrection, repel invasions,' etc., approved February 28, 1795, I have the honor to request that the quota of militia to be immediately detached from the militia of your State the quota designated in the table below, to serve as infantry or riflemen for the period of three months, unless sooner discharged.

"Your Excellency will please communicate to me the name or names of officers to whom the rank will be given in the rendezvous, as it will be met as soon as practicable by an officer or officers to muster them into the service and pay of the United States. At the same time the oath of fidelity to the United States will be administered to officers and men.

"The mustering officer will be instructed to receive no men under the rank of commissioned officer who is in years apparently more than forty-five or under eighteen, or who is not in physical strength and vigor."

NEW YORK REPLIES.

On 16th the Legislature passed a bill authorizing the Governor to call out the thirty thousand State troops to be placed at the disposal of the President, and appropriating three million dollars for the purpose. The bill was amended from the form in which it passed the Assembly, was passed by the Senate, and returned to the Assembly, which again concurred in the amendments almost unanimously, there having but one negative vote. The preamble and resolutions were manifested in both Houses on the subject. Part of the troops have already been sent off by Washington.

SO DO MASSACHUSETTS,

Without waiting the official requisition for troops, but acting upon the call made by the Secretary of War, Governor Andrews telegraphed to the President as follows:

"The quota of troops required of Massachusetts is ready. How will you have them proceed?"

The Secretary of War responded:

"Send them by rail."

Part have gone forward by rail, the rest by steamer.

AND CONNECTICUT.

Governor Buckingham, of Connecticut, telegraphs to the Secretary of War, "Your requisition will have immediate attention."

AND VERMONT,

Governor Fairbanks, of Vermont, responds that one regiment of Green Mountain boys will be immediately raised.

AND OHIO,

Governor Dennison says to the Secretary of War, "Your dispatch calling on Ohio for thirteen regiments is received, and will be promptly responded to.

Adjutant-General Buckingham has issued orders carrying into effect the military laws just enacted by the General Assembly of Ohio, and providing for 6000 regular militia, besides the militia of reserve, not less than 35,000 men, to be subject to immediate transfer into the United States service. Commissions will be issued to the twenty-five regiments, which, when upon a war basis, will make 16,000 volunteers. The ranks of each war are thronged by persons eagerly inquiring for the news, and sending their names as volunteers to aid and support the General Government.

Governor Dennison telegraphs that Ohio will furnish her quota of twelve thousand men, and more if needed.

AND WISCONSIN,

Governor Randall, of Wisconsin telegraphs, "The call for one regiment will be promptly responded to, and further calls when made."

AND RHODE ISLAND,

Governor Sprague tendered, by telegraph, 1000 men, with himself as leader, and a second regiment if the Senate is not required to send more than one regiment.

AND MAINE,

Governor Washburn, of Maine, telegraphs the Secretary of War as follows: "Your dispatch is received, and the call will be promptly responded to. The people of the Maine, of all parties, will rally with alacrity to the maintenance of the Government and the Union."

AND ILLINOIS,

Governor Yates has issued a proclamation to convene the Legislature of Illinois in extra session on the 24th April, for the purpose of enacting such laws and adopting such measures as may be deemed necessary to place the loyal sovereign State, in a condition to render the most effective aid to the General Government in preserving the Union, enforcing the laws, protecting the public property and rights of the people, and also the raising of such money and other means as may be required to carry out the foregoing objects.

The troops are mustering, and ready to go forward.

AND KENTUCKY.

Governor Curtin has directed his Adjutant to forthwith establish two camps, one in eastern and the other in western Pennsylvania, for the reception of the thirteen thousand men required from that State; and he has also authorized his Adjutant to issue orders for a fifteen division officers to act promptly.

Pennsylvania has organized 130,000 men if necessary.

AND MINNESOTA,

Governor Ramsey, of Minnesota, offered the President one thousand volunteers. He replied: "The song would be long to sing on all dining occasions forever. The Union must be preserved."

A VOICE. "Governor, you have done your duty so far."

GOVERNOR. "Yes, and I intend to keep doing so."

VOICE. "Well stand by you."

Much enthusiasm was manifested.

A telegram dated Baltimore, April 14, says: The Union feeling in the city has been very much strengthened since Friday. Men with cockades and secession emblems have been seen by crowds, and applauded for their pluck.

The bark Fanny Fensham hoisted the secession flag today, and crowds assembled on the wharves to insist on it coming down. The captain afterward relented it, and required a detachment of Federal troops to take it from the people. The indignation is intense. All the other vessels in port hoisted the American flag. The opposition to Union men has not hoisted the flag under instructions from the owners of the vessel, for fear of the effect on their business.

Another of some date says: The Union feeling here is strong this morning. The Minute-Men number now, 2000 strong, who have been drilling ever since the Presidential election as a military organization, under out the State and Stripes this morning from their head-quarters, with the motto, "The Union and the Constitution."

AND NEW JERSEY.

General Halsted has issued the following call:

"HEAD-QUARTERS, HUDSON BRIGADE, N. J. S. M., JERSEY CITY, April 15, 1861.

"TO THE OFFICERS OF THE BRIGADE.—In view of the proclamation of the President of the United States, calling forth the militia of the several States to aid in the protection and execution of the laws, and the expected immediate call for the required quota of troops from this State by the Governor, Commander-in-Chief, I deem it most expedient to call together the immediate representatives of the several companies, to consult and determine what duty and honor require of us under these circumstances.

"I have no authority, by my office, or your enlistment in the organization of the State, to offer your services, unsolicited by you, to the General Government.

"I therefore request that the commissioned officers will assemble on Friday evening next, the 19th inst., at eight o'clock, at the Hudson House, Jersey City.

"JAMES E. HATFIELD, Brig.-Gen."

KENTUCKY REFUSES.

FRANKFORT, April 16, 1861.

"HON. SIMON CAMERON, Secretary of War:

"Your dispatch of 15th inst., received, say emphatically that Kentucky will furnish no troops for the wicked purpose of subduing her sister Southern States.

"B. MAGOFFIN, Governor of Kentucky."

A dispatch dated Louisville, April 16, says: "A large and enthusiastic meeting was held this morning to Proclaim Lincoln's war policy was held to-night. About 2000 people were present.

"Resolutions were unanimously adopted that Kentucky will not permit the marching of troops to the Confederate States, but shave the latter's destiny, if war must ensue. Speeches were made pertaining to the fore-going, and indorsing Governor Magoffin's response to Secretary Cameron."

Another dated Pedonah, April 16, says: "A meeting, irrespective of party, was held here yesterday, and high toned adopted resolutions recommending the government to immediately call out the militia, that we are with the South in interest and action; that the Governor be requested to call a special session of the Legislature forthwith at as early a day as practicable, to consider the position of this State and the action of Kentucky in the people of Kentucky to ignore party feelings and repose in the sovereignty the concrete and fratricidal policy of the Executive."

SO DOES MISSOURI.

The State Journal publishes the following reply from Governor Jackson to Secretary Cameron:

"EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
"JEFFERSON CITY, April 17, 1861.

"SIR,—Your requisition of the 15th instant, making a call on Missouri for four regiments of men for immediate service, has been received. There can be, I apprehend, no doubt but there will be no compliance on the part of this State with the requisition. Your requisition will have its intended effect. It will be regarded by the people of Missouri as part of a system of coercion, inaugurated by a illegal, unconstitutional, and revolutionary in its objects, in which Missouri will refuse to take part. I speak, in this one man will, of the State of Missouri, furnish or carry on such an unholy crusade.

"C. F. JACKSON, Governor of Missouri."

SO DOES NORTH CAROLINA.

The following dispatch was received:

"HON. SIMON CAMERON, Secretary of War:

"Your dispatch is received, and, if genuine, which its extraordinary character leads me to doubt, I have to say in reply that I regard the levy of troops made by the Administration for the purpose of subjugating the States of the South, a wicked violation of the Constitution and a usurpation of power. I can be no party to this wicked violence, and I will not obey any requisition that may upon the liberties of a free people. You can get no troops from North Carolina. This is my answer in detail when you call is received by mail.

"JOHN ELLIS, Governor of North Carolina."

A dispatch, dated Wilmington, North Carolina, April 15, says: "Business is entirely at a stand, with perfect contempt and indignation. The Union men openly denounce the Administration, and the Secessionists manifest joy."

THE FEELING IN TENNESSEE.

A dispatch dated Nashville, April 13, says: An enthusiastic public meeting was held here to-night. Resolutions were unanimously adopted, condemning the Administration for the coercive policy and warmongering with the South. The Hon. Mr. Zollicoffer and others spoke.

Another, dated Memphis, April 14, says: Great excitement prevails in this city over the news from Charleston, and great crowds are in the streets. The event is being celebrated by firing cannon, bonfires, music, and dancing.

Another, dated Memphis, April 16, says: There is intense excitement here. A tremendous meeting to-night adopted resolutions to the effect that there are no Union men now here.

A dispatch from Montgomery says: General Pillow guarantees to raise 10,000 men in Tennessee in twenty days. Governor Harris is in favor of them, and there is no doubt expressed but what he will accept of the offer.

THE SOUTHERN LOAN.

The 15th April was the day for the reception of subscriptions to the five million loan of the revolutionists. Of this sum the Times subscribed in Charleston, and $5,000,000 in New Orleans.

MR. DAVIS CALLS FOR PRIVATEERS

The following proclamation has been published:

PROCLAMATION OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES OF AMERICA.

"Whereas, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, has, by proclamation, announced intention of invading the Southern ports of the United States, for the purpose of capturing its fortresses, and thereby subverting its sovereignty and destroying the rights which belong to the domain of a foreign power; and whereas, it has thus become the duty of the Government to repel the threatened invasion, and defend the rights and liberties of the people by all the means in its power, not inconsistent with the usages of civilized warfare place at its disposal.

"Now, therefore, I, Jefferson Davis, President of the Confederate States of America, do issue this, my proclamation, inviting all persons who desire to render service in private armed vessels on the high seas, to aid this government in defending the right of the people, to make application for commissions or letters of marque and reprisal, to be granted under the seal of the Confederate States; and I do further notify all persons applying for letters of marque and reprisal to accompany their application with the name and suitable description of the vessel, the name and residence of each owner concerned, and the intended number of crew, and to sign each statement, and deliver the same to the collector of the port, or other officer of the customs of these Confederate States, to be by him transmitted to the Secretary of State, that I may not unlawfully withhold any commission, before any commission or letter of marque and reprisal to any person or persons applying for the same when revoked by the President of the Confederate States.

"And I do further specially enjoin on all persons holding offices, civil and military, under the authority of the Confederate States, that they be vigilant and zealous in the discharge of the duties incumbent upon them; and I, moreover, exhort the good people of these Confederate States, to support their country—for they justly claim at the hands of government—as they feel the wrongs of the past, and the perils which environ the approaching future. No serious enmity is more implacable, because unprovoked—no war more just, because waged in defense of wicked—no strife more inspiring than the struggle for maintaining the authority and efficacy of the laws, and in supporting, invigorating all the measures which may be adopted for a common defense, and by which, under the blessings of Divine Providence, we may hope for a speedy, just, and honorable peace.

"In witness whereof, I have set my hand and have caused the seal of the Confederate States of America to be attached this seventeenth day of April, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-one.

"JEFFERSON DAVIS.

"ROBERT TOOMBS, Secretary of State."

AND MEM.

He has also called out 32,000 men for three troops, 2000 are from each State except Florida, the number from that State being 1000.

WILL VIRGINIA SECEDE?

A Washington correspondent states that Mr. Seward has received information from Richmond to the effect that the secession element in the Virginia Convention in secret session by seven majority. Other

A telegram dated Richmond, April 14, says: The demonstration in the city of a large crowd continued till midnight. Illuminations, bonfires, and fire-works were the order of the evening. A party ascended the roof of the Capitol and hoisted the Southern flag on the flag-staff. It was subsequently hauled down by a guard.

THE REPLY OF MR. SEWARD TO THE SOUTHERN COMMISSIONERS.

The correspondence between Mr. Seward and the Southern Commissioners has been published. The gist of Mr. Seward's letter is in the following paragraph:

"The Secretary of State finally confesses that he understands the events which have recently occurred, and the condition of political affairs which now exists in the first part of the Union to which his attention has thus been directed, to be substantially as they are stated in a written paper presented by Messrs. Forsyth and Crawford. He says in them, not a right derived from established revolution and an independent nation, with an established governance, but rather a position of actual temporary and partial advancement to the inconsistent purposes of an unjustifiable and unconstitutional usurpation upon the rights of both the authority vested in the Federal Government, and hitherto belonging exclusively to the free and very nature that always must be so exercised, for the maintenance of the Union, the preservation of liberty, and the security, peace, welfare, happiness, and aggrandizement of the American people.

"The Secretary of State, therefore, in which Mr. Mason-Forsyth and Crawford that he looks patiently but confidently for the events which will force upon the existing proceedings unnecessary, so unwise, so unusual, and so unjustifiable in the circumstances, having in view the peaceful and untried relations with agencies unknown to and acting in derogation of the Constitution and laws, to regulate and coordinate action of the people of those States, in co-operation with the people of the Union in the States, through the Congress of the United States, and such extraordinary conventions, if there shall be need thereof, as the Federal Constitution provides and authorizes to be assembled."

THE NEW CONGRESS.

The President has called an extra session of Congress, to meet on the 4th of July next. Leaving out the seceded States, only fifty representatives will answer to the call. Of these, thirteen will be chosen in Virginia on the 23d of May, leaving thirty-seven to be chosen in other States, with two members, Kentucky tet, Maryland six, North Carolina seven, Tennessee eight, and Kansas one, will have to call special elections.

WERE THERE ANY NEW KILLED AT FORT MOULTRIE?

A private letter received by a gentleman in this city from a friend in Charleston, gives the most new and interesting particulars respecting the bombardment of Fort Sumter. The writer states that such was the correctness of Major Anderson's fire that thirty of the reconstructs in Fort Moultrie were killed, besides many wounded, and that the Stevens Battery was silenced, and the Floating Battery half shot away. He extols the courage and skill of the garrison, and intimates that the casualties of the enemy were more numerous than they with to acknowledge.

TERRIFIC.

Ex-President Buchanan exhibits intense interes in the news from the South, and participates in the expression of joy at the success of the Administration.

Major Anderson arrived at New York with his command on 26th at two o'clock.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

MR. TRAIN FINED ONE SHILLING.

MR. TRAIN, of Massachusetts, has been fined one shilling by a London Police Court for driving on the London race-way was on obstruction; but the magistrate explained that the penalty would be remitted if imposed by the Supreme Court. Mr. Train gave notice of an appeal to that court.

THE BUILDING STRIKE IN LONDON.

At latest dates there was some probability of a compromise in the Building Trade strike. The London Times says showing some disposition to accept a proposition of working by the hour under an increased scale of wages.

FRANCE.

MILITARY AND NAVAL PREPARATIONS.

The French navy has, by command of the Emperor, been organized into five divisions, each division to be under the charge of an admiral, and the ships and steel plated frigates attached to it. One division was about to proceed to the Levant, and another to the coast of the naval force.

Great sensation was created by the announcement that the Emperor was about to review the garrison of Paris. A review of the troops of the line was construed by some into a forerunner of a campaign.

ITALY.

AFFAIRS OF ROME AND NAPLES.

The affairs of Rome, Naples, and Sicily remain an article showing the necessity of withdrawing the troops from Rome. It says that the Pope will not leave during the Pope; but as soon as fully grants the complete guarantees for the safety of the Pope and the inviolability of the residue of the seat of the French will be fulfilled with dignity by the national army of Naples.

The Pope's army of Naples continued in the Chamber of Deputies from the Minister of the Interior and the Minister of Police been exaggerated, but he promised a remedy of several inconveniences of the Government. It is intended to increase the military of the country previous as measures of public safety.

AUSTRIA, THE POPE AND GARIBALDI.

The Pope fainted away during service on 3d, but his indisposition was not serious.

Garibaldi arrived safely at Turin. He was received with the greatest enthusiasm by the people.

HUNGARY AND VENICE CO-OPERATING.

The London Post asserts that the military operations in which Garibaldi will take part are the point of commencing; and that the Hungarians and Italians have come to a perfect understanding to make a combined movement. It is expected that the Hungarian Diet will pass a formal vote calling on the Hungarian troops from other parts of the Austrian empire to be concentrated in the kingdom of Hungary alone. Such a measure will necessarily strip the Southern provinces of the force of the Austrian forces. If opposed by the Austrian Government the Hungarians will refuse to take part with the movement for breaking out into insurrection will be have arrived.

BOMBARDMENT OF FORT SUMTER BY THE BATTERIES O

E CONFEDERATE STATES, APRIL 13, 1861.—[See Page 257.]

BILLOWS PAST.

My mother died when I was very young; I never thought my father was very fond of me. Nigel inherited my mother's beauty, which I did not; but he was rich, proud of his old family, and he wished me to make what would be called a good match. I did not much think about it, I had all I wanted at home; but I did one season at last; I met him often, he was staying with some friends; he staid here several times. His regiment was quartered at Carlisle, and the officers were asked every where. My father seemed to like him, too, and often told him he should be glad to meet him at Littlecourt whenever he liked a day's shooting, and that was a great deal for him to say. I thought he liked me; I felt sure of it sometimes when he would bring me a flower, and look down on me in a peculiar way as he gave it, and once, too, he said he wished we were not so rich. I felt so happy then, I only laughed.

He sang, oh, such a voice! I never heard one like his. I can hear it now. He sang without music at first, but after I had prayed for him once he used to ask me to accompany him, and ask me to sing, which I could not do; but he would say he thought I must, for I played his songs as no one else did, and I felt them; I must have been dull indeed not to feel that voice, "Oft in the Stilly Night," "The Land o' the Leal," and some of the old Scotch and Irish ballads.

Tall, I could see his head above every one in the room: light hair, and he had a way of passing his fingers through it, and shaking a rebellious lock back that always fell over his forehead. His eyes were dark—I scarcely know what color—they changed and looked darker as he spoke. But he was so good and gentle, and I was so thoughtless then for any thing beyond idle words, that I remained that spring year over a Sunday, 20th April, 1832, and in the afternoon service there was a baptism, as there often was. I looked upon it as an interruption to the regular prayers, and was busy looking at the painted glass, or beautiful carving of our old church: but he stood or knelt according to the service, and I saw him hear a baptism without seeing him standing so firm with his arms crossed, and hear his "Amen" to those beautiful words, "And so receive Thy servant's faithful mother and servant unto his life's end."

As he walked home he asked me if I were "The Christian hero" of one thing, but, oh, I had it, and though not understanding or valuing it as I do now, I admired many of the poems. It was a lovely evening, and we came across the fields and through the larch wood, then in all the beauty of its fresh bright green leaves, studded with small crimson cones, and beyond the yellow primroses peeping out every where, the birds singing, every thing looking bright, bursting into leaf, making me glad and happy. On reaching the brow of the hill we all stopped to look at the sunset, so glorious it was, and a young girl of my age party with us.

"Let us each take one of those feathery clouds for our own and see what happens to it. I will have that pink feathery bit, and you, Mr. Armstrong, take that bit of bright gold." So we each chose our little cloud, and watched their future destiny.

His bright golden one moved swiftly, straight on, on, on, and melted away in the great golden sunset in the West.

"Your journey is soon over, Armstrong," cried one; "now look at Miss Beresford's—where in the world is she going?"

It was said lightly, but I saw a look in his face —he did not take it lightly. My cloud affected amusement and trifled now with its wandering, but at last it also joined the glorious crimson sunset.

We had all talked and laughed carelessly about it, but remembered it by grave, and said to Percy as we again moved on our way down the hill:

"When the shore is won at last,
Who will mourn the billows past?"

"That is just what I was thinking," he said, eagerly. "I could not help feeling there was something under those clouds deeper than we first thought."

Those were very happy days; they went on for some weeks, and constantly meeting. I saw my father went from home for a fortnight, taking me with him. We were to return for a ball at Warrington, which I was to open with Nigel. I knew he would be there; he was to be at the Grange, and I thought he would come over to see us.

We went to Warrington for the ball I had been at but was on the stairs, as I thought waiting for us, for he had taken me into the ball-room, and asked me to dance at once; but he was not there now. However, I saw his head as soon as we entered, and thought he would come to meet me; I saw him look at me, but he did not come. We were rather late, and as we edged our way to the far end of the room, I was one of the last, and there were several people between us. I felt him watching me, as he did not come round to me at once, he only bowed again, and looked so grave —so pale! I thought he got to him. I was too far off to speak. There were several gentlemen with us, and I know I should be obliged to dance with them; how I hated it, he would come and ask me, but he stood there, leaning against the corner of the bench as if he had forgotten where he was.

"What has happened to Mr. Armstrong?" said Mrs. Biddulph, and she looked at me and smiled.

"Who?" said Sir Harry Vivian.

"That handsome young fellow, Percy Armstrong, of the—h. I call him my Hotspur."

"The Knight of the Sorrowful Countenance, I should call him," said Sir Harry, putting up his glass. "But do you really consider him good-looking, Mrs. Biddulph?"

"Yes, remarkably so, and you would too, only you are so horribly conceited."

"Ah!" said Sir Harry, "you always flatter me. Do you admire him, Miss Beresford?"

How I hated him for asking me!

"It is a well-known fact," said Mr. Lane, "that Armstrong and I are the handsomest men in the room. You are a stranger here, Sir Harry, so may be excused for not finding it out."

I could not help laughing, and felt grateful to kind, ugly little Mr. Lane for coming to my rescue, and saying what I dared not.

"Well," said Mrs. Biddulph, "I shall go and ask him, and tell him we are all speculating on what can make him so unlike himself."

She moved toward Percy, she spoke to him in a rallying way, he looked at me; surely she had not used my name! I felt my color rise, for his face flushed, then he came straight toward me.

"Were you laughing at me, too?" he said, bending down to the door. I watched him.

"I! oh no," I said; and looked up at him, though my eyes were full; I held out my hand, he took it, and in the same moment I said:

"I did not believe it; I knew you could not do that." He pressed my hand in both his. "God bless you," he said, and he walked quickly from me. I saw my father meet him, shake him heartily by the hand, and then Percy passed on through the room to the door. I watched him so eagerly I found Sir Harry Vivian asking me for the second time to dance. As Percy reached the ball-room door he turned, and was not taking my place in the dance—only to think he was nothing to me, when my whole heart was his, and I felt as though it were dreaming, and not real.

I tortured myself fruitlessly for years, thinking I might have said or done something different that dreadful evening. If I had only said, "Stay with me," if he had only called me Helen, I could have spoken —could have followed him—could have told him I was ready to go with him to the world's end.

"Myself must tell him in that purer life,
But then it were too daring."

I watched the door in vain, he did not return. never saw him again.

I suppose I looked deadly pale, for some one asked me if I were ill; then I remembered I must not betray myself. I must not look ill, talk, and smile through that horrible ball. Then came the drive home; no relief: not alone till I was undressed, and my maid went. Oh! could think over all, and feel I was miserable, loving him utterly as I did. Why had he left me in that way? Was it quite right? Could I have done more for me? How humbled, crushed, broken I felt as that idea forced itself upon me!

How wretched I looked the next morning! but I had a part to act, and I acted it well, I believe. After breakfast my father called me to the library, and told me I had been selfish and cruel to his old friend and I money enough for all I wanted? if not, he would double my allowance; he liked me to be well dressed. I, I, I, I, I, I, I, I, I, I, I, I, I, I, I, I.

"By-the-by, my dear, Armstrong's regiment is ordered to India, and he thanked me last night for all our attentions to him during his stay. He was to catch the night mail, and sail from Liverpool next week, I think he said; he is a fine young fellow, a credit to any corps."

What could I say? I felt something rise in my throat—I could not speak. Then he had not really cared for me, and I had allowed myself to think—to nothing—no one but him. I thought I never could be more miserable than I then was.

A few months passed. It was the end of October. I had been to Chester in October a twelvemonth ago. One morning at breakfast my father, reading the newspaper, exclaimed, "Good Heavens! the Birch, a new list, with the old name, has foundered at sea!" and then he read aloud,

"It is with feelings of deep regret we announce the total loss of the ship Berkshire, on the 10th August, latitude 5° North, longitude 20° West, bound for Calcutta with the —th on board. Only five officers and fifty men, of the —th, the troops behaved nobly, obeying orders to the last."

I heard all; my tongue dry, my eyes burning, I tried to say something, but my voice did not obey me, my lips moved, but there was no sound. I reached my own room—my trembling limbs carried me so far—and I threw myself on my bed. As for sleep, I felt, I could not forget, I knew he was gone; I felt reproached he was not one of the five saved: I suffered all the horrors of that fearful voyage, and to care; I had no right even to wear a black gown for him, and oh! the misery of knowing I was what people term a widow, mourning for my husband!

I don't remember how the time passed from that day until my father's death. Early in January, as we were sitting at tea over-night, I suddenly never regained consciousness. Nigel arrived too late to see him alive.

I found a letter from after my father's death he wrote to me to look for some papers which were missing. "Do look in my father's bureau and send me all the papers you can find relating to Mr. Armstrong." I took the key and went to the library, with the melancholy feeling such a task gives one. I had never opened that bureau before. I searched one drawer after another—I could find nothing. At last I found an inner drawer; it looked as though the contents had been disturbed, for two or three packets of papers tied up, headed "Spanish Bonds." I took it and untied the red tapes to see if Nigel would want any, when I saw, underneath, my own writing, and I knew I should be obliged to dance with them; how I hated him! he would come and ask me, but he stood there, leaning against the corner of the bench as if he had forgotten where he was.

"What has happened to Mr. Armstrong?" said Mrs. Biddulph, and she looked at me and smiled.

"Who?" said Sir Harry Vivian.

"That handsome young fellow, Percy Armstrong, of the—h. I call him my Hotspur."

"The Knight of the Sorrowful Countenance, I should call him," said Sir Harry, putting up his glass. "But do you really consider him good-looking, Mrs. Biddulph?"

"Yes, remarkably so, and you would too, only you are so horribly conceited."

"Ah!" said Sir Harry, "you always flatter me. Do you admire him, Miss Beresford?"

How I hated him for asking me!

"It is a well-known fact," said Mr. Lane, "that "I thought his face was like the face of an angel; then he turned away, encouraging the men.

"We had to row hard to get the boats away from the burning ship; but the sea was so calm, not a breath of wind, and such horror and awe among us all—not a word was uttered, and we could hear the voices of those left behind. I knew Percy's voice as he began the litany. I heard him say, 'In the hour of death, and in the day of Judgment;' then one deep, full cry for mercy echoed over our heads, 'Good Lord, deliver us!' then came the fearful explosion, and all was over.

He stopped a moment; then he added, "Poor fellow! these awful days of suffering and thirst, and death! I read his Prayer-Book as I never read before. I would give it to some of his friends, if I could find one who loved him."

I started forward then: "Give it to me! oh, give it to me, for I did love him, and he loved me!"

Under his name on the fly-leaf was written—

"When the shore is won at last,
Who will count the billows past?"

IN PERIL UNDERGROUND.

My comrades and I were underground and hard at work two full hours before sunrise. Our work lay in a part of the coal-mine far away from where the general work was carried on, and was on this account comparatively lonely and remote. We were employed in cutting a pair of drifts through a barrier of coal which divided the workings of two coal-pits situate in the north of England.

Fifteen strokes to the middle of our work was the time we allowed ourselves for rest and refreshment; but we always spent these well, and made up for that deficiency by the increase of our pleasure. But one day—the last day we ever passed together—an unusual amount of gloom seemed to have settled on the whole of our little party. I was the first to attempt a conversation: I remarked that Thomson, the wildest of us all, looked very serious, and I asked him the reason. To my left you tell you that Thomson was the only gambler among us—he cared nothing about religion, and was set down as seriously disposed; and his wit being quick and keen, he would always try to raise a laugh against you at every opportunity that presented itself. But to-day he was neither inclined to himself, nor to cause others to do so. He could not have done it if he had tried, for we were all as gloomy as himself; and he explained that he had been troubled with a remarkable dream last night, which he could neither remember nor understand; nor could he account for the unusual effect it had caused him during the day. The conversation then took a generally superstitious turn, and it was agreed by the fact that most of us were more or less perplexed with forebodings for which we could find no reason. Harry Walters, who had been married but three weeks, said, "Our fancy," as he quickly and perplexed with forebodings for which we could find no reason. Harry Walters, who had been married but three weeks, said, "Our fancy," as he quickly added, "that we should always try to raise a laugh against you at every opportunity that presented itself. But to-day he was neither inclined to himself, nor to cause others to do so. He could not have done it if he had tried, for we were all as gloomy as himself; and he explained that he had been troubled with a remarkable dream last night, which he could neither remember nor understand; nor could he account for the unusual effect it had caused him during the day. The conversation then took a generally superstitious turn, and it was agreed by the fact that most of us were more or less did, for another second would have plunged me into the madly rushing torrents.

The water burst through the stoppings with such force that when it struck the angles of the opposite pillars of coal, it caused the floor and roof of the mine to shake as if convulsed by an earthquake. It seems to me as if I was then inverted with the power of seeing the events taking place in all parts of the mine. The bodies of men were caught up by the currents and dashed fearfully against the joints of the coal-pillars, tearing them as I thought limb from limb, and drifting the parts in different directions. The most painful scene which my imagination, or perhaps, something superior, forced upon my vision, was that of a little driver, eleven years of age, whom I recognized in the night-gown-and-tail, with his horse mate! to a train of railroad cars. He had been in the act of driving outward with his load, but his horse was backing and plunging. The poor fellow's face was fast down the poor little driver's smutty face, when a rush of water down an adjoining headway engulfed all at once—the horse, the driver, and the load. This ended a succession of visions too horrible to detail. It seemed as if I had been a considerable time witnessing such scenes, but it could not have been more than a minute.

It required all my energy to enable me to start back—all but the hope of a body of water close to me showed the immediate necessity of this only alternative. Back I ran as fast as my now trembling limbs would carry me. I had not gone far when I came in collision with some one running in the opposite direction. I was knocked down, and had not the faintest power to prevent my opponent from running headlong into the water. I regained my legs, and commenced a speedy retreat. I soon met many remaining companions, and prevailed on them to turn back, which I had to do by means of cuffs and signs, for we could not hear each other's voices. We all made directly to the face of the drift, where the noise was not so loud, and where we could talk to each other quite easily. Thomas was missing, and we knew too well his awful fate.

We were so confused and terror-stricken at our horrible situation that we could scarcely command our senses, and raved more like insane men than rational beings. There were lamentations, prayers, hopes, which all uttered simultaneously—their poor wives and dear children—who would protect them, was their plaintive cry! Our situation was really desperate. There were, driven in the face of a narrow drift, six feet wide by four feet high, and we could hear the water rapidly advancing; with the least power to prevent we should be spared many minutes in this life or not. About an hour afterward we were comparatively calm, like men on the brink of fearful resignation. The distant roar had gradually ceased, and I was the first to venture to the water's edge, which may have been about forty yards from the face of the drift. I found great resistance in moving, and, knowing some little trifle of pneumatics, came to the conclusion that this resistance was caused by the compression of the air; therefore that the column of water would be kept back by the elasticity of the air, and that we were no longer in danger of being drowned. I communicated my opinions to my comrades, and then went into the other drift to reflect. My spirits rose high, and I felt extraordinary mental power; owing, I suppose, to the increased pressure of the atmosphere and the proportionate amount of oxygen. By the height of the water, and that of the drifts within the barriers, from which no air could escape, I found the pressure had increased two additional atmospheres; and by the rules of calculation, I concluded that the water would be stationary about thirty yards above the face of the drifts. The upper edge of the barriers of which was expected to be about twenty yards further than the face, thus leaving ten or twenty yards of water above the upper edge of the barrier. It also struck me that some one would be down the up-cast pit examining the old works to endeavor to give relief to those who had been working in the upper part of the new or do-to-cast workings. I knew, however, that this would be probably given up as soon as the settled level of the water had been discovered; yet with the hope of being heard, I commenced knocking on the face of the drift, and continued to do so in measured time, as that any one might recognize the knocks as proceeding from us. Most fortunately the very first blows I struck were heard: they were faintly answered by similar knocks, which appeared to us a hopeless distance off.

This, I afterward learned, was the case; for a party of miners were hewing, and were at the point of turning back in despair, when the sound of my first blows reached them. They could not tell what to make of it, nor how to account for the sounds proceeding from below the level of the water; and a sort of superstitious dread came over them as they observed the knocks by making similar ones on the nearest coal; which, however, was cut off from the barrier by a gallery, which accounted for their faintness. I immediately returned to my companions, and communicated to them my hopes of escape. They were still in a state of quiet despair, yet they agreed to keep up a system of knocking on the face of the drift, though with small hopes of good result. Knocks responding to our own, and with the same measured time, a little raised their spirits, for we knew that, if it was possible, we should get assistance. The knocks seemed to be about forty yards distant, each side the edge of the seam, which confirmed my supposition that the upper edge of the barriers was under water. The question was, could the water be lowered by the new pumping-engine, so that a drift could be driven toward us from the upper edge of the barrier? and could this be accomplished before we died of starvation? That a drift would be driven to us we felt confident, but it might arrive too late to save life. Yet hope gleamed brightly through all the blackness, and we, one and all, looked forward to an ultimate release.

We had to suffer much. It was horrible to think that the water we were obliged to drink contained the dead bodies of all our friends and comrades among them, my two brothers and my father, who had been working in another part of the mine, where I knew they must have been drowned. And then I thought of my mother and sisters, how they would be mourning for us all; and I prayed to be spared for their sakes. Time passed, and brought on hunger; and our thoughts were then concentrated on our own sufferings. We had a few pounds of candles which we divided among us, and which we were obliged to eat raw, principally. Two of our number sick ned and died very shortly after the candles were consumed, leaving but three feet to meet our fate. They died in my arms quietly, without a murmur, and it seemed to us as if they had simply fallen asleep, when they lay dead beside us. We did not throw them into the water, for a sense of deathly sickness was settling on us, as the change from hunger to weakness was taking place. At the beginning of that trial I suffered terribly from hunger, and my mental sufferings were also great; but as I grew weaker, my pains and sufferings diminished in proportion to my strength. Hope left us at last, and we ceased knocking on the face of the rock; but once more I collected the little remaining strength I had and struck a few blows. There was no response. Then hope flew, and I did not care to encourage it back. The last clear recollection I have is of repeating Dr. Walter's and Whitehead's names, and that they did not answer. I then lay down; for I felt drowsy.

What passed now seemed to be a feeble dream. I had alternating periods of light and darkness; in the light period I seemed to be in a cell, in the dark period I was dead. I also faintly recollect that I considered why I did not go to the world eternal. It then appeared that I was surrounded by beings like what I imagined I recognized by their shape. I thought I was in a tomb of fire, while a being, human in form but of brilliant flame in substance, came toward me with a shroud of fire, and in an instant all was dark, and I remember no more.

It was weeks before I got better, or could call to mind the feelings and incidents of the first few weeks. I can only account for the light and dark periods by supposing that I was delirious when I thought I was light, for I was then in a comfortable room. The familiar sounds no doubt aroused me, and I tried to sit up, but I was too weak for this and must have fallen back on the floor. When I saw the opening was made and candles of the searchers appeared, I must have opened my eyes and believed the place to be eternal misery. When the sun had a was a flame in human form must have been the man who rushed to ascertain whether I was alive or dead. I will leave you to your explanation.

Whitehead and I were the sole survivors: the rest were dead when the rescue came.

LOVE AND 'LECTION.

CHAPTER I.

"Tippecanoe and Tyler too,
Oh, Van, Van! you're a used up man.
Tippeca—"

JACK GARNER stopped short in his jubilant chorus as he saw his quondam friend Wright Holmes on the other side of the way also journeying toward the scene of action. The man had a moment for breath, and then recommenced the refrain louder than ever in the ear of the crest-fallen little Democrat.

"Tippecanoe and Tyler too, Tippecanoe," etc., finishing off with the question "Mail come yet? Jest wait till them returns is in. Oh, won't we whip the—" Tippecanoe—"

Wright gave the bundle of books under his arm an extra hitch and the visor of his cap an extra pull—the one to signify his contempt, the other to shut off the sight of his aggravating little Whig companion.

There were heavy thoughts in the boy's sad heart, for he knew well the trial it would be to his father to surrender the post-office, which he so long had held. The old man was going to say, with honest pride, that for twenty years the correspondence of H——— County had passed through his hands, and that a letter had never been lost nor a penny missed.

And now this was past. The idea of March had come, and "Old Tippecanoe" had succeeded by a brief career. The Whigs looked triumphantly at the Squire when they came for letters, bringing additional items with regard to the majorities by which the party had conquered. He knew that he would be displaced very soon, and two or three of the opposite side had been mentioned as likely to succeed him. Young Harry Grafton had gone already to Washington, and people said it was pretty hard for the old man to see his son-in-law's office. During that time he had been faithfully nursed through a long illness by the family of his employer, and had professed so much gratitude for it that every body thought it was hardly fair to try to supplant him now. How the story originated nobody knew, but the rumor was afloat that the flourishing young lawyer was not content with his profession, and through the influence of powerful friends he would likely succeed to the office.

CHAPTER II.

MISS POLLY BAS—allow me to present her to you—gaunt, dark, a nose decidedly Roman, hair that was twisted so tight and wound around so firmly that one fancied that nothing but an old-fashioned bed-wrench could have produced the tension, small gray eyes, and piercing tips. That's the style of Miss Polly's beauty. Now if she had been really genteel and clever, nobody would have cared a straw for these personalities; but there was the misapprehension that the world demanded extraordinary candor from her, she was at times decidedly vicious. As the only male member of a small family in the town, she was a person of no slight importance, and when May Holmes would have her plain gray merino made up, she would not dare to oppose her will—the formidable lady; and thus it was that the waning light of a March afternoon saw May's round figure under the non-unfashionable hands of Miss Polly, and the soft folds began to assume her trim shape. She didn't look like the picture of a martyr as she stood there with the slender waist and trailing skirt, with the bright blue eyes and golden hair of a Hebe; but she was being martyred after all that. I omitted to notice, in the list of Miss Polly's personalities, her thumb, which was curved back like a bow. Under the pressure of this magical member plaits and flounces seemed to gather themselves instinctively, and shears under its guidance never swerved from the straight line, or left where they ought to be. She had not learned to trust implicitly to the thumb, and when the shining steel bows of the scissors came near her thumb she held it out that they might slip on a small incision on her throat, or that the long, keen fingers might close any moment. But this wasn't extraordinary, and I'll tell you what was.

"Ahem! I made a blue silk for Miss Garner, and it were lovely. How's that seam?" giving a touch on the back with her hand to pull down a fold, and trimmed with the beautifulest gimp you ever see. Hold out your arm a mink. I'spose you've heard the news, I guess there'll be a wedding down to Garner's soon."

May guessed what was coming, and helped it on by saying, coolly,

"Ah, Miss Sarah is to be the bride, isn't she?"

"Oh yes, you know Hal Grafton has been courtin' some time; and I guess the old man wants him so anxious to get the office away from your father."

"From father! Is he trying to get it?"

"Yes—he's been writin' to Washington a good thing I've got the courage to tell folks what they don't know."

May put up her hand saying, "Isn't this too tight around the throat—it chokes me?" and Miss Polly hastened to release the girl, who was trembling and cold; but she didn't mean to let her escape, so she said,

"Now, Miss May, you jest stitch up them seams while I go on with the sleeves," and May tried the task, but her fingers trembled, and with a woman's intuitive tact, interposed for her relief.

"No, May dear, you go and take that loaf of gingerbread to Mrs. Jones, and the fresh air will do you good. I can finish these seams."

With a thankful glance May went out into the bright sunshine on her way to her errand of kindness, but she still felt as though something was choking her breath, and making her heart bound at every impulse. She turned down the path to the big flush and sparkle in her eye as she walked quickly down the narrow lane, but the blood would not be checked in its flow. She willed rapidly, as a relief for the excitement of her spirit; for truly the words of the mantua-maker had been doubleedged swords. Yes, she had sometimes unconfessed liked her just a little bit, should marry Sarah Garner, she had schooled herself to believe; but that he would ask for the office which it would grieve Squire Holmes so much to resign, this it was that added to her sadness and bitterness of spirit. She remembered those happy days when now seemed ages past, when her girlish will was law to the handsome clerk, and when, under pretext of a piece of knotty political solicit her aid in the office; or when she, vexed with Euclid or Algebra, found the clear brain and ready explanatory, making ease of difficulty. And then walks and rides, and treasured flowers, and pleasant books, had kept up a dreamy happy life until now——now—— Leo, the big Newfoundland, interrupting by, and would fain have leaped for a caress, but with a stern "Down, Leo!" she repulsed him. It was but a moment; and observing the brute's keen eye so full of love and wonder, she stooped to pat him, and then her heroism gave way, and, clasping the dog's neck, he leaned down and cried like a little child.

What there is in a caress or gesture that makes "a good cry" such a positive necessity at times I don't know, but certain it is that May Holmes went on her way more calmed and strong.

CHAPTER III.

If was the night but one before the new appointments would arrive by mail, and the Squire sat down to think. Ah, he looked back on by-gone years—on those years of his life in the post-office—on had gone home, and he prepared to close the shutters and lock the mail-bags, thinking how he now might miss those accustomed tasks. An oppressive sadness came over him as he sat down by the old stove to try to realize the coming change. Fancy carried him back to the days when he first was entered on his duties, and that prouder time when he had a home and competence to offer to the sweet orphaned child who was to be his companion in those days when his first-born May began to run about and play stage-coach among the mail-bags, and part imagining that she was the mistress of the home when dark-eyed Allan sat and dreamed in the old leathern chair where he now sat, drinking in the arguments and reasoning of the politicians about him with a wisdom beyond his years, until Death stamped his name on the white tombstone; and he was seen no more in his favorite resort. And then came right bright and loving, quick and merry, a winsome chap enough. With this memory came the sad thought that the favorite dream of giving his only son a college education must be dispelled—for the small pittance he possessed would barely sustain them all.

The fire was out and the lamp had grown dim before he was roused from his reverie by a light footfall. The office communicated directly with the house—in fact, occupied one thing, and through the door peeped the pale face of May Holmes—

"Oh, father, you'll get cold here; you are chilly now—you'll be getting a cold" and the tearful, handkerchief came out to justify the flimsy pretext. May stopped a moment, and, with sudden courage, placing her slight figure before him, spoke rapidly.

"Father, I have done something without your permission—I have written for a place to teach. I thought you would have hard times pretty soon, and Wright must go to college; and I shall be so glad if I can be a little bit of help that way. Now you shall not say no, father; I won't let you do it, you see. I shall like to do something that will keep my thoughts occupied; for—for—I don't care to say both of you and myself—Wright's dear body;" and here, like an unaccountable little woman, she began to cry too.

The Squire looked at her with a puzzled glance, and, lifting her dimpled chin with his big forefinger, he said,

"May, May! and how about Hal Grafton? You know they say that he has the post-office all to Washington to get this office for himself, and you could—be Hal Postmaster?"

"Oh, father, don't! If he is so cruel as to do that I never want to see him any more, and I would rather go away somewhere else. If he ever did like me ever so little, he couldn't do such a hateful thing as to try to get my father's place. I'spose Miss Polly knows, and she says that Sarah Garner told her so, but I didn't believe it."

A few tears, a quivering lip, and the girl took her father's hand smilingly, and drew him to the house, where he told Wright that he had left his hand on her heard with a solemn "Bless you, child!" and she retired to fight the battle of life with a brave heart, with a sad regret for her heart, but a brave spirit that was resolved to conquer regrets and repinings, to smooth the path of life for the parents she loved, and to help make sunshine on her little brother's future course. Such unselfish resolves as these always bring their own sweet reward; and when the morning broke, Squire Holmes felt the cheerful brow and happy smile of the good daughter and loving sister, and with a peace that leaped of trust in Him she commenced her accustomed tasks.

But a new care came upon her, for her father was sick—sick to keep his bed, and the fresh energie in the freelies office, and perhaps a troubled spirit, had brought on a severe attack of lung fever, and for the first time in many years Squire Holmes was not seen at his accustomed post. May knew that her mother would be his nurse, and she made her own resolve. She knew that the office must be attended to, that Wright could not leave school at this time without endangering his success at the coming examination, and she knew one who knew the routine would be required; so as she kissed her father "Good-morning," she answered his questions, "How about the Office?" with a cheerful answer.

"Oh! I've got somebody to attend it. Some one that is used to it. Don't you know?" His sick man had hardly consciousness to wonder who it was when the lethargic sleep crept over him again, and he wandered off in dreamy slumber.

CHAPTER IV.

SEE the new clerk perched up on a high stool behind the bars, two small hands setting the few letters from a country mail, two small feet dangling long way from the round rung of the stool, eyes glancing up when a new-comer asks for a letter. They stare at May Holmes in her father's place. Is she fit even for the duties? Will she charge upon her? It did not seem long to her since she used to be her father's assistant, while short dresses and curls made her presence suitable; and now a time had arrived to the reckoning of "Jack" before a brother made his appearance on life's stage. She knew right well the whole routine, and for her father's sake she had made her mind up to meet—and once resolved, she was not one to falter in the path. I would not undertake to say that Fred Nelson did not come for his letter for the next two or three days. I rather think he did; for May looked very fair as she sat among the dull books and mail-bags, and Bill Barlow came every night to drag the heavy uncouth leathern receptacle to her feet and deposit it on the table before her, and would stand and stare at her with open mouth, and then the little hands brought order out of chaos. He told one or two in a loud whisper, "Well, I does beat me to wot she knows 'workin' so sure. Why I couldn't do it more 'n a nothin'." Miss Bias came in to say that she thought May ought to know that Hal Garner thought that she was rather forward "to be doin' so, settin' up and talkin' to all the men." May grew white as she answered, "Miss Garner is cruel to think so," and she bent over a letter and directed it to the wrong mail in her agitation, and wondered whether any one ever knew but such hard-hearted people to deal with before.

At last the night came when the document which would dispossess the present incumbent of the office might be supposed to arrive by mail, and as that time approached May grew trembling and excited. Her father seemed more ill than usual, and she felt the self-imposed task irksome to the last degree while her heart was with her father, she longed to be about his bed every moment.

But the hours of that day came and went as hours will come and go forever; and at last her ear caught the sound of the well-known horn, and shortly after the rattling wheels of the stage-coach as it drove up to the door, and her stanch friend, Barblow, stood ready to transfer the mail-bag to the table. There was a short colloquy with some one within the vehicle, a clear ringing voice, and then a quick step on the threshold made May look up, to meet the eager, bright glance of Hal Grafton's eye, as his pleasant tones rang out so cheery:

"Miss May, I've come just in time to save you this work. I wish I had come before, but I had something to stay for—" His frank face grew puzzled, for the hand which he had thrust through the bars to exchange salutations was not grasped, and the ring of the girl before him moved quietly, saying, "Thank you, Mr. Grafton, I can do very well alone."

Nothing more; and Hal stood perfectly still and motionless for a moment. Then he grew angry, and turned on his heel to retreat; but some kindly feeling prompted him to return, and say,

"I would be very glad to relieve you of this care, for you look very weary, Miss May."

A quiet "No, thank you," barred all further endeavors to make himself useful; and what his thoughts were as he shot off down the street like an arrow, any young man of twenty-four who thinks he has been abused can guess.

There was no document in the mail that night for Squire Holmes, for May's nervous fingers had shuffled the epistles over many times; and somewhat relieved that the evil day had been put off, she sought her father's bedside, only to find him delirious. Dr. Burnett was then watching anxiously the quick pulse of the sick man, and before he left determined to send some one to watch with the invalid who should be strong enough to lift him for freer breath or to administer the medicines.

It was midnight when the watcher made his appearance, and weeping May scarcely raised her head as a tall, dark form stepped lightly into the shaded room, and took a position by the head of the bed, behind the chintz curtain, and there remained, only speaking in a whisper to Mrs. Holmes, who sat beside her husband.

The patient slept at intervals, but uneasy mutterings and half-forgotten memories sounded sadly through the anxious hours.

"Yes, I know it; Jackson will never favor it. The bank—the great bank. Where's Allan? He looks pale to-night; he must not study too much. There's no letter for you to-night, Sir. Yes here is one." Allan Holmes, aged ten, died—yes, died. I know he died in the spring—"

Then a few moments of quiet, and the busy brain wrought on:

"Twenty years—yes, Sir. Nobody ever lost a letter—nobody. Did they tell me Hal was gone to get the office for himself? Well, well, Hal is a good lad, and I'm getting old; and—Where's May?"

The girl could keep down her sobs no longer, and had passed out of the room; but the tall watcher started at the last words, and with the reverential tenderness of a son he bent over the sick man, bathing his temples and hands, and administering the cooling draught; and when he seated himself again beside the patient, who had sunk off to sleep, there was a soft light in his eye, and a new calmness on his brow. In those dark hours he prayed with the earnest trust that he had ever had; that One above would spare the old man's life a little longer, or if that boon might be denied, that he should turn to that God who alone could smooth the dark passage.

CHAPTER V.

THE morning light brought hope to the hearts of the watchers, and in the coming sunshine May knelt beside her father's bed, thankful to hear the words once more "My daughter?"

Henry Grafton—for he it was who had held the vigil of the night—stood back; but when May's eyes discerned who it was who had nursed the weak invalid so tenderly, her frank nature could not resist the impulse to put out her hand with a word of thanks for the kindness, but she dared not meet his glance bent on her so inquiringly, nay, tenderly, as he said, "Miss May, at the risk of displeasing you, I must insist on taking your place in the office to-day." Before May could reply, Mrs. Holmes had thanked him and accepted the offer in spite of her protestations, and so the key was produced from May's apron-pocket and she was left to watch her father. The doctor came and reported favorably—the crisis had passed, and only rest and quiet would insure a speedy recovery.

It was strange why Hal would keep running into the house to ask May where the different articles were. In the first place, he declared he couldn't find the wrappers for the papers, then he didn't know where the wafers were kept, and, finally, he reported that the ink was all gone from the inkstand, and he didn't know where the rest was kept. Wouldn't Miss May please come and show him once? he wouldn't trouble her afterward if she would only set him right this time.

So there was nothing for it except to help his awkwardness, whether it were real or assumed, and she found the wrappers and the wafers and the ink, and was demurely walking out again when he arrested her.

"One more favor, Miss May—will you look in your father's box, there seems to be something there?"

She thought it strangely cruel that he should compel her to read the fatal official paper that met her eye, and smile so exultingly all the while, but with a trembling hand she took it up, as Hal said, "I brought it on from Washington, open, and I suppose you can as well see what it is?"

If ever Hal Grafton was happy in his life, it was when he saw the soft blue eyes dilate and the cheeks flush with the glad surprise; for he signed and sealed with all due forms, was the reappointment of Frederick Holmes, Esq., to the post-office for the next term of years, and a letter from a great political character, alluding to the testimonials and long array of the names of fellow-townsmen, referred to Harry Grafton as indefatigable in presenting and forwarding the petition, wherein Whigs and Democrats alike were represented. The paper dropped from her hands as she clasped them.

"Oh, I'm so glad!" How can I thank you?—and to think that I—"

She was perched up on the tall stool, and Hal made only one step forward when he took each one of her little hands in his, as though he would help her off; but he only held her there, looking down on her with his big brown eyes, while he said,

"Little May, don't you know better than to doubt me so? You thought I was only seeking my own good; that I would willingly grieve you and lose my self-respect by taking away from your father the post which he fills so much better. Blossom—May blossom—I don't want any thing that any body can give me—but little May; can't she trust me for the future? I never had another dream than this, to press on in my profession until I could offer heart and home together to May Holmes."

Well, what does any body suppose a wee woman perched on a high office-stool could do but to let such a great, handsome, frank lover lift her down? and if he didn't take his arm from about her round waist until he had heard some sort of answer from the lips, what wonder? And if Squire Holmes didn't get well quicker after the administration of when he wrote home to May the letter bore the superscription, Mrs. Henry Grafton, Esq. At each appearance of such epistles the Squire would smile anew, and declare that Love had stepped in to aid him when Lection failed.

PRESIDENT LINCOLN.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

PRESIDENT LINCOLN.

WE publish herewith, from a photograph just taken expressly for this paper, a PORTRAIT OF THE PRESIDENT. It is the first authentic portrait that has been published of him since he began to grow his beard.

HON. ABRAHAM LINCOLN, of Illinois, was born on the 12th February, 1809, in Hardin County, Kentucky. His family, although much respected, were not blessed with much of this world's goods, and he was forced to fight his own way through the opening struggles of life's campaign. In this way he became intimately acquainted with the industrial classes, and they now claim him as one of their number—"The Flatboatman." It is also reported that he supported himself for a winter by splitting rails for a farmer—whence his sobriquet, The Rail-splitter. Whether he was engaged in rural pursuits, or in piloting down the Mississippi boats laden with produce, he permitted no opportunity to escape for the improvement of his mind. When he had thus, by his own exertions, been admitted to the bar, he settled in the pleasant town of Springfield, Illinois, where he has since resided.

When the "Black Hawk War" broke out, in the spring of 1832, Mr. Lincoln was among the first to offer his services, and was elected captain of a company of Illinois volunteers, at the head of which he distinguished himself during the brief yet effective campaign. He was afterward elected to the State Legislature, taking decided ground as a Whig of the Henry Clay school. In 1846 he was elected a member of the 30th Congress, where he acted with the Whig party; and at the National Convention which nominated General Scott for President, in June, 1852, he was elected to represent Illinois in the Central Whig Committee. Yeoman's service did he render in that campaign.

In 1856 Mr. Lincoln entered actively into the Republican contest, and two years later a Convention of that party nominated him, in opposition to Judge Douglas, as Republican Senator from the State of Illinois. He was defeated, as is known, but lost none of his reputation with his party.

In May, 1860, he was nominated for the Presidency by the Republican Convention at Chicago, and was duly elected in November. His Inaugural in March has already been laid before the readers of the Weekly.

Last week a Committee of the Virginia Convention waited upon him to ascertain his views. He replied to them as follows:

"To Hon. Messrs. Preston, Stuart, and Randolph:

"GENTLEMEN—As a Committee of the Virginia Convention, you present me a preamble and resolution in these words:

"'Whereas, In the opinion of this Convention, the uncertainty which prevails in the public mind as to the policy which the Federal Executive intends to pursue toward the seceded States, is extremely injurious to the industrial and commercial interests of the country, and keeps up an excitement which is unfavorable to the adjustment of the pending difficulties and tendencies to disunion of that public peace; therefore,

"'Resolved, That a committee of three delegates be appointed to wait on the President of the United States, present to him this preamble, and respectfully ask him to communicate to this Convention the policy which the Federal Executive intends to pursue in regard to the Confederate States.'

"In answer I have to say that having, at the beginning of my official term, expressed my intended policy as plainly as I was able, it is with deep regret and mortification I now learn there is great and injurious uncertainty in the public mind as to what that policy is, and what course I intend to pursue. Not having as yet seen occasion to change, it is now my purpose to pursue the course marked out in the Inaugural Address. I commend a careful consideration of the whole document as the best expression I can give to my purpose. As I then and therein said, I now repeat, 'The power confided in me will be used to hold, occupy, and possess property and places belonging to the Government, and to collect the duties and imposts; but beyond what is necessary for these objects, there will be no invasion, no using of force against or among the people anywhere.' By the words property and places belonging to the Government, I chiefly allude to the military posts and that wonderful paper than if he had taken a dozen pills, I don't know the reason why. Mrs. Holmes declared that it was the most wonderful "Poor Man's Plaster" that ever was known, for it was not many weeks ere the Squire was at his post, active and cheerful as ever.

Then came an answer to May's application for a teacher's place; but, for obvious reasons, she was obliged to decline the offer for herself, recommending, as more able, an old school friend who was very glad to make the engagement.

Miss Sarah Garner called soon after, dressed in the identical "beautifulest silk," bows and gimp included; and there was no consciousness in her manner that she had ever heard the story coined in the fertile brain of Miss Polly Bias. She congratulated May as politely as any one else; and if she felt a twinge of regret for handsome Hal, she concealed it very skillfully.

When that wedding did come off Miss Polly didn't get a chance to cut a breadth or gather up a bow with the wonderful thumb, but she revenged herself by pointing with it over her shoulder toward the Squire's, and referring to the city artists there employed, as that "furrin" baggage.

Wright went to college the next winter, and

GENERAL BEAUREGARD.—(FROM A PHOTOGRAPH FURNISHED BY E. ANTHONY.)

and property which were in possession of the Government when it came into my hands. But if, as now appears to be true, in pursuit of a purpose to drive the United States authority from those places, an unprovoked assault has been made upon Fort Sumter, I shall hold myself at liberty to repossess it, if I can, like places which had been seized before the Government was devolved upon me; and in my event I shall, to the best of my ability, repel force by force. In case it proves true that Fort Sumter has been assaulted, as is reported, I shall, perhaps, cause the United States mails to be withdrawn from all the States which claim to have seceded, believing that the commencement of actual war against the Government justifies and possibly demands it. I scarcely need to say that I consider the military posts and property situated within the States which claim to have seceded as yet belonging to the Government of the United States as much as they did before the supposed secession. Whatever else I may do for the purpose, I shall not attempt to collect the duties and imposts by any armed invasion of any part of the country; not meaning by this, however, that I may not land a force deemed necessary to relieve a fort upon the border of the country. From the fact that I have quoted a part of the Inaugural Address, it must not be inferred that I repudiate any other part, the whole of which I reaffirm, except so far as what I now say of the mails may be regarded as a modification."

GENERAL P. G. T. BEAUREGARD.

We publish herewith a portrait of General Beauregard, the commander of the Confederate forces at Charleston, to whom Major Anderson surrendered on 13th.

General P. G. Toutant Beauregard was born on his father's plantation, near New Orleans. His father was a wealthy and influential Louisiana planter. His mother—born Reggio—was of Italian origin, and descended from the ducal Reggio family of Italy. General Beauregard entered the United States Military Academy at West Point at an early age, where he graduated in 1838, taking the second honors in a class of forty-five graduates, and was appointed a Second Lieutenant in the First regiment of Artillery, which commission he only held for one week ere he was transferred to the Corps of Engineers. He was promoted to a First Lieutenantcy in June, 1839, and in that capacity served with great distinction during the Mexican War. He was twice brevetted "for gallant and meritorious conduct" in the field, the first time as Captain for the battles of Contreras and Churubusco, to date from August 20, 1847, and again as Major for the battle of Chapultepec, to date from the 13th of September of that year. Major Beauregard was wounded in the assault upon the Garita de Belen in the city of Mexico. On his return home he was presented with an elegant sword. He was subsequently placed by the Government in charge of the construction of the Mint and Custom-house at New Orleans, as well as of the fortifications on and near the mouth of the Mississippi. General B. is about forty-three years of age, in the prime of life and vigorous health, erect as a soldier, well made, and remarkably active.

A Charleston paper gives publicity to two incidents in General Beauregard's career:

"The first occurred before Vera Cruz.

"General B., then a Lieutenant of Engineers, was sent out by his Colonel (Totten, if we remember aright), with a party of sappers to dig out pioneers trench, according to a profile and plan prepared by the Colonel. No sooner had Beauregard examined the ground than he discovered great objections to the plan. To assure himself, he climbed into a tree, and with the aid of the marine glass, the engineer's side-arm-in, he made a reconnaissance, and saw plainly that the trench, as planned, would be enfiladed by the enemy's cannon. Here was a difficult position for a subaltern misinterim officer. He decided promptly, and returned to head-quarters without stacking a spade. The Colonel met him and expressed surprise that he had not been performed his task. Beauregard replied that he had not touched it. The Colonel, with the astonishment military men feel in hearing their orders have not been obeyed, inquired the reason. He was soon informed of it. He was incredulous: 'the ground had been examined,' 'the reconnaissance was perfect,' etc. The young lieutenant was satisfied, however, that the reconnaissance of his old chief had not been made like his, 'from up in a tree.' The colonel, like a sensible man, concluded to make another examination; the plan was changed in accordance with the young lieutenant's views. The work done from these trenches is matter of history, which has not, however, informed us to whom the credit is due.

"The second event occurred before the city of Mexico.

"A night or two before the attack a council of war was held. There were assembled all the big folks, from the (now) Lieutenant-General who gnettions Scott to the (now) Lieutenant-General who gnettions Scott, to the (now) Lieutenant-General who gnettions Scott, including Worth, Ten from the housetops in Washington, including Worth, Twiggs, etc., down to our friend Beauregard, the youngest officer in the room. The plan was put before Scott was solitary to his opinion. Every other officer present, except one, had spoken, and all concurred in their views. The silent one was Beauregard. At last General Vive crossed over and said, 'You have not expressed an opinion.' 'I have not been called on,' said Beauregard. 'You shall be, however,' said Pierce; and soon resuming his seat, announced that Lieutenant Beauregard had not expressed his opinion. Being then called on, he remarked, that if the plan which had received the consent of all but the commanding General was carried into effect, it would prove disastrous. It would be another Churubusco affair. He then detailed the objections at length, and, after having up the other, urged the reasons in its favor with equal earnestness. The Council reversed their decision. The city of Mexico was entered according to the plan urged by the young lieutenant; and it would seem that his reasons influenced the decision. A few days afterward General Scott, in the presence of a number of general officers, alluded to Lieutenant Beauregard's opinion at the Council, and the consequences which had followed from it."

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1860, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.]

GREAT EXPECTATIONS.

A NOVEL.

By CHARLES DICKENS.

CHAPTER XXXV.

HERBERT and I went on from bad to worse, in the way of increasing our debts, looking into our affairs, leaving margins, and the like exemplary transactions; and Time went on, whether or no, as he has a way of doing; and I came of age—in fulfillment of Herbert's prediction that I should do so before I knew where I was.

Herbert himself had come of age eight months before me. As he had nothing else than his majority to come into, the event did not make a profound sensation in Barnard's Inn. But we had looked forward to my one-and-twentieth birthday with a crowd of speculations and anticipations, for we had both considered that my guardian could hardly help saying something definite on that occasion.

I had taken care to have it well understood in Little Britain when my birthday was. On the day before it I received an official note from Wemmick, informing me that Mr. Jaggers would be glad if I would call upon him at five in the afternoon of the auspicious day. This convinced us that something great was to happen, and threw me into an unusual flutter when I repaired to my guardian's office, a model of punctuality.

In the outer office Wemmick offered me his congratulations, and incidentally rubbed the side of his nose with a folded piece of tissue-paper that I liked the look of. But he said nothing respecting it, and motioned me with a nod into my guardian's room. It was November, and my guardian was standing before his fire leaning his back against the chimney-piece, with his hands under his coat-tails.

"Well, Pip," said he, "I must call you Mr. Pip to-day. Congratulations, Mr. Pip."

We shook hands—he was always a remarkably short shaker—and I thanked him.

"Take a chair, Mr. Pip," said my guardian.

As I sat down, and he preserved his attitude and bent his brows at his boots, I felt at a disadvantage, which reminded me of that old time when I had been put upon a tomb-stone. The two ghastly casts on the shelf were not far from him, and their expression was as if they were making a stupid apoplectic attempt to attend to the conversation.

"Now, my young friend," my guardian began, as if I were a witness in the box, "I am going to have a word or two with you."

"If you please, Sir."

"What do you suppose," said Mr. Jaggers, bending forward to look at the ground, and then throwing his head back to look at the ceiling, "what do you suppose you are living at the rate of?"

"At the rate of, Sir?"

"At," repeated Mr. Jaggers, still looking at the ceiling, "the—rate—of?" And then looked all round the room, and paused with his pocket-handkerchief in his hand, half way to his nose.

I had looked into my affairs so often that I had thoroughly destroyed any slight notion I might ever have had of their bearings. Reluctantly, I confessed myself quite unable to answer the question. This reply seemed agreeable to Mr. Jaggers, who said, "I thought so!" and blew his nose with an air of satisfaction.

"Now, I have asked you a question, my friend," said Mr. Jaggers. "Have you any thing to ask me?"

"Of course it would be a great relief to me to ask you several questions, Sir; but I remember your prohibition."

"Ask one," said Mr. Jaggers.

"Is my benefactor to be made known to me to-day?"

"No. Ask another."

"Is that confidence to be imparted to me soon?"

"Waive that a moment," said Mr. Jaggers, "and ask another."

I looked about me, but there appeared to be now no possible escape from the inquiry, "Have—I—any thing to receive, Sir?" On that Mr. Jaggers said, triumphantly, "I thought we should come to it!" and called to Wemmick to give him that piece of paper. Wemmick appeared, handed it in, and disappeared.

"Now, Mr. Pip," said Mr. Jaggers, "attend, if you please. You have been drawing pretty freely here; your name occurs pretty often in Wemmick's cash-book; but you are in debt, of course?"

"I am afraid I must say yes, Sir?"

"You know you must say yes, don't you?" said Mr. Jaggers.

"Yes, Sir."

"I don't ask you what you owe, because you don't know; and if you did know, you wouldn't tell me—you would say less. Yes, yes, my friend," cried Mr. Jaggers, waving his forefinger to stop me, as I made a show of protesting, "it's likely enough that you think you wouldn't, but you would. You'll excuse me, but I know better than you. Now take this piece of paper in your hand. You have got it? Very good. Now unfold it and tell me what it is."

"This is a bank-note," said I, "for five hundred pounds."

"That is a bank-note," repeated Mr. Jaggers, "for five hundred pounds. And a very handsome sum of money too, I think. You consider it so?"

"How could I do otherwise!"

"Ah! But answer the question," said Mr. Jaggers.

"Undoubtedly."

"You consider it, undoubtedly, a handsome sum of money. Now that handsome sum of money, Pip, is your own. It is a present to you on this day, in earnest of your expectations. And at the rate of that handsome sum of money per annum, and at no higher rate, you are to live until the donor of the whole appears. That is to say, you will now take your affairs entirely into your own hands, and you will draw from Wemmick one hundred and twenty-five pounds per quarter, until you are in communication with the fountain-head, and no longer with the mere agent. As I have told you before, I am the mere agent. I execute my instructions, and I am paid for doing so. I think them injudicious, but I am not paid for giving any opinion on their merits."

I was beginning to express my gratitude to my benefactor for the great liberality with which I was treated, when Mr. Jaggers stopped me.

"I am not paid, Pip," said he, coolly, "to carry your words to any one;" and then gathered up his coat-tails, as he had gathered up the subject, and stood frowning at his fire as if he suspected them of designs against him.

After a pause, I hinted;

"There was a question just now, Mr. Jaggers, which you desired me to waive for a moment. I hope I am doing nothing wrong in asking it again?"

"What is it?" said he.

I might have known that he would never help me out; but it took me aback to have to shape the question afresh, as if it were quite new. "Is it likely," I said, after hesitating, "that my patron, the fountain-head you have spoken of, Mr. Jaggers, will soon—" there I delicately stopped.

"Will soon what?" said Mr. Jaggers.

"That's no question as it stands, you know."

"Will soon come to London," said I, after casting about for a proper form of words, "or summon me any where else?"

"Now here," replied Mr. Jaggers, fixing me

"THE REPUGNIBLE DUTY OF MAKING THE TOAST WAS DELEGATED TO THE AGED."

the first time with his dark deep-set eyes, "we must revert to the evening when we first encountered one another in your village. What did I tell you then, Fip?"

"You told me, Mr. Jaggers, that it might be years hence when that person appeared."

"Just so," said Mr. Jaggers, "that's my answer."

As we looked full at one another I felt my breath come quicker in my anxiety to get something out of him. And as I felt that it came quicker, and as I felt that he saw that it came quicker, I felt that I had less chance than ever of getting any thing out of him.

"Do you suppose it will still be years hence, Mr. Jaggers?"

Mr. Jaggers shook his head—not in negativing the question, but in altogether negativing the notion that he could anywise be got to answer it—and the two horrible warts of the twitched faces looked, when my eyes strayed up to them, as if they had come to a crisis in their suspended attention, and were going to sneeze.

"Come!" said Mr. Jaggers, warming the backs of his legs with his warmed hands, "I'll be plain with you, my friend, Pip. That's a question I must not be asked. You'll understand that better when I tell you it's a question that might compromise me. Come! I'll go a little further with you; I'll say something more."

He bent down so low to frown at his boots that he was able to rub the calves of his legs in the pause he made.

"When that person discloses," said Mr. Jaggers, straightening himself, "you may trust that person will settle your own affairs. When that person discloses, my part in this business will cease and determine. When that person discloses, it will not be necessary for me to know any thing about it. And that's all I have got to say."

We looked at one another until I withdrew my eyes, and looked thoughtfully at the floor. From this last speech I derived the notion that Miss Havisham, for some reason or no reason, had not taken him into her confidence as to her designing me for Estella; that she resented this, and felt a jealousy about it; or that he really did object to that scheme, and would have nothing to do with it. When I raised my eyes again I found that he had been shrewdly looking at me all the time, and was doing so still.

"If that is all you have to say, Sir," I remarked, "there can be nothing left for me to say."

He nodded assent, and pulled out his thick-throaded watch, and asked me where I was going to dine? I replied at my own chambers, with Herbert. As a necessary sequence, I asked him if he would favour us with his company, and he promptly accepted the invitation. But he insisted on walking home with me, in order that I might make arrangements for him, and first he had a letter or two to write, and (of course) had his hands to wash. So I said I would go into the outer office and talk to Wemmick.

The fact was, that when the five hundred pounds had come into my pocket, a thought had come into my head which had been often there before; and it appeared to me that Wemmick was a good person to advise with concerning such thought.

He had already locked up his safe, and made preparations for going home. He had left his desk, brought out his two greasy office candlesticks and stood them in line with the snuffers on a slab near the door, ready to be extinguished: he had put his hat on, put his hat and great-coat ready, and was beating himself all over the chest with his safe-key, as an athletic exercise after business.

"Mr. Wemmick," said I, "I want to ask your opinion. I am very desirous to serve a friend."

Wemmick shook his post-office and shook his head, as if his opinion were dead against any fatal weakness of that sort.

"That friend," I pursued, "is trying to get on in commercial life, but has no money and finds it difficult and disheartening to make a beginning. Now, I want somehow to help him to a beginning."

"With money down?" said Wemmick, in a tone of the most business-like.

"With some money down," I replied, for an uneasy remembrance shot across me of that symmetrical bank-note in my safe at home; "with some money down, and perhaps some anticipation of my expectations."

"Mr. Pip," said Wemmick, "I should like just to run over with you on my fingers, if you please, the names of the various bridges up as high as Chelsea Reach. Let's see: there's London, one; Southwark, two; Blackfriars, three; Waterloo, four; Westminster, five; Vauxhall, six." He had knocked off each bridge in turn, with the handle of his safe-key on the palm of his hand. "There's as many as six, you see, to choose from."

"I don't understand you," said I.

"Choose your bridge, Mr. Pip," returned Wemmick, "and take a walk with your bridge, and pitch your money into the Thames over the centre arch of your bridge, and you know the end of it. Serve a friend with it, and you may know the end of it too—but it's a less pleasant and profitable end."

I could only remind a newspaper in his mouth, he made it so wide after saying this.

"This is very discouraging," said I.

"Meant to be," said Wemmick.

"Then is it your opinion," I inquired, with some little indignation, "that a man should never—"

"—Invest portable property in a friend?" said Wemmick. "Certainly he should not. Unless he wants to get rid of the friend—and then it becomes a question how much portable property it may be worth to get rid of him."

"And that," said I, "is your deliberate opinion, Mr. Wemmick?"

"That," he returned, "is my deliberate opinion in this office."

"Ah!" said I, pressing him, for I thought I saw him near a loophole here; "but would that be your opinion at Walworth?"

"Mr. Pip," he replied, with gravity, "Walworth is one place, and this office is another. Much as the Aged is a pleasure, and Mr. Jaggers is another. They must not be confounded together. My Walworth sentiments must be taken at Walworth; as to my official sentiments can be taken in this office."

"Very well," said I, much relieved, "then I shall look you up at Walworth, you may depend upon it."

"Mr. Pip," he returned, "you will be welcome there in a private and personal capacity."

We had held this conversation in a low voice, well knowing my guardian's ears to be the sharpest of the sharp. As he now appeared in his door-way, toweling his hands, Wemmick got on his great-coat and stood by to snuff out the candles. We all three went into the street together, and from the door-step Wemmick turned his way, and Mr. Jaggers and I turned ours.

I could not help walking more than once that evening that Mr. Jaggers had had an Aged in Gerrard Street, or a Stinger, or a Something, or a Somebody, to assist his hymen a little, or was an uncomfortable consideration on a twenty-first birthday, that coming of age at all seemed hardly worth while in such a guarded and distrustful world as we were environed by. He was a thousand times better informed and cleverer than Wemmick, and yet I would a thousand times rather have had Wemmick to dinner. And Mr. Jaggers made not me alone intensely melancholy, because, after he was gone, Herbert said of himself, with his eyes turned to the fire, that he thought he must have committed a felony and forgotten it, he felt so dejected and guilty.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

DEEMING Sunday the best day for taking Mr. Wemmick's Walworth sentiments, I devoted the next ensuing Sunday afternoon to a pilgrimage to the Castle. As I walked towards the appointments I found the Union Jack flying and the draw-bridge up; but undeterred by this show of defiance and no answer to a kick at the gate, and was admitted in a most pacific manner by the Aged.

"My son, Sir," said the old man, after securing the draw-bridge, "rather had it in his mind that you might happen to drop in, and he left word that he'd soon be back from exercising the guns with a salute. He is very regular in his walks, is my son. Very regular in every thing, is my son."

I nodded at the old gentleman as Wemmick himself might have nodded, and we went in and sat down by the fireside.

"You have a pleasant time with my son, Sir," said the old man, in his chirping way, while he warmed his hands at the blaze, "a real pleasant time?"

I expected from the phrase that he was falling into the greatest confusion by laughing heartily, and replying, in a very sprightly manner, "No, Sir, no; you're right there!" But he only said, as he bore a resolute face to it, "I am glad to have not the faintest notion what he meant, or what joke he thought I had made.

As I could not sit there comparing at him perpetually, without making some other attempt to interest him, I shouted an inquiry whether his calling in the Stinger was "a usual thing with Wemmick." By dint of straining that term out of myself several times, and tapping the old gentleman on the chest to associate it with him, I at last succeeded in making my meaning understood.

"No," said the old gentleman; "the warehousing, the warehousing."

He appeared to point up the chimney, but I believe he intended to refer me to Liverpool; "and then in the City of London here. How then," he gave an infirmity—for I am hard of hearing, Sir—"

I expressed in pantomime the greatest astonishment.

"—Yes, hard of hearing: having that infirmity coming upon me, my son he went into the line, and he took charge of me, and he by little and little made out this elegant and beautiful property. But returning to what you said, you know," resumed the old man, again laughing heartily, "when I say is, No to be sure; you're right."

I was modestly wondering whether my utmost ingenuity would have enabled me to say any thing that would have amused him half as much as this unintentional remark, when I was startled by a sudden click in the wall on one side of the chimney, and the ghostly tumbling open of a little wooden flap with "Post-Office" on it. The old man, following my eyes, cried with great triumph, "My son's come home!" and we both went up to the door to let him in.

It was worth any money to see Wemmick waving a salute to me from the other side of the moat, when we might have shaken hands across with the greatest ease. The Aged was so delighted to work the draw-bridge that I made no offer to assist him, but stood quiet until Wemmick had come across, and had presented me to Miss Skiffins: a lady by whom he was accompanied.

Miss Skiffins was of wooden appearance, and was, like her escort, in the post-office branch of the service. She might have been some two or three years younger than Wemmick, and I judged her to stand possessed of portable property. The cut of her dress from the waist upward, both before and behind, made her figure very like a boy's kite; and I might have pronounced her gown a little too decidedly orange, and her gloves a little too intensely green. But she seemed to be a very good sort of fellow, and showed a high regard for the Aged. I was not long in discovering that she was a frequent visitor at the Castle; for, on our going in, and straightening Wemmick on his ingenious contrivance for announcing himself to the Aged, he begged me to give my attention for a moment to the other side of the chimney, and disappeared. Presently another click came, and another little door tumbled open with "Miss Skiffins" on it. Then Miss Skiffins shut up, and, John tumbled open; then Miss Skiffins and John both tumbled open together, and finally shut up together, the door remaining open. Through these mechanical appliances I expressed the great admiration with which I regarded them, and he smiled, "I'll let you know, Mr. Pip, by both pleasant and useful to the Aged. And by George, Sir, it's a thing worth mentioning, that of all the people who come to this gate, the secret of those pulls is only known to the Aged, Miss Skiffins, and me!"

And Mr. Wemmick made them," added Miss Skiffins, "with his own hands out of his own head."

While Miss Skiffins was taking off her bonnet (she retained her green gloves during the evening, as an outward and visible sign that there was company present), Wemmick led me to take a walk with him round the property, and see how the island looked in winter-time. Thinking that the Aged might relish an opportunity of taking his Walworth sentiments, I seized the opportunity as soon as we were out of the Castle.

He took hold of the matter with a cry, I approached my subject as I had never hinted at it before. I informed Wemmick that I was anxious in behalf of Herbert Pocket, and I told him how we had first met, and how we had fought. I glanced at Herbert's home, and at his character, and at his having no means but such as he was dependent on his father for; whose, uncertain and unpunctual. I alluded to the advantages I had derived in my first rawness and ignorance from Herbert's society, and I confessed that I feared I had but ill repaid them, and that he might have done better without me. And my expectations being now Miss Havisham at the back-ground at a great distance, I strongly hinted at the possibility of my having competent means to make it worth Herbert's while to enter upon a partnership, and being for above any mean distrusts, relations, or designs, I put those means in Wemmick's hands at once. In short, I begged Wemmick, in conclusion, to understand that my help must always be rendered without Herbert's knowledge or suspicion, and that there was no one in the world with whom I could advise. I wound up by laying my hand upon his shoulder, and saying, "I can't help confiding in you, Wemmick. I know it must be troublesome to you; but that is your fault, in having ever brought me here."

Wemmick took it very well for a little while, and then said, with a kind of start, "Well, you know, Mr. Pip, I must tell you one thing. This is devilish good of you."

"Say you'll help me to be good, then," said I.

"Econ," replied Wemmick, shaking his head, "that is not what I mean."

"Nor is this your trading-place," said I.

"You are right," he returned. "You hit the nail on the head. Mr. Pip, I'll put on my considering-cap, and I think all you want to do may be done by degrees. Skiffins (that's her brother) is an accountant and agent. I'll look him up and go to work for you."

"I thank you ten thousand times."

"Why, of course," said he, "I thank you for though we are strictly in our private and personal capacity, still, there are Newgate cobwebs about, and it brushes them away."

After a little further conversation to the same effect we returned into the Castle, where we found Miss Skiffins preparing tea. The response to the duty of making the toast was delegated to the Aged, and that excellent old gentleman was so intent upon it that he seemed to me in some danger of melting from the face of the earth—a consummation that were going to make, but a vigorous relative. The Aged prepared such a hay-stack of buttered toast that I could scarcely see him over it as it simmered on an iron stand hooked on to the top-bar; while Miss Skiffins brewed such a urn-full of tea as I think only the best breweries became strongly excited, and audibly expressed his desire to participate in the entertainment.

The fire burned clear, and the tea-pot had been fired at the right moment of time, and I felt as snugly cut off from the rest of Walworth as if the moat were filled with pitch and tar instead of water. Nothing disturbed the tranquillity of the Castle but the occasional tumbling open of John and Miss Skiffins: which little doors were a prey to some spasmodic infirmity that made me sympathetically uncomfortable until I got used to it.

I inferred from the mechanical nature of Miss Skiffins's arrangements that she made tea there every Sunday night; and I rather suspected that a classic brooch she wore, representing the profile of an undesirable female with a very straight nose and a very new moon, was a piece of portable property that had been given her by Wemmick.

We ate the whole of the toast and drank tea in proportion, and it was delightful to see how warm and greasy we all got after it. The Aged especially, might have passed for some clean old chief of a savage tribe, just oiled. After a short pause of repose, Miss Skiffins—in the absence of the little servant who, it seemed, retired to the bosom of her family on Sunday afternoons—washed up the tea-things in a trifling lady-like amateur manner that compromised none of us. Then she put on her gloves again, and we drew round the fire, and Wemmick said, "Now Aged Parent, tip us the paper."

Wemmick then handed to me while the Aged got his spectacles out, that this was according to custom, and that it gave the old gentleman infinite satisfaction to read the news aloud. "I won't offer an apology," said Wemmick, "for he isn't capable of many pleasures—are you, Aged P.?"

"All right, John, all right," returned the old man, seeing himself spoken to.

"Don't tip him a nod every now and then when he looks off his paper," said Wemmick, "and he'll be as happy as a king. We are all attention, Aged One."

"All right, John, all right!" returned the cheerful old man: so busy and so pleased that it really was quite charming.

The Aged's reading reminded me of the classes at Mr. Wopsle's great aunt's with the pleasanter peculiarity that it seemed to send Wemmick to sleep. As he wanted the candles close to him, and as he was always on the verge of pulling either his head or the newspaper over them, he required as much watching as a fire-work. But Wemmick was equally untiring and gentle in his vigilance, and the Aged read on, quite unconscious of his many rescues. Wherever he looked at us, we all expressed the greatest interest and amazement, and nodded until he resumed pleasantly.

As Wemmick and Miss Skiffins sat side by side, and as I sat in a shadowy corner, I observed a kind and protecting abrogation of Miss Skiffins's mouth, powerfully suggestive of his slowly and gradually stealing his arm round Miss Skiffins's waist. It was not in the least unpleasant to appear on the other side of Miss Skiffins; but at that moment Miss Skiffins nearly stopped him with the green teapot several times, and again as if it were an article of dress, and with the greatest deliberation bind it on the table before her. Miss Skiffins's composure while she did this was one of the most remarkable sights I have ever seen, and if I could have thought that she consistent with abrogation I should have deemed that Miss Skiffins performed it mechanically.

By-and-by I noticed Wemmick's arm beginning to disappear again, and Miss Skiffins put out of view. Shortly afterward his mouth began to widen again. After an interval of suspense, his arm was shot out of sight again and almost pinful, I saw his hand appear on the other side of Miss Skiffins. Instantly Miss Skiffins stopped it with the mouth of a placid boxer, took off that girdle or cestus as before, and laid it on the table. Taking the table to represent the path of virtue, I am compelled to state that during the whole time of the Aged's reading Wemmick's arm was straying from the path of virtue and being recalled to it by Miss Skiffins.

At last the Aged read himself into a light slumber. This was the time for Wemmick to produce the case-bottle, a tray of glasses, a black bottle with a porcelain-topped cork, representing some clerical dignitary of a rubicund countenance, and a lemon. On the aid of these appliances we all had something warm to drink: including the Aged, who was soon awake again. Miss Skiffins and I drank punch, and Miss Skiffins and Wemmick drank out of one glass. Of course I knew better than to offer to see Miss Skiffins home, after the delicate attentions I thought I had best go first: which I did, taking a cordial leave of the Aged, and having passed a most agreeable day.

Before a week was out I received a note from Wemmick, dated Walworth, stating that he hoped he had made some advance in that matter appertaining to our private and personal capacities, and that he would be glad if I could come and see him upon it. So I set off, all impatience, and yet again, and yes again, and I saw him by appointment in the City several times, but never alone, and our conversation was on the subject in or near Little Britain. The upshot was that we found a worthy young merchant or shipping-broker, actually established in business, who wanted intelligent help, and who wanted capital, and who in due course of time and receipt would want a partner. Between him and whom articles were signed of which Herbert was the subject, and I paid him half of my five hundred pounds down, and engaged for every other year of my income; some, contingent on my coming into my property. Miss Skiffins's brother came into the negotiation; Wemmick pervaded it throughout, but never appeared in it.

Time wore on, and Clara was so cleverly managed that Herbert had not the least suspicion of my hand being in it. I never shall forget the radiant face with which Clara came home one afternoon, and told me, as a mighty piece of news, of her having fallen in with one Clarriker (the young merchant's name), and of Clarriker's having shown an extraordinary inclination toward him, and of his belief that the opening had come at last. Day by day as his hopes grew stronger and his face brighter, he must have thought me a more and more affectionate friend, for I had the greatest difficulty in restraining my tears of triumph when I saw him so happy. At length, the thing being done, and he having that day entered Clarriker's House, and he having talked to me for a whole evening in a flush of pleasure and success, I did really cry in good earnest when I went to bed, to think that my expectations had done some good to somebody.

A great event in my life, the turning-point of my life, now opens on my view. But before I proceed to narrate it; and before I pass on to all the changes it involved, I must give a chapter to Estella. It is not much to give to the theme that so long filled my heart.

THE SMILES AND TEARS OF APRIL.

WITH weeping clouds the sky was gray;
An unseen mist above us fell;
And up the Hudson, far away,
The vapors rose from flood and fell;
The dim sun through the atmosphere
Flung down a moist heat from above,
Like one that strives to dry the tear
That trickles on the cheek we love.

Weehawken woods were blurred and wet,
And shivered through their leafy grain,
Like some poor bird by storms beset,
Whose plumage ruffles in the rain.
And every cool creeping mass
Distilled a copious sorrow then,
As if Earth had usurped all loss,
And left no grief for gods or men.

And we wept too—those tears of pride
That well within the heart's deep core—
Our hearts swelling like the tide
That lashed the dank Hoboken shore.
Our faces were as fixed as stone:
But deep a cliff that granite seems
Is filled with crypts and springs unknown,
And in its heart is rich with streams!

We walked in silence: then, at last,
She turned and said: "This best we part.
Forget," she sobbed—"forget the past;
Forget the bondage of heart;
Forget the evenings passed in song;
Forget the happy, happy stroll,
When o'er the twilight dusk and long
The night with shadowy footsteps stole.

"I loved you, and you oftimes swore
That you loved me as well as life;
Here, by this dank and dismal shore,
You asked me to become your wife.
I trusted you, and yet last night,
Here in this very spot, I saw
You, whom I thought my love, my light,
Prove traitor to all manly law.

"I, musing here, beheld you pass!
A fair girl to your bosom clung;
I crept behind you through the grass,
And heard the glozing of your tongue.
I saw her kiss you kissing back;
I saw her arms about your neck;
I saw your treachery—and, alack!
I knew my faithful heart a wreck.

"And now, Sir, go!" With a slow smile
I drew her head upon my breast—
The head that struggled all the while
In my strong arms with fierce unrest;
And whispered in her delicate ear,
Rosy and cabinéed as a shell,
One day a sister, loved and dear,
That pined within a convent cell,

Grow sick of solitude so unblest;
Flung off her robes so black and grim;
And flying to her brother's breast,
Came from once more to God and him!
"And that was she?" "It was: for years
I had not seen her till that eve."
Then on my bosom, through hot tears,
The maid sighed out, "Forgive, forgive!"

And as she sobbed the gray skies broke;
A golden flood poured down the west;
The clouds rolled back like driven smoke,
And melted on Weehawken's crest.
An evening glory swept the earth;
The white sails down the Hudson flew;
In all there was a tenderer mirth,
For Heaven and she were smiling too.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Premature Loss of the Hair,

Which is so common now-a-days, may be entirely prevented by the use of Burnett's Cocoaine. It has been found in thousands of cases where the hair was coming out in handfuls, and has never failed to arrest the decay, and to promote a healthy and vigorous growth. It is at the same time, unrivaled as a dressing for the hair. A single application will render it soft and glossy for several days.

No Chimney!

Burners that will fit any Coal Oil Lamp, and burn Coal Oil or Kerosene without a chimney. Burner sent by mail on receipt of $1 25. Callender's Carbo-Air Gas Lamp burns pure Coal Oil, Kerosene, &c., without wick or chimney. Sample Lamp $3 00. Excites stamp for Circulars. Address CALLENDER & PURDY, Dealers in Lamps, Oils, &c., 175 Broadway, New York.

WEDDINGS for the UNION—Supplied with Cards, Note, Satin Ties, Envelopes, &c., of the latest styles, at fair prices, by A. DEMAREST, Engraver, No. 187 Broadway, N. Y. Samples by mail.

GARDINER'S RHEUMATIC AND NEURALGIA COMPOUND.

A certain, safe, and permanent cure for Rheumatism, Neuralgia, and Salt Rheum. It is an internal remedy, driving out the acidity and thinning the disease, requiring no change in diet or business, and may be taken by children and persons of the most delicate constitutions with perfect safety.

Testimonials.

"Gardiner's Rheumatic and Neuralgic Compound" is the best medicine for the money I ever saw.—CHAS. A. SMITH, No. 1 Old State House, Boston.

After suffering with Rheumatism for twenty years, and being confined to my bed several weeks last spring, I was entirely relieved by the use of two bottles of "Gardiner's Rheumatic and Neuralgia Compound."—NORMAN T. AYRES, 79 Franklin Street, Boston.

Having been a constant sufferer from Neuralgia for eighteen months, and been driven by excruciating pain to the trial of numerous remedies without obtaining relief, I was induced to try "Gardiner's Rheumatic and Neuralgia Compound." I have taken but one bottle and am entirely well.—D. D. BAXTER, Dry Goods Dealer, No. 9 Appleton Block, Lowell, Mass.

I have been afflicted with Salt Rheum in its worst form for a long time, and suffered more than can be imagined, except by those similarly afflicted. I tried one bottle of your Compound, and can honestly say that I believe myself entirely cured.—JOHN A. MORDO, Pearl St. House, Boston, Mass.

"Gardiner's Rheumatic and Neuralgia Compound" has entirely cured me of suffering of seven years' standing.—W. E. HODGKINS, No. 1 Old State House, Boston.

My son, ten years of age, has been for three years a great sufferer from Salt Rheum, his hands covered with sores and he continually crying; one bottle of your compound cured him.—J. W. HAMMOND, 99 Milk Street, Boston.

"Gardiner's Rheumatic and Neuralgia Compound" has entirely cured me of Neuralgia.—W. C. THOMPSON, Proprietor Parlor Jr. House, Revere, Mass.

I certify that my friend Wm. T. Gridden, Esq., presented me with a bottle of "Gardiner's Rheumatic Compound," in 1855, when I was suffering with a painful attack of Neuralgia and Rheumatism, and that it proved to be of decided benefit.—ALBERT SMITH, Ex-Member of Congress from Maine.

The Rheumatic and Neuralgia Compound has been taken by hundreds of persons for Scrofulous Humors with great benefit.

PRINCIPAL DEPOT, 87 KILBY STREET, BOSTON, MASS.

Wholesale Agents for the United States,
F. C. WELLS & CO., Franklin Street.

For sale by apothecaries generally throughout the United States. None genuine unless signed by CHAS. F. GARDINER.

Hard Times made Easy!

GOOD NEWS FOR THE UNEMPLOYED!

ONE THOUSAND CHANCES TO MAKE MONEY!
ONE MILLION DOLLARS WORTH
OF WATCHES, JEWELRY,
AND
SILVER-PLATED WARE,
to be disposed of on an
ENTIRELY NEW AND ORIGINAL PLAN.
Call or Send for a
2,500 AGENTS WANTED.
All persons desirous of securing an Agency in this
NEW ENTERPRISE
Should send on their address at once, inclosing a 3 cent stamp to pay postage, and receive by return of mail
A PREMIUM CATALOGUE
containing
OUR INDUCEMENTS, which offered
A RARE CHANCE TO MAKE MONEY
without risk, together with
FULL PARTICULARS
Relative to this
NOVEL PLAN!!
To insure prompt and satisfactory dealings, direct all orders to
GEORGE G. EVANS,
No. 439 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

"Matrimony made Easy."—A new work, showing how either sex may be suitably married, irrespective of age or appearance. Sent by return mail full—free for 25 cents. Address T. William & Co., Publishers, Box 2260, Philad.

$5,000 REWARD—TO ANY SOBER, energetic man who fails to make $3,000 a year. Business easy, honest, and at home. For full particulars, inclose a stamp for return, and address A. D. F., Box 78, P. O., Wellsburg, Va.

WANTED—MEN, WOMEN, AND BOYS in every Town, City, and Village in the United States, to act as Agents for a new and popular work, on Gift Jewelry Envelopes. Agents can make from 3 to 8 dollars a day. Being the only work in the manufacture of a superior quality of Jewelry, we are enabled to offer to one customer a greater variety and more valuable Gifts than any other similar establishment. For further particulars inclose a stamp, and address, SHERMAN & CO., 229 Broadway, corner of Barclay Street, New York.

VALUABLE TO ALL—Who use the Pen or Pencil. Shaver's Patent Eraser and Burnisher, Pencil Sharpener, &c., all neatly combined in one useful article. "It is a most ingenious contrivance, answering so many purposes entirely."—Independent.

"It combines more useful qualities than any other article of the same size we have seen."—The Gov. Durham, of Connecticut.

1 Sample and postage paid for 75 c., or 3 styles for $1 50. Send for Circular. A. G. SHAVER, New Haven, Ct.

The Working Farmer
AND
Harper's Weekly,
$2 40 per Annum.

Address CHARLES V. MAPES, Mapes' Agricultural Warehouse, 126 and 128 Nassau Street, N. Y.

H. WORCESTER'S
IMPROVED PIANO FORTES,
Manufactory & Salesrooms,
14th St., cor. 3d Av., N. Y.

Great Work on the Horse!

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES:
BY ROBERT JENNINGS, V. S.,
Professor of Surgery and Lecturer on Surgery in the Veterinary College of Philadelphia, Professor of Veterinary Medicine in the late Agricultural College of Ohio, Secretary of the American Veterinary Association of Philadelphia, etc., etc.

WILL TELL YOU Of the Origin, History and distinctive traits of the various breeds of European, Asiatic, African and American Horses, with the physical formation and peculiarities of the animal, and how to ascertain his age by the number and condition of his teeth; illustrated with numerous explanatory engravings.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES
WILL TELL YOU Of Breaking, Breaking, Saddling, Feeding, Grooming, Shoeing, and Unsurpassed Management of the horse, with the best mode of administering medicine, also, how to treat Biting, Kicking, Rearing, Shying, Stumbling, Crib Biting, Restlessness, and other vices to which he is subject; with numerous explanatory engravings.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES
WILL TELL YOU Of the Senses, symptoms, and treatment of Strangles, Sore Throat, Distemper, Catarrh, Influenza, Bronchitis, Pneumonia, Pleurisy, Broken Wind, Chronic Cough, Roaring and Whistling, Lumps, Sore Mouth and Ulcers, and Decayed Teeth, with other diseases of the Mouth and Respiratory Organs.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES
WILL TELL YOU Of the causes, symptoms, and Treatment of Worms, Boils, Colic, Stranglation, Hoop Concretions, Epizootics, Palsy, Diarrhœa, Jaundice, Hepatitis, Bloody Urine, Stones in the Kidneys and Bladder, Inflammation, and other diseases of the Stomach, Bowels, Liver and Urinary Organs.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES
WILL TELL YOU Of the causes, symptoms, and Treatment of Blood, Blood, and Dog Spavin, Ring-bone, Sweenie, Strains, Sore Knees, Wind Galls, Foundered, Sole Bruise and Gravel, Cracked Heels, Scratches, Canker, Thrush, and Corns; also, of Megrims, Vertigo, Epilepsy, Staggers, and other diseases of the Feet, Legs and Head.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES
WILL TELL YOU Of the Causes, symptoms, and Treatment of Fistula, Poll Evil, Gunshots, Farcy, Scaley Farcy, Mange, Surfeit, Locked Jaw, Rheumatism, Cramp, Galls, Diseases of the Eye and Heart, &c., &c., and how to manage Castration, Bleeding, Trephining, Rowelling, Firing, Setons, Amputation, Tapping, and other Operations.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES
WILL TELL YOU Of Barclay's Method of taming Horses; how to approach, Halter, or Saddle a Colt; how to accustom a horse to Strange sounds and sights, and how to Bit, Saddle, Ride, and Break him to Harness; also the form and law of Warranty. The whole being the result of more than Forty Years' careful study of the habits, peculiarities, and weaknesses of the noble and useful animal.

The book contains 384 pages, profusely illustrated by nearly One Hundred Engravings. It is printed in a clear and open type, on fine paper, and will be sent, postage paid, on receipt of price, half bound, $1 00, or, in cloth, extra, $1 25.

$1000 A YEAR can be made by enterprising men everywhere, in selling the above, and other popular works of ours. Our inducements to all such are exceedingly liberal.

As our books are unequaled in their mechanical execution, as well as in their value and interest, a certain and rapid sale follows their introduction everywhere.

For single copies, or for terms to agents, with other information, address the publishers,

JOHN E. POTTER, Publisher,
No. 617 Samson Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

MRS. MRS. UNION. MISS LOVE. WEDDING CARDS.

Specimens by Mail on receipt of 3 postage stamps.
BYERDELL & 322 Broadway, N. Y.

HAVING been restored to health by a very simple Remedy, after suffering for many years, and having a desire to make known to others, who may be suffering from Debility, Nervousness, Loss of Memory, &c., the method and means of cure. Simply enclose stamp to D. H. WELLINGTON, Box 3313 Boston, Mass.

6000 AGENTS wanted, to sell SIX new articles, just out; every person, and of great value to families; all pay great profits to agents. Send four stamps and get 80 pages particulars free. EPHRAIM BROWN, Lowell, Mass.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA—The best Spring Alterative. It will purify the blood, promote a vigorous circulation and thoroughly cleanse the system.
For sale by A. D. & D. SANDS, 100 Fulton St., N. Y.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

Have Just Published,

SILAS MARNER, the Weaver of Raveloe. By GEORGE ELIOT, Author of "Adam Bede," "The Mill on the Floss," and "Scenes of Clerical Life." 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents; Paper Covers, 50 cents.

BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES

Throat Affections.

From Rev. E. Rockey, A.M., President Athens College, Athens, Tenn.—"I have found great benefit from the use of 'Brown's Bronchial Troches,' before and after preaching, as they prevent hoarseness, to which I am very subject. I think from their past effect they will be of permanent advantage to me. Several clergymen of my acquaintance to whom I have given the Troches have been benefited by them.

DR. BROWN'S
Patent Baby-Tender.

The Great Institution for Children.

Warerooms 652 Broadway.

J. Silas Brown & Co.

Send for our Circular.

LE BON TON—THE BEST LADIES' FASHION BOOK in the World. Specimen copies, with two very splendid colored plates, 50 cents.
S. T. TAYLOR & SON, 49½ Broadway, N. Y.

Close of the Twenty-Second Volume.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
For May, 1861.

CONTENTS.

A SUMMER IN NEW ENGLAND.—IV. BOSTON AND LOWELL. Illustrated by FORTE CHANLY.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—An expatriated Patriot.—On State Street.—Worth a Million.—Shifting Figures.—The Kitchen.—Boston Girl.—Lecture on Matrimony.—The Artist's Studio.—A popular Orator.—Harlot of the Crescent.—A Haddock.—Lobster Pot.—Pond near Cohasset.—The Apple-Peeler.—The Reformer.—The Good Old Times.—Recreation formerly.—Recreation nowadays.—The Circus.—Lecture Hour and Bed.

THE OLD LOVE AND THE NEW.

THREE MONTHS IN LABRADOR. By CHARLES HALLOCK. (Concluded.)

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Camp at Flatwater.—Settler's Cabin.—Map of Esquimaux Bay.—Esquimaux Sketch.—Esquimaux of Nugsuak.—Rigolette.—The Doctor's Mishap.—Moaly Mountain.—Mosquito, or Musquito.—Labrador Indian.—Chateau Islands.—Profile Rocks at Henley Harbor.—Fort Chateau Bay.

DIGGING FOR CARTHAGE.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Reservation at Carthage.—Cape Carthage.—The African Colonel.—Ruins of Temple of Baal Hammon.—Inscription.

THE DEBATABLE BABY.

GEORGE ROGERS CLARKE.

GELEY'S DAM. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE.—Illustrated by J. E. MILLAIS.

CHAPTER I. The Commencement of the Great Geley Farm Case.

CHAPTER II. Lady Mason and her Son.

CHAPTER III. Mr. Dockwrath.

CHAPTER IV. The Doris of Youth.

CHAPTER V. Mr. Sturt's Solicitor.—Sir Peregrine and his Heir.

A SINGLE WOMAN'S STORY.

THE ADVENTURES OF PHILIP. By W. M. THACKERAY.

CHAPTER VIII. Will he pronounced to be Cynical by the Benevolent.

CHAPTER IX. Contains one Riddle which is solved, and perhaps some more.

CHAPTER X. In which we visit "Admiral Byng."

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Cynical.—Laura's Fireside.—Riddle.—With Admiral Byng.

PRINCE NAPOLEON.

A WOMAN'S ADVENTURE.

MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.

LITERARY NOTICES.

EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.

OUR FOREIGN BUREAU.

EDITORS DRAWER.—With Ten Illustrations.

FASHIONS FOR MAY.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Spring Fardessus, No. 1.—Spring Fardessus, No. 2.

The present Number completes the Twenty-Second Volume of HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE. The Publishers renew their thanks for the cordial approbation and liberal support which the Magazine has received during the eleven years of its publication.

A regular monthly circulation of more than One Hundred Thousand, and a constant demand for back Numbers, Volumes, and complete Sets, evince that the Magazine meets the wants of the great body of American readers. All the features which have given it such distinctive popularity will be retained. Its object will still be to present to the American public the choicest literature of the day, with abundant and original illustrations of every subject in which the Artist can aid the Writer. The Publishers confidently anticipate a continuance of the favor with which the Magazine has heretofore received from the Press and the Public.

The Author of "Adam Bede," wishing to publish her New Novel, in England, complete, at an early day, it will not appear, as announced, in the Magazine, but has been issued in a volume by the Publishers, in advance of its publication in England. In the place will appear "Grisly Farm," by ANTHONY TROLLOPE, the most brilliant Novelist of the day. The first part is contained in the present Number of the Magazine. It will be completed in time, until its completion, the Publishers having secured from the Author the advance sheets of the original Engravings, from Drawings by MILLAIS, the founder of the "Pre-Raphaelite School," and the most eminent painter of the age.

Any Number will be sent by Mail, post-paid, for Twenty-five Cents. Any Volume, comprising Six Numbers, neatly bound in Cloth, will be sent by Mail, to any part of the United States within 3000 miles of New York, post-paid, for Two Dollars per Volume. Complete Sets will be sent by Express, the freight at the charge of the purchaser, at a Discount of Twenty-five per Cent. from the above rates. Twenty-one Volumes, bound uniformly, extending from June, 1850, to December, 1860, are now ready.

HARPER'S WEEKLY will be sent gratuitously for one month, as a specimen—to any one who applies for it. Specimen Numbers of the Magazine will also be sent gratuitously.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year	$2 00
Two Copies for One Year	3 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each)	2 00

And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of EIGHT Subscribers.

HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MAGAZINE, together, one year, $4 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

VENUS. "You say dey's fitin', 'Poleon."
NAPOLEON. "Yes, Marster say dey is, 'cause dey can't get no Coppermise."
VENUS. "Whar dey get dat?"
NAPOLEON. "In de Nort, I b'lieve."
VENUS. "Well, my Lor! sooner en' to fite, dey better git de Coppermise, ef it cos' a Hundred Dollar; dis ting of Brudderin' fitin' is agin de Scriptur!"

INTOLERABLE!—(*Vicinity of the * * * * * * Club, Fifth Avenue.*)
EXTERIOR PARTY (observes to Friend), "I declare, Sophy, if those same horrid Men are not staring out of the Club window again!"
INTERIOR PARTY (ditto to ditto). "Hello, Fred! here comes those same Girls back again—is it you or me, eh!"

DINING UNDER DIFFICULTIES.

The Indignation and Disgust of JONES (who is not a Musical Man) at hearing SMITH accompany Miss FLORA so nicely in the Elixir of Love.

5,000 Men Wanted
To Sell
LLOYD'S NEW POLITICAL CHART FOR THE TIMES, containing large, new, colored PORTRAITS OF PRESIDENT LINCOLN AND HIS CABINET, GEN. SCOTT, GEN. WOOL, MAJ. ANDERSON, AND LIEUT. SLEMMER, with a sketch of the life of each. A MAP OF OUR COUNTRY, showing, in different colors, the FREE STATES, BORDER SLAVE STATES, SECEDED STATES, and TERRITORIES.
Also, accurate Election and Census Returns for 1860, with much other valuable information.
Finely colored on excellent paper, 28x36 inches in size.
Mailed, pre-paid, for 25 cents. (Stamps received.)
A RARE CHANCE FOR AGENTS.
Published at H. H. LLOYD & CO'S,
Agents' General Depôt for BOOKS, MAPS, AND STATIONERY PACKAGES,
No. 13 Howard Street, New York.

A PAIR OF REAL NOVELTIES,
AND ONE WITHOUT A MATE.
THE "PARIS" TIE Patent applied for. "A new Tie every day."

THE "BELIEF" TIE Patented Jan 29, 1861 A perfect "Belief" from tying Bows.
THE "LACE EDGED" TIE (exquisitely beautiful). SMITH & BROTHER, Sole Manufacturers, No. 36 Warren St., N.Y.
N. B.—We sell to WHOLESALE DEALERS ONLY. Country Merchants can order our goods of ANY JOBBER.

John B. Dunham.

Overstrung Grand Square and Upright Pianos.
Established in 1834.
Are pronounced to be the best Pianos manufactured. Each Instrument warranted 5 years. Send for Circular. Warerooms and Manufactory, 75 to 85 East 13th Street, near Broadway, N. Y.

General Scott's Infantry Tactics;
OR,
Rules for the Exercise and Maneuvres of the United States Infantry.
3 vols. 24mo, Muslin, $2 50.
Published by Authority.

United States Army Regulations.
Approved by the President of the United States, and Printed under the Directions of the Secretary of War.
12mo, Muslin, $1 50.
Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

Harper's Weekly.
PRICE FIVE CENTS.
TERMS.

One Copy for Twenty Weeks	$1 00
One Copy for One Year	2 00
One Copy for Two Years	4 00
Five Copies for One Year	9 00
Twelve Copies for One Year	20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year	40 00

Harper's Weekly and Harper's Magazine, one year, $4 00.
Volumes I., II., III., and IV. of HARPER'S WEEKLY, handsomely bound in Cloth extra, Price $1 50 each, can now be had.
* * To postmasters getting up a Club of Twelve or Twenty-five, a Copy will be sent gratis. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. Specimen Numbers gratuitously supplied.
☞ Clergymen and Teachers supplied at the lowest CLUB RATES.
HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

WARD'S
Perfect Fitting Shirts,
MADE TO MEASURE AT $18 PER DOZEN, OR SIX FOR $9.
MADE OF NEW YORK MILLS MUSLIN,
With fine Linen Bosoms, and warranted so good a Shirt as sold in the retail stores at $2 00 each.
ALSO, THE VERY BEST SHIRTS THAT CAN BE MADE AT $2 EACH.
SELF-MEASUREMENT-FOR SHIRTS.
Printed directions, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of Shirts sent free everywhere, and so easy to understand, that any one can take their own measure for Shirts. I warrant a good fit. The cash to be paid to the Express Company on receipt of goods.
S. W. H. WARD, from London,
No. 387 Broadway, N. Y., up Stairs.

As reduced prices, with Glass Cloth Presser, Improved Loop-Check, New Style Hemmer, Binder, Corder, etc. Office, No. 505 Broadway, New York.
"This Machine strikes the 'Locic Section,' and ranks highest, on account of the elasticity, remoteness, beauty, and general desirableness of the stitching when done, and the wide range of its application."
(Report of American Institute, New York.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. V.—No. 227.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 4, 1861. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS.—$2 50 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1861, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE HOUSE-TOPS IN CHARLESTON DURING THE BOMBARDMENT OF SUMTER.

PUBLISHERS' NOTICE.

THE proprietors of Harper's Weekly beg to inform the public that they have dispatched an artist to the SOUTH, in company with MR. RUSSELL, the correspondent of the London Times. Another of their special artists is traveling with the SEVENTH REGIMENT; a third is now in BALTIMORE; and a fourth is with the Southern Army in VIRGINIA. They are making other important changes in Harper's Weekly, involving considerable expense. The present number contains many MORE PICTURES than any heretofore issued; succeeding numbers will be still richer in illustrations. In addition, the next number of Harper's Weekly will be published on better paper than has ever been used by any newspaper in this country. These improvements, it is believed, will render Harper's Weekly the BEST ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

In consequence of the additional expense which they will involve, the proprietors beg to announce that the price of Harper's Weekly is raised from FIVE to SIX CENTS for single copies. The subscription price remains the same. The advertisement of terms, etc., will be found on the last page.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MAY 4, 1861.

THE WAR.

THE WAR has now begun in earnest. The secession of Virginia, and the attempts of rebels to seize the Arsenal at Harper's Ferry and the Navy-yard at Norfolk; the bombardment of Fort Sumter; the investment of Fort Pickens; the seizure of the Star of the West by a Southern privateer; the threatened seizure of the Federal Capital by the rebels; the murder of Massachusetts men in Baltimore, and the refusal of Maryland to permit Northern troops to pass through that city to defend the capital—these facts explain the situation without further comment.

It is not now a question of slavery or anti-slavery. That is not even a question of Union or disunion. The question simply is whether Northern men will fight. Southerners have rebelled and dragged our flag in the dirt, in the belief that, because we won't fight ducks or engage in street brawls, therefore we are cowards. The question now is whether or no they are right.

If they are wrong, and if Abraham Lincoln is equal to the position he fills, this war will be over by January, 1862.

At the time we write, after less than a fortnight's notice, nearly 20,000 Northern men have left their homes to defend Washington. In the course of another week as many more will have gone forward from New England, New York, and Pennsylvania. By 15th May, 100,000 Northern men will be in arms for the defense of the capital. By 15th June, this number can be increased, if need be, to 200,000. Any amount of money is at the service of the Government. The whole Northern people are of one mind on the subject; party divisions are obliterated; twenty millions of people place at the service of the Administration their lives and their money.

With such support, and such resources, if this war be not brought to a speedy close, and the supremacy of the Government forcibly asserted throughout the country, it will be the fault of ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

We do not propose to re-echo the censure which the Administration has already incurred at the hands of its friends for its want of energy. We hope that in the future it will be energetic enough to satisfy every body. But Mr. Lincoln must remember that this is no time for trifling. The rebels have appealed to the sword, and by the sword they must be punished.

Baltimore should instantly be seized and occupied. Governor Hicks and Mayor Brown mean very well, no doubt. But it is evident they can not control the lawless mob who are known as "Blood-tubs" and "Plug Uglies," and it is necessary that Baltimore should be held by people who can. Two columns—one from New York and Philadelphia, the other from Harrisburg—should move on Baltimore, and hold it under martial law. In case of resistance, the city should be shelled. The more severe the methods the surer and more humane the regimen. Mr. Lincoln must remember that if we can not hold Baltimore we must evacuate Washington.

Baltimore secured—either as a city or as a ruin—the Government should operate on Virginia, on a base line from Fort Monroe to Washington City. Both shores of the Potomac must be secured; and this done, a column should move on Richmond. Richmond is important, first as the capital of Virginia, and secondly as the greatest depot of arms and flour in the Southern States. The entire rebel force is armed and fed, at this moment, by Richmond. It should be in the possession of the Government before 1st of June.

A similar course should be pursued in the West. St. Louis, Missouri, Louisville, Kentucky, and Memphis, Tennessee, should be occupied by Northwestern troops, and the strong points on the river fortified. At least fifty thousand men should be scattered along the shore of the Mississippi, south of St. Louis, with a home reserve of an equal number to fill vacancies after battles. Kentucky and Missouri, we notice, evince a tardy sense of their national obligations. This is very good, as far as it goes. But Kentucky may as well understand at once that she can not occupy an attitude of neutrality in the present contest. If she is not for us, she is apparently really for the secession temper of the North, people don't seem to care much which way she goes. If she is for us, we expect her riflemen in our ranks. If she is against us, in a few months Ohio will probably be arming 50,000 negroes who will have fled from slavery in Kentucky. It is hard to say which event would be best for the North.

It will probably take the whole summer to consummate these operations. But they can be consummated, if Mr. Lincoln and his advisers have energy enough, by 1st November. And by that time, the Southern rebels will be cooped in from Richmond, Virginia, to Memphis, Tennessee, will be ready to commence operations against the Gulf rebels.

These should not be undertaken before November. It would be fatal to send troops South in the summer. A few frigates should cruise all summer in Southern waters to pick up privateers and compel the Southern rebels to keep their forts fully garrisoned. In case of neglect, landings might be effected on healthy points, and fortifications erected. But the main operations should be deferred till November.

Then, two armies should move—one in transports from New York, the other down the Mississippi. The one should capture every fort, arsenal, custom-house, and post-office in the Southern States on the Atlantic; the other should move directly on Baton Rouge and New Orleans. With proper generals and reliable commanders, both armies would perform their work by New Year. The work would be sharp, but it could and should be done.

We desire, in conclusion, to present three considerations:

1. The war has now begun, and the trade of the year is as thoroughly ruined as it can be. We should do no more mischief to trade by war vigorously. By prosecuting it vigorously we shall secure peace and a fair trade next year. By pursuing a lax, half-and-half policy, we shall probably involve this country in a ten years' war. Furthermore, this war, which wise men have foreseen for three or four years, should be settled now, for two reasons: first, because, if it is not, two of the North's bravest cowards beyond redemption; and, secondly, because we owe it to our children not to bequeath to them a quarrel which we had a fair chance to adjust.

2. As to slavery. This is a matter which concerns the Southern States exclusively. We of the North have never attempted to touch it, but if we have believed that it was not our business to interfere with it where it existed. The Government troops will not march into the Southern States to set the Africans free, however. But if the South expect that our gallant volunteers are going to hunt the slaves who may run away as they approach, they labor under a delusion. We will not employ a single man to assist blood-hounds to catch runaway slaves, they are mistaken. Wherever the United States Army goes, local, municipal, and State laws will be suspended by martial law, and the Fugitive Slave Act is not to be found in the Army Regulations. Whatever may be the intentions of the Government, the practical effect of a war in the Southern States will be to work even against Southern men, must be to liberate the slaves. This should be well understood.

3. Lastly, we desire to caution Northern people against the danger of underrating Southerners. The Southern States, combined, constitute a powerful nation. Southern men are accustomed to the use of arms. Each State is able to raise a great army; the men will all be found brave, and at least as highly skilled in military tactics as our Northern men; they have officers fully as able as our own people who are. They have as much money as they need for the present. There are twenty-five millions of dollars at least in specie in the Southern States, and in case of need, Southern troops would fight put in bonds or shinplasters, however depreciated. They can raise plenty of corn, pork, and vegetables for their subsistence. They commence the war with a capital of thirty or forty millions of repudiated Northern debts. They are thoroughly persuaded that they are right, and that their cause is the cause of God and of independence. Some Northern people suppose that negro slavery is a source of weakness to the South. This is only conditionally true. A grate, scientifically filled with paper, dry kindling-wood, and good coal, is quite likely to blaze into a flame if a match be applied beneath. But until the match is applied it is as dead as a wet log. Who has asked the Southern slaves to look out for themselves?

THE LOUNGER.

THE TALK OF RIGHT OF REVOLUTION.

Do you, then, deny the right of revolution? returns some wise slave as yet without adequate conception of what is taking place in the country.

No, and again no, you exasperating but possibly honest persons, nobody denies the right of revolution. But do you believe in a revolution without cause? Is it enough that some people think they would prefer a different Government to justify them in trying to break up that which already exists? Do the people of this country owe no duties to each other? Did Wendell Phillips say: "Stand by with the principles of '76 behind us, who can deny them the right?" Why, what are the principles of '76? Simply that when a Government oppresses and robs people the oppressed have before God and men a right to seize their arms and redress themselves, even at the cost of destroying that Government.

But the principles of '76 are any thing but a resort to revolution until all legal redress fails. Of course the discontented must themselves be the judge when they are oppressed; but if they refuse to take the lawful, peaceful, sanctioned methods of remedy and appeal to battle, they are the deadly foes of all mankind.

If the people of South Carolina or Georgia felt aggrieved by any thing in the lawful and regular operation of our Government, why did they not invite a convention to deliberate upon redress? Does Mr. Phillips forget that James Otis constantly declared that the remedy for the colonies was in the English Constitution, which had been violated? And he did not think that such representation was denied to the colonies. But in our case the Constitution prescribes the very form of remedy, and each State had and has nothing to do but follow it. If that appeal had been made and had failed, there would have been a little better excuse for the effort to plunge the land into anarchy, and the orator would have been somewhat more justified in defending the rebellion.

But the great truth is, that under our system of revolution can be considered always and utterly unjustifiable; because there is scarcely any conceivable harm which the Government could do which would not be preferable to the consequences of triumphant anarchy. And therefore it is that this insurrection is a rebellion against the people. It is the cause of the skilled and desperate faction, despotic and aristocratic in its very nature, against the peace and the will of the people of the United States.

No; nobody denies the right of revolution. But a pirate can not plead the principles of '76. A thief can not plead that a burglar can not point his pistol and accuse us of breaking the peace, if we move to save wife and child and he shoots us. No; when every remedy which the peaceful course of law provides has been exhausted, then, but not till then, may you begin to talk of revolution and the principles of '76. And then you are the natural foe of all honest citizens, and, if you are many and dangerous, the continuance of society demands that you be put down at every cost, even that of your extermination.

THE FIRST GREAT VICTORY.

THE great rebellion had counted upon the division of loyal citizens. Jeff Davis supposed that this war would be fought and finished in the streets of the chief Northern cities. New York he considered his especial and trusty ally; and the moment his gage was thrown down he believed that his course would triumph at the North.

He fired his shot, and lo! the echo from the North! He expected that the fire of it to every loyal heart in the land into a blaze! He took Sumter—seven thousand men took seventy. And the answer to the appeal to the power of civilization and Constitutional liberty took twenty millions of heroic hearts, and is this moment marshaling them for battle. The rebellion was sure that the men and money of New York would go for anarchy. But the men and money of New York have responded to the appeal to labor by every heart-strings of treason. "Anarchy is no remedy for political disappointment. While you were true to the laws which are virtually essential to the welfare of all, we were true to you; but when you put down the laws, then by the grace of God we will put you down at every cost."

This was the cheer which the city of New York listened on the 20th of April, and which is ringing through all the loyal States. Jeff Davis and his rebellious crew forgot that the New York merchants were the first to declare non-intercourse with Great Britain in the old revolutionary day, and that their sons were worthy of them. The rebels have made the same mistake at home that they have made abroad. As they believed that Northern men would not support the rebellion in order to secure a supply of cotton, so they supposed that the trade of New York would countenance rebellion to prevent a panic. But they think that a man builds his house upon a volcano that it may be stable? There can be no peace without civil war, and order? The first security of New York is permanent quiet, and it knows that quiet can be obtained only by the most unflinching reliance upon law.

The rebellion, therefore, deprived of its chief hope, must strike out desperately and at once. If they had known the profession, said a Southerner in the streets of New York when the Seventh Regiment marched to the field, things would not have gone so far. Without money, without ships, without a cause—except that which every pirate has—and with four millions of servile population which knows that the struggle springs indirectly from their condition, what can the rebellion do but plunge forward ferociously, and try to carry by terror a victory which it can not compel by force? Meanwhile the rebels know that, as surely as the sun rises, the honor of the country's flag will presently be vindicated.

WAR!

THE great triumph of these days is that the American people outside of the rebels are not in the least demoralized, and that they are united in heart and hand in this struggle for the very existence of civil society.

The guilt of the leaders of the rebellion is unparalleled in history. For their own selfish and base purpose the hearts of thousands are to be wrung and the blood of thousands more to be poured out like water. Our best and bravest have marched away, with cheerful hearts and smiling faces. They will return to us victors or not at all, for they are heroes. But for the vast blight and desolation which now cover the land there is but one man responsible—a few men directing this colossal treason, by whose side Benedict Arnold shines white as a saint.

At this moment—it may be passed when the writing becomes print—the fear is the capture of Washington. By the treason of Virginia, which is the meanest treason of the whole, and the defection of Maryland, our chief point is far within the lines of the enemy and communication well-nigh cut off. The great hope of the rebellion is a sudden blow. If it can fall upon Washington successfully, it will move triumphantly across Maryland, and give battle to the patriots along the Pennsylvania line.

Meanwhile we are to remember that this is War. The rebels have appealed to arms. They seek to smother us in our own blood. Let us all understand, therefore, that war it is to be. Every loyal State should make it death to hold the least commerce with traitors. The coast of the South should be sternly blockaded, and as the rebellious army presses northward it should be recalled by the destruction of Southern cities. We can not put with one hand and strike with the other. War they have invoked; war let them have; and God be the judge between us!

THE FLAG A SYMBOL.

NOBODY openly defends the rebellion, because it is not safe to do so. But if any one secretly sympathizes with it, not from treachery, but from ignorance and thoughtlessness, let him remember this—that the flag of the United States is the symbol of the Government which secures and protects him in all his rights and interests; and when he accuses the flag he invites anarchy and the universal destruction not only of all property, but of all the guarantees of civil society.

Does any man seriously think that a man is absolved from his allegiance to this Government simply because he says that he is so? Is a thief, caught in the act, to be glad especially that he does not acknowledge the law, that he has thrown off his allegiance? Is it unjust or unkind or cruel to defend the law by every means necessary to insure safety and assault? Is it noble and magnanimous to spring to avenge it when some pirate nation in a remote sea lays hand upon the flag, and is when the men who have grown and prospered under it more than any nation in the world strike their hands at the flag and their fangs at the peaceful and happy system which it symbolizes?

A man so totally devoid of love of country as such a feeling indicates is to be pitied. He is a lump of inhuman selfishness. He has no more conception of civil society than a Hottentot or a Digger Indian. To him Bunker-hill and Marathon and Salamis—to him Naseby and Worcester—to him Lexington and Saratoga and King's Mountain, Lake Erie and Chippewa, are names without music or meaning. The heroic names of history, that shine all along from the beginning to our time, beacons of human hope and progress, are merely names to him, nothing more. He is incapable of that glowing emotion of patriotism which fuses all his thoughts and hopes into one burning passion of loyalty. In his native land, which has the cause of that land is the cause of liberty and law and human welfare, such a being is not a man but a fish.

GO, OR KEEP STILL.

IN a struggle so vital as this for the maintenance of law and the flare of human society, there is no half ground. Every man is a friend or foe. Every man who, by word or deed, sympathizes with rebellion should be marked and watched, not for mischief, but to see that he does no mischief. One enemy within the camp is as fatal as fifty outside. And at a time when the best citizens send their husbands, and sons, and brothers, and lovers to the war to shed their life blood with the enemy at home supports the traitors who shed that blood should be made painfully conspicuous, that his power to harm be blood-shudders may be paralyzed.

At the same time mob-law of every kind should be sharply and suddenly and hopelessly repressed. It is not a war of vengeance, but of defense and love of liberty. The calm and regular course of law, essential to human freedom and the equal rights of the citizens, has been withstood and crushed by opposite factions and furious men assume to be higher than the law, and wiser than the tried system of ages. Since, then, we are engaged in a holy war for rights and liberty and law, it must be our first duty and vow to show how loyal we ourselves are to law. Let every man upon private property or upon individuals be as sternly discountenanced as treason and traitors. But if we are to defend the law we must obey it. In one any man openly gives aid and comfort to the enemy, he must remember that the Constitution declares just that business to be treason.

There were plenty of men in the old Revolution, when the people of this country established the Government they are now defending and maintaining, who said that they thought the Americans wrong. Such gentry were known as Tories—and as such they are stigmatized in our history. But they went off. They went to Halifax, to the West Indies, to England, or they held their tongues. They were wise men, and those who resemble them in disloyalty to the American flag will be wise if they go to Europe or Asia, or hold their tongues.

THE HEROES WHO FIRST FELL.

In Acton, a country town of Massachusetts about 20 miles from Boston, and near Concord bridge where the battle was fought in '75, there is a military company which is composed of the descendants of the men who fought and fell in the battle. Their commander's family name since that day has always been Davis. On Monday morning, the 15th April, the proclamation of the President of the United States calling for troops was issued. On Tuesday morning, the 16th, at one o'clock, the Acton church bell rang. The men of the town hastily assembled on the green. The President's proclamation was read, and the requisition of the Governor of Massachusetts; and a fund was started during the Acton company was in Faneuil Hall, in Boston, ready for service. On Friday, the 19th April, the great day of the company's history, it was engaged in Baltimore; and the heroes of Lexington and Concord of 75 made place in glory beside them, for their sons the heroes of Baltimore fight in '61.

Nor is he less a hero who is the official civil and military head of Massachusetts in this solemn hour. Long foreseeing the inevitable fate, personally acquainted with leaders of the rebellion, then ripening into full traitors; sprung of the blood which has been the seed of liberty and progress in civilization; an accomplished civilian; a man altogether of the higher type of the old Revolutionary leaders—Governor Andrew was preparing, hoping against hope for a peaceable solution, so that the Massachusetts men could be equipped and forwarded at once. It was their happiness to be first summoned and first in the field. It will be their undying fame that, in the great struggle of to-all it is certain the liberty our fathers won, they were again the first to fall.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A NEW MISERERE

(For this Year's Border Services at the Pope's Chapel).

That tottering state of Peter's chair,
In shaky Italy, in confusion here,
All stuffed with thorns for soft horse-hair.
Miserere!

And the old man that filleth it,
Upon French bayonets forced to sit
(Galling predicament, smith),
Miserere!

The triple crown, now crushed and flat,
At e'er the shocking-at bad hat,
Since Piedmont on it rudely sat,
Miserere!

The great Cross-Keys—that sign which showed
The sinful sinner upon the road,
Now debutain's diner abode,
Miserere!

St. Peter's bark, before the blast,
Upon a lee-shore driving fast,
With leaky sides, and splintered mast,
Miserere!

The Captain of that storm-beat craft,
Helpless at tiller fore and aft,
No chart—no compass—life-buoy—raft—
Miserere!

St. Peter's Patrimony fair,
Where once the Church had pickings rare,
Now left from spoliation bare.
Miserere!

St. Peter's sheep—whose fat increase,
Wit, wool, mutton, wool, and grease—
Turned out for battles to fleece,
Miserere!

Their shepherd, to the wolves a prey,
Gone in sheep's clothing, and to say,
And others in their fangs display!
Miserere!

The cardinals, in fear intense,
Mustered for their red hats' defense,
Cut down from Peter's Pounds and Pence,
Miserere!

The friars, black, blue, brown, and gray,
Who right pro-tem-pore-ize and pray,
Now rudely driven to work, and pray,
Miserere!

Poor bats, broad daylight made to bear,
Poor moles, dug out to upper air,
Poor owls, from ruins found to fare,
Miserere!

Our ancient wind-bags, pricked by doubt—
Our windmills, turned into a rout—
Our pious frauds, sin's impious fout—
Miserere!

Austrian hopes now down at zero—
Ground-floor blocked by every Nero—
King Bomba-ino—pestilent hero—
Miserere!

And lastly Bowyer noble chief,
Who dared to call the Papal brief,
Gainst John Bull cursed be in beef,
Miserere!

A QUESTION FOR THE HOUSEKEEPERS.—Like curds like say Hahnam-ann's disciples. Well, granted this be so, who will tell us whether an ounce of the latter should not be cured by a small mouthful of pâté de foie gras, which every lady knows is made of diseased liver?

DON'T BELIEVE IT WAS EVER SAID.—Hundred anecdotes are generally very stupid—so are most other inventions, and the less a Party getting into his anecdotage. What is the good, for instance, of Sydney Smith's story. An actress who is a very great favorite with the gallery, was being interviewed in the green-room upon the blackness of her hair. "Why, it's dyed," she replied, with the sensible frankness of the true artist. "Dyed," repeated the other speaker, "why, favorite as you are, you are not yet five-and-twenty." "Why, no," said the lady, "but you know—"

"Whom the Gods love, dye young."

A QUESTION FOR DR. TAYLOR.

Why is a man who has made his Will like a rabbit-pie-ous? Because he's a Test-ator (pronounced, cockneywise, Testeator).

A fiend in human form suggests that, in these days of burnt candles and much writing, it would be well if some enthusiast, instead of consuming the midnight oil, were to burn the midnight composition.

According to Drummond of Hawthornden, it was a remark of Dr. Arthur Johnstone, on being told of a bishop who seldom preached, that he was "a very rare preacher."

JUVENILE PERCEPTION.

A Schoolmistress once asked a pupil to tell What word the letters S double E spell?
The child was but dull, and no mistress cries,
"What is it, you dunce, I do with my eyes?"
"Oh yes!" says the child, quickly opening her hist,
"I know the word now, ma'am, S double E myself."

LYING IN STATE.—A Queen's Speech.

A just but a severe man built a gallows on a bridge, and asked every passenger what was his business. If he answered truly, he passed unharmed; if falsely, he was hanged on the gallows. One day a passenger being asked the usual question, answered, "I am going to be hanged on the gallows." On hearing this, the man ordered him to hang this man, he will have answered truly, and ought not to have been hanged; if he be not hung, he will have answered falsely, and ought to have been hanged." It is not recorded what decision was come to.

"Pray, Sir," said a person who had previously been the backmost of a crowd, to another who had just joined it, "pray, Sir, will you be kindenough to pass upon me; it is unnecessary, since there is no one behind to press upon you!" But there may be presently," said the other; "besides, Sir, where's the good of being in a crowd, if one mayn't shove?"

A young clergyman very deficient in learning complaining to Dr. Johnson that Amor was a noun of the third conjugation Greek—"I suppose," said the Doctor, "it was at the time of your being examined in Virgil."

"Sir, your account has stood for two years, and I must have it settled immediately."—To which the customer replied, "Sir, I am surprised at your standing for a debt, a debt that my account is an exception. If it has been standing too long, suppose you let it stand longer."

The Rev. Dr. A——, and the late Mr. T——, of B——, were together on a scientific excursion in Perthshire. They were pursuing their researches on the estate of Dundarach, which had been left by a deceased proprietor to a gentleman named Melills, but who had changed his name on succeeding to the property. "Pray, Mr. T——," said the latter, "that the laird has not been injured by prosperity; he is well known to be a little near." "Why, Sir," replied T——, "since he has laid aside mellis and is done sinecure."

[ARTIFICIAL MEMORY.—A humorous comment on this system was made by a waiter at the Crystal Palace dining-room after giving his lecture on artificial memory. A few minutes after the gentleman had finished his lecture, he entered, with uplifted hands and eyes, exclaiming, "Well, I protest the memory can be improved to a miracle!"]

At a banquet, when solving enigmas was one of the diversions, Alexander said to one of his courtiers, "What is that which did not exist before, and will exist no more next year?" A distressed officer, starting up, said, "It certainly must be our army list." The king was so diverted that he commanded him to be paid up, and also increased his pay.]

A quack doctor advertises to this effect. "Consumptives, come to me, and I'll cure you for after you've taken one bottle of my mixture you can't." We rather think we won't take any of that until we find out what it is, by means by the above rather equivocal extract from his advertisement.

EXAMINER. "Who was the strongest man?"
SMART BOY. "Jonah."
EXAMINER. "How so?"
SMART BOY. "Cause the whale couldn't hold him after he got him down."

In one of the States they passed an act that no dog should go at large without a muzzle, and a man was brought up for violating the statute. In defence he alleged that his dog had a muzzle. "How is that?" quoth the justice. "Oh!" said the defendant, "I had a notion a thing of where the muzzle should be placed; and as I thought the animal would like the fresh air, I put the muzzle on his tail."

It is the opinion of the doctor that the lawyer gets his living by philander, while the lawyer thinks the doctor gets his by medi-cheat.

"What do you call this?" said Jones, tapping his dinner lightly with his fork. "Call it!" emitted the landlord; "what do you call it yourself?" "Well, really," said Jones, "I don't know; it hasn't quite enough hair in it for plaster, but there's a little too much for a bun."

"Weigh your words," said a man to a fellow who was blustering away in a towering passion at another. "They won't weigh a pound," was the cool but unmeaning reply.

A burglar was once frightened out of his scheme of robbery by the sweet simplicity of a military spinster, who, getting her candle safely out of the window, exclaimed: "Go away! ain't you ashamed!"

HONEY AND BUTTER.—The Rev. Dr. M—— was reputed for the suavity of his manners and his especial politeness toward the fair sex. Hearing that Miss Butter was dead at a party in his house, he said, in his wonted manner, "Do take a little more wine, Miss Butter, and help yourself." A Mr. Mudie, handling the butter-dish to the next, exclaimed, "Do take a little butter, Doctor; 'tis as like yourself!"

"DEAR ADOLPHUS," said a fashionable belle the other day to her accepted admirer, "have you felt the force of the winds and waves?"—Oh, yes," replied Adolphus, "for I have frequently seen it stated that the wind flies and the wave rose!"

A beggar, some time ago, applied for alms at the door of a partisan of the Emigrating Society. After in vain declaiming his manifold sorrows, the inexorable gentleman peremptorily dismissed him with "Go away," said he; "I go—no sense go ye nothing." "You might at least," replied the mendicant, with an air of great dignity and archness, "have refused me grammatically."

A woman of a satirical mind was asked by her friends if she really intended to marry Mr. ——, adding, "He is a man was a good kind of a man, but so very singular. "Well," replied the lady, "so much the better; if he is very much unlike other men, he is much more likely to make a good husband."

An old lady, who had been frightened by the running of a horse, was asked whether she was not afraid that the beast was glimpsing?"—"Oh," said she, "I trusted in Providence Until the broncho broke, and then I had to look out for myself."

Should not our fair country-women take into consideration whether the wearing of bustles is not repeatable a little too early, and leave off a great deal too soon?

A lady, somewhat advanced in years, whose vivacity sometimes approached the borders of impertinence, asked an old man, in rather a jarring tone, why he was always dressed in black. "Why, madam," was the answering fee?"—"For your charms, Miss," he gallantly replied.

Dowell complained to Johnson that the noise of the drums in the night kept him awake. "Why, Sir," said Johnson, it was not the noise that made your head ache; it was the noise we put into it."—"Has any that effect upon the head?"—"No, Sir, on heads not used to it."

A Scottish student, supposed to be deficient in judgment, was asked by a professor, in the course of his examination, how he would discover a fish. "By the questions he would ask," was the prompt and highly suggestive reply.

Put your money into a box if you like, but get a dice box.

DOUBTFUL PUBLICITY.—The breaking in of bores.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

A LETTER FROM THE STATE DEPARTMENT.

THE following important letter has been sent by Mr. Seward to Governor Hicks, of Maryland:

"DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 28, 1861.

"Thomas H. Hicks, Governor of Maryland:

"SIR,—I have had the honor to receive your communication of this morning, in which you have informed me that you have little it is in your power to advise the President of the United States to order elsewhere the troops of Pennsylvania, which are now on their way through Maryland, and that you have further suggested that Lord Lyons be requested to advise the President to order the troops parties in our country, to prevent the effusion of blood.

"The President directs me to acknowledge the receipt of that communication, and to assure you that he has given to the subject which it contains with the utmost which he habitually cherishes for the Chief Magistrate of the several States, and especially for yourself. He regrets as deeply as any Magistrate or citizen of the country can the unhappy circumstances which exist in the United States, with very extensive preparations for the effusion of blood, but none is his duty to call out the force by which you allude. The force now sought to be sent through Maryland is destined for rendering aid to the defense of this capital.

"The President has necessarily confided the choice of the National highway which that force shall take in coming to this city to General Scott, who, as the commanding army of the United States, who, like his only responsible to the people, distinguished for humanity profound loyalty, patriotism, and distinguished public services.

"The President requests me to add that the national highway thus selected by the lieutenant-General has been chosen by him upon consultation with prominent magistrates and citizens of Maryland, as being known, while a route is absolutely necessary, is further removed than the other possible routes from danger with the expectation that it would, therefore, be the least objectionable one.

"The President has been pained to learn that there has been a time in the history of the American Union when the presence of the troops of the United capital were not welcome any where in the State of Maryland, and certainly not by the Legislature, assembled for the special and patriotic State, and then, also, one of the capitals of the Union. If there should have been any obstructed all other noble sentiments of that age in Maryland, the President should be happy to believe that there is one that would forever remain there and every where. That sentiment is the love of constitutional freedom wherever that may arise among the parties of this republic, ought, in any case, to be referred to the peaceful judgment, least of all to the arbitrament of a European Monarchy.

"I have the honor, sir, to be your distinguished consideration, your Excellency's most obedient servant,

"WILLIAM H. SEWARD."

HOW THE NORFOLK NAVY-YARD WAS DESTROYED.

The following account has been published: "On Saturday evening, at 9 o'clock, the Pawnee, arrived from Washington, with 200 volunteers and 200 marines, besides her crew, and at once the officers and crew of the Pawnee and Cumberland went on board the latter vessel, and dismissed the guns, and threw the shot and small-arms into the river. At this time the marines, who had been quartered in the barracks, fired them, and came on board the Pawnee. This was done to prevent the fact that the intention to fire all the buildings simultaneously. A party of officers, marines, and others, going through the different buildings and ships, distributing waste and turpentine, and laying a train to blow up the Dry Dock. They were engaged in this work until 2 o'clock, when the train was fired. The first explosion, to the Captain of which, Charles Germain, much credit is due, came next, and took the Commodore's house. The Pawnee taking the lead. All the vessels beat to quarters, the guns were manned, and every thing was in readiness to carry out the behest of Secretary Welles, that if a gun was fired from either shore he would level both Portsmouth and Norfolk. At 10 o'clock the Pawnee indescribably magnificent, all the buildings being in a blaze, and explosions here and there continuing to take place.

HOW THE "CUMBERLAND" ESCAPED.

The Yankee left the yard with the Cumberland in tow about 2 o'clock. The Cumberland was towed down the river until 9 o'clock, when it came to another within a mile of the point where everything was supposed to have been sunk for the purpose of obstructing the navigation. Boats were sent out to take soundings to ascertain whether some other passage than the regular channel could not be found. All efforts proving unsuccessful, as the fleet ruined another vessel was sunk there. The Cumberland caught one of the sunken vessels and carried it along with her, and succeeded in getting over at first exclaimed that she might be carried on to Sewell's Point, where it was supposed the rebels had their batteries. Meantime the Keystone State came up from Washington with marines, and by her tugs and that of the Yankee, the Cumberland was towed into deep water and the wreck were disentangled. The Cumberland was towed out of the guns of Fort Monroe and came to anchor. While the vessels lay there the men were employed in getting in the Navy-yard, succeeded in making their way down the river, and reported that the Cumberland was all right, and the smoke and flames could easily be seen from the Cumberland. The Pawnee and Yankee were sent early in the morning to arrest the flames, because they apprehended that a train to the powder had been laid.

THE TWO MASSACHUSETTS VOLUNTEERS.

The following telegraphic correspondence explains itself:

"I pray you to cause the bodies of our Massachusetts soldiers dead in Baltimore to be forwarded to me. I have served in ice, and tenderly sent forward by express to me. All expenses will be paid. Respectfully yours,

"JOHN A. ANDREWS, Governor of Massachusetts."

The Mayor replied as follows:

"The Hon. John A. Andrews, Governor of Massachusetts:

"SIR,—No dead bodies of soldiers are in Baltimore in the city more deeply than myself, but they were inevitable. Our people, in the midst of armed troops to another State through the streets as an invasion of a mob, and could not be prevented. The authorities exerted themselves to the best of their ability; but with only police force. Governor Hicks was present, and concurs in all my views as to the necessity of the passage of the troops for protection. When are these scenes to cease? Are we to have a war of sections? God forbid! The bodies of the Massachusetts soldiers could not be sent out to Boston, as you requested, at present. Persons in this city and Philadelphia by railroad, and with Boston by steamers, and every effort has been made to place them in metallic coffins, and will be placed, with proper funeral ceremonies, in the mausoleum at Mount Auburn Cemetery, where they shall be retained until further directions are received from you. I have the honor to remain, sir, with high respect, your obedient humble servant,

"GEORGE BROWN, Mayor of Baltimore."

To this the following reply was returned by the Governor:

"To the Hon. George W. Brown, Mayor of Baltimore:

"DEAR SIR,—I appreciate your kind attention to our wounded and dead. I have learned before the arrival of your sentiments of our fallen will return to us. I am grieved to learn that a peaceful march of American citizens over the highway to the defense of our common country should have been stained with blood. Through New Yorkthe march was triumphal.

"JOHN A. ANDREWS, Governor of Massachusetts."

BURIAL OF THE MASSACHUSETTS VOLUNTEERS.

A letter has been received by a gentleman in this city from a friend in Baltimore, of the highest respectability, giving a touching account of the inquest over the bodies of the two Massachusetts soldiers, killed on Friday last, and of their burial at Green Mount Cemetery. Their remains were followed to the grave by the greatest and most respectable citizens, and the funeral services were solemnly performed by a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The letter declares that their death took place without the sanction of either the city or the State authorities—that their slayers were not executed but murdered.

CONDITION OF BALTIMORE.

All accounts from Baltimore represent the condition of affairs in that city as most fearful. Irresponsible mobs calling themselves Vigilance Committees, exercise a severe espionage over persons entering or leaving the city, and those who incur their suspicion or displeasure are treated in the most harsh and summary manner. Hundreds of these people are flying from their homes and seeking safety in the country. The railway bridges over the roads connecting with Baltimore have all been destroyed, and armed parties are constantly on the watch to prevent their repair or reconstruction. Travelers coming North have great difficulty in getting from the city, and on the slightest pretexts are detained and subjected to hardships and indignities.

WHAT NEW YORK IS DOING.

New York has been responded to the call made for troops to assert and protect the honor of the country. The following is the list for military forces to the expected requisition of Gen. Scott. Eight regiments are already under the command of Gen. Washington, as follows:

Seventh regiment, Colonel Lefferts.....	1000 men.
Seventy-first regiment, Colonel Vosburgh.....	1000 "
Twelfth regiment, Colonel Burtnett.....	800 "
Sixth regiment, Colonel Pinckney.....	850 "
Sixty-ninth regiment, Corcoran.....	1000 "
Eighth regiment, Colonel Lyons.....	1000 "
Thirteenth regiment, Colonel Smith (Brooklyn)	800 "
Twenty-eighth regt, Col. Bennett (Brooklyn)	800 "

It will thus be seen that 7300 troops have left the city—a small choice of the quota which is expected from the State—and a much larger number is in readiness to leave on receipt of the next requisition.

MAJOR ANDERSON'S TERMS OF SURRENDER.

[SPECIAL DISPATCH TO THE NEW YORK Herald, April 15, 1861.]

"The Hon. S. Cameron, Secretary of War, Washington:

"SIR,—Having defended Fort Sumter for thirty-four hours, until the quarters were entirely burned, the main gates destroyed by fire, the gorge wall seriously injured, the magazine surrounded by flames, and its door closed from the effects of the heat, four barrels and three cartridges of powder only being available, and no provisions but pork remaining, I accepted terms of evacuation offered by General Beauregard, being the same offered by him on the 11th instant, prior to the commencement of hostilities, and marched out of the fort Sunday afternoon, the 14th instant, with colors flying and drums beating, bringing away company and private property, and saluting my flag with fifty guns.

"ROBERT ANDERSON, Major First Artillery."

PERSONAL.

Hannibal Hamlin arrived in this city on 23d, from his residence in Maine. He has taken up his quarters at the Astor House. He is at present the guest of Governor Morgan.

Mr. Evans, the editor of the Baltimore Patriot, has been driven from that city by the traitors. He arrived in Philadelphia. He declares he will return to the city if he can get a military escort.

Gen. Case made a patriotic speech at Detroit, last week, urging the people to stand by the Union and the Government, and to rally to the defense of the Stars and Stripes.

Count Gurowski, Minister to Russia, has offered his services to the Secretary of War, either as a private volunteer or to serve as a private soldier in the ranks. Mr. Cameron said to him, "Sir, this is the first instance in history that ever I heard of where a foreign Minister volunteered to to serve in the ranks." "Then," said Count, "let's make a little history." A company of 100 volunteers was speedily raised and put under Count's command.

Gen. Henry Wilson, U. S. Senator from Massachusetts, passed through this city last week on his way to Washington. He goes as a private in the Worcester regiment.

It is said that Mr. Forney, editor of the Hon. John J. Tucker, Ex-Secretary of State, has become editor and part proprietor of the Evening Bulletin of this city. Mr. Seaver, the late editor, is a staunch Union man.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ITALY.

THE ITALIAN PARLIAMENT.

In reply to an interpellation in the Chamber on the Roman question, Count Cavour said the Italian Government could not, in the present circumstances, be represented in Rome as a conqueror. He admitted that the solution of the Roman question could never be bound by any convention, and hoped the antagonism of the Church would soon cease. He said the Government could not peacefully suppress any disturbances in Naples, and the most efficacious means would be found for the solution of the Roman question. The Chamber finally adopted the following, almost unanimously:

"The Chamber, having confidence in the Government, and acknowledging the necessity for the union of Rome to Italy, in accomplishing which, however, the grandeur and independence of the Church and the Pope will be guaranteed, passes to the order of the day."

Count Cavour, in reply to a question, denied the rumors of a treaty concluded with the Inland Government of France.

Revolts continue to be made in Naples of parties implicated in the recently-discovered conspiracy, and a search-ing inquiry is being instituted.

Reactionary attempts had been suppressed at numerous places.

AUSTRIA.

PROSPECT OF WAR.

A well-known correspondent of the Times points out the temptation to immediate hostilities. He says it is requisite to Austria to wait until the Italian Kingdom is consolidated. A bold attack with two hundred thousand men could soon drive Austrians to Milan and Turin, a pretext must be found, otherwise the French would again cross the Alps. This is the present Austrian agents allege, that Austria is arming to prevent Garibaldi's army the price being about £12 each. Once a sufficient number of these weapons are in the hands of the Hungarian malcontents can be easily put in real clarity, and be made to attack. Then Austria will have a right to retaliate, and the Austrian Army will re-enter Italy.

RUSSIA.

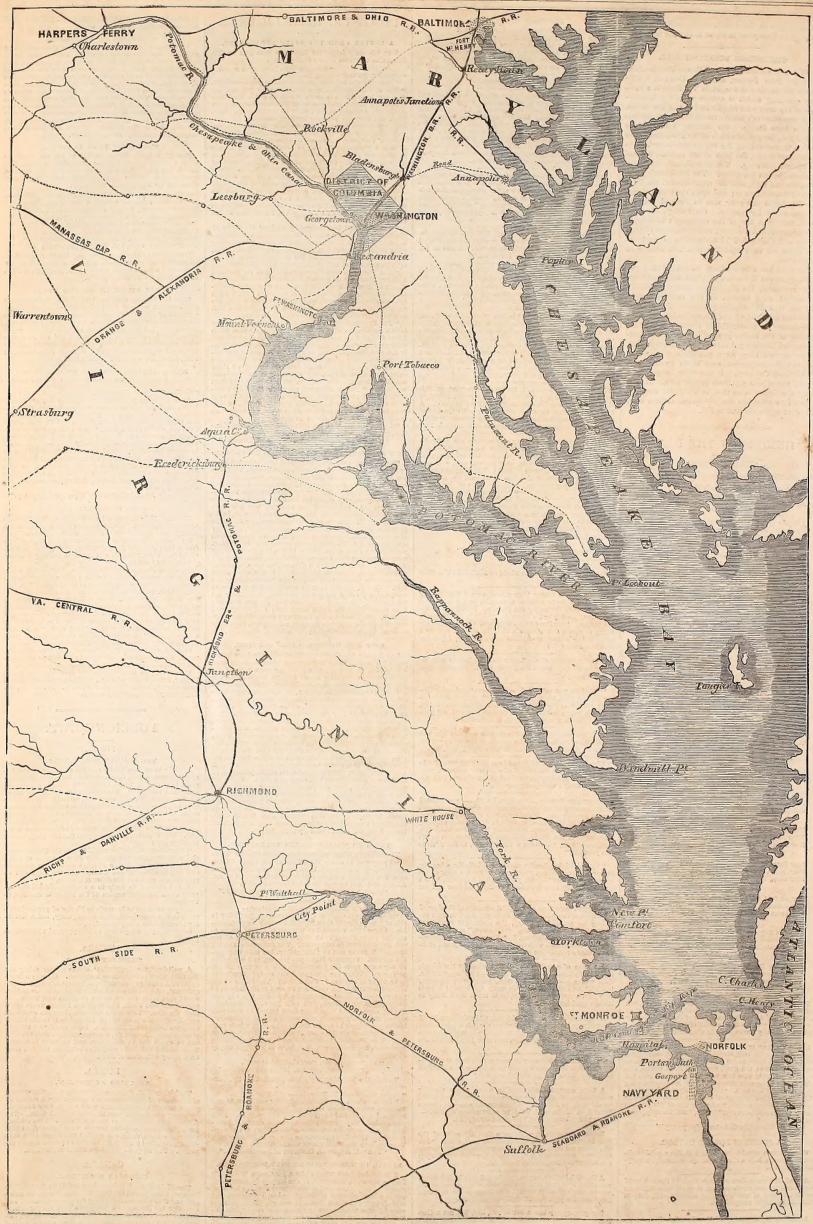
TROUBLES AT WARSAW.

The Journal St. Petersburg gives the following version of the renewed disturbance at Warsaw: Great crowds of persons had assembled before the church, and impressed by love; the conflict was renewed several times. Ten persons were killed, and forty-five persons were arrested. Other accounts say the number of victims was far more than stated in original telegram. Renewal of disturbances expected. The troops now number 15,000 men.

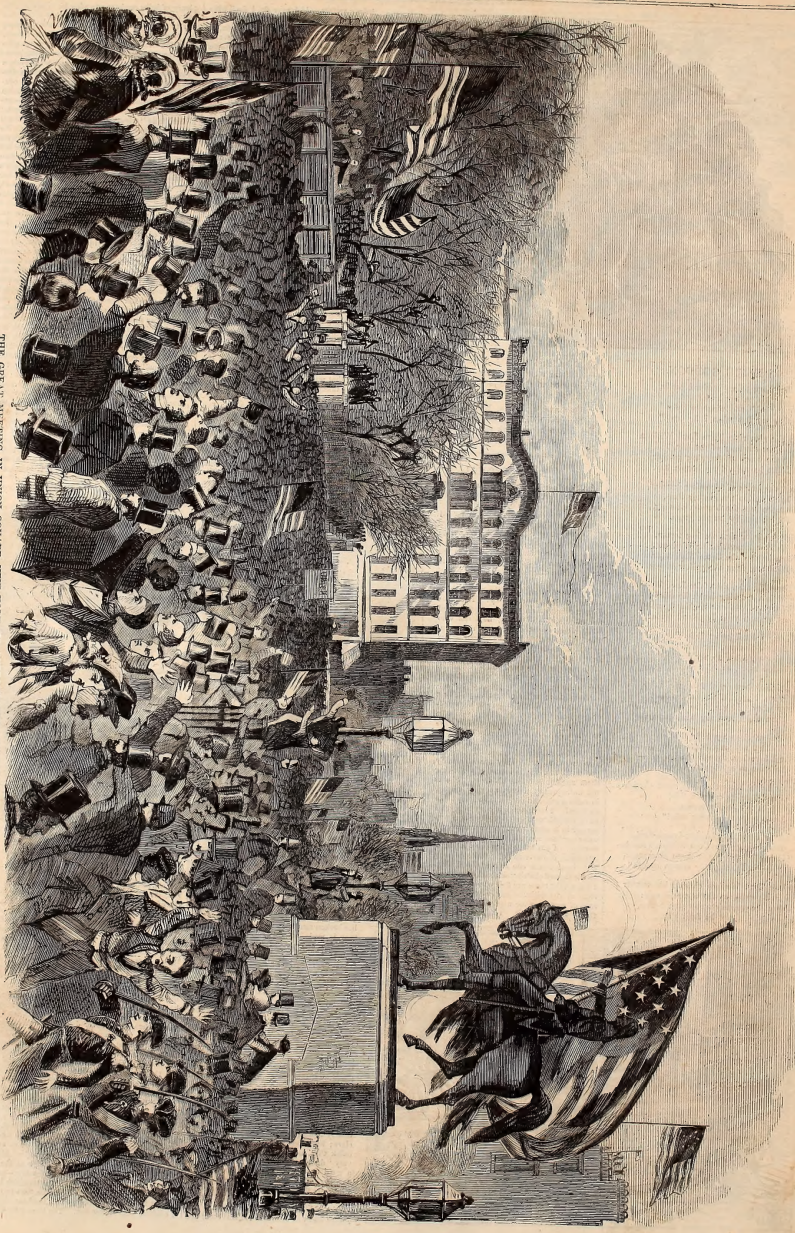
CANADA.

CANADIAN SENTIMENT.

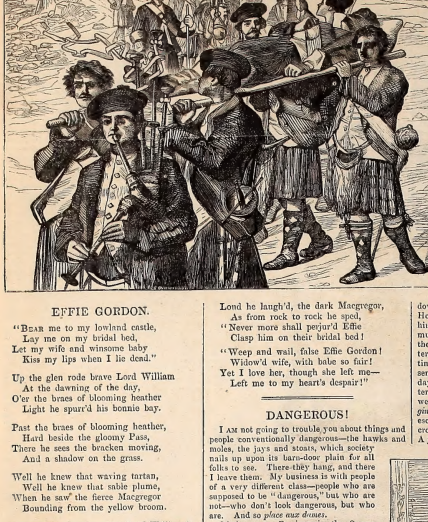
The Globe of April 30 has a long article on the relations between England and the United States, advocating a sincere and firm alliance, forgetting all past differences and quarrels. It says that the Union is dead, but the permanent good will of the American people is worth a war. It hopes that the hopes to see the rebellion put down and the traitors dealt with as they deserve.



MAP OF PART OF MARYLAND AND VIRGINIA, SHOWING THE PROBABLE THEATRE OF THE WAR.



THE GREAT MEETING IN UNION SQUARE, NEW YORK, TO SUPPORT THE GOVERNMENT, APRIL 20, 1861.



EFFIE GORDON.

"BEAR me to my lowland castle,
Lay me on my bridal bed,
Let my wife and winsome baby
Kiss my lips when I lie dead."

Up the glen rode brave Lord William
At the dawning of the day,
O'er the braes of blooming heather
Light he spurr'd his bonnie bay.

Past the braes of blooming heather,
Hard beside the gloomy Pass,
There he sees the bracken moving,
And a shadow on the grass.

Well he knew that waving tartan,
Well he knew that sable plume,
When he saw the fierce Macgregor
Bounding from the yellow broom.

"Draw the rein, thou false Lord William,"
With a mocking laugh he cried;
"Would ya win our Highland quarry
As ye won your Highland bride?

"Long I loved sweet Effie Gordon,
Bonnie blossom, fair and bright!
I had clasp'd her to my bosom,
Fickle heart, so false and light!

"Pricking homeward from the foray,
When I reach'd the border side,
There they told me, false Lord William,
Thou hadst won thy winsome bride!

"Now ye clasp my Effie Gordon,
Wedded wife with babe so fair!
But I love her, though she left me—
Left me to my heart's despair!

"And this heart that love must cherish
Till I lose its crimson tide,
Lying in my bloody tartan
Dead upon the border side!"

Out he swept his flashing broadsword,
Backward bounds Lord William's steed—
"Coward!" shouts the fierce Macgregor,
"Quick I'll stay thy craven speed!"

Brave Lord William check'd his courser
Half-way down the torrent's side:
There Macgregor's arrow struck him,
Drinking deep the fatal tide.

Loud he laugh'd, the dark Macgregor,
As from rock to rock he sped,
"Never more shall perjur'd Effie
Clasp him on their bridal bed!

"Weep and wail, false Effie Gordon!
Widow'd wife, with babe so fair!
Yet I love her, though she left me—
Left me to my heart's despair!"

DANGEROUS!

I AM not going to trouble you about things and people conventionally dangerous—the hawks and moles, the jays and stoats, which society nails up upon its barn-door plain for all folks to see. There they hang, and there I leave them. My business is with people of a very different class—people who are supposed to be "dangerous," but who are not—who don't look dangerous, but who are. And so place aux dames.

Of the genus Fascinatoria, the Syrens Circoliers, or circulating library Syren, is a very well known variety. It infests French romances in yellow wrappers, and the early works of young novelists who write about what they have not seen. The French variety is to be known by the locality of its dwellings and elegance of its furniture; the English, by the whiteness of its linen and the smallness of its boots. One of these latter is now conspicuously before the public, in the pages of a popular magazine; and I protest to you, that if any accident should happen to her washer-woman, or her boot-lace, there would be an end of the character at once and forever. She could do no more mischief, being in fact as powerless as poor Aladdin when he lost his wonderful lamp. The Syren always grows curls, they are invariably perfumed, and she is incessantly shaking them against gentlemen's faces. She is not unfrequently a very naughty person, in more ways than one; and she sings like an angel. I have made her my study. I have her—so to speak—stuffed, and preserved in a glass case. In all candor, I must say that she is a most unnatural production. I am led to class her with those gorgeous contortions of mother-of-pearl and tinsel which one sees in the fishing-tackle shops ticketed "artificial minnows." I know that there are fish who are fools enough to snap at the delusive bait, and am told that the sons of men may be angled for, with a book, by the Syrens Circoliers. I have never met with one in my waters. If I ever do, I shall give it a wide berth. So will you. The snowy, lace-edged petticoat will not catch you, or the boots beguile. You will not be struck and landed, or break away and pine in some silent pool, trying in vain to rub a hook out of your gullet. No! this is not the sort of being which I label "dangerous."

The Fresh Saltfora, or ball-room belle, is another specimen of the Fascinatoria, which is supposed to be "dangerous." She is to be found upon the back of songs, of the "Will you love me then as now?" order, and of dance music. She also frequents the fashionable novel, appears at Christmas in books of beauty and other annuals, and in May smiles upon you from the walls of the Royal Academy. Her dress and general "get-up" is something bewildering to behold. She is always in full costume—wreathed, white gloved, bouqueted, satin shod, silver sheened, clothed in white samite, mystic—wonderful! She requires the whole of the front seat of the carriage for the accommodation of self and flounces. She retires to her toilet at five P.M., and the link-boys touch their hats to her at a quarter to midnight. As she enters the "gay and festive scene," a buzz of admiration runs round the room, and in ten minutes her engagement-card is full. Henceforward she reigns supreme. What care those happy youths, whose names are down for the late dances, will take of her chaperon, for fear she should want to go before their turns come round! What scheming there will be to get her down to supper! What dreadful falsehoods the Honorable Coolsum Flirtford will fabricate to edge himself in for that waltz which is played while the musicians are taking their refreshment! She is the very flower, spirit, pride—every thing else flattering that you can suggest—of the ball. But time flies; you can not dance and talk soft nonsense forever. The candles are getting low, the daylight streams in through the chinks of the shutters, and the detestable sparrows will chirp their welcome to the smiling morn outside. The Virginia Saltfora must go. Never was lady so well escorted to her coach. She is surrounded by a crowd of grief-stricken and assiduous cavaliers. A juvenile peer of the realm has darted up stairs to fetch her bouquet from the mantle-piece; a secretary of legation holds her fan; a Crimean colonel spreads the opera-cloak over her lovely shoulders from behind, and a popular preacher ties the cords in front. A sucking barrister has got her stolen sandal, and thinks that his fortune is made. She has rejected the proffered arm of young Willows, of the Rudd, Buckinghamshire, and the poor boy's peace of mind is ruined for a week. She bestows a smiling adieu upon all, and slides her little hand along the coat-sleeve of that dark cynical Colin Grey, who is just passing out without noticing her, and leaves her chaperon to be handed into the carriage by the lord, the soldier, the pet parson, the country gentleman, and the man of law.—Is not this being "dangerous?"

Well, I don't know. The danger I wot of is incurred when the bundle of St. George's, Hanover Square, waves aside the dirty little boys from the façade steps, and his lordship, my hero, and my heroine, his lovely and accomplished bride, are whirled away by Newman's grays into the unknown matrimonial land. Sometimes the Virginia Saltfora is so dangerous as utterly to destroy noble and wealthy bachelors; but, somehow or other, I do not think that, taking it as a class, it is so very "dangerous" after all. I see it about a good deal, with every charm in good fighting order, and every snare set; but where are the victims? The Crimean Colonel and the pet parson have tied operacloaks and been smiled upon before. The young lord will soon find out that there are plenty of belles ready to run after his bouquet, if he had one; the barrister will be told that it is a cruelty to ask a girl to marry on his hundred a year; the young squire will get over his little attack, and Colin Grey will go home, stuff a very large pipe with very strong Cavendish, and smoke it gloomily. Our belle is like a sportsman who, with a strong shooting-gun and heavy charges, takes aimless shots, right and left, into the middle of a covey before it is fairly off the ground. Half a dozen birds are wounded—one has its leg broken—another has to go without any feathers on its back; a third falls "winged," and running up a drain is lost, and so on. There is nothing for the bag. No execution done. Are you not acquainted with some families in which the "beauty" daughter did not make the first—or the best—match? Do you not know of instances in which that young lady's marriage has brought trouble upon herself and her friends? How many ball-room belles of—well, say nine-and-twenty—have you met about this season?

No! the real object of bachelor dread is the Anglicana Domestica, or English Hearth flower. This is a sort of girl that the Royal Humane Society ought to be compelled by act of Parliament to label "Dangerous." She may be found at many a fireside, but notably in country-houses about Christmas time. She is not a "beauty" like the Virginia Saltfora, or a professional enchantress like the Syrens Circoliers, though it must be admitted that she does her bootmaker credit, and that she has a large running account with the laundress. Do not run away, though, with the idea that she is plain. The shape of her head is classical, her eyes are large, kind, and lustrous, her teeth are white and regular, and her figure—perfect. Still she has not a good feature in her face. In stature she is usually petite, in complexion a brunette. She shakes no perfumed tresses under your nose; indeed, she avoids essences and scents, and is redolent only of that exquisite bouquet which suggests nothing at all but the plentiful use of cold water. I should call it the "odor of sanctity," did I dare to be irreverent and had forgotten that the saintly ones of old were not remarkable for the use of the liquid which produces it. She dearly loves a good dance, but does not talk "ball" or think "ball," and to her ear the march of intellect is not written in two-four time, and published by D'Almaine & Co.

The Anglicana Domestica is accomplished, as you may find at your leisure. She does not interlard her conversation with French and German words, neither will she pelt you with old red sandstone, pterodactyls, and oolite forces upon first acquaintance. Ask her to play and she will sit down, without an excuse, and run you off sparkling little Reveries, and dreamy Nocturnes, one after the other. You must not expect fire-work pieces and bravura songs. She has not a powerful voice, and is not such a goose as to think she can please you in a back drawing-room with what you have heard from Titiens upon the opera-stage the night before. She will warble little ditties that you have not heard elsewhere, and is remarkable, generally, for having all sorts of things that other people could have very easily, but, somehow or other, don't find out. Thus she is never dressed in the height of the fashion, but wears what is going to be, or ought to be the fashion. Pretty girls—her companions—bow down and worship her cuff, or her wreath, or the bodice of her dress, and, "Oh! where did you get the pattern of that EX-quisite"—whatever it may be?—is their cry. Then our Anglicana Domestica gives a little laugh, and confesses that she cut it out herself yesterday; so it is borrowed and lent. She would strip the nose off her face and lend it to a friend, if it would do her any good; but, plague take the copy! it never will look like the original; and by the time it is made she has invented something else about three times as bewildering that puts it quite in the shade. Herein lies her "dangerous" character. She is the sort of girl that a poor gentleman may marry—so patient, so cheerful, so contriving, so unselfish is the British Hearth Flower. I believe that it is the easiest thing in the world to be a Duchess, though, I confess, I never was one. You have only to look haughty, do nothing, and hold your tongue, consistently, and you will pass for an exceedingly well-bred person, and a superior being altogether. A poor gentleman's wife has much to bear, and I respect and love the home specimen when I see how well she goes through it all.

What is the consequence of this? My friend Jack Steadman—whom I have known ever since he was my fag at school—comes fidgeting into my chambers as I am writing this. He has come thus fidgeting about many times before. He had read the Virginia Solifidra, and was going to cut somebody's throat—probably the Honorable Coolman Flitcher's because of his dividend. He had a long gallop, or he was going through a course of strychnine and charcoal hot-air baths, because she would not look at him in the park. I soon got accustomed to such debilitations. I used to give him one of my strongest cigars, and bid him sleep upon it—the blighted affection, I mean, not the cigar. He did, and smoothed it. But now I saw by the expression of his countenance, that there is something serious the matter. With a shy sort of happy grin, he asks if I remember the little girl with the big gray eyes that we met last July, at the Fizzeyman's picnic. I know what is coming. The little girl with the big gray eyes that we met at the Fizzeyman's picnic is an Anglicana Domestica of the most dangerous type. I remember calling upon her mother one day with Jack. The color of the eyes was practising in the back drawing-room, and Mr. Jack must needs go and turn over the music for her. I kept a sharp look upon them while Materfamilias was recounting the horrible profligacy of her late cook. There sat the daughter in her simple morning dress, with natty little linen cuffs at her wrists and a natty little linen collar round her throat, a natty little belt round her natty little waist, and great wavy masses of glorious brown hair glistening in her natty little net. She had just concluded a piece; and, with one hand leaning on the lyre, she looked up to Jack's face, while the chords were still quivering, and asked him how he liked "that." I never saw a girl look more "dangerous." My friend, I do remember this person, and then, looking more shy and stupidly happy than before, he tells me that he is very fond of her, and I say, "All right, you know, you must be my best man." His best man! Hang his impudence! What else have I been to him all his life?

And so roving Jack is led into captivity. Our acquaintance, the Virginia Solifidra, comes in state to the evening party that is given afterward to finish up the scraps of the wedding breakfast, and dances and flirts till she can hardly stand. But nothing comes of it, and the week afterward her cousin is heard of as about to sail out of the Guards, and settle down into matrimony with one of the bridesmaids to the "little girl with the big gray eyes"—another specimen of the Anglicana Domestica that nobody heard of before.

OUR WAR ILLUSTRATIONS.

We devote most of our space this week to the war.

On page 273 will be found an interesting picture of the SCENE ON THE HOUSE-TOPS AT CHARLESTON during the bombardment of Fort Sumter. Reporters say that every human being in Charleston had gathered to see the fight.

On page 276 we publish a MAP of that part of Virginia and Maryland which, for the present, promises to be the THEATRE OF THE WAR. It shows Baltimore and Harper's Ferry on the north, and Richmond and Norfolk on the south, with all the principal roads, railroads, canals, rivers, cities, etc.

On page 277 will be found an engraving of the GREAT WAR MEETING in Union Square. Of the meeting the Herald said:

"A great mass meeting in support of the Government, in the present crisis of the nation, was held at Union Square, in this city, on Saturday afternoon. Such a mass meeting of the people has never before been witnessed in New York, or probably in the whole length and breadth of the Union. Five stands were erected, from which seven of the most able speakers of the city and state addressed the multitude on the necessity of rallying around the flag of the republic in the hour of its danger. A scene of frivolities was proposed and unanimously adopted, pledging the meeting to use every means to preserve the Union intact and inviolate, and agreeing to the appointment of a committee of seventy to represent the citizens in the collection of funds and the transaction of such other business as will aid the Government at the public meeting to-day to-morrow. Great unanimity prevailed throughout the whole proceedings; party spirit was thrown overboard, and the meeting—speakers and listeners—were a unit in maintaining the national honor unsullied. Judge Anderson, the hero of Fort Sumter, was present, and showed himself to the several stands, each of which he was most enthusiastically received. An impressive feature in the proceedings was the Fort Sumter flag, hoisted on the stump of the mast which had been shot away by the revolutionists, and which was placed to the head of the equestrian statute of Washington."

On this page we give a small picture of HARPER'S FERRY, showing the Arsenal and Workshops which have been destroyed by the United States troops to prevent them falling into the hands of the Virginians. Of this spot a correspondent wrote us some time since:

"Harper's Ferry is situated in Jefferson County, Virginia, at the confluence of the Potomac and Shenandoah rivers, on the point opposite the gap through which the united streams pass the Blue Ridge on their way toward the ocean. The Ridge here is about seventeen hundred feet in height, showing here, precipitous cliffs on either side of the river, and exhibiting some of the most picturesque and imposing natural scenery to be found in the country. The town was originally built in two streets stretching along a narrow shelf between the base of the bluff and the river, meeting at the point at nearly a right angle, and crossed respectively Potomac and Shenandoah streets. To accommodate its increasing population the town has struggled up the steep bluff, and, in detached villages and scattered residences, occupies the level ground above—about four hundred feet above the streams.

"It has altogether a population of five thousand; is distant from Richmond 173 miles; from Washington City, 57 miles by turnpike road; and from Baltimore, 80 miles by rail. Here the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad crosses the Potomac by a magnificent covered bridge, one thousand and passes along Potomac Street westward, its track being at first above the river. The Winchester and Harper's Ferry Railroad, lying along Shenandoah Street, connects with the Baltimore and Ohio at the bridge. Potomac Street is entirely occupied by the workshops and offices of the National Armory, and its entrance is inclosed by a handsome gate and iron railing. Nearly at the angle of junction are the old arsenal buildings, where usually from 100,000 to 200,000 stand of arms are stored. The other buildings on the point, and nearer the bridge, are railroad offices, hotels, eating-houses, a bank, etc. Shenandoah Street contains stores and dwelling-houses for half a mile or more, when we come to Hall's rifle-works, situated on a small island in the Shenandoah River."

On page 280 we publish a picture of the MASSACHUSETTS REGIMENT (8th) EMBARKING IN THE JERSEY CITY CARS FOR WASHINGTON. A reporter of the Herald published an account of this:

"The ferry-boat with the troops on board reached Jersey City about twenty minutes before two. Long before their arrival hundreds congregated about the ferry and railroad depôt waiting anxiously their arrival. The railroad depôt was crowded inside, while the crowd that belonged to it extend around the building, nearly every one bearing the Stars and Stripes. The depôt was also beautifully decorated with flags, presenting a most imposing appearance. As the troops marched from the ferry-boat to the depôt from the Long Dock, and the Custard steamer Perseo slipped her cables several times, and, accompanied by the tug-boat Thomas Holmes, also crossed the river to tender their services to the troops and to accompany them on the way of the troops at the depôt. As soon as the boat had been made fast to the bridge, and the order given to forward, the band struck up the Star Spangled Banner, which was accompanied by deafening cheers from the crowd in and about the depôt. As they entered the railroad depôt every other cheer broke forth, the ladies waving their handkerchiefs and flags, which lasted for nearly twenty minutes.

"The train, numbering eighteen cars, and to which was attached the powerful locomotive Jersey, was coupled with flags, and in charge of Mr. J. W. Woodruff, Assistant Superintendent of the road. While delay was occasioned on account of the crowd in the building blocking up the place; but the Chief of Police, Mr. Kennedy, with his men and Sheriff Francis, aided by the squad of New York police, soon cleared the way. During the time the troops were in waiting to embark on board they were continually cheered, and the ladies waved handkerchiefs and flags, which lasted for nearly twenty minutes.

"At one o'clock Colonel Jones informed Mr. Woodruff that all was ready, and the signal was immediately given for the train to start. The first movement of the locomotive brought out three other cheers, and as the train slowly glided out from the depôt, the crowd set up a deafening and waving of flags. Among the ladies could be seen several in tears, deeply affected at the scene; and one old gentleman cried like a child. When asked if he had any friends among the troops, he replied that he had not, but he felt as though every one who composed the little band were his own children. The cheering was kept up until the last Jersey militia who accompanied the troops as far as Trenton."

HARPER'S FERRY, VIRGINIA.

On page 281 will be found a fine engraving of the MARCH OF THE SEVENTH REGIMENT DOWN BROADWAY on their departure for Washington. The Herald thus sketched the scene:

"With the band playing the national airs and the regiment's quickstep, while the streets were lined on either side by men, in double files to clear a way for the soldiery; while the line was broken by the crowd, which pressed backward and forward like an ocean, the march began. Through a long and dense line it advanced to block up the way impassably. Through walls of human beings, dense, compact, unyielding, as if not pithy. The Fifth-avenue Hotel, that parted the sea of people into living walls. Under a perfect canopy of flags, fluttering from every point of view bright as that which they have always won and deserved. With cheers rising and falling in tumultuous thunders. Past buildings whose fronts were covered with flags, and above doors, windows, stoops, and balconies were jammed with people. With handkerchiefs, waved by fair hands and as generous as the flowers which they typified, waved out, emulating the gallant volunteers. Past Major Anderson, who reviewed the regiment from the balcony of Hall, Bleeky & Co.'s building, and by his presence added a charm of war's dangers and of its glories. Past an effigy of "Jeff Davis in wood for whom many cheers were given.

"'Jeff Davis, Jeff Davis, beware of the day,
When the Seventh shall meet thee in battle array.'

"Past motives more commendable and its better taste, declaring that the National cause was for the Union, and that its members should imitate 'the National Guard of 1776.' With banners, lovingly clinging to the staff with stay firm; with bearing proud and erect, as befitted the men who were going forth to battle for principle; down Broadway. Never was a popular demonstration more thoroughly spontaneous. Never was a day more celebrated for her ovations, but even that to the Prince of Wales was not more enthusiastic in its heartiness, its spontaneity, and its enthusiasm. The street, the sidewalk, the doors, the windows, and the very roofs of our most beautiful fog, and the cheers were never ceasing, that the people found time to pay honor to the men who went to defend them, and along the entire line from the Park, blockading up Chatham Street and clustering over the Museum, they looked, shouted, and cheered as they have seldom done before. The crowd parted for the soldiery to pass, but before and behind them squeezed a dense, solid, impenetrable mass. Fire-engines were brought to the street-corners and hooks and ladders were planted there. The buildings along Broadway are themselves a decoration, so well are they adorned, and architecture, and its magnificent their proportions; but one accustomed to see only the everyday scene would have found it hard to recognized yesterday, flaunting with flags and packed with all upon tier of people, from sidewalk to house-roof."

On page 282 we illustrate the SAILING OF THE TRANSPORTS FROM NEW YORK, on Sunday, April 21, with Volunteers for the War. The Herald said:

"The bay never appeared to more advantage than it did yesterday on the occasion of the departure of the transport fleet for Washington. From an early hour in the morning until sunset, yachts, sail-boats, and other smaller craft, filled with the friends of the troops, dotted the entire surface of the North River, and hovered around the transports until the very last moment. The ferry-boats and shipping were thickly decorated with flags, and everywhere to their utmost capacity with an anxious multitude of men, women, and children.

"At a quarter past five o'clock, all being in readiness on board the Baltic, the cables were slipped, and the vessel glided out gracefully into the stream, amidst the firing of cannon, the ringing of bells, and the hearty cheers of the fifty thousand spectators. Unlike the Empire State, the Baltic kept steadily on her course, and, heading for Staten Island, led the fleet on their voyage to the Capital. As she passed down the river, the Empire State, the Cahier, the Constitution, the Columbia, and other vessels dipped their colors, while steamboats blew their fog-whistles and rang their bells in honor of the occasion. The Harriet Lane, Captain Faunce, accompanied the Baltic down the bay, and led her on the way to Quarantine. The Cahier soon followed in the wake of the Baltic, and then the Constitution, Columbia, and Empire State fell in behind, and at half past six o'clock the entire fleet was under way. After passing the line of the North Brother, from Fourteenth Street to the Battery, the piers were jammed with spectators, and as the transports one by one hauled out into the stream, there was a rush for the lower piers. At the Battery the crowd were densely packed. As the dense mass forced its way along West Street, the very house-tops were their foundations with the concussion. On the water the people were excited, and the most enthusiastic efforts were made to keep pace with the transports. Steamboats crowded every inch of the bay with the volunteers as long as they could, but after a few minutes' vigorous pulling were left behind. The troops, however, were delighted with waving their handkerchiefs and cheering until their forms were no longer discernible to their friends on board the fast receding fleet."

On page 283 we publish an illustration of the FIRST BLOOD. It is the conflict between the Baltimore mob and the Massachusetts regiment on 19th April. The Baltimore Sun of April 20 says:

"Yesterday morning the excitement which had been gradually rising, in this city for some days, with reference to the passage of Northern volunteer troops southward, was brought to a crisis by the arrival of the Philadelphia and other volunteers, some from the vicinity of Pittsburgh, at their usual depot, at half past ten o'clock. A large crowd guarded and none could be obtained. The firing continued from Fredrick Street to the South Street in quick succession, but how many fell can not now be ascertained.

"From Gay to South Street, on Pratt, the fight with the soldiers who marched, or rather ran, through the town, was terrific. Large paving stones were hurled into the ranks from every direction, the negroes who were down the wharf in many instances joining in the assault. At the depot the soldiers fired a number of shots in the air, without hitting any one, so far as could be ascertained. Soon after the volley the soldiers again broke into a run, but another shower of stones being hurled into the ranks they wheeled about face with such force as to knock several of them down, the order was given to another portion of them to halt and fire, which they did as requested before they could be brought to a halt. They then wheeled and fired some eight or nine shots, but no one could say for certain he saw the stones, but four or five shots took effect, the marks of which were visible on the walls of the depot, as well as on those of the adjacent warehouses, even up to the second stories. The soldiers then took up the line of march in a compact body, and the other two were carried off, supposed to be mortally wounded.

"At one of the soldiers fired he was struck with a stone and knocked down, and so he attempted to rise another stone struck him in the face, when he seemed into a stern, haggard ferocity he sprung to the front, escaped his hands and with instant death by his officers if he refused to accompany them. At this point of time one shot had been fired to come in the same manner, and he hoped all who forced either to come might be killed before they got through the city. He plead so hard that no further vengeance was bestowed upon him, and he was left to the police station to have his wounds dressed. As soon as they had fired at the crowd the party again proceeded and about a mile and a half, when some three or four parties issued from the warehouses on the right and fired on them, which caused about three more soldiers, one of whom was carried into the same depot that they had just attended to, as stated in a few moments. The others succeeded in regaining their feet, and proceeded on with their companions, the whole running as fast as they could, and a running fire was kept up by the soldiers from the point to the depot, the crowd continuing to hurl stones into the ranks throughout the whole line of march."

On page 284 we publish the group of Major Anderson's officers at Fort Sumter—THE HEROES OF SUMTER—whose biographies have been heretofore given in Harper's Weekly.

We publish on page 285 two pictures of the INSPECTION OF UNITED STATES TROOPS ON GOVERNOR'S ISLAND, NEW YORK HARBOR. Every day from twenty-five to fifty men arrive at Governor's Island from the various recruiting offices in New York and elsewhere, and are immediately drafted in squads, until they are fit to be formed into companies and drafted into regiments. Every afternoon the troops are marched out upon the grassy slope to the rear of the southeastern battery, and are drilled in every conceivable movement for the space of about one hour, and the success of this rigid training is to be very satisfactorily observed in the precision and rapidity of execution following any given order. A staff of officers usually occupy the rising ground.

Before the departure of the late expedition for Charleston not less than one-third of the landed men, with arms and knapsacks complete, were rallied in line behind the grove of trees ornamenting the southeastern battery. After going through various evolutions, part of the troops were separated and marched past the officers' houses to the water's edge. Of the reserve on the Island it may be said that their ease and precision of movement, as well as their numbers when all together, render their appearance quite formidable, and they look like a little army. Their officers, too, show indications of being able military men.

MOVING.

THE first of May is nearly come,
And people think of moving;
The cart and truck and wagon men
Find vistas opening!
All kinds of costly furniture
The swawny fellows lash on—
I think I'll move some things myself,
And so be in the fashion.

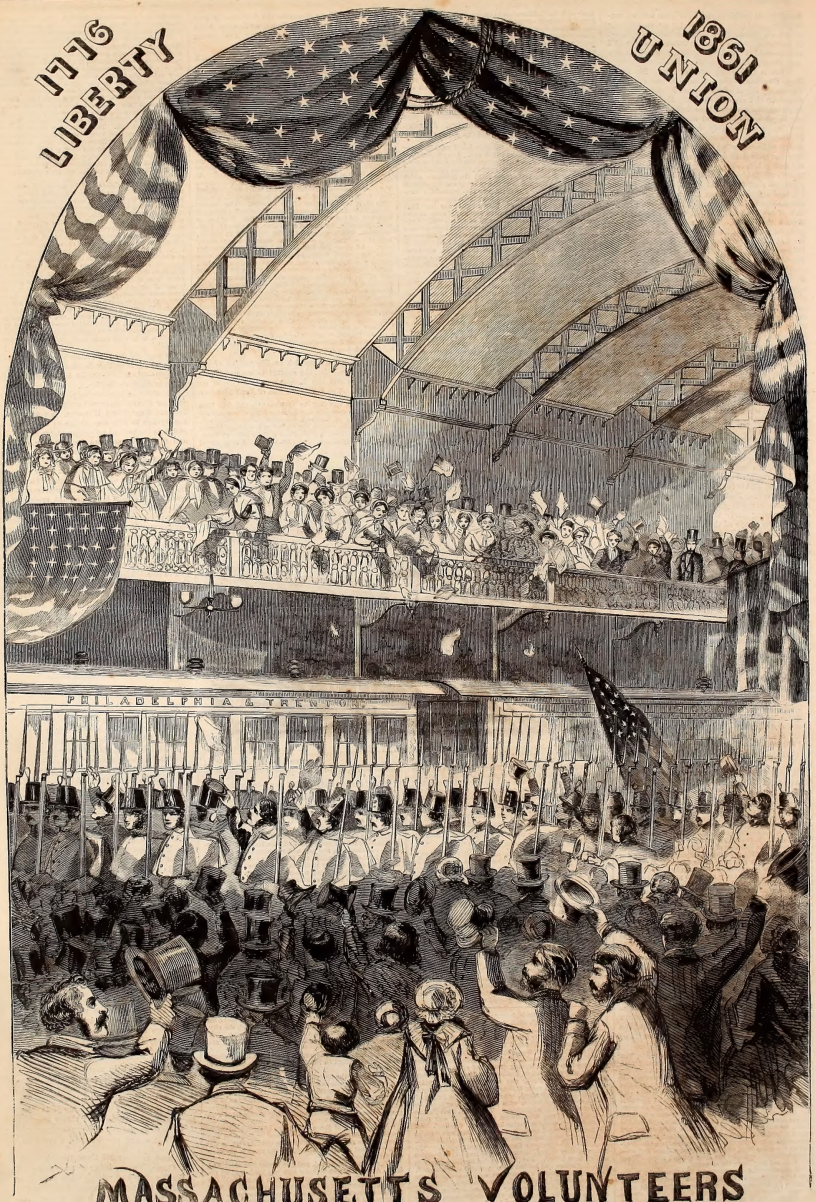
I've got a curious sort of house,
Which never had a name
From top to bottom it is filled
With lots of useless lumber.
And though I live a bachelor,
This house is not a single unit;
But night and day, and day and night,
Is given up to riot.

This curious house is called a heart,
And although small, is roomy:
Some chambers are as bright as day,
But some are dark and gloomy.
And there are pictures on the walls—
Some beautiful and sainted,
And some that I regret to say
Should not have been painted.

Some rooms are scented all with flowers
And memories of my childhood—
The boyish days of innocence,
The river, and the wild-wood.
And one is filled with music
More beauteous than all others;
And my hard face grows young again
When gazing on my mother's.

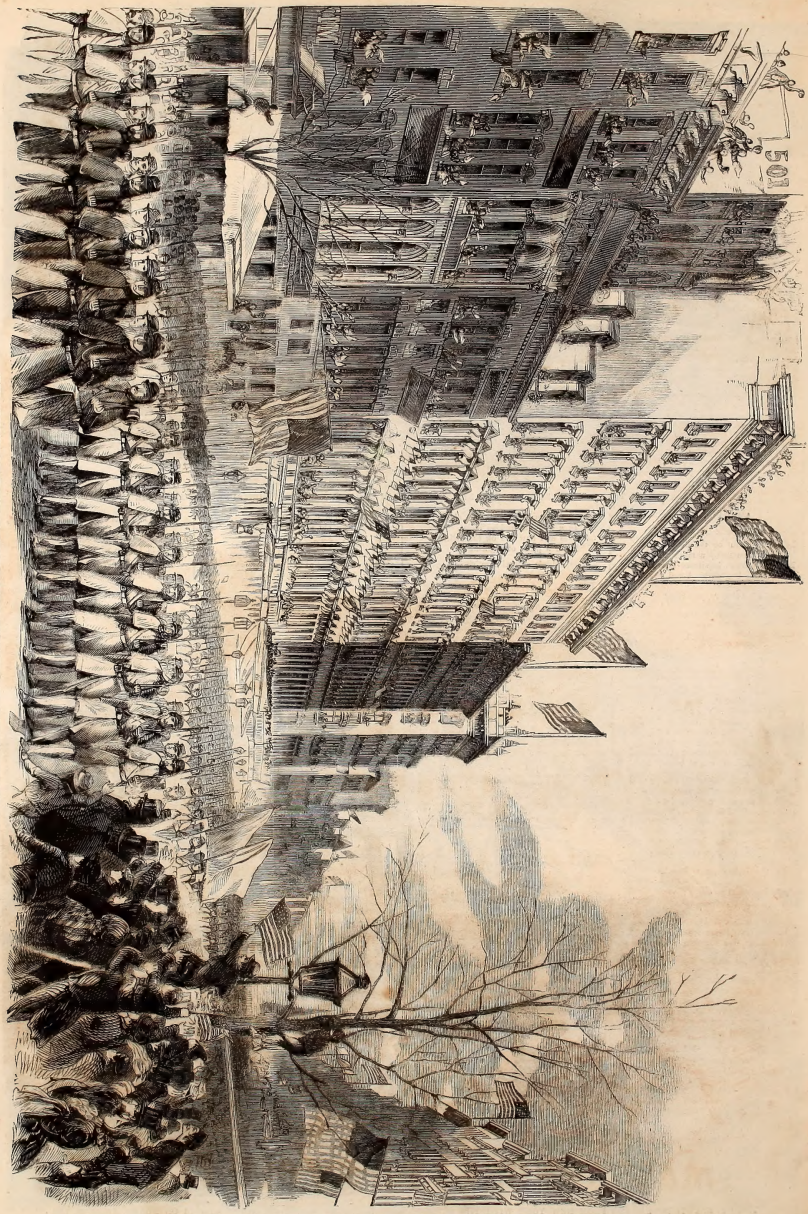
But yet, alas! in many a room
Still hang the scents of revel,
When fellows of the baser things
Sank down to toper's level.
And there are old, revolting jests
Still cobwebbing each rafter
With fragments of unholy songs
That waked the drunkard's laughter.

So now to clear all these away!
Come, Virtue, bring your besom;
Well sweep the vile things out of door,
And fill the trod-upon seize 'em;
And when my house is pure and clean
As you and I can make it,
I think I know a pretty girl
Who won't object to take it.



MASSACHUSETTS VOLUNTEERS

THE BOSTON REGIMENTS EMBARKING FOR WASHINGTON IN THE JERSEY CITY CARS.



THE SEVENTH REGIMENT MARCHING DOWN BROADWAY TO EMBARK FOR THE WAR.

DEPARTURE OF TRANSPORT STEAMERS FROM NEW YORK FOR WASHINGTON WITH VOLUNTEERS, SUNDAY, APRIL 21, 1861.

KING OLAF.

BY ARTHUR LAURENSON.

In his high seat on the dais,
Round him many a mighty lord,
Lost in thought, in silence brooding,
Sat King Olaf at his board.

With his unsheathed dagger playing
In a half-unconscious mood,
Strikes and hews he off the splinters
From a piece of faggot-wood.

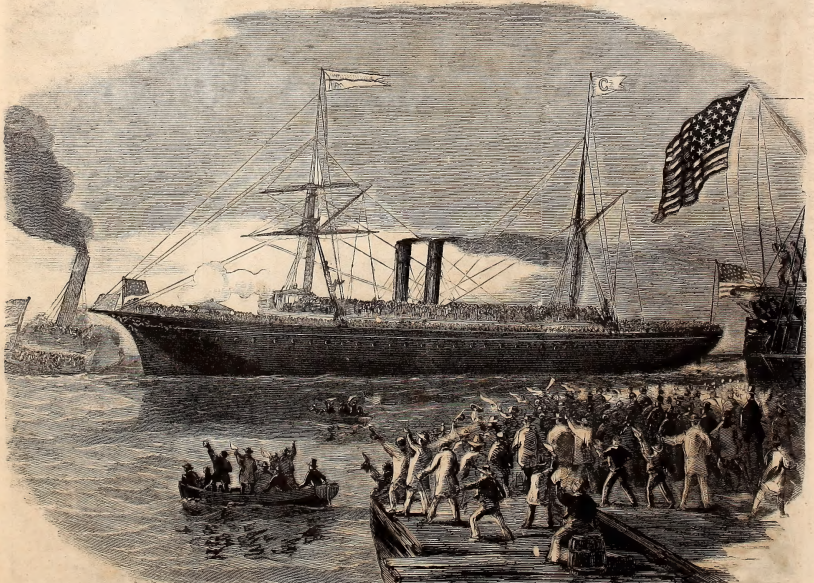
As the lords around him sitting
Mark the King's deep reverie,

"It is Monday, Sire, to-morrow,"
Says an old jarl, meaningly.

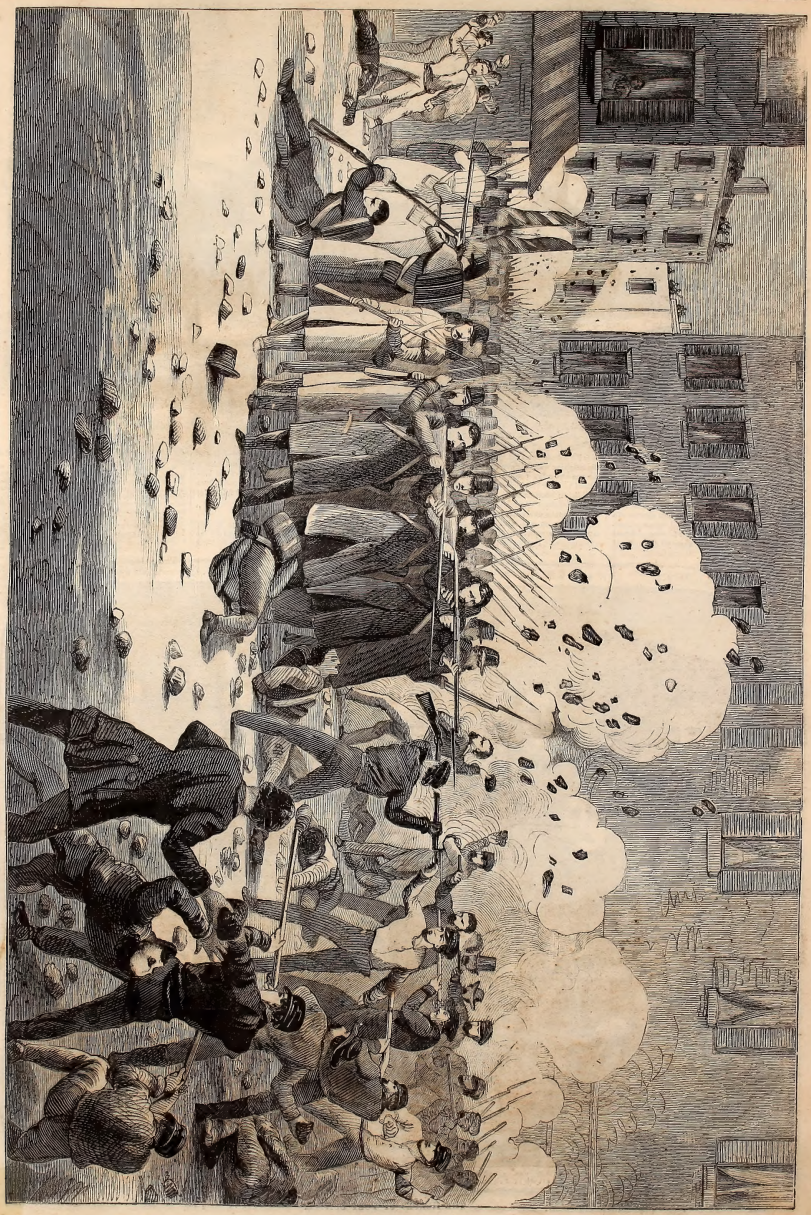
Sudden looks the King upon him:
"Bring me here a burning brand!"
Sweeps the splinters from the table—
Lights them on his naked hand.

Firm he holds it stretched before him,
Never does it backward draw—
Till the wood was all consumèd,
Till he the white ashes saw.

Thus King Olaf made atonement
For his trespass on God's law.



THE "R. R. CUYLER" SAILING FROM NEW YORK WITH THE SEVENTY-FIRST REGIMENT NEW YORK STATE MILITIA ON BOARD, APRIL 21, 1861.



FIRST BLOOD.—THE SIXTH MASSACHUSETTS REGIMENT FIGHTING THEIR WAY THROUGH BALTIMORE, APRIL 19, 1861.

STEVENS'S BOMB-PROOF FLOATING BATTERY.

STEVENS'S BOMB-PROOF FLOATING BATTERY.

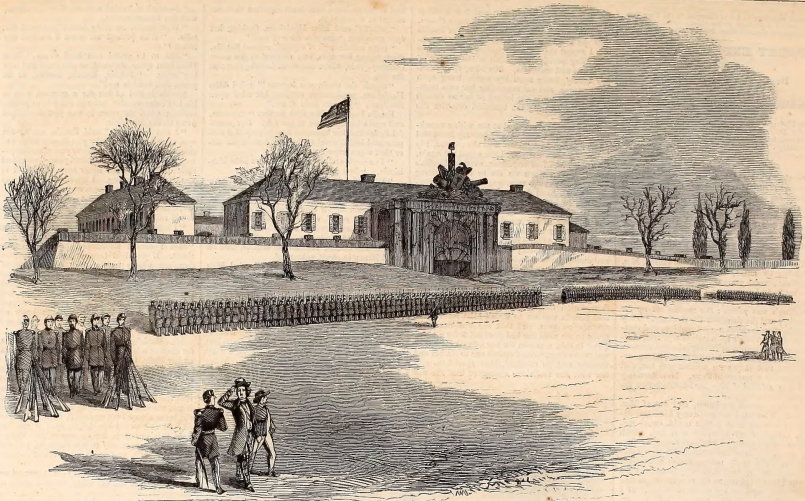
EVERY one has heard of the famous floating battery which has been for many years in course of construction at Hoboken, New Jersey. The idea of this battery occurred to Mr. Stevens shortly after the war of 1812, as an effectual means of protecting the harbor of New York in case of future wars, and the Government appropriated a large sum for its construction. Every thing relating to the machine was, however, kept a profound secret. No one but a few confidential workmen were permitted to enter the inclosure in which the battery was being constructed. Armed watchmen and fierce bull-dogs guarded every entrance. The most vigorous exertions have been made by newspaper reporters and others, from time to time, to ascertain the nature of the work; but all proved unsuccessful. For the first time since the work began, a reporter of the World newspaper, who is also an artist, penetrated the inclosure, and obtained a sketch and materials for a description of the battery. We publish herewith a drawing made from his sketch, and copy from the World the following description:

THE BATTERY.

Descending the sloping side of the dock, which is built in a rude manner, evidently designed to be used for the one purpose only for which it was constructed, we reach the bottom, which is about twenty-five feet below the surface of the yard.

Standing on the bottom, which is formed by the solid ground, near the stern of the vessel, and looking forward toward the bow, amidst the forest of sheers and beams which keep the hull upright, one can not fail to be struck with the magnitude of the proposed work. It was once stated that she was 700 feet in length, with a beam of 70 feet, but had such been a true statement she would have exceeded the famed Great Eastern in size. As far as the judgment of our reporter could be relied upon from eye measurement, she is about 400 feet in length, with about 50 feet beam. Even at this figure she is the next to the largest vessel of which keel has yet been laid. Her huge proportions rose up like a mountain of iron as seen from the bed of the basin. Her beam spreading over so much ground added to her colossal appearance. If she were to placed upon the level of the ground, where her outlining could stand in greater relief against the surrounding objects, her form would present a spectacle such as never has been witnessed on the shores of the Hudson River. Notwithstanding her great size, she will draw but a light amount of water; and, when completed, the front of the dock and copper dam can be easily removed, and the vessel floated out by the water, which will rush in and fill the dock where she now lies. The stern of the vessel is within a few yards of the river, the ingress of which is prevented by the means of a strong coffer dam. Heavy timber props rest against it to prevent its being forced in by any undue pressure. Following along the bottom of the dock, then mounting the staging, one enters the cave or tunnel into which the bow of the vessel penetrates about 100 feet.

THE HEROES OF FORT SUMTER.



RECRUITS DRILLING IN SQUADS ON GOVERNOR'S ISLAND, NEW YORK

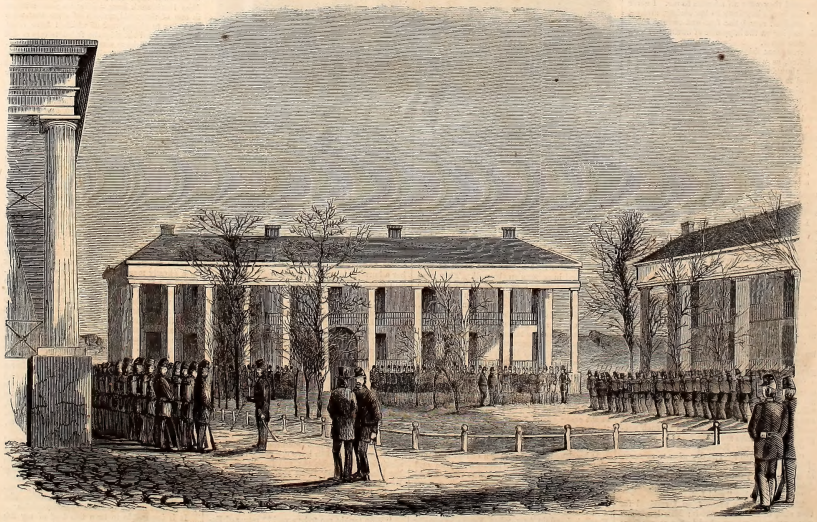
The excavation runs under the sidewalk in the street, and shelters the bow of the vessel from the weather.

THE HULL.

The hull of the vessel is built of iron plates, about three-fourths of an inch in thickness, nearly eight feet in length, and about two feet in width. These are fastened together by rivets placed at about the distance of an inch and a half from each other. The rivets below the water-line are smooth-headed, so that they will offer no resistance to the vessel's progress through the water, while those above the water-mark protrude from the vessel's side over a half inch, terminating in a sharp point. Eight is the average number of plates in depth below the water-line. The work has progressed only so far as that both forward and aft there are but two plates above the water-line; but amidships, or in the centre of the vessel, the number has increased to seven, extending only as far as the engine-room. The interior of the vessel presents a very forcible impression as regards her strength. At intervals of about two feet rise up very large L-shaped bars of iron, which are the ship's ribs; two of these constitute a rib, and from the rivet holes in them it would seem that more plates are yet to be added. This is evident when we remember that she was built on the principle of having a series of plates riveted together so that spaces should intervene between each of them. The bow is very sharp, and there are good evidence that she was intended to be fortified in this locality by what is termed dead wood; but in this case it would be dead iron. Passing along aft, and on reaching the beam, or broadest part of the vessel, we find that upright stanchions or bearers have been erected. These are arranged by pairs, and are intersected by the lower-deck floor-beams, forming, as it were, two crosses joined at the transverse ends. These beams are built of heavy plate-iron, firmly united together. A portion of the deck has been laid, on which is placed her engines, which are of a novel pattern, but as dismembered that full description of them can not be given.

PRESENT ARMAMENT OF THE BATTERY.

It is said, when completed, there will be nine shells or plates of iron, with space between, making a wall twenty-seven inches in thickness. Being sharp at the bow, she can be used for cutting a vessel in two. She was designed to carry thirty guns of the heaviest calibre on her gun-deck, and mount four Paixhan guns on her spar deck, and furnaces for heating red-hot shot were to be placed in different parts of the ship. Thus built, she would prove a valuable acquisition to our harbor defence. She will have no masts, and will probably be about 6000 tons burden.



PARADE OF UNITED STATES TROOPS ON GOVERNOR'S ISLAND BEFORE EMBARKATION.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1860, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.]

GREAT EXPECTATIONS.

A NOVEL.

By CHARLES DICKENS.

Splendidly Illustrated by John McLenan.

☞ Printed from the Manuscript and early Proof-sheets purchased from the Author by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."

CHAPTER XXXVII.

In that staid old house near the Green at Richmond should ever come to be haunted when I am dead, it will be haunted, surely, by my ghost. Oh the many, many nights and days through which the unquiet spirit within me haunted that house when Estella lived there! Let my body be where it would, my spirit was always wandering, wandering, wandering about that house.

The lady with whom Estella was placed, Mrs. Brandley by name, was a widow, with one daughter several years older than Estella. The mother looked young, and the daughter looked old; the mother's complexion was pink, and the daughter's was yellow: the mother set up for frivolity, and the daughter for theology. They were in what is called a good position, and visited, and were visited by, numbers of people. Little if any community of feeling subsisted between them and Estella, but the understanding was established that they were necessary to her, and that she was necessary to them. Mrs. Brandley had been a friend of Miss Havisham's before the time of her seclusion.

In Mrs. Brandley's house, and out of Mrs. Brandley's house, I suffered every kind and degree of torture that Estella could cause me. The nature of my relations with her, which placed me on terms of familiarity without placing me on terms of favor, conduced to my distraction. She made use of me to tease other admirers, and she turned the very familiarity between herself and me to the account of putting a constant slight on my devotion to her. If I had been her secretary, steward, half-brother, poor relation—if I had been a younger brother of her appointed husband—I could not have seemed to myself further from my hopes when I was nearest to her. The privilege of calling her by her name and hearing her call me by mine became, under the circumstances, an aggravation of my trials; and while I think it likely that it almost maddened her other lovers, I know too certainly that it almost maddened me.

She had admirers without end. No doubt my jealousy made an admirer of every one who went near her; but there were more than enough of them without that.

I saw her often at Richmond, I heard of her often in town, and I used often to take her and the Brandleys on the water; there were parties, fête days, plays, operas, concerts, parties—all sorts of pleasures, through which I pursued her—and they were all miseries to me. I never had one hour's happiness in her society, and yet my mind all round the four-and-twenty hours was harping on the happiness of having her with me unto death.

Throughout this part of our intercourse—and it lasted, as will presently be seen, for what I then thought a long time—she habitually reverted to that tone which expressed that our association was forced upon us. There were even times when she would come to a sudden check in this tone and in all her many tones, and would seem to pity me.

"Pip, Pip," she said, one evening, coming to such a check, when we sat apart at a darkening window of the house in Richmond, "will you never learn discretion?"

"Of what?"

"Of me."

"Would you not to be attracted by you, do you mean, Estella?"

"Do I mean! If you don't know what I mean you are duller indeed."

I should have reported that Love was commonly reputed blind, but for the reason that I always was entertained—and this was one of the least of my miseries—by a feeling that it was ungenerous to press myself upon her when she knew that I was not distasteful but dear to Miss Havisham. My dread always was that this knowledge on her part laid me under a heavy disadvantage with her pride, and made me the subject of a rebellious struggle in her bosom.

"At any rate," said I, "I have no warning given me just now, for you wrote to me to come to you this time."

"That's true," said Estella, with a cold, careless smile, that always chilled me.

After looking at the twilight without for a little while, she went on to say:

"The time has come round when Miss Havisham wishes to have me for a day at Satis. You are to take me there, and bring me back, if you will. She would rather I did not travel alone, and objects to receiving my maid, for she has a sensitive horror of being talked of by such people. Can you take me?"

"Can I take you, Estella!"

"You can, then? The day after to-morrow, if you please. You are to pay all charges out of my purse. You hear the condition of your going?"

"And must obey," said I.

This was all the preparation I received for that visit, or for others like it; Miss Havisham never wrote to me, nor had I ever so much as seen her handwriting. We went down on the next day but one, and we found her in the room where I had first beheld her, and it is needless to add that there was no change in Satis House.

She was even more dreadfully fond of Estella than she had been when I last saw them together; I repeat the word advisedly, for there was something positively dreadful in the energy of her looks and embraces. She hung upon Estella's beauty, hung upon her words, hung upon her gestures, and sat contemplating her own trembling fingers while she looked at her as though she were devouring the beautiful creature she had reared.

From Estella she looked at me, with a searching glance that seemed to pry into my heart and probe its wounds. "How does she use you, Pip —how does she use you?" she asked me again, with her witch-like eagerness, even in Estella's hearing. But when we sat by her flickering fire at night she was more weird; for then, keeping Estella's hand drawn through her arm and clutched in her own hand, she extorted from me, by dint of referring back to what Estella had told her in her regular letters, the names and conditions of the men whom she had fascinated; and as Miss Havisham dwelt upon the roll, with the intensity of a mind mortally hurt and diseased, she sat with her other hand on her crutch stick, and her chin on that, and her wan bright eyes glaring at me, a very spectre.

I saw in this, wretched though it made me, and bitter the sense of dependence and even of degradation that it awakened—I saw in this, that Estella was set to wreak Miss Havisham's revenge on men, and that she was not to be given to me until she had gratified it for a term. I saw in this, a reason for her being beforehand assigned to me. Sending her out to attract and torment and do mischief, Miss Havisham sent her with the malicious assurance that she was beyond the reach of all admirers, and that all who staked upon that game were secured to lose. I saw in this, that I, too, was tormented by a perversion of ingenuity, even while the prize was reserved for me. I saw in this, the reason for my being staved off so long, and the reason for my late guardian's declining to commit himself to the formal knowledge of such a scheme. In a word, I saw in this, Miss Havisham as I had her then and there before my eyes, and always had had her before my eyes; and I saw in this the distinct shadow of the darkened and unhealthy house in which her life was hidden from the sun.

"SHE CARRIED A BARE CANDLE IN HER HAND," ETC.

The candles that lighted that room of hers were placed in sconces on the wall. They were high from the ground, and they burned with the steady dullness of artificial light in air that is seldom renewed. As I looked round at them, and at the pale gloom they made, and at the speechless clock, and at the withered articles of bridal dress upon the table and the ground, and at her own awful figure with its ghostly reflection thrown large by the fire into the ceiling and the wall, I saw in every thing the construction that my mind had come to repeated and thrown back to me. My thoughts passed into the room across the landing where the table was spread, and I saw it written, as it were, in the falls of the cobwebs from the centre-piece, in the crawlings of the spiders on the cloth, in the tracks of the mice as they betook their little quickened hearts behind the panels, and in the progress and gnawings of the beetles on the floor.

It happened on the occasion of this visit that some sharp words arose between Estella and Miss Havisham. It was the first time I had ever seen them opposed.

We were seated by the fire as just now described, and Miss Havisham still had Estella's arm drawn through her own, and still clutched Estella's hand in hers, when Estella gradually began, to detach herself. She had shown a proud impatience more than once before, and had rather endured that fierce affection than accepted or returned it.

"What!" said Miss Havisham, flashing her eyes upon her, "are you tired of me?"

"Only a little tired of myself," replied Estella, disengaging her arm, and moving to the great chimney-piece, where she stood looking down at the fire.

"Speak the truth, you ingrate!" cried Miss Havisham, passionately striking her stick upon the floor; "you are tired of me."

Estella looked at her with perfect composure, and again looked down at the fire. Her graceful figure and her beautiful face expressed a selfpossessed indifference to the wild heat of the other that was almost cruel.

"You stock and stone!" exclaimed Miss Havisham. "You cold, cold heart!"

"What?" said Estella, preserving her attitude of indifference as she leaned against the great chimney-piece and only moving her eyes; "do you reproach me for being cold? You?"

"Are you not?" was the fierce retort.

"You should know," said Estella, "I am what you have made me. Take all the praise, take all the blame; take all the success, take all the failure: in short, take me."

"Oh, look at her, look at her!" cried Miss Havisham, bitterly. "Look at her, so hard and thankless, on the hearth where she was reared! Where I took her into this wretched breast when it was first bleeding from its stabs, and where I have lavished years of tenderness upon her!"

"At least I was no part to the compact," said Estella, "for if I could walk and speak when it was made it was as much as I could do. But what would you have? You have been very good to me, and I owe every thing to you. What would you have?"

"Love," replied the other.

"You have it."

"I have not," said Miss Havisham.

"Mother by adoption," retorted Estella, never departing from the easy grace of her attitude, never raising her voice as the other did, never yielding either to anger or tenderness—"Mother by adoption, I have said that I owe every thing to you. All I possess is freely yours. All that you have given me is at your command to have again. Beyond that I have nothing. And if you ask me to give you what you never gave me, my gratitude and duty can not do impossibilities."

"Did I never give her love?" cried Miss Havisham, turning wildly to me. "Did I never give her a burning love, inseparable from jealousy at all times, and from sharp pain, while she spoke of thus to me! Let her call me mad, let her call me mad!"

"Why should I call you mad," returned Estella, "I, of all people? Does any one live who knows what set purposes you have, half as well as I do? Does any one live who knows what a steady monotony you have, half as well as I do? I, who have sat on this same hearth on the little stool that is even now beside you there, learning your lessons and looking up into your face, when your face was strange and frightened me!"

"Soon forgotten!" moaned Miss Havisham. "Times soon forgotten!" ✶

"No, not forgotten," retorted Estella. "Not forgotten, but treasured up in my memory. When have you found me false to your teaching? When have you found me unmindful of your lessons? When have you found me giving admission here"—she touched her bosom with her hand—"to any thing that you excluded? Be just to me."

"So proud, so proud!" moaned Miss Havisham, pushing away her gray hair with both her hands.

"Who taught me to be proud?" returned Estella. "Who praised me when I learned my lesson?"

"So hard, so hard!" moaned Miss Havisham, with her former action.

"Who taught me to be hard?" returned Estella. "Who praised me when I learned my lesson?"

"But to be proud and hard to me!" Miss Havisham quite shrieked, as she stretched out her arms. "Estella, Estella, Estella, to be proud and hard to me!"

Estella looked at her for a moment with a kind of calm wonder, but was not otherwise disturbed; when the moment was past she looked down at the fire again.

"I can not think," said Estella, raising her eyes after a pause, "why you should be so unreasonable when I come to see you after a separation. I have never forgotten your wrongs and your cause. I have never been unfaithful to you or your schooling. I have never shown any weakness that I can charge myself with."

"Would it be weakness to return my love?" exclaimed Miss Havisham. "But yes, yes, she would call it so!"

"I begin to think," said Estella, in a musing way, after another moment of calm wonder, "that I almost understand how this comes about. If you had brought up your adopted daughter wholly in the dark confinement of these rooms, and had never let her know that there was such a thing as the daylight by which the heart of every other girl newer face—if you had done that, and then, for a purpose had wanted her to understand the daylight, and know all about it, you would have been disappointed and angry?"

Miss Havisham, with her head in her hands, sat making a low moaning, and swaying herself on her chair, but gave no answer.

"Or," said Estella—"which is a nearer case —if you had taught her, from the dawn of her intelligence, with your utmost energy and might, that there was such a thing as daylight, but that it was made to be her enemy and destroyer, and she must always turn against it, for it had blighted you and would else blight her; if you had done this, and then, for a purpose, had wanted her to take naturally to the daylight, and she could not do it, you would have been disappointed and angry?"

Miss Havisham sat listening (or it seemed so, for I could not see her face), but still made no answer.

"So," said Estella, "I must be taken as I have been made. The success is not mine, the failure is not mine, but the two together are me."

Miss Havisham had settled down, I hardly knew how, upon the floor, among the faded bridal relics with which it was strewn. I took advantage of the moment—I had sought one from the first—to leave the room after beseeching Estella's attention to her, with a movement of my hand. When I left, Estella was yet standing by the great chimney-piece, just as she had stood throughout. Miss Havisham's gray hair was all adrift upon the ground, among the other bridal wrecks, and was a miserable sight to see. It was with a depressed heart that I walked in the starlight for an hour and more, about the court-yard, and about the brewery, and about the ruined garden. When I at last took courage to return to the room, I found Estella sitting at Miss Havisham's knee, taking up some stitches in one of those old articles of dress that were dropping to pieces, and of which I have often been reminded since by the faded tatters of old banners that I have seen hanging up in cathedrals. Afterward, Estella and I played cards, as of yore—only we were skilful now, and played For Love—and so the evening wore away, and I went to bed.

I lay in that separate building across the court-yard. It was the first time I had ever lain down to rest in Satis House, and sleep refused to come near me. A million of Miss Havishams haunted me. Every one of them laid a leaden pillow, on that, as the head of the bed, at the foot, behind the half-opened door of the dressing-room, in the dressing-room, in the room overhead, in the room beneath—in every where. At last, when the night was slow to creep on toward two o'clock, I felt that I absolutely could no longer bear the place, and was a most unearthly object by its light. Standing at the bottom of the staircase, I felt the mildewed air of the room I occupied, without seeing that open the door, and I heard her walking there, and so across into her own room, and so across again into that room, without pause. After a time, I tried in the dark both to get out, and to go back, but I could do neither until some streaks of day strayed in and revealed to where to lay my hands. During the whole interval, whenever I went to the bottom of the staircase, I heard her footsteps, saw her light pass above, and heard her cease to move.

Before we left next day, there was no revival of the difference between her and Estella, nor was it ever renewed on any similar occasion; and there were four similar occasions, to the best of my remembrance. Nor did Miss Havisham's manner toward Estella in anywise change, except that I believed it to have something like fear infused among its former characteristics.

It is impossible to turn this leaf of my life without putting Bentley Drummle's name upon it; or I would, very gladly.

On a certain occasion when the Finches were assembled in force, and when good feeling was being promoted in the usual manner by nobody's agreeing with any body else, the presiding Finch called the Grove to order, forasmuch as Mr. Drummle had not yet toasted a lady; which, according to the solemn constitution of the society, it was the brute's turn to do that day. I thought I saw him leer in an ugly way at me while the decanters were going round, but as there was no love lost between us, that might easily be. What was my indignant surprise when he called upon the company to pledge him to "Estella!"

"Estella who?" said I.

"Never you mind," retorted Drummle.

"Estella of where?" said I. "You are bound to say of where." Which he was, as a Finch.

"Of course, gentlemen," said Drummle, putting me out of the question, "and a peerless beauty."

Much he knew about peerless beauties, a mean miserable idiot! I whispered Herbert.

"I know that lady," said Herbert, across the table, when the toast had been honored.

"Do you?" said Drummle.

"And so do I," I added, with a scarlet face.

"Do you?" said Drummle. "Oh, Lord!"

This was the only retort — except glass or crockery — that the heavy creature was capable of making; but it came so lightly invested by it as if it had been barbed with wit, and I immediately rose in my place and said that I could not but express how much I felt honored by Drummle Finch's impudence to come down to that Grove — we always talked about coming down to that Grove, as a most Parliamentary turn of expression — down to that Grove, proposing a lady of whom he knew nothing. Mr. Drummle upon this, starting up, demanded what I meant by that? Whereupon, I made him the extreme reply that I believed he knew where I was to be found.

Whether it was possible in a Christian country to get on without blood, after this, was a question on which the Finches were divided. The debate upon it grew so lively indeed, that at least six more honorable members took six more, during the discussion, that they believed they knew where they were to be found. However, it was decided at last (the Grove being a Court of Honor), that if Mr. Drummle would bring never so slight a certificate from the lady, importing that he had the honor of her acquaintance, Mr. Pip must express his regret, as a gentleman and a Finch, for "having been betrayed into a warmth which." Next day was appointed for the production (let our honor should take cold from delay) and next day Drummle appeared with a polite little avowal in Estella's hand, that she had had the honor of dancing with his amiable friend Mr. Pip, and that she remembered him with pleasure. This left me no course but to regret that I had been "betrayed into a warmth which," and on the whole to repudiate, as untrustworthy, the words I was to be found any where. Drummle and I then sat snorting at one another for an hour, while the Grove engaged in subsidiary contradiction, and finally the promotion of good feeling was declared to have gone ahead at an amazing rate.

I tell this lightly, but it was no light thing to me. For I can not adequately express what pain it gave me to think that Estella should show any favor to a contemptible, clumsy, sulky booby, so very far beneath her notice. To the present moment, I believe it to have been referable to some pure fire of generosity and disinterestedness in my love for her that I could not endure the thought of her stooping to that hound. No doubt I should have been miserable whomsoever she had favored; but a worthier object would have caused me a different kind and degree of distress.

It was easy for me to find out, and I did soon find out, that Drummle had begun to follow her closely, and that she allowed him to do it. A little while ago, and I should have been maddened by jealousy, and have gone straight to her, and he and I crossed one another every day. He held on, in a dull persistent way, and Estella held him as with each encouragement, now with discouragement, now almost flattering him, now openly despising him, now knowing him very well, now scarcely remembering who he was.

The Spider, as Mr. Jaggers had called him, was used to his web, however, and had the patience of his tribe. Added to that, he had a blockhead confidence in his money and in his family pretensions, which sometimes did him good service — almost taking the place of concentration and determined purpose. So the Spider, doggedly watching Estella, outwatched many brighter insects, and would often uncoil himself and drop at the right nick of time.

At a certain Assembly Ball at Richmond (there used to be Assembly Balls at most places then), where Estella had outshone all other beauties, this blundering Drummle so hung about her, and with so much toleration on her part, that I resolved to speak to her concerning him. I took the next opportunity which was when she was waiting for Mrs. Brandley to take her home, and was sitting apart among some flowers, ready to go. I was with her, for I almost always accompanied them to and from such places.

"Are you tired, Estella?"

"Rather, Pip."

"You look so."

"Say rather, I should not be; for I have my letter to Satis House to write before I go to sleep."

"Recounting to-night's triumph?" said I. "Surely it's a very poor one, Estella."

"What do you mean? I didn't know there had been any."

"Estella," said I, "do look at that fellow in the corner yonder, who is looking over here at us."

"Why should I look at him?" returned Estella, with her eyes on me instead. "What is there in that fellow in the corner yonder — to use your words — that I need look at?"

"Indeed, that is the very question I want to ask you," said I. "For he has been hovering about you all night."

"Moths, and all sorts of ugly creatures," replied Estella, with a glance toward him, "hover about a lighted candle. Can the candle help it?"

"No," I returned; "but can not the Estella help it?"

"Well!" said she, laughing, after a moment, "perhaps. Yes. Any thing you like."

"But, Estella, do hear me speak. It makes me wretched that you should encourage a man so generally despised. You know that he is despised."

"Well?" said she.

"You know that he is as ungainly within as without. A deficient, ill-tempered, lowering, stupid fellow."

"Well?" said she.

"You know that he has nothing to recommend him but money, and a ridiculous roll of addle-headed predecessors; now, don't you?"

"Well? said she again; and each time she said it, she opened her lovely eyes the wider.

To overcome the difficulty of getting past that monosyllable, I took it from her, and said, repeating it with regret, "Well! Then, that is why it makes me wretched."

Now if I could have believed that she favored Drummle with any idea of making me unhappy, wretched, I should have been in better heart about it; but in that habitual way of hers, she put me so entirely out of the question that I could believe nothing of the kind.

"Pip," said Estella, casting her glances over the room, "I don't see Bentley in the office on you. It may have its effect on others, and may be meant to have. It's not worth discussing."

"Yes it is," I returned, "since I can not bear that people should say, 'she throws away her graces and attractions on a mere boor, the lowest in the crowd.'"

"I can bear it," said Estella.

"Oh! don't be so proud, Estella, and so inflexible."

"Calls me proud and inflexible in this breath!" said Estella, opening her hands. "And in his last breath reproached me for stooping to a boor!"

"There is no doubt you do," said I, something hurriedly, "for I have seen you give him looks and smiles this very night such as you never give to—me."

"Do you want me, then," said Estella, turning suddenly and looking me full in the face, "do you cry, look, 'to deceive and entrap you?'"

"Do you deceive and entrap him, Estella?"

"Yes, and numbers more. Come! Is not anybody, look, 'to deceive and entrap you?'"

And now that I have given the one chapter to the theme that so filled my heart, and so often made it ache and ache again, I pass on, unhastened, to the event which brought me nearest to my home.

Estella's intercourse with Drummle went on longer yet; the event that had begun to be prepared for, before I knew that the world held Estella, and it was consummated. Mr. Jaggers gave me a receiving its first distortions from Miss Havisham's wasting hands.

In the Eastern story, the heavy slab that was to fall on the bed of the bride in the flush of conquest was slowly wrought out of the quarry, the tunnel for the rope to hold it in its place was slowly carried through a hill of rock, the fall slab was slowly raised and fitted in the roof, the rope was rove to it and slowly taken through the miles of hollow to the grated door in the air. Being made ready with much labor, and the hour come, the sultan was aroused in the dead of the night, and the sharpened axe that was to sever the rope from the great iron ring was put into his hand, and he struck with it, and the rope parted and rushed away, and the ceiling fell. So, in my case; all the work, near and afar, that tended to the end, had been accomplished; and in an instant the blow was struck, and the roof of my stronghold dropped upon me.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Military Books.

D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher and Importer of Military and Engineering Books. 192 Broadway. Send for Catalogue of Military Books.

Hoarseness and Sore Throat.

The unpleasant and painful result of "Catching Cold," or Clergyman's Sore Throat, the vocal organs, may at any time be removed by allowing one or two of "Brown's Bronchial Troches" or Cough Lozenges, to dissolve slowly in the mouth. Hence, Singers and Public Speakers will find them of peculiar advantage.

"We have found them of great service in allaying Bronchial Irritation, and in subduing Hoarseness so prolific by Colds."—Rev. Daniel Wise, late Editor of Zion's Herald.

WANTED—MEN, WOMEN, AND BOYS in every Town, City, and Village in the United States, to act as Agents for the sale of Sherman & Co.'s Gilt Jewelry Envelopes. Agents can make from 5 to 8 dollars a day. Being largely engaged in the manufacture of a cap rice quality of Jewelry, we are enabled to offer to our customers a greater variety and more valuable Gifts than any other similar establishment. For further particulars enclose a stamp, and address, SHERMAN & CO., 239 Broadway, corner of Barclay Street, New York.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA—The best Spring Alterative. It will purify the blood, promote a vigorous circulation and thoroughly renovate the system.

For sale by A. B. & D. SANDS, 100 Fulton St., N. Y.

Burnett's Kalliston,

As a wash for the Complexion has no equal. It is distinguished for its cooling and soothing properties, and is admirably adapted to all unnatural conditions of the skin; removing Tan, Sunburn, Freckles, Redness and Roughness of the Skin, &c., curing Chapped Hands, and allaying the irritation caused by the bites of Mosquitoes, and other annoying insects. Prepared by Joseph Burnett & Co., Boston. Price 50c. per bottle. For sale everywhere.

Great Work on the Horse!

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES:

BY ROBERT JENNINGS, V. S.,

Professor of Pathology and Operative Surgery in the Veterinary College of Philadelphia, Professor of Veterinary Medicine in the late Agricultural College of Ohio, Secretary of the American Veterinary Association of Philadelphia, etc., etc.

WILL TELL YOU Of the Origin, History and distinctive traits of the various breeds of Europeans, Asiatic, African and American Horses, with the physical formation and peculiarities of the animal, and how to ascertain his age by the number and condition of his teeth; illustrated with numerous explanatory engravings.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES

WILL TELL YOU Of Breeding, Breaking, Stabling, Feeding, Grooming, Sleeping, and the general management of the horse, with the best modes of administering medicine, also, how to treat Biting, Kicking, Rearing, Shying, Running, Crib Biting, Restiveness, and all other vices to which he is subject; with numerous explanatory engravings.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES

WILL TELL YOU Of the causes, symptoms, and treatment of Strangles, Sore Throat, Distemper, Catarrh, Influenza, Bronchitis, Pneumonia, Pleurisy, Broken Wind, Chronic Cough, Roaring and Whistling, Lampas, Sore Mouths and Tongue, and Decayed Teeth, with other diseases of the Mouth and Respiratory Organs.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES

WILL TELL YOU Of the causes, symptoms, and Treatment of Worms, Bots, Colic, Strangulation, Stone, Concretions, Hepatitis, Jaundice, Diarrhœa, Jaundice, Hepatitrhœa, Bloody Urine, Stones in the Kidney and Bladder, Inflammation, and other diseases of the Stomach, Bowels, Liver and Urinary Organs.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES

WILL TELL YOU Of the causes, symptoms, and Treatment of Bone, Blood, and Bog Spavin, Ring Bone, Sweenie, Shoulder, Broken Knees, Wind Galls, Founder, Stifle Joint Lameness, Curbed and Hock, Scratches, Cankers, Thrush, and Other Ailes, of Hoof, Nerve, Vertigo, Epilepsy, Staggers, and other diseases of the Head, Legs and Head.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES

WILL TELL YOU Of the causes, symptoms, and Treatment of Fistula, Poll Evil, Grinders, Fancy, Sorrel Fever, Mange, Surfeit, Locked Jaw, Rheumatism, Cramp, Colic, Diseases of the Eye and Heart, &c., &c., and how to manage Castration, Bleeding, Trephining, Docking, Firing, Hernia, Amputation, Tapping, and other surgical operations.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES

WILL TELL YOU Of Ravey's Method of taming Horses: how to Approach, Halter, or Stable a Colt; how to Accustom a horse to strange sounds and sights, and how to Bit, Saddle, Ride, and Break him to Harness; also the form and law of WARRANTY, and how to avoid the result of more than fifteen years' careful study of the habits, peculiarities, wiles and weaknesses of the noble and useful animal.

The book contains 384 pag s, appropriately illustrated by wood cuts. Handsomely bound. It is printed in a clear and open type, and will be forwarded to any address, postage paid, on receipt of price, Half Bound, $1.00, or, in cloth, extra, $1.25.

$1000 A YEAR can be made by enterprising men, selling the above and other popular works of merit. Address, for terms, the publishers.

GEO. MACLEAN & CO.,
No. 617 Sansom Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

"Plumbing and Gas."

The Subscribers have MOVED to their new building, No. 205 Fourth Street, corner of Greene. Experienced men stand to all parts of the country, and execute all city orders, and all work done is under the supervision of either one of the subscribers, who have had an active knowledge of the Practice and Theory of their Business would warrant entire satisfaction. LAWRENCE & O'HARA.

Jewelry, Jewelry.

HEADQUARTERS for all those engaged in the One Dollar Stores and Envelope Business. For particulars address, enclosing stamp, C. A. HAYWARD, Manufacturing Jeweler, 389 Broadway.

H. WORCESTER'S
IMPROVED PIANO FORTES,
Manufactory & Warerooms,
No. 340, 342, & 344 West 14th St., cor. 3d Av., N. Y.

"Matrimony made Easy."—An 8-w work, showing how either sex may be suitably married, irrespective of age or appearance, with certain fail—free for 25c. Address T. William & Co., Publishers, Box 2509, Phila.

VALUABLE TO ALL—Who use the Pen or Pencil. Sharer's Patent Ivorine and Burnisher. Pencil Sharpener, &c., all neatly combined in one tasteful form. "It is a most ingenious contrivance, answering so many purposes entirely."—Independent.

"It combines more useful qualities than any other article of its size within the range of observation."—Ex-Gov. Dodge, of Connecticut.

1 Sample, post paid, for 75c., or 3 styles for $1 50. Send for Circular. A. G. SHAVELIN, New Haven, Ct.

Hard Times made Easy!

GOOD NEWS FOR THE UNEMPLOYED!

ONE THOUSAND CHANCES TO MAKE MONEY!
ONE MILLION DOLLARS WORTH
OF WATCHES, JEWELRY,
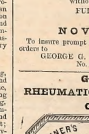
AND
SILVER-PLATED WARE,
to be disposed of on an
ENTIRELY NEW AND ORIGINAL PLAN.

2,500 AGENTS WANTED.

All persons desirous of securing an Agency in this NEW ENTERPRISE
Should send on their names at once, inclosing a 3 cent stamp to pay postage, and receive by return of mail A PREMIUM CATALOGUE containing
OUR INDUCEMENTS,
which afford
A RARE CHANCE TO MAKE MONEY
without risk, together with
FULL PARTICULARS
Relative to this
NOVEL PLAN!!

To insure prompt and satisfactory dealings, direct all orders to
GEORGE O. EVANS,
No. 302 Market Street, Philadelphia.

GARDINER'S RHEUMATIC AND NEURALGIA COMPOUND.



A certain, safe, and permanent cure for Rheumatism, Neuralgia, and all diseases of the internal muscles, driving out and entirely eradicating the disease, requiring no change in diet or business, and may be taken by children and persons of the most delicate constitutions with perfect safety.

Testimonials.

"Gardiner's Rheumatic and Neuralgia Compound" is the best medicine for the disease I ever saw.—CHAS. A. SMITH, No. 1 Old State House, Boston.

I have suffered with Rheumatism twenty years, and being confined to my bed several weeks last spring, I was entirely cured from an attack of same by Gardiner's Rheumatic and Neuralgia Compound."—NORMAN T. AYRES, 75 Franklin Street, Boston.

"Having been a constant sufferer from Neuralgia for eighteen months, and been driven by excruciating pain to the trial of numberless remedies, without obtaining relief, I was induced to try Gardiner's Rheumatic and Neuralgia Compound." "I have taken but one bottle and am entirely well.—D. D. BAXTER, Dry Goods Dealer, No. 7 Appleton Block, Lowell, Mass.

I have been afflicted with Salt Rheum in its worst form for a long time, and suffered more than can be imagined except by those similarly afflicted. I tried one bottle of your Compound, and can honestly say that I believe myself entirely cured.—JOHN A. MORLO, Pearl St. House, Boston, Mass.

"Gardiner's Rheumatic and Neuralgia Compound" has entirely cured me of suffering of seven years' standing.—W. E. HODGKINS, No. 7 Old State House, Boston.

For my own part, for more than for three years a great sufferer from Salt Rheum, his hands covered with sores and in constant pain, the use of your compound cured him.—J. W. HAMMOND, 93 Milk Street, Boston.

"Gardiner's Rheumatic and Neuralgia Compound" has entirely cured me of Neuralgia.—W. C. THOMPSON, Proprietor Parlor Matches, Boston, Mass.

I certify that my friend Wm. T. Gliddon, Esq., present, called on me with a bottle of "Gardiner's Rheumatic Compound," in 1856, when I was suffering with a painful attack of Neuralgia and Rheumatism, and that it proved to be of decided benefit.—ALBERT SMITH, Ex-Member of Congress from Maine.

The Rheumatic and Neuralgia Compound has been taken by hundreds of persons for Scrofulous Humors with great benefit.

PRINCIPAL DEPOT, 87 KILBY STREET, BOSTON, MASS.

F. C. GARDINER, Sole Agent for New York.

F. C. WELLES & CO., Franklin Street.

For sale by Druggists and Country Merchants the United States. None genuine unless signed by CHAS. F. GARDINER.

WEDDING CARDS,
Specimens by Mail on receipt of Stamps.
L. DEMPSEY & CO.,
Engravers and Printers,
401 Broadway, N. Y.

HAVING been restored to health by a very simple Herb-dy, I am anxious to make known the means by which any sufferer from Debility, Nervousness, Loss of Memory, &c., the method and means of my Simple but perfect cure stamp to D. H. WELLINGTON, Box 3818 Boston, Mass.

LE BON TON—THE BEST LADIES' FASHION BOOK—Sent by mail, post paid, with two valuable patterns, printed for 25 cents.
S. T. TAYLOR & SON, 407 Broadway, N. Y.

Close of the Twenty-Second Volume.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE For May, 1861.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) 2 00

And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of EIGHT SUBSCRIBERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MAGAZINE, together one year, $4 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

THE MUSIC FOR THE TIMES.

AWFUL APPARITION!

MRS. T. (to T., who has been Reading the Popular Novel) "Pray, MR. TOMKINS, are you never coming Up-Stairs? How much longer are you going to Sit Up with that 'Woman in White?'"

General Scott's Infantry Tactics;

OR,

Rules for the Exercise and Maneuvres of the United States Infantry.

3 vols. 24mo, Muslin, $2 50.

Published by Authority.

United States Army Regulations.

Approved by the President of the United States, and Printed under the Directions of the Secretary of War.

12mo, Muslin, $1 50.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

6000 AGENTS wanted, to sell SIX NEW INVENTIONS—two very recent, and of great value to families; all pay great profits to Agents. Send four stamps and get 80 pages particulars. EPHRAIM BROWN, Lowell, Mass.

No Chimney!

Burners that will fit any Coal Oil Lamp, and burn Coal Oil or Kerosene without a chimney. Burner sent by mail on receipt of $1 50. Callender's Carbo-Air Gas Lamp burns pure Coal Oil, Camphene, &c., without wick or chimney. Sample Lamp $3 00. Enclose stamp for Circulars. Address CALLENDER & PEIRCE, Dealers in Lamps, Oils, &c., 175 Broadway, New York.

Dollar Copying Press.

AGENTS WANTED to sell VAN ANDEN'S PATENT PORTABLE DOLLAR COPYING PRESS. It weighs but eight ounces. Can be carried in the pocket, and copies with greater facility, and as perfectly, as the iron press. Good Agents make from $5 to $10 a day. Send for Circular. Address, with red stamp, WATERS & VAN ANDEN, 141 William Street, New York. Sent free on receipt of $1.

DR. BROWN'S

Patent Baby-Tender.

The Great Institution for Children.

Warerooms 652 Broadway.

J. Silas Brown & Co.

Send for our Circular.

Military Clothing

of all

DESCRIPTIONS.

Large orders executed at the shortest notice, and at the Lowest prices, by

Devlin, Hudson & Co.,

Broadway and Grand, and Broadway and Warren Streets.

John B. Dunham.

Overstrung Grand Square and Upright Pianos.

Established in 1834.

Are pronounced to be the best Pianos manufactured. Each Instrument warranted 6 years. Send for Circular. Warerooms and Manufactory, 75 to 85 East 13th Street, near Broadway, N. Y.

WARD'S

Perfect Fitting Shirts,

MADE TO MEASURE AT $18 PER DOZEN OR SIX FOR $9.

MADE OF NEW YORK MILLS MUSLIN, With fine Linen Bosoms, and warranted as good a Shirt as sold in the retail stores at $2 50 each.

ALSO, THE VERY BEST SHIRTS THAT CAN BE MADE AT $2 EACH.

SELF-MEASUREMENT FOR SHIRTS.

Printed directions, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of shirts sent free everywhere, and so easy to understand, that any one can take their own measure for Shirts. I warrant a good fit. The cash to be paid to the Express Company on receipt of goods.

S. W. H. WARD, from London,

No. 387 Broadway, N. Y., up Stairs.

Mantillas! Mantillas!

BRODIE

Has made his Great

Anniversary Opening

at his

Palace of Fashion,

Under the 5th Avenue Hotel,

Corner 23d Street,

and at the

Old Celebrated Stand,

300 Canal Street.

The Richest Display of

MANTILLAS

in

Silk and Fancy Cloth

Ever made in New York.

Harper's Weekly.

PRICE SIX CENTS.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year	$2 00
Two Copies for One Year	4 00

Harper's Weekly and Harper's Magazine, one year, $4 00.

Volumes I., II., III., and IV. of HARPER'S WEEKLY, handsomely bound in Cloth extra, Price $3 50 each, are now ready.

 To postmasters and agents getting up a Club of Ten Subscribers, a Copy will be sent gratis. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. Specimen Numbers gratis.

Agents and Teachers supplied at the lowest CASH RATES.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. V.—No. 228.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 11, 1861. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $2 50 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1861, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

COLONEL ELLSWORTH, OF THE FIRE ZOUAVES.

We publish above, from a recent photograph, a portrait of COLONEL ELLSWORTH, the commander of the Fire Zouaves of this city. Colonel Ellsworth's face and gallant bearing are well known to most of our citizens, and they will be glad to meet him once more in our pages.

The Colonel is quite a young man, being only about twenty-seven years of age. He is a native of New England, and studied for a time at West Point, acquiring the usual proficiency in the manual of military exercise and the use of arms.

Some years ago he removed to Chicago, Illinois, and settled there. His love for military pursuits still endured, and conceiving—shortly after the Crimean war—a decided opinion that the Zouave tactics were more practically efficient than those of our ordinary light infantry, he set to work to raise a corps of Zouaves in Chicago. Some forty or fifty young men joined his company, and he devoted himself to drilling them. In the course of a year or so, they arrived at such a pitch of perfection both in the light-infantry drill and in the Zouave tactics, that many of their friends were anxious that they should visit the East to show what Chicago could do. Accordingly, in July, 1860, they left Chicago on a pleasure tour.

On 14th July they arrived in this city, after a triumphant progress through the Western States. At that time the Zouave drill was new to most of us. The fantastic dress of our visitors, their strange evolutions, and the masterly precision of their drill, attracted general attention not only among military men, but among the public at large. All the Colonels of our crack city regiments attended their exhibitions, and studied Colonel Ellsworth's manœuvres, and at last, so great was the desire of our ladies to witness the Chicago boys, that an exhibition was given for them in the Academy of Music which was crammed by the élite of society. Colonel Ellsworth may safely be described as the Father of the Zouave drill in the United States. At the present time, there are several thousand well-drilled Zouaves in the North and West.

On his return home, the young Colonel was of course much féted by his fellow-citizens, and new Zouave Companies were formed on the model of his.

Among other persons who paid him marked attention was Mr. Lincoln, then merely a candidate for the Presidency. After the election Mr. Lincoln signified his intention of attaching Colonel Ellsworth to his person; and when, in February last, he departed on his journey to Washington, Colonel Ellsworth was invited to form one of his escort. He was, the reporters tell us, one of the most useful of the party, ever watchful of Mr. Lincoln's person, and always in good temper and ready for any thing that could render the journey pleasant.

It was generally supposed that Colonel Ellsworth would be placed in a prominent position in the War Department under MR. LINCOLN. It is understood that his claims were urged by General Sumner, and that some post—perhaps the Chief Clerkship—was mentioned in connection with his name. It is not likely, however, that he sought any such inglorious berth. On the outbreak of the war he sought active service. And having had an opportunity of judging what excellent material for soldiers was contained in the New York Fire Department, he bethought himself of forming out of them a Zouave Regiment.

The idea was a happy one. Our firemen, brave as steel, would be restive under the stiff restraints of light infantry tactics, whereas the comparative freedom and dash of the Zouave drill suit them exactly. In the course of a couple of days over a thousand firemen volunteered. Some ten companies were accepted, the regiment was formed, and sent to Fort Hamilton for drill. They have since left for Washington, and, whatever happens, will doubtless give a good account of themselves.

COLONEL WILSON.

COLONEL WILLIAM WILSON, of the "Wilson Zouaves," whose portrait we give on this page, is a well-known character in New York. He has long been famous as a leader of the Mozart Democracy, having joined Fernando Wood in his famous bolt from Tammany Hall. A doughty chief of the "roughs," Mr. Wilson has figured prominently in almost every mêlée of our turbulent city Democracy, and is justly feared even by the strongest and boldest of the "b'hoys." In his youth he was a prize-fighter, and made a name for himself in the ring. A few years since he became Alderman of the First Ward, and was an active member of the Board. Since his retirement from the City Council he has not filled any public station.

When the city of New York was thrilled by the news that Baltimore refused passage to Northern troops marching to the defense of Washington, and had even attacked and driven back a body of unarmed Pennsylvanians, Colonel Wilson instantly announced that he would form a corps of "roughs" to march through Baltimore. All the "b'hoys" flocked to his standard, and in two or three days nearly two thousand men offered their services.

They were offered no holiday work. "Boys!" said Wilson, to a party of thirty young men who volunteered, "you want to come with me, eh! Well, if you do, three-fourths of you will be in your graves in three weeks!"

"Bravo! good! good!" was the unanimous reply. "We'll go with you!"

They are all of this stamp.

Colonel Wilson and his men are encamped on Staten Island, preparing for their march through Baltimore.

COLONEL WILSON, OF WILSON'S BRIGADE.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

PUBLISHERS' NOTICE.

THE proprietors of Harper's Weekly beg to inform the public that they have dispatched an artist to the SOUTH, in company with Mr. RUSSELL, the correspondent of the London Times. Another of their special artists is traveling with the SEVENTH REGIMENT; a third is now in BALTIMORE; and a fourth is with the Southern Army in VIRGINIA. They are making other important changes in Harper's Weekly, involving considerable expense. The present number contains many spirited PICTURES than any heretofore issued; succeeding numbers will be still richer in illustrations. These improvements, it is believed, will render Harper's Weekly the BEST ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

In consequence of the additional expense which they will involve, the proprietors beg to announce that the price of Harper's Weekly is raised from FIVE to SIX CENTS for single copies. The subscription price remains the same. The advertisement of terms, etc., will be found on page 303.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MAY 11, 1861.

A FEW FIGURES.

AT the time we write it seems likely that the Border Slave States, with the exception of Delaware and Maryland, will make common cause with the rebels against the United States Government. There is much talk about "neutrality" in Kentucky, Missouri, and Tennessee. In this case "neutrality" means a covert alliance with rebels, and treasonable willingness to supply them with aid and comfort. The Government will regard such "neutrals" as enemies, and will deal with them accordingly. If Maryland aspires to a similar position of neutrality; but geographical necessity will compel the Government to lay hands on her at the outset of the war, and it is therefore not worth while to estimate her among the parties to the conflict. Delaware alone, of the Border Slave States, evinces loyalty to the Union.

The war which has now begun will therefore be waged by the Free States, on one side, against thirteen Slave States on the other, to wit: Virginia, North and South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, Tennessee, Kentucky, and Missouri.

The population of the Free States, by the census of 1860, amounted to 18,950,759; the free population of the thirteen rebellious States to 7,037,395—considerably less than half that of their opponents.

In the Free States every man able to bear arms is at the service of the Government. In the rebellious States a certain number of men are required at home to keep in subjection 3,912,406 slaves. By a law of Louisiana planters are obliged to keep on their plantations a sufficient force of white men to resist a negro insurrection. Custom renders the same practice imperative in the other Slave States. Thus, from the 7,037,395 whites of the rebellious States must be deducted a large body of adult males, who are required at home to defend the women and children from the negroes. It is with the balance only that the Government will have to deal.

In modern warfare, however, success is won not so much by numbers as by money. The longest purse, in the long-run, infallibly wins the day. The comparative wealth of the two sections thus becomes a matter of the highest moment. In the Banks of the Slave States now constituting the Southern Confederacy, there is at present about $20,000,000 in specie; in the Banks of the Border States about $5,000,000 more. With the exception of the Banks of New Orleans, all the Banks of the Gulf States, of North Carolina, and of Virginia, and many of those of Tennessee and Kentucky, are insolvent, have suspended specie payments, and issue notes which are uncurrent except at an enormous discount. In the three cities of New York, Philadelphia, and Boston, the Banks hold about $51,000,000 in specie, and the sub-treasuries and mint about $15,000,000 more. Notes of Western Banks, secured by deposits of Slave State stocks are greatly depreciated. But the currency of Pennsylvania, New York, and New England is at par. It is now well known that the attempt to negotiate $5,000,000 of Confederate Bonds, ten days ago, was a failure, notwithstanding the terrorism exercised by the rebel press. When our Government asked for $8,000,000, $24,000,000 were offered, notwithstanding the opposition of leading newspapers. The Southern Savings Banks contain so little money that the amount is not worth recording in statistical reports: in New England, New York, and Pennsylvania, the working-classes have deposited some $130,000,000 in Savings Banks. The Government of the United States can borrow, without difficulty, and at a moderate rate of interest, a hundred millions a year at New York for two or three years, if so much be required to suppress the rebellion: the rebel Government can not borrow ten millions at home, or ten cents abroad. If, therefore, money be the sinew of war, as historians assure us, a very brief campaign must settle the question in favor of the North.

Mechanical appliances are as essential in war as men and money. In these the pre-eminence of the North is unquestionable. The Southern States are a purely agricultural region. Mechanical arts can not thrive side by side with slavery. There is a foundery at Richmond, Virginia, at which guns and shot for naval war are manufactured, and there are one or two other small shops in other Southern States where Northern mechanics make a few guns. But, with sparse exceptions, every pistol, rifle, musket, cannon, bayonet, sword, and bowie-knife, and every pound of powder, every box of caps, every cartridge, every shell, every fuse, and every bullet or ball that is used by the Southern troops was made at the North, and can not be replaced at the South. From the hour the United States occupy the Mississippi foundries and blacksmith shops, the ports, the supply of arms to the rebels will be stopped. Every cartridge burned after that time will be an irreclaimable loss. For there is not any state that foundries will be established at the South. Slaveholders dare not. The most magnificent pasture-lands in America are untilled because the Southern whites dare not trust their slaves with scythes to mow hay; much less could they suffer armories and factories to be established where negroes might obtain powder, ball, and edged tools. It is obvious, on the other hand, the prospect is that every adult male will, in the course of a few weeks, be supplied with the most perfect weapons of modern warfare, and that the highest efforts of mechanical art and modern engineering talent will be at the service of the Government.

Again, in wars between regions which have both a large coast surface, much depends on the respective tonnage of the belligerents. In this respect the power of the Government is to the power of the rebels as four to one. Where they have a thousand tons the Government has four hundred thousand. All the great steamships and clipper vessels, all the fast yachts, and the bulk of the ocean steamers and propellers are owned at the North. New York alone can fit out, in thirty days, a fleet sufficient to capture every Southern vessel and blockade every Southern port. Mr. Jefferson Davis committed a sad blunder in organizing a system of privateering. He may tempt half a dozen pirates to seize a few of our mercantile ships. But he has essentially rendered ultimate extirpation of Southern vessels from the face of the deep. In six months from this time there will not be a craft afloat that will dare to hoist within any port south of the capes of the Delaware.

What, then, can the South hope from this absurd rebellion?

THE LOUNGER.

NO TRUCE WITH TRAITORS.

THERE are idle reports in the papers from time to time that Mr. Pierce, of Concord, or some other notable person, has been invited by Mr. Jefferson Davis to act as mediator between the Government and the rebels. Then that Secretary Cameron has proposed an armistice of sixty days. Then that Lord Lyons is going to mediate. Why not say at once that Jeff Davis has proposed to the President of the United States that if he will cease to hold the rebels in subjection, he will let him off with perpetual exile from the country?

The Government of this country was slow, and properly slow, to credit its unquestionable authority to force of arms. It endured more than any Government among civilized men ever endured before. It looked on as the rebels built batteries to batter down the forts of the people of this country. It looked on patiently while the hospitals, navy-yards, and ships of the United States were basely mutated as cravens by its foes—it was almost suspected as incompetent by its friends—and laughed at, yet treated with contempt. But the first shot from Sumter loomed across the land: its echo was an appeal from the Government to the people whose majesty it represented, and the response was the marvelous unanimity of the vast population of the Free States.

They have taken up their arms—they have kissed wife and child—they have bent under the blessing of parents—and they are not men who will parley or deliberate parleying with traitors. Indeed peace; obedient to law; patient of injuries while still legal redress is open; they are the last men in the world to be trifled with when once aroused, they are the very last men in the world to lay them down until every jot and tittle of the dispute has been finally adjusted.

No truce with traitors is their watchword; but laying down of arms by rebels—total dispossession or expulsion of English-like evidences of future quarrel—is their demand. No truce with traitors until the last spark of this treason, which has united our politics for twenty years and more, is utterly trampled out. No truce with traitors until the American flag floats over every inch of our soil, the unquestioned guarantee to every citizen of every right secured by the Constitution.

Whoever offers to treat with armed rebels is himself no loyal man. This profound and bitter struggle was none of our seeking; but by all the precious blood that has flowed and shall yet flow, it shall not end until all the wrongs which peaceful and decent citizens of the Free States have patiently and silently endured for years are thoroughly redressed. Because they believed in their Government and meant to right all wrongs by its lawful operation, the sons of the men who fought the Revolution have been spit upon as sneaking Yankee peddlers and cowardly tinkers whose noses might be pulled at pleasure. Believing still in that Government they have endured these insults for its maintenance. At last the great north wind is rising that shall purge our air of these sickly Southern vapors. At last, at last, the majesty of that flag shall be vindicated, and all that its bright stars mean shall be read in the regeneration of the nation. Through that blackest cloud the wolf will on toward morning. No truce with traitors until the spirit of treason is annihilated.

WHAT IS THE ISSUE?

A RECENT number of Once a Week has a summary of foreign news, and it remarks: "There is a revolution in America, involving impracticable tariffs and a question of a dearth of cotton."

England has always a magnificent ignorance of America and American affairs, but this is peculiarly dense even for England. It is like the journals of a century ago speaking of the Revolution as a trouble about a tea-tax. But patience, patience; England will learn in time that this is a very vital and a very simple struggle. It is only a question of rebellion. There is an effort making to change the government of the United States into a military despotism. If it succeeds, it will be a revolution like one which should change the English system into one of Russian absolutism.

The people of the United States last November constitutionally expressed their will. A faction refused to submit to it. Because the political sympathy in other parts of the country would negatively if not positively support its resistance. And it formed what is called a Government and took up arms. That moment the passive sympathy it had elsewhere had deserted it, and the rebellion found itself face to face with a vast people armed to maintain the supremacy of the Government they had constitutionally elected. Many of them had been bitterly opposed to the policy of the actual administration of that Government, but in defending their rights those people only maintain their own majesty in the person of a constitutional President.

"Impracticable tariffs" have as much to do with the struggle as they have with Garibaldi's war in Italy. The rebellion is an unfortunate complication before the final aspect of the treason. It has flowered out now into a formidable rebellion. Aaron Burr dreamed of Jeff Davis nets. His future is success, a baluter, or exile. He is Wat Tyler, nothing more; and if Once a Week represents that class of the English people it can easily understand our struggle. The issue is Government or Anarchy, Mexico or America. And the result will be America.

GENERAL SCOTT.

IN our natural eagerness to have every thing done at once we have forgotten, during the last two or three weeks, that at the head of the military movement in the country there is one of the most successful and accomplished soldiers of the age. The weight of years seems to tear lightly upon him. His letter to Floyd last autumn, before Floyd was so entirely exposed as he soon afterward became, showed that General Scott's faculties were untouched by time, while his management of matters in Virginia before and during the inauguration was certainly masterly. Of course every body must feel that it is to Scott that we owe the safety of the capital to the present moment.

On the day of the great meeting in New York a panic of apprehension fell upon the public mind, and the most incredible stories were told. Then this General Scott was the calmest man in the country, because no one could know so well as he the exact extent of the danger to be seriously apprehended. The Secretary of War would have risked was a battle with Jeff Davis before he was fully prepared. Scott has fifty years of illustrious service behind him. As the old Shakespeare knew:

"The painful warrior, famoused for fight,
After a thousand victories, once foiled,
Is from the book of honor razed quite,
And all the rest forgot for which he toiled."

He knows also that the deadly hate which Jeff Davis bears him could have no severer satisfaction than his final overthrow in wrestling.

Had Scott, therefore, seriously supposed that there was danger of an overwhelming or even doubtful attack upon Washington before he felt himself strong enough to meet it, he would have advised the destruction of the city and retirement within the lines of the free States of the offices and archives of the Government.

When the story was told that the command of the rebel army had been offered to Scott, it was necessary to forget two things before giving it even an attentive ear. The first was that Scott's glory is dear to the life of the country. To betray it was to damn himself to inappeasable infamy, and no one knew it so well as he. The second was that the ringleader of the rebellion is Jeff Davis.

The result, thus far, has shown how wary the old soldier has been. He has had his eye and hand upon the two chief points, Washington and Cairo. Of course we all want to direct the campaign, but General Scott probably knows almost as much about it as we do.

MAY.

WHILE the land hums with gathering armies the splendor of the spring unfolds itself, and leaves and blossom and soft sunny airs woo the mind away from the defiled images of war.

This memorable spring has been very late, as if aghast at the terrible preparations that are every where making. The delicate hands that are wont at this season to be pushing aside moist dead leaves for yellow violets and the early anemone are cutting bandages and scraping lint, while the tears fall quietly in the sad wonder for whose wounds they are making ready.

Yet while the sweet-breathed spring confirms our faith in the tender and beneficent Providence that shelters and sees and heals, and heals by nearness and music, let us not forget that this vast and swift movement of the people proves to us the same kind Providence in another way; for it shows us how faithful we still are to great principles.

The leaders of the rebellion secretly believed that the people of the United States were so thoroughly demoralized that they would accept any yoke rather than risk their lives or the interests of trade in the defense of their own Government. Not let any man wonder at this monstrous infatuation. The system by which the rebellion has been bred, and under which it has been long secretly fostered, is one of utter demoralization. It is the most absolute and intolerant of despotisms. It makes one class of men brutally abject, and the others insanely insolent. It is incompatible with Christian civilization. There may be, there doubtless are, shining exceptions, but a system is to be measured by its general influence. The trouble in this country has always proceeded from one section of the country and from one cause. The evil question which has now culminated in open and desperate rebellion are those which grow and rankly flourish only in an atmosphere of injustice.

The issue is before—the immediate future is dim; but did any spring ever steal over the land so full of the best promise for the world—as this? The rose of liberty and unbounding treasure symbols of flowers that shall not fade, of fruit that shall be immortal, which our children's children shall eat in plenty and peace.

OUR OWN.

HARPER'S WEEKLY has dispatched an artist for the benefit of its friends with Mr. Russell, who is to write letters about the war for the London Times. The correspondent of the Times has come for some time receiving the hospitalities of that cheerful city. Now the condition of that kind of hospitality is, that you shall say that every thing you see and hear is the most charming thing in the world; that civilization is unknown except in that and those old regions; and if you have a humor, dimly suspect, not what the host thinks, but what you think, of what you observe around you, you are an ungrateful scoundrel—a betrayer of hospitality, a viper warmed in the bosom, and then stinging it.

If Mr. W. H. Russell should happen to write for the London Times that he does not think every thing he sees is the best possible thing, he will be hustled out of the hospitable region. If he were an American he would be lucky to get off so easily—if he remembers that necessarily every thing unpleasant will be kept out of his sight—and if his natural prejudices for a strong monarchical government leave his judgment unwarped, he will be of great service to the cause of civilization and human rights in this crisis by simply describing what he sees and saying what he thinks.

The Mr. Gregory who moves in the British Parliament to recognize the rebellion, and the rebellious citizens of this country, is a young Oxford man who believes fully in the divine rights of kings and the aristocracy, and who believes that the aristocratic element in our society strongest in the Slave States, sympathizes most with them; believing that successful rebellion would secure a monarchical government to the country. He is quite right. It would do so unhesitatingly. For the rebellion is only a huge effort to overthrow a free popular government and erect a military despotism upon its ruins.

Mr. Russell may or may not see this. He may or may not say it. But if he writes to the London Times that the original crack in our political edifice is about having organized and the building made permanently rebellion and treason proof, he will be writing history.

A WORD OF RETROSPECTION.

EVENTS pass so rapidly in these eager days that it is hard to recur to the facts of a fortnight ago. But as we approach the end of the month we ought to pause a moment and reflect a little upon our judgments as we go.

In instance, there was the letter of the Secretary of State to the Governor of Maryland. It produced an outburst of fury among the marshaling hosts of the free States. There was to be no parley with a traitor? was the instinctive question of Tom, Dick, and Harry. Yes, he did; and so would you in the same circumstances. The Secretary's hand in the matter thrust you would parley, and temporize, and delay all you could.

What were the circumstances? The Capital of the United States and the persons of the Cabinet were felt every where to be in imminent peril. Virginia on one side and Maryland on the other were in a blaze of rebellion. Communication with the loyal States was cut off. The Government was forty miles and more within the lines of the rebellion. It had summoned the loyal States, but it could not know that they were coming. It only knew that Virginia and Maryland swarmed with traitors. A new line of railroads were destroyed and bridges burned, and the chronically riotous city of Baltimore was mad with a rebellious riot. It knew and expected that at any moment a horde of rebels might descend upon it, and that their coming would not be unwelcome to many, if not a majority, of the population of the city.

It was under these circumstances that the Secretary wrote to the Governor, and spoke him fair. The position was a very humble one. It was not exactly a moment for bragging or defying. If he could have known what we know, he might not have sylvilated so civil a reply. If he had had an army of thirty thousand men about him, do you suppose he would have been so gingerly gracious? It was not a time for reply. It was not the kind of answer that a commodore makes upon the deck of his ship, or a commander standing by his flag in extremity. Yet it does not deserve the wholesale censure and contempt which have been cast upon it. Remember that the Secretary until lately was inclined to believe and say with Dalyer's Richie Ben,

"Put away your sword, you
States can't succeed without it."

He has now learned that these States, at least, can not be saved without it.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

ROYCE CORYDON.—Asched-boy having good-naturedly helped another boy to polish cigarbing knives, was decply questioned by the Dominie, "Why did you work his beam?"—"Do 'cause he's a poor work," replied the youngster.

In the Paris Court of Correctional Police, recently, a lady, by no means young, advanced coquettishly to the witness-stand to give his testimony. "What is your name?"—"Virginie Lestatat."—"What is your age?"—"Twenty-five."—Exclamation of incredulity from the audience. The lady's evidence being taken, she regained her place, still coquettishly bridling, and the next witness was introduced. He was a full-grown young man. "Your name?" said the judge.—"Isidore Lestatat."—"Your age?"—"Twenty-seven years."—"Are you a relative of the last witness?"—"I am her son."—"Ah, well!" murmured the magistrate, "your mother must have married very young."

DR. PARR AY WISDOM.—Dr. Parr had a high opinion of his own skill as a wheel, and could not even patiently listen to the want of it in his partner. Being engaged with a party in which he was unusually melancholy, and the next witness by a lady how the fortune of the cause turned, when he replied, "Pretty well, Madam, considering that I have three observations."

"Father," said a lady of the new school to her indulgent spouse, as he resumed his pipe after supper one evening, "you must buy our dear Georgiana an English grammar and spelling-book to help her through her French, Latin, and Greek; music, drawing, and dancing, and now she must commence her English studies."

AN ANCIENT OF GENTLE BLOOD.—At a time when Curran was called before his colleagues for wearing a dirty shirt, "I pleaded," said Curran, "inability to wear a clean one, and then the history of poor Lord Avonmore, who was at that time the plain, untitled, struggling Barry Yelverton. 'I will, my mother,' said Barry, 'I have eleven shirts.'—Eleven, Barry? why eleven?'—Because, mother, I am of opinion that a gentleman, to be comfortable, ought to have eleven shirts.' Poor Barry had but one, and I made the precedent my justification."

"In what company is your life insured, Sir?" asked a sprightly young miss.

"In the Hope," said he.

"I prefer the Alliance," said she, blushing.

"Then we'll make a joint-stock operation, if you choose," said the sighing lover at her feet.

Pleasant enough was the magnanimity of the person who, being reproached with not having avenged himself for a certain thing, said, "Sir, I never meddle with what passes behind my back."

THE COCK AND THE OWL.—(A FABLE FOR THE TIMES.)

AN Irishman living in Ohio once challenged a Western man to fight roosters. The birds were brought out, and Pat's was pretty soon knocked off his pins. The Irishman concluded that his rooster's unsteadiness on his legs arose from the narrowness of his feet; and purchasing a duck, with webbed feet, challenged the Western man again. Again the Buckeye fowl won the day, and with ease. Pat then said he had a bird at home that would beat the Western gamecock, and offered to double the bet, provided the birds were not allowed to see each other till the fight began. The money put up, on the day fixed our friend Dockeye produced his rooster in splendid fighting condition. Pat brought out an old lanky chicken-cock, who was of course blind. by the light, and stood winking and stupidly twisting his head. The game-cock instantly flew at him, and drew blood. The owl winked, and looked stupider than ever. Again the rooster dashed in, and made a furrow in the owl's cheek. Again the owl winked, and twisted his neck round, appearently trying to understand the matter. A third time the game-cock flew at him, and slashed vigorously with beak and spurs. Just at that moment the owl happening to get the corner of one eye open enough to see his little antagonist, he grinned, stretched forth one claw, caught the game-cock by the neck, and ate him up on the spot.

MICHAEL SCOTT-BOOKS.—As musical small-beers of brilliant play are that are copyright, the singer's-face has been come to to prohibit them unless the author's right are paid.

In most quarrels, there is a fault on both sides. Both flint and steel are necessary to the production of a spark; either of them may hammer in vain for ever, and he die will follow.

A friend, in conversation with Rogers, said, "I never put my razor to my throat, but I feel as if I should cut the vessel of the blade."—"No doubt of it," said the poet; "other men blade that would not be out of temper, if plunged into hot water."

"Here, John," said a gentleman to his servant on horseback in the rear, "come forward, and just take hold of my horse while I dismount, and after I am dismounted, John, you dismount too. Then, John, unsaddle the saddle of your horse and put it down; then also unsirth the saddle of my horse and put it down. Afterward, John, take up the saddle of your horse, and put out girth in one hand, bent, John, take up the saddle of my horse, and put out girth in our horse. Then, John, I will seat myself in your saddle, and you will remount your own."—"Then me, master," said the astonished servant, "why couldn't you have simply said, Let's change saddles?"

Love's sweetest meanings are unspoken. The full heart knows no rhetoric of words; it asserts to the patronage of sighs and glances.

Joseph the Second of Austria was fond of traveling incognito, and one day he reached a little inn on his route before his retinue came up. Entering a retiring room he began shaving himself. Two thousand hussars were anxious to know what post his guest held about the person of the Emperor. "I shave him sometimes," was his majesty's reply.

The best government is that which teaches a man to govern himself; the next best, that which teaches him how to govern his family; the third, that which teaches him to govern a commonwealth.

When Voltaire was on his death-bed, many visitors called and of whom were denied entrance to his chamber. Among them was the Abbé Chaupee, who came to hear the last confessions of the Church. When his name was announced by the servant, Voltaire said, "I came into the world backward, and I shall leave it without a chapeau."

A Spanish proverb says: "Jew-rain themselves at their Passover, Moors at their marriages, and Christians in their quarrels."

One day, at a farm-house, a wag saw an old gobler trying to eat the strings of some nightcaps that lay on the ground to bleach. "Why, old boy," said he, "is what I call introducing cotton into Turkey."

A gentleman was threatening to beat a dog who barked into a kennel. "Why," exclaimed a by-lander, "would you beat that poor dumb animal for speaking out?"

"I say, Bill," asked an insulting fellow, "why is your hat like a gridiron?"—"Give it up."—"Why, because there's a great deal of brass in it."

Nothing is so fragile as thought in its infancy—an interruption breaks it; nothing is so powerful, even to the overturning of mighty empires, as thought matured.

A FAMILIAR HYMN.—On being shown a portrait of himself very unlike the original, Hood said that the artist had perpetrated a false-Hood.

MR. A——, upon entering a certain back-shop, inquired of a young lady in attendance if she was "Goldsmith's Grocer" to sell. "No, but we have some mighty good Grocer," was the reply.

"Why did you retreat in the face of the enemy?" "You see, sir, I have got a retreating nose, and of course I have to follow it."

It is a law among the Japanese that he who lends them cash in this world will receive in the next world the capital and ten per cent. at simple interest.

When the beautiful Duchess of Devonshire, and her sister, Lady Duncannon, canvassed the election of Westminster in behalf of Fox, in 1784, it was wittily said, "Never did two such lovely portraits appear on canvass."

Of what nation are all stocking-menders?—Darn-nation.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE SAFETY OF WASHINGTON.

WASHINGTON is safe. Over 12,000 troops have arrived at Annapolis from the North, including the New York 6th, 7th, 12th, 13th, 25th, 28th, and 71st Regiments; and it is stated that no more volunteers will be ordered unless they are fully equipped for service. It would appear that the preparations to receive the troops at Annapolis were very much needed, and that it would have been very unfit, they would have suffered much. As it was, a thousand of them had to sleep in the open air, and without food, although there is abundance of provisions the commissariat was so badly managed that one of the troops were without food for twenty-four hours.

THE VIRGINIA ORDINANCE OF SECESSION.

This ordinance is in the following form, and reads as follows:

THE SECESSION ORDINANCE.

AN ORDINANCE TO REPEAL THE RATIFICATION OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA BY THE STATE OF VIRGINIA, AND TO RESUME ALL THE RIGHTS AND POWERS GRANTED UNDER SAID CONSTITUTION.

The people of Virginia, in their ratification of the Constitution of the United States of America, adopted by them in Convention on the twenty-fifth day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight, having declared that the powers granted under the said Constitution were derived from the people of the United States, and might be resumed whensoever the same should be perverted to their injury and oppression; and the Federal Government having perverted said powers, not only to the injury of the people of Virginia, but to the oppression of the South Slave-holding States:

Now, therefore, we, the people of Virginia, do declare and ordain that the ordinance adopted by the people of this State in Convention, on the twenty-fifth day of June, eighty-eight, whereby the Constitution of the United States of America was ratified, and all acts of the General Assembly of this State, ratifying or adopting amendments to said Constitution, are hereby repealed and abrogated; that the Union between the State of Virginia and the other States under the Constitution aforesaid, is hereby dissolved, and that the State of Virginia is in the full possession and exercise of all the rights of sovereignty which belong and appertain to a free and independent State. And they do further declare that the said Constitution of the United States of America is no longer binding on any of the citizens of this State.

This ordinance shall take effect and be an act of this day when ratified by a majority of the votes of the people of this State, cast at a poll to be taken thereon on the fourth Thursday in May, at which election the citizens of this State are entitled to vote.

Done in Convention, in the city of Richmond, on the 17th day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-one, and in the eighty-fifth year of the Commonwealth of Virginia.

JOHN L. EUBANK, Secretary of Convention.

VIRGINIA ENTERS THE CONFEDERATE STATES EMPIRE.

The following ordinance has also appeared:

AN ORDINANCE FOR THE ADOPTION OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE PROVISIONAL GOVERNMENT OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES OF AMERICA.

We, the delegates of the people of Virginia, in Convention assembled, solemnly impressed by the perils which environ the Commonwealth, and appealing to the searcher of hearts for the rectitude of our intentions in assuming the grave responsibility of the act we are about to perform, adopt and ratify the Constitution of the Provisional Government of the Confederated States of America, ordained and established at Montgomery, Alabama, on the eighth day of February, eighteen hundred and sixty-one; provided that this ordinance shall cease to have any force or operation or effect, if the people of this Commonwealth, upon the terms and conditions of the amendments to the accession passed by this Convention, on the 17th day of April, eighteen hundred and sixty-one, shall reject the same.

A true copy.

JNO. L. EUBANK, Secretary.

A treaty, offensive and defensive, between the Confederate States and Virginia also has been published.

ANOTHER PROCLAMATION FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The following proclamation followed the secession of Virginia:

By the President of the United States of America.

WHEREAS, the laws of the United States, by proclamation of the 15th instant, a blockade of the ports of the States of South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi, and Texas was ordered to be established; and whereas, since that duly authenticated act, the State of Virginia has been seized, the collection of the revenue obstructed, and duly commissioned officers of the United States, while engaged in executing the orders of their superiors, have been arrested, and held in custody as prisoners, or have been impeled in the discharge of their official duties, without due legal process, by persons claiming to act under authority of the States of Virginia and North Carolina. An efficient blockade of the ports of these States will therefore also be established.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand, and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the City of Washington, this fifth day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-one, and of the independence of the United States the eighty-fifth.

By the President:

WILLIAM H. SEWARD, Secretary of State.

MORE MEN CALLED OUT.

That the Government is resolved to carry on the war vigorously and to the bitter end, is evident from the fact that it has just decided to receive, besides the 75,000 volunteers called for, 42,034 men to serve for three years, 25,000 for five years, and 12,000 out of the regular army to serve for five years, besides enrolling 18,000 sailors in the navy. An additional call has been made upon Pennsylvania for twenty regiments of infantry and one of cavalry, all of which have already been tendered to the Government for the service of the United States aforesaid.

MARYLAND COMING TO HER SENSES.

Dispatches state that the Maryland Legislature, now in session at Frederick, has resolved not to be a party to secession of the people on the question of secession, by a vote of 53 nays to 13 nays, and also resolved that the troops of the United States Government shall be permitted to pass through the State. A great change in public sentiment has reported to have occurred in Baltimore, which has been manifested by an extensive display of the Stars and Stripes in all quarters of the city.

THE MARCH ON WASHINGTON.

A gentleman, who arrived in this city at Philadelphia, from Wilmington, North Carolina, having left there on Friday, and who says at Richmond and Petersburg, and that the people of North Carolina were all up in arms, and were preparing to come North with several thousand troops for the purpose, as Governor Ellis informed him, of making an attack upon Washington. The day that he left Governor Ellis received a dispatch which he said just received from Montgomery, stating that some five thousand troops were on the way to join those in North Carolina, which were about to leave for Richmond, and that it was the purpose of the Confederate authorities to make an attack without a moment's delay: that if they were to attack it must be done before the Northern troops could be concentrated a large force at Washington.

FEDERAL PROPERTY SEIZED IN NORTH CAROLINA.

General Ramsom, who has recently left North Carolina, reports that every Federal post in that State has been seized by the State authorities, and the Confederate flag of arms were captured, including twenty-eight thousand of the most approved pattern.

THE FIRST HERO OF THE WAR.

The Tycoon says: "General Butler, by the efficient manner in which he conducted the confederate affairs at Annapolis, and between that point and Washington, in fact established an enviable reputation for efficiency. The railroad is now fully in possession of the Government command, and the rails will not be allowed to be removed with impunity. The Superintendent of the road was on Friday arrested for attempting it."

A STEAMER CUT OUT BY THE BOSTON BOYS.

On Saturday night the Tenth Company of the Eighth Massachusetts regiment, in a steam-tug, cut out the steamship ship Alleghany in Baltimore harbor, and placed her under the guns of Fort M'Henry.

A NEW ARSENAL IN LIEU OF HARPER'S FERRY.

The Government has decided to establish an arsenal at or near Rock Island City, Illinois, in place of the Harper's Ferry Arsenal just destroyed. Rock Island City stands on the banks of the Mississippi, 182 miles west of Chicago. It is situated at the foot of the Upper Rapids, which cover the river fifteen miles, and in the centre of water obstruct the passage of vessels drawing a heavy draft.

GENERAL CASS ON THE WAR.

At a meeting in Detroit on the other day, General Cass presided, and said: "You need me not to tell you what are the dangers of your country or what are your duties to meet and avert them. There is but one path for every true man to travel, and that is broad and plain. I will conduct us, not, indeed, without trials and sufferings, to peace and to the restoration of the Union. He who is not for his country is against her. There is no neutral position to be occupied. It is the duty of all zealously to support the government in its efforts to save this unhappy civil war to a speedy and satisfactory conclusion, by the restoration to the integrity of that great charter of freedom bequeathed to us by Washington and his compatriots."

PERSONAL.

General Harney, it is reported, has been released from arrest by order of General Lee, the commander of the Virginia forces.

A proposition to act as arbitrators in the quarrel between the North and South has been made by Mr. C. J. Ingersoll, Mr. Reverdy Johnson, Mr. Crittenden, Mr. Bocanan, Pierce, Tillinghast, and Judge Woodward.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

BRITISH SYMPATHIZERS WITH REBELLION.

IN the House of Commons, on the 16th ult., Mr. Gregory gave notice that he should defer the motion relative to a speedy recognition of the Southern Confederacy for two weeks.

ITALY.

GARIBALDI IN PARLIAMENT.

Garibaldi had taken his seat in the Italian Parliament, and business was temporarily suspended by applause.

The action of the Ministry in disbanding the Southern volunteers and in making a basis for its reorganization was debated. Garibaldi made a speech so violent that it created tumult. He said he would defer his observations to the Ministry, against which Count Cavour protested. The President of the Chamber put on his hat, and sitting was suspended for a brief interval. Garibaldi, in resuming, spoke with more moderation. He defended his comrades in arms, and said the formation of three divisions of volunteers, as decreed, was not sufficient for the national armament.

General Sirtie made a conciliatory speech.

Count Cavour said he accepted the mode of conciliation.

Garibaldi explained the several facts alluded to by Count Cavour, and removed the belief that Garibaldi favored Revolt. He designated the French army as the enemy of Italy, from the Alps to the Adriatic.

On the 19th Garibaldi was again received in the Chamber with loud cheers.

A discussion took place on the organization of the Militia.

RUSSIA.

MORE DISTURBANCES.

The disturbances in Russia are spreading fast. In Kiev, the capital of the district once bearing the distinctive name of the Ukraine, a fanatical crowd, now celebrated on the 14th ult. for the Warsaw victims, went to it in a most serious disturbance and slaughter. A bloody conflict is stated to have taken place between the inhabitants and the Russian troops. A telegraphic dispatch states that the number of persons killed and wounded amounted to one hundred and fifty.

JAVA.

DESTRUCTIVE FLOOD.

Particulars are published of a destructive flood which occurred on the 23d and 24th of January in the Bay of Batavia. Upward of 2000 people are reported as drowned and an immense amount of property destroyed.

OUR WAR ILLUSTRATIONS.

We continue in this number the series of illustrations of the pending War which have formed so conspicuous a feature in Harper's Weekly for some months back.

Mr. STONE has sent us some sketches of the Harper's Ferry affair. On page 293 we give a picture of the Garrisons on the Potomac for the protection of the Arsenal; and on the following page the APPROACH, and the BURNING of the Works and Arsenal. The following account is the NARRATIVE OF AN EYE-WITNESS.

Harper's Ferry, which, eighteen months ago, was the centre of great interest, and the scene of one of the most furious events of more immediate political importance, but fortunately not of so tragic a character as those of October, 1859.

On Thursday, the 18th instant, private orders were brought from the authorities at Richmond commanding the seizure of the arms and public works at Harper's Ferry. Immediately on receiving the news Jefferson Davis, Esquire, assembled at Charleston, the county seat, and mustered the county militia, and marched at Hillsboro, a small village situated midway between the Court House and Harper's Ferry, and about four miles from either point. Some three thousand men had been notified of the movement, but only a part of the rendezvous of the summons, and doubt as to its authenticity, only two hundred and fifty were on the ground by eight o'clock in the evening. As prompt action was deemed more important than numbers, Colonel Allen, who commanded the Jefferson troops, gave the order to march as soon as it was quite dark. The infantry moved down the road to Harper's Ferry, followed by one piece of artillery and a squad of the Fayette Cavalry, led by Major Ambler, mounted upon heavy horses.

The troops marched in silence, and about a mile from the starting-point the column was challenged by sentries posted in the road. They halted, loaded their rifle-barrelings, and advanced with fixed bayonets until they reached the house of the toll-keeper at the head of the outskirts of the village of Bolivar. Here the advance was again challenged, and the column halted. As these sentries were known to be employees of the armories, and as it was thought best to avoid the firing of musketry during the day that the whole body of workmen had united with the Government troops, thus giving the best and speediest effective men, with full preparation and choice of position, it was thought proper to send a flag into the town to ascertain how matters stood. An influential gentleman accompanying the troops offered his services to execute this delicate duty, and to dissuade the citizens, if possible, from taking part in the contest. From observations it was ascertained that this precaution was unnecessary, as the mass of the inhabitants were loyal to and where they lived, and such as might have caused difficulty by their movements were silenced by the reports of the imposing force which was supposed to be at hand.

While the Virginia officers were in consultation there was seen in the direction of the armory a flash, accompanied by a report like the discharge of a cannon, followed by a number of other flashes in quick succession, and then the sky and surrounding mountains were lighted with the steady glare of ascending flames. Captain Ashby, with his squad, immediately rode down into the town, and in a short time returned with the report that the troops had fired the public buildings and retreated across the Potomac bridge, taking the mountain road toward Carlisle Barracks in Pennsylvania.

VIEW OF FORT M'HENRY, BALTIMORE.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY W. H. WEAVER.

[SEE PAGE 293.]

On our way down we met a long line of men, women, and boys, carrying loads of muskets, bayonets, and other military equipments. The streets at the confluence of the two rivers were brilliantly illuminated by the flames from the Old Arsenal, which burned like a furnace. The incessant explosions around these buildings was covered with spintered glass, which had been thrown out by the explosion of the powder train. A few iron-boxes, open and empty, lay near the entrance; but nearly all the muskets in this building, fifteen thousand as stated, were destroyed.

Of the Armory buildings on Potomac Street one large work-shop was in a light blaze, and two others on fire. Alarmed by the first explosions, the citizens hesitated to approach the work-shops, and warned the Virginia troops not to do so, supposing them to be mined; but presently becoming reassured in that subject, they went to work with the engines, extinguished some of the fires, and prevented its extension to the town and railroad bridges.

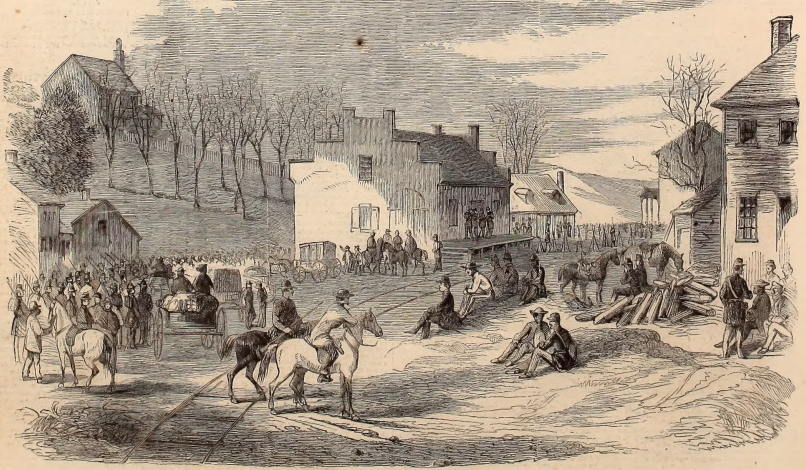
The total destruction of property, therefore, is confined to the Old Arsenal, with its contents; the carpenter's-shop on Potomac Street totally destroyed; with slight injury to the stock-turner's shop. All the remaining shops on Potomac Street, with their fine machinery, and all the establishment on the Shenandoah, known as Hall's Rifle-works, are uninjured and complete. There were saved, also—complete and nearly completed—about two thousand first-class Minie muskets in the shops and packing-rooms, together with a quantity of material, iron and wood, in progress of manufacture. I have been informed that a room full of packed arms, numbering five or six thousand, has been discovered since by the troops in occupation.

There were very few persons about the streets, and comparatively little excitement manifested during the conflagration. Those seen were chiefly engaged in extinguishing the fire and removing arms and provisions from the adjacent buildings. Some savage temper was manifested against the Government which gave, and the officer who executed the order for destruction; and some of the citizens talked of organizing parties to pursue the retreating troops, but the more considerate advised against it. I do not believe that any pursuit was undertaken, for soon after Lieutenant Jones left several deserters from his party returned to the town and reported no firing; and it is to be hoped that he was mistaken in supposing his missing men to be killed.

Indeed, up to the date of the burning the best feeling existed between the soldiers and the people; and even after that event, all better-thinking people exculpated the instruments of the devastation, and threw the responsibility where it properly belonged.

The estimate of the force advancing upon the town was based upon information given us to the numbers expected, and the report of videttes, who, in the darkness, could not tell the weight of the column, or possibly thought it only the avant guard of a larger force. The attacking party was only two hundred and fifty strong. The conduct of the Virginians throughout was quiet and determined, there being no exhibition of vindictiveness, triumph, or excitement of any kind.

THE BURNING OF THE BRIDGE AT CANTON, MARYLAND, BY THE MOB.—[SEE PAGE 293.]



THE RENDEZVOUS OF THE VIRGINIANS AT HALLTOWN, VIRGINIA, 5 P.M. ON APRIL 18, 1861, TO MARCH ON HARPER'S FERRY.

[SKETCHED BY D. H. STROTHER.]

THE BURNING OF THE UNITED STATES ARSENAL AT HARPER'S FERRY, 10 P.M. APRIL 18, 1861.—[SKETCHED BY D. H. STROTHER.]

The movement was regarded as a military necessity, and as such executed. To many of us who looked on, the scenes of that night were inexpressibly sad and solemn. The clouds of fire rolled up magnificently from the depths of the romantic gorge, illuminating the confluent rivers and the encircling cliffs for miles around, each rock and pinnacle associated with the name of some one of our great historic founders. In the martial column revealed by the blaze there stood arrayed, with deadly ball and bayonet, the freshborn pride of a hundred hitherto peaceful and happy families. In the town below, between them and their enemy, were neighbors, friends, and fellow-citizens—the enemies themselves our late patented defenders and countrymen.

Brethren, what has forced this fatal necessity upon us? "As the smoke and vapor of a furnace goeth before the fire, so revilings before blood."

D. H. S.

We also publish a view of FORT M'HENRY, at Baltimore. This fort is held by the United States, and in the event of a fight at Baltimore would probably shell the city. It stands at the extremity of a tongue of land near the geographical centre of the city. In the war of 1812 it was bombarded by the British fleet, without success. It was of this bombardment that the famous song "The Star-Spangled Banner" was written.

The small cut on the opposite page exhibits the burning of the bridge at Canton by the Baltimore mob. Both of these pictures are from photographs by W. H. Western, of Baltimore.

THE MARCH OF THE VIRGINIANS ON HARPER'S FERRY, 9.30 P.M. APRIL 18, 1861.—[SKETCHED BY D. H. STROTHER.]

REFERENCES.—1. Catholic College.—2. City Hotel.—3. Battery.—4. Capitol.—5. Midshipmen's Quarters.—6. Constitution.—7. Recitation Hall.—8. Chapel.—9. Observatory.—10. Officers' Quarters.—11. St. John's (Episcopal) College.—12. Hospital.—13. Monument—the same that was in front of the Capitol at Washington.—14. Naval Monument.

GENERAL VIEW OF ANNAPOLIS, WITH THE "CONSTITUTION" IN THE FOREGROUND.

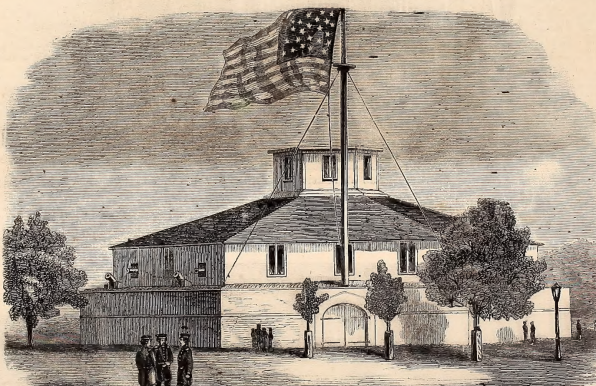
OUR WAR PICTURES.

We publish herewith a series of views of Annapolis, from sketches made by one of our artists who is now traveling for us through the South. Our illustrations consist of, 1. A GENERAL VIEW OF ANNAPOLIS; 2. THE PRACTICE BATTERY; 3. TARGET PRACTICE, BREECHES; 4. THE NAVAL MONUMENT IN THE SCHOOL GROUNDS; and, 5. THE MIDDIES LEARNING THE RIGGING OF BOARD THE "CONSTITUTION." Every body knows that Annapolis is the United States Navy what West Point is to the Army—the great training school from whence our gallant navy officers are sent forth to fight the battles of their country.

Our own Seventh, and the other Volunteers sent forward from Boston, New York, and elsewhere for the defence of Washington, all landed at Annapolis last week. A letter from a member of the Seventh thus describes the landing:

"At 4 o'clock P. M. of Monday, April 22, the Seventh Regiment first landed in a hostile State on a military errand, and was disembarked at the dock of the Naval School at Annapolis. The men marched ashore by companies in good order, and formed in regimental lines on the beautiful parade-ground in the rear of the Naval-school buildings.

"These grounds and views compose one of the most lovely spots that ever was beheld by mortal eye. The Severn River and the broad bay present a constant panorama of ships and boats; the distant shores are green and beautiful, with groves of forest trees; the buildings of the yard are elaborately and imposing in appearance; from the orchards and gardens on every side floated the delicious fragrance of peach and plum blossoms, there being now thousands of these trees in full bloom. At irregular intervals about the grounds were barrels, lying as the mowers had left them a few hours before; and the entire sides of new-mown hay added still another charm to the scene. Tired soldiers, just from the cramped discomforts and foul smells of a three-days' sea-voyage in an overcrowded boat, could never have had a more welcome sight or one of greater beauty. After a short inspection, the men were given leave to rest, when they stretched themselves on the bright green grass, or tumbled in the new hay, in a perfect glory of deliberate luxury. Under some trees, where every gentle breeze covered them with the pink fragrant peach blossoms, the lowliest were down up, headed to the parade with cannister shot. To have fired those cannon the gunner must have stood up to his knees in new-mown clover, and have brushed away the flowers from the place before he could apply the match."



THE PRACTICE BATTERY AT ANNAPOLIS.

On pages 296 and 297 we publish two fine illustrations of the burning of the NORFOLK NAVY-YARD BY THE UNITED STATES TROOPS, under orders from Washington. The following description of the event has been published: "On Saturday evening, at nine o'clock, the Pawnee arrived from Washington with 400 volunteers and 160 marines, besides her own crew, and at once the officers and crew of the Pawnee and Cumberland went to the Navy-yard and spiked and disabled the guns, and threw the shot and ammunition into the river. At ten o'clock the marines, who had been quartered on the barracks, fired them, and came on board the Pawnee. This movement was premature, for it was the intention to fire all the buildings simultaneously. A party of officers, meantime, were going through the different buildings and ships, distributing waste and turpentine, and laying a train so as to blow up the Dry Dock. They were engaged in this work until two o'clock, when the train was fired. At three o'clock the Yankee, to the Captain of which, Charles Germain, much credit is due, came along and took the Cumberland in tow, the Pawnee taking the lead. All the vessels had left quarters, the guns were manned, and every thing was in readiness to carry out the threat of Commander McAuley, that if a gun was fired from either shore he would level both Portsmouth and Norfolk. At this time the scene was indescribably magnificent, all the buildings being in a blaze, and explosions here and there occurring in the embers in all directions.

TARGET PRACTICE FROM THE NAVAL BATTERY.

"The Yankee left the yard with the Cumberland in tow about three o'clock. The fleet proceeded down the river until nine o'clock, when it came to anchor within a mile of the point where wrecks were known to have been sunk for the purpose of obstructing the navigation. Boats were sent out to take soundings in order to ascertain whether some other passage than the regular channel could not be found. All efforts proved unsuccessful, so the fleet raised anchor and forced their way directly through the wrecks. The Cumberland caught one of the sunken vessels and carried it along with her, and apprehensions were at first entertained that she might be carried on to Sewell's Point, where it was supposed that the rebels had erected batteries. Meantime the Keystone State came up from Washington with marines, and by her help and that of the Yankee, the Cumberland was towed into deep water and the wreck was disentangled. She then went up under protection of the guns of Fort Monroe and came to anchor. While the vessels lay there, four men, who had been employed in the Navy-yard, succeeded in making their way down the river, and reported that they left every thing in flames, and the smoke and flames could easily be seen from the Cape Henry. Two rebels, too, they reported were fearful of attempting to arrest the flames, because they apprehended that a train was laid to blow up the building."

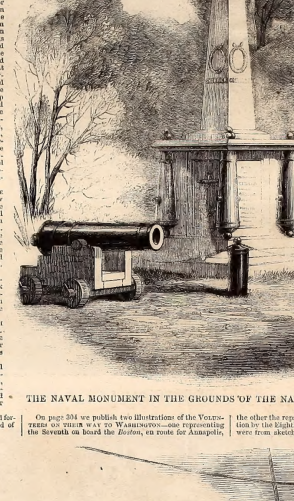
On page 298 we illustrate the DEPARTURE OF THE THIRTEENTH AND SIXTY-NINTH REGIMENTS from New-York. They left on Tuesday 23d, the 13th in the Marion, the 69th in the James Adger, and arrived safely at Annapolis. The 13th consists of Brooklyn boys, and is one of the finest Regiments in the service. The 69th is Colonel Corcoran's Irish Regiment, the same which refused to turn out in honor of the Prince of Wales. It is now very earnest in supporting the Government, and might have been four thousand strong if uniforms and arms could have been supplied. Both of these Regiments will do good service.

On page 292 we illustrate the NEW TEMPORARY BARRACKS WHICH HAVE JUST BEEN ERECTED ON THE PARK AT NEW YORK, AND THE ENCAMPMENT ON THE BATTERY. In the shade on the Park six thousand men can be fed. The Battery Encampment contains at the present time some two thousand five hundred men.

On page 299 we illustrate the EARTH-WORKS WHICH WERE THROWN UP TO PROTECT THE ARSENAL AT ST. LOUIS BEFORE THE ARMS WERE REMOVED FROM THENCE BY THE TEXAS TROOPS. The United States officer who sent us the sketches likewise kindly supplied us with the following account:

"The United States Arsenal at St. Louis is an arsenal of repair and shot-drill, here quantities of arms being annually sent there from the Government depots, and 1 or 2 in the several States to be placed in a proper condition for service. Here, also, is manufactured and put up out of the fixed ammunition used in our service.

"The Arsenal is defended by about four hundred and forty troops, Artillery and Infantry, under the command of Captain W. Lyon, 2d Infantry."



THE NAVAL MONUMENT IN THE GROUNDS OF THE NAVAL SCHOOL AT ANNAPOLIS.

On page 304 we publish two illustrations of the VOLUNTEERS ON THEIR WAY TO WASHINGTON—one representing the Seventh on board the Boston, en route for Annapolis, the other the repairing of a bridge on the road to the Junction by the Eighth Massachusetts Regiment. Both of these were from sketches of our special artist with the Seventh Regiment. The three boys carrying a United States flag who are shown in the latter picture were Maryland boys, who met the troops on their way and begged to be allowed to enlist. The Herald correspondent tells the following stories of the labors of the Eighth Massachusetts men on the way:

"At four A. M. on Wednesday, Company 9, Captain Clark, and Company 6, Captain Nevins, forming the advance-guard, marched to the railway station, where they found an engine and two or three passenger cars, ready to start. This was the work of the Massachusetts regiments, which General Butler, who had found the engine dismantled. 'Who knows how to make an engine?' asked General Butler. Six practical mechanics stepped from the ranks, but one claimed the privilege of making repairs. 'I made that engine,' said he, and pleaded out his private rank.

"The Sixth and Second companies were unable to proceed in the cars more than three or four miles, because the rails were torn up. Then commenced the march. Scouts and skirmishers were thrown out in front and on each side. Rails torn from switches at Annapolis too short for use, and having to be placed out with joists of timber, replaced the missing rails, excepting where they could be found in the bushes beside the track. The rails and timber we resorted on baggage cars, which were pushed by the men. On the front car was a howitzer, with guards and gunners. All day they marched, mending the track wherever it needed mending.

"About sunset they reached the remains of the bridge near Millersville, twenty feet high and sixteen feet long, which had been burned, and the engineer corps of the Regiment, assisted by the Massachusetts men, who had done good service throughout the day in repairing the track, rebuilt the bridge and relaid the rails, so that after a heavy shower, which wet the men through, they were enabled to proceed. After nightfall the march continued, through swamps and mist, out of which chill blasts came. Company G had been ordered to roll up its over-coats, and had only blankets. Occasional rails had to be replaced. The baggage cars were still to be pushed on by men who had no sleep for twenty-four hours, and who had experienced unusual heat and unusual chilliness by turns for twenty hours."

FORT SUMTER.

AN IMPROMPTU, BY A VIRGINIAN LADY STILL IN THE UNION.

LOUD be the note of triumph rung,
Forgot the battles Homer sung;
Let all men under heaven see
What Southern chivalry hath done:
The day that saw Fort Sumter won,
Seven thousand conquered seventy!

Let heroes, from Thermopylæ
To Waterloo, forgotten be;
Our faith in them is shaking.
Their deeds were rather grand, I know;
But not, though we have praised them so,
At all like Sumter's taking.

Thank God! if 'twas a bloodless fight,
Even brother foes in this unite;
May only such our heaven see!
But what can take from Southern men
The fame of that great battle, when
Seven thousand conquered seventy!

BALTIMORE, April 18, 1861.

MIDDIES LEARNING THE ROPES AT THE NAVAL SCHOOL ON BOARD THE "CONSTITUTION," ANNAPOLIS.

DESTRUCTION OF THE UNITED STATES NAVY-YARD AT NORFOLK, V

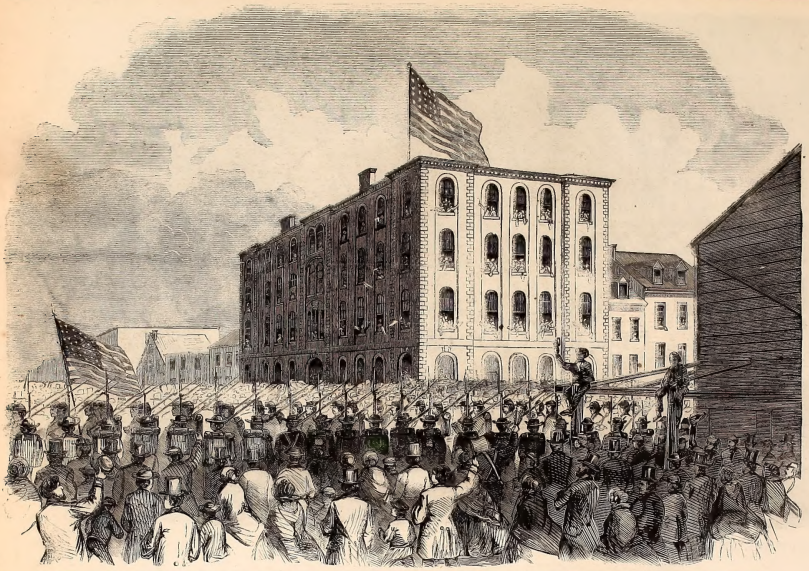
UNITED STATES. TUG YANKEE. CUMBERLAND. MERRIMAC.

DESTRUCTION OF THE UNITED STATES SHIPS AT THE NORF

NIA, BY FIRE, BY THE UNITED STATES TROOPS, ON APRIL 20, 1861.

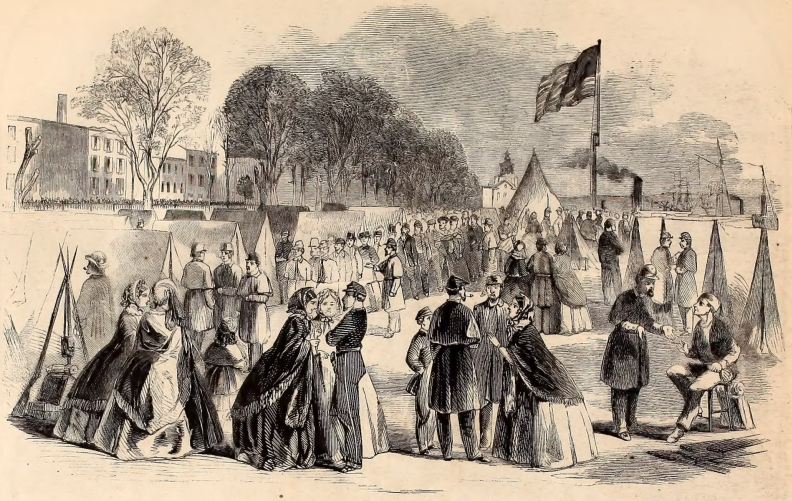
PENNSYLVANIA.

Y-YARD, BY ORDER OF THE GOVERNMENT.—[See Page 294.]



THE THIRTEENTH REGIMENT NEW YORK STATE MILITIA LEAVING THEIR ARMORY IN BROOKLYN FOR THE WAR, APRIL 23, 1861.—[SEE PAGE 295.]

THE SIXTY-NINTH (IRISH) REGIMENT EMBARKING IN THE "JAMES ADGER" FOR THE WAR APRIL 23, 1861.—[SEE PAGE 295.]



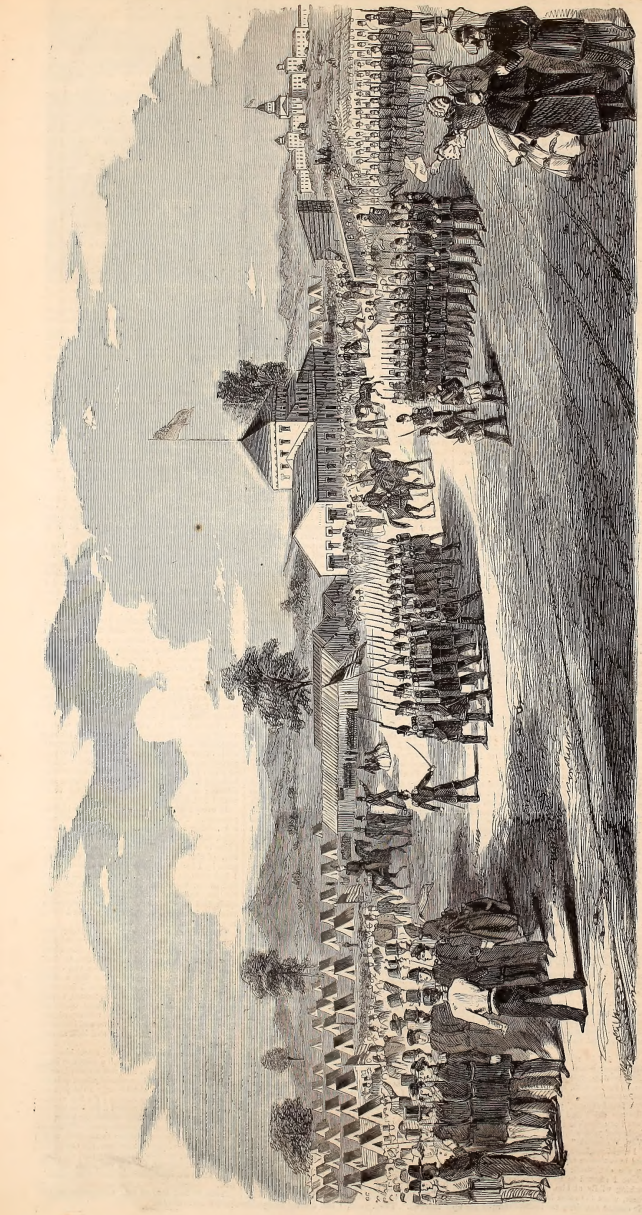
CAMP ON THE BATTERY, NEW YORK CITY.

[SEE PAGE 295.]

THE TEMPORARY BARRACKS ERECTED IN THE PARK, NEW YORK CITY, FOR THE ACCOMMODATION OF TROOPS.

[SEE PAGE 295.]

FORTIFICATIONS THROWN UP TO PROTECT THE UNITED STATES ARSENAL AT ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI.—[SEE PAGE 295.]



CAMP CURTIN, NEAR HARRISBURG, PENNSYLVANIA. A RENDEZVOUS OF THE PENNSYLVANIA VOLUNTEERS.—[SKETCHED BY JASPER GREEN, ESQ.]

CAMP CURTIN, PA.

WE publish herewith, from a drawing made on the spot, an illustration of Camp Curtin, a rendezvous of the Pennsylvania Volunteers. At this place Governor Curtin is understood to have collected some eight or ten thousand volunteers, and more are flocking in daily—horse, foot, and artillery. A large number of experienced drill-sergeants are busy from daylight till dark drilling the men, who go through the unaccustomed labor with cheerfulness, and only ask to be led forward. A gentleman who has just returned from Harrisburg writes as follows respecting the other camps of the Pennsylvania troops:

"This State has in the neighborhood of seventeen thousand already in the field, and thousands more begging for the opportunity of marching. They have full six thousand stationed at Camp Scott, near York, under the command of General Wynkoop and Negley. There are twenty-six hundred at Camp Slifer, near Chambersburg, under the command of General E. A. Williams, one of the officers of the Pennsylvania volunteers in the Mexican War, who has Colonel J. J. Patterson for his aid. Scattered along between Elkton, Perryville and Philadelphia are six thousand more, and there are one or two regiments from Ohio near Lancaster, with some twelve hundred United States troops at Carlisle Barracks."

(Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1860, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.)

GREAT EXPECTATIONS.

A NOVEL.

By CHARLES DICKENS.

Splendidly Illustrated by John McLenan.

☞ Printed from the Manuscript and early Proof-sheets purchased from the Author by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

I was three-and-twenty years of age. Not another word had I heard to enlighten me on the subject of my expectations, and my twenty-third birthday was a week gone. We had left Barnard's Inn more than a year, and lived in the Temple. Our chambers were in Garden Court, down by the river.

Mr. Pocket and I had for some time parted company as to our original relations, though we continued on the best terms. Notwithstanding my inability to settle to any thing—which I hope arose out of the restless and incomplete tenure on which I held my means—I had a taste for reading, and read regularly so many hours a day. That matter of Herbert's was still progressing, and every thing with me was as I have brought it down to the close of the last chapter.

Business had taken Herbert on a journey to Marseilles. I was alone, and had a dull sense of being alone. Dispirited and anxious; long hoping that to-morrow or next week would clear my way, and long disappointed, I sadly missed the cheerful face and ready response of my friend.

It was wretched weather; stormy and wet, stormy and wet; and mud, mud, mud, deep in all the streets. Day after day a vast heavy veil had been driving over London from the East, and it drove still, as if in the East there were an Eternity of cloud and wind. So furious had been the gusts that high buildings in town had had the lead stripped off their roofs; and in the country, trees had been torn up, and sails of wind-mills carried away; and gloomy accounts had come in from the coast of shipwreck and death. Violent blasts of rain had accompanied these rages of wind, and the day just closed as I sat down to read had been the worst of all.

Alterations have been made in that part of the Temple since that time, and it has not now so lonely a character as it had then, nor is it so exposed to the river. We lived at the top of the last house, and the wind rushing up the river shook the house that night like discharges of cannon or breaking of a sea. When the rain came with it and dashed against the windows, I thought, raising my eyes to them as they rocked, that I might have fancied myself in a storm-beaten light-house. Occasionally the smoke came rolling down the chimney as though it could not bear to go out into such a night; and when I set the doors open and looked down the staircase, the staircase lamps were blown out; and when I shaded my face with my hands and looked through the black windows (opening them ever so little was out of the question in the teeth of such wind and rain), I saw that the lamps in the court were blown out, and that the lamps on the bridges and the shore were shuddering, and that the coal fires in barges on the river were being carried away before the wind like red-hot splashes in the rain.

I read with my watch upon the table, purposing to close my book at eleven o'clock. As I shut it, Saint Paul's, and all the many church-clocks in the City—some leading, some accompanying, some following—struck that hour. The sound was curiously flawed by the wind; and I was listening, and thinking how the wind assailed it and tore it, when I heard a footstep on the stair.

What nervous folly made me start, and awfully connect it with the footstep of my dead sister, matters not. It was past in a moment, and I listened again, and heard the footstep stumble in coming on. Remembering then that the staircase-lights were blown out, I took up my reading-lamp and went out to the stair-head. Whoever was below had stopped on seeing my lamp, for all was quiet.

"There is some one down there, is there not?" I called out, looking down.

"Yes," said a voice from the darkness beneath.

"What floor do you want?"

"The top. Mr. Pip."

"That is my name. There is nothing the matter?"

"Nothing the matter," returned the voice. And the man came on.

I stood with my lamp held out over the stair-rail, and he slowly came within its light. It was a shaded lamp, to shine upon a book, and its circle of light was very contracted; so that he was in it for a mere instant, and then out of it. In the instant, I had seen a face that was strange to me, looking up with an incomprehensible air of being touched and pleased by the sight of me.

Moving the lamp as the man moved, I made out that he was substantially dressed, but rough-ly: like a voyager by sea. That he had long, iron-gray hair. That his age was about sixty. That he was a muscular man, strong on his legs, and that he was browned and hardened by exposure to weather. As he ascended the last stair or two, and the light of my lamp included us both, I saw, with a stupid kind of amazement, that he was holding out both his hands to me.

"Pray what is your business?" I asked him.

"My business?" he repeated, pausing. "Ah! Yes. I will explain my business, by your leave."

"Do you wish to come in?"

"Yes," he replied; "I wish to come in, Master."

I had asked him the question indomitably enough, for I resented the sort of bright and gratified recognition that still shone in his face. I resented the manner it seemed to imply that he expected me to respond to it. But I took him into the room I had just left, and, having set the lamp on the table, asked him as civilly as I could to explain himself.

He looked about him with the strongest air—as air of wondering pleasure, as if he had some part in the things he admired—and he pulled off a rough outer coat, and his hat. Then I saw that his head was furrowed and bald, and that the long, iron-gray hair grew only on its sides. But I saw nothing that in the least explained him. On the contrary, I saw him next moment once more putting out both his hands to me.

"What do you mean?" said I, half suspecting him to be mad.

He stopped in his looking at me, and slowly rubbed his right hand over his head. "It's disquieting to a man," he said, in a coarse, broken voice, "even having looked forward so distant and come so far; but you're not to blame for that—neither on us is to blame for that. I'll speak in half a minute. Give me half a minute, please."

He sat down in a chair that stood before the fire, and put his forehead with his large brown veinous hands. I looked at him attentively then, and recoiled a little from him; but I did not know why.

"There's no one nigh," said he, looking over his shoulder; "is there?"

"Why no, a stranger coming into my rooms at this time of the night, ask that question?" said I.

"You're a game one," he returned, shaking his head at me with a deliberate affection, at once most unintelligible and most exasperating; "I'm glad you've grow'd up a game one! But don't catch hold of me. You'd be sorry afterward to have done it."

I relinquished the intention he had detected, for I knew him! Even yet, I could not recall a single feature, but I knew him! If the wind and the rain that drove around the intervening years, had scattered all the intervening objects, had swept us to the churchyard where we first stood face to face on such different levels, I could not have known my convict more distinctly than I knew him now, as he sat in the chair before the fire. No need to take a file to him. No need to hint and shove him: no need to take the handkerchief from his neck and twist it round his head; no need to buy himself with bread, meat, and drink to get him across the room, looking back at me for recognition. I knew him before he gave me one of those looks, and I said no more than that I did not been conscious of remotely suspecting his identity.

He came back to where I stood, and again held out both his hands. Not knowing what to do—for in my astonishment I had lost my self-possession—I reluctantly gave him my left hand. He grasped it heartily, raised them to his lips, kissed them, and still held them.

"You acted noble, my boy," said he. "Noble, Pip! And you have never forgot it!"

At a change in his manner as if he were even going to embrace me, I laid a hand upon his breast and put him away.

"Stay!" said I. "Keep off! If you are grateful to me for what I did when I was a little child, I hope you have shown your gratitude by mending your way of life. If you have come here to thank me, it was not necessary. Still, however you have found me out, there must be something good in the feeling that has brought you here, and I will not repulse you; but surely you must understand that—I—"

My attention was so attracted by the singularity of his fixed look at me, that the words died away on my tongue.

"You was a saying," he observed, when we had confronted one another in silence, "that surely I must understand. What sarcely must I understand?"

"That I can not wish to renew that chance intercourse with you of long ago, under these different circumstances. I am glad to believe you have repented and recovered yourself, and glad to tell you so. I am glad that, thinking I deserve to be thanked, you have come to thank me. But our ways are different ways, now, my boy. You are well, and you look weary. Will you drink something before you go?"

He had replaced his neckerchief loosely, and had stood, keenly observant of me, biting a long end of it. "I think," he answered, still with the end at his mouth and still observant of me, "that I will drink (I thank you) afore I go."

There was a tray ready on a side-table. I had only to set the table near the fire, and asked him what he would have? He touched one of the bottles without looking at it or speaking, and I made him some hot punch-and-water, and tried to keep my hand steady while I did so, but his look at me as he leaned back in his chair made me nervous. A full sense of my condition, with the long dragged-out interval that had passed between his first confidently forgotten—made my hand very difficult to master. He took it from me, I put the glass to him, I saw with new amazement that his eyes were full of tears.

Up to this time I had remained standing, not to disguise that I wished him gone. But I was softened by the softened aspect of the man, and felt a touch of reproach. "I hope," said I, hurriedly putting something into a glass for myself, and drawing a chair to the table, "that you will not think I spoke harshly to you just now. I had no intention of doing it, and I am sorry for it if I did. I wish you well, and hope you!"

As I put my glass to my lips he glanced with surprise at the end of his neckerchief, dropping from his mouth when he opened it, and stretched out his hand. I gave him mine, and then he took his, and drew his sleeve across his eyes and forehead.

"How are you living?" I asked him.

"I've been a sheep-farmer, stock-breeder, other trades besides, away in the new world," said he; "and many a thousand miles of stormy water off from this."

"I hope you have done well?"

"I've done wonderful well. There's others went out sheep-farming as has done well too, but nowhere near as well as me. I'm famous for it."

"I am glad to hear it."

"I hope to hear you say so, my dear boy."

Without stopping to try to understand those words or the tone in which they were spoken, I resumed off to a point that had just come into my mind.

"Have you ever seen a messenger you once sent to me," I inquired, "since he undertook that trust?"

"Never set eyes upon him. I wasn't likely to do it."

"He came faithfully, and he brought me the two one-pound notes. I was a poor boy then, as you know, and to me they were a little fortune. But, like you, I have done well since, and you must let me pay them back. You can lend them to some other poor boy's use." I took out my purse.

He watched me as I laid my purse upon the table and opened it, and he watched me as I separated two one-pound notes from its contents. They were clean and new, and I spread them out and handed them over to him. Still watching me, he laid them one upon the other, folded them long-wise, gave them a twist, set fire to them at the lamp, and dropped the ashes into the tray.

"May I make so bold," he said then, with a smile that was like a frown, and was not like a frown that was like a smile, "as ask you how you have done well, since you and me was out on them lone shivering marshes?"

"How?"

"Ah!"

He emptied his glass, got up, and stood at the side of the fire, with his heavy brown hand on the mantle-shelf. He put a foot up to the bars, to dry and warm it, and the soft shoe-part, so often worn by him he neither looked at it nor at the fire, but steadily looked at me. It was only now that I began to remember it.

When my breath parted, and had shaped some words that were without sound, I forced myself to tell him (though I felt him to be intensely, that I had been chosen to succeed to some property.

"Might a mere warmint ask what property?" said he.

I faltered, "I don't know."

"Might a mere warmint ask whose property?" said he.

I faltered again, "I don't know."

"Could I make a guess, I wonder," said the Convict, "or you cannot since you come of age! As to the first figure now. Five?"

With my heart beating like a heavy hammer of disordered action, I rose out of my chair, and stood with my hand upon the back of it, looking wildly at him.

"Coaxing a guardian," he went on. "There ought to have been some guardian, or such-like, while you was a minor. Some lawyer, may be. As for the first time of their lawyer's name now. Would it be J?"

All the truth of my position came flashing on me; and its most overwhelming dangers, disgraces, consequences of all kinds, rushed in in such a multitude that I was borne down by them, and had to struggle for every breath I drew.

"Put it," he resumed, "as the employer of the lawyer whose name began with a J, and might be Jaggers—put it as he had come over sea to Portsmouth, and had landed there, and had wanted to equip a young fellow, gentleman, to have found me out, 'you says just now. Well! However did I find you out? Why, I wrote from Portsmouth to a person in London, for particulars of your address. That person's name? Why, Wemmick."

I could not have spoken one word though it had been to save my life. I stood, with a hand on the chair-back and a hand on my breast, where I seemed to be suffocating—I stood so, looking wildly at him, until I grasped at the chair, when the room began to surge and turn. He caught me, drew me to the sofa, put me up against the cushions, and bent on one knee before me: bringing the face that I now well remembered, and that shuddered at, very near to mine.

"Yes, Pip, dear boy, I've made a gentleman on you! It's me wot has done it! I swore that time, sure as ever I earned a guinea, that guinea should go to you. I swore arterward, sure as ever I got hold and got rich, you should get rich. I lived rough that you should live smooth; I worked hard that you should be above me. What coals, dear boy? Do I tell it for you to feel a obligation? Not a bit. I tell it for you to know as that there hunted dog-wot you kep life alive in got his head so high that he could make a gentleman—and, Pip, you're him!"

The abhorrence in which I held the man, the dread I had of him, the repugnance with which I shrank from him, could not have been exceeded if he had been the most terrible beast.

"Look'ee here, Pip. I'm your second father. You're my son—more to me nor any son. I've put away money only for you to spend. When I was a hired-out shepherd in a solitary hut, not seeing no faces but faces of sheep till I half forgot wot men's and women's faces was like, I see yourn. I drops my knife many a time in that hut when I was a eating my dinner or my supper, and I says to myself, they're mine, as is a-leaving at me while I eats and drinks! I see you there, a many times, as plain as ever I see you on them misty marshes. 'Lord strike me dead!' I says each time—and I goes out in the air to say it under the open heavens—'but wot, if I gets liberty and comes for my own, I make that boy a gentleman!' And I done it. Why, look at you, dear boy! Look at these here lodgings o' yourn, fit for a lord! Look at your linen! Look at your money with lords for wagers, and beat 'em!"

In his hard triumph, and in his knowledge that he had been nearly fainting, he did not remark on my reception of all this. It was the one grain of relief I had.

"Look'ee here, Pip." He sent on, taking out my watch, and turning toward him a ring on my finger, while I recoiled from his touch as if he had been a snake. "A gold one and a hunter, that's a gentleman's! A diamond, all set round with rubies; that's a gentleman's! Look at your linen, wot fine collars and wot fine cuffs! Look at your clothes; better ain't to be got! And your books too," turning his eyes round the room, "mounting up, I'll be bound, by hundreds! And you read 'em; don't you? I see you've been a reading of 'em when I come in. Ha, ha, ha! You mustn't be cast down, dear boy! And if they're in foreign languages wot I don't understand, I shall be just as proud as if I did."

Again he put his hands and put them to his lips, while my blood ran cold within me.

"Don't you mind talking, Pip," said he, after again drawing the back of his hair over his eyes and face, as the chief cause in his throat which I well remembered—and he was all the more horrible to me that he was so much in earnest; "you can't do better nor keep quiet, dear boy. You ain't looked slowly forward to this as I have; you won't prepared for this, as I was, but didn't you think it might be me?"

"Oh no, no, no," I returned. "Never, never!"

"Well, you see it was me, and single-handed. Never a soul in it but my own self and Mr. Jaggers."

"Was there no one else?" I asked.

"No," said he, with a glance of surprise; "in wot else should there be? And, dear boy, how have you been living, how growed! There's bright eyes somewheres—eh? Isn't there bright eyes somewheres, wot you love the thoughts on?"

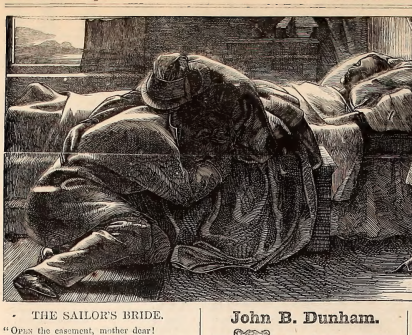
Joe Gargery. Biddy.

"They shall be yourn, dear boy, if money can buy 'em. Not that a gentleman like you, so well set off as you, can't win 'em off of his own game; but money shall back you! Let me finish wot I was a telling you, dear boy. From that there hunted dog wot you kep life and got a independence for him, I got hold of your fortun, if so be I could make a gentleman—and, Pip, you're him!"

I forced myself to look at him. I looked at him, the dread I had of him, the repugnance with which I shrank from him, could not have been exceeded if he had been the most terrible beast.

"Look'ee here, Pip. I'm your second father. You're my son—more to me nor any son. I've put away money only for you to spend. When I was a hired-out shepherd in a solitary hut, not seeing no faces but faces of sheep till I half forgot wot men's and women's faces was like, I see yourn. I drops my knife many a time in that hut when I was a eating my dinner or my supper, and I says to myself, they're mine, as is a-leaving at me while I eats and drinks! I see you there, a many times, as plain as ever I see you on them misty marshes. 'Lord strike me dead!' I says each time—and I goes out in the air to say it under the open heavens—'but wot, if I gets liberty and comes for my own, I make that boy a gentleman!' And I done it. Why, look at you, dear boy! Look at these here lodgings o' yourn, fit for a lord! Look at your linen! Look at your money with lords for wagers, and beat 'em!"

In his hard triumph, and in his knowledge that he had been nearly fainting, he did not remark on my reception of all this. It was the one grain of relief I had



THE SAILOR'S BRIDE.

"Oh! the casement, mother dear!
Methinks the tide is high,
And I would look upon the sea
Once more before I die.

"Some ships are making for the bay;
It may be his is one.
Oh, mother! how will Leonard grieve
To come and find me gone.

"I will remember when he smiled
(It was at Lammas-tide),
He said that he would soon return
To claim his rosy bride.

"But, ah! the flush upon my cheek,
That showed like health's fresh bloom,
Was Death's own color—he had decked
His victim for the tomb.

"I had a vague misgiving then
I could not put away;
And look through parting tears unto
A happy meeting day.

"But he was full of hope—for him
The future had no cloud;
He saw me in my bridal dress,
Not in my burial shroud.

"Alas! he'll be a widowed man
Before I am his wife;
Oh, mother! for his sake and yours,
I sometimes pray for life.

"I know that he will soon be here,
It may be come this day;
I once thought it was very hard
To die, and he away.

"But now I feel 'tis ordered well
That Leonard is not here;
I might have found it was more hard
To die when he was near.

"Tell him I had my little bed
Before the window drawn,
That I might look upon the sea,
And think of him each morn.

"And say that with my latest breath
I prayed God soothe his pain;
And, mother, bid him live that so
We two may meet again.

"I know that you will grieve for me,
But he will be your son;
Tell him I loved him watch o'er you,
When you own child was gone."

Gazing upon the far-off sea,
A while she quiet lay,
Then murmured, "Father, lead my thoughts
From earthly things away."

And with that prayer God gave her peace,
And she was very calm;
And, like the swan that sings its dirge,
Chanted some favorite psalm.

Then stole a cloud across her face;
"All things are growing dim,
Mother! Can this be death? Kiss me,
And give my love to him."

A hand is on the cottage-door;
A face bend o'er the bed.
Too late! too late hath Leonard come;
Love can not raise the dead.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Send your Orders to
W. A. HAYWARD, 208 Broadway,
For Union Pins, Ring Pins, Union Locket Chorms, Union Shirt-Studs, Badges, &c., &c., and all the New Styles of Emblems!!

MAP FOR THE TIMES.
THE PRESENT THEATRE OF EVENTS.
Just published, the map every one needs while reading the papers in these exciting times. Price 25 cents.
ENSIGN, BRIDGMAN & FANNING, No. 106 William st.
Copy sent by mail on receipt of price.

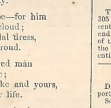
John B. Dunham.
Overstrung Grand Square and Upright Pianos.
Established in 1834.
Are pronounced to be the best Pianos manufactured. Each Instrument warranted 8 years. Send for Circular.
Warerooms and Manufactory, 76 to 85 East 13th Street, near Broadway, N. Y.

To the Ladies.
Our lady readers who desire a fair complexion, will find an efficient agent in Burnett's Kalliston. Those who have used it are loud in its praises, as a preparation which imparts a clear, soft, and healthful hue to the skin, without being attended by any injurious effects. It is pronounced one of the best toilet features ever prepared.—St. Louis Evening News.

"Plumbing and Gas."
The Subscribers have Moved to their new building, No. 305 Fourth Street, corner of Greene. Experienced men can be still parts of the country, some raise as city prices, and all work done is under the supervision of either one of the subscribers, whose long standing and knowledge of the Practice and Theory of their Business would warrant entire satisfaction. McKENZIE & O'HARA.

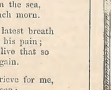
Military Books.
D. VAN NOSTRAND, Bookseller, Publisher, and Importer of Military and Engineering Books, 192 Broadway. Send for Catalogue of Military Books.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—My Unguent will force them to grow heavily in six weeks (upon the smoothest face) without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of an order. R. G. GRAHAM, No. 169 Nassau Street, N. Y.



H. WORCESTER'S
IMPROVED PIANO FORTES,
Manufactory & Salesrooms,
14th St., cor. 5d Av., N. Y.

"Matrimony made Easy."—A new work, showing how either sex may be addressed, received, and deceived at age or appearance, which can not fail—free for 25 c. ste. Address T. William & Co., Publishers, Box 2590, Phila.



Specimensby Mail on receipt of 3 postage stamps.
EVERDELL & SON, Broadway, N.Y.

An Appeal to Patriots.
For the benefit of the Families of those who may fall IN DEFENSE OF THE FLAG OF THE UNITED STATES.
The entire profits of the sale of the PORTRAIT OF MAJOR ANDERSON, which now retires at Fort Sumter, will hereafter be deposited in Bank for the benefit of the families of those who may fall in the present contest in defense of the Flag of the United States, and paid over to the committee authorized to take charge of such contributions by the great Union Meeting of April 20th.
C. ANTHONY,
591 Broadway, New York.

NOBLE MEMORIES CHANTED ROUND THIS PORTRAIT!!! TWENTY MILLIONS OF FREEMEN CAN, WITHOUT FEELING IT, SOON ROLL UP A FUND THAT WILL GLADDEN THE HEARTS OF THE WIDOWS AND THE FATHERLESS, AND DO HONOR AT THE SAME TIME TO THE BRAVE ANDERSON.
The press throughout the United States will serve their country well by giving the above as wide publicity as possible.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.
Have just Published:

SILAS MARNER, the Weaver of Raveloe. By GEORGE ELIOT, author of "Adam Bede," "The Mill on the Floss," and "Scenes of Clerical Life." 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents; Paper Covers, 50 cents.

LORD MACAULAY'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND, from the Accession of James II. With an Original Portrait of the Author and a Complete Index to the entire Work. 5 vols. 12mo, Muslin, $10 50. The volumes sold separately, at $2 cents each.

MOTLEY'S HISTORY OF THE UNITED NETHERLANDS: from the Death of William the Silent to the Synod of Dort. With a full View of the English-Dutch Struggle against Spain, and of the Origin and Destruction of the Spanish Armada. 2 vols. 8vo, Muslin, $4 00.

TRUMPS. A Novel. By GEO. WM. CURTIS, Author of "The Potiphar Papers," "Prue and I," "Nile Notes of a Howadji," "The Howadji in Syria," "Lotus-Eating," &c., &c. Illustrated by DARLEY. 12mo, Muslin, $1 25.

ONE OF THEM. By CHARLES LEVER, Author of "Charles O'Malley," "Gerald Fitzgerald," "The Dodd Family," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above Works by Mail, postage prepaid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of the Price.

WARD'S
Perfect Fitting Shirts,
MADE TO MEASURE AT $18 PER DOZEN,
OR SIX FOR $9.
MADE OF NEW YORK MILLS MUSLIN,
With fine Linen Bosoms, and warranted as good a Shirt as sold in the retail stores at $2.50 each.
ALSO, THE VERY BEST SHIRTS THAT CAN BE MADE,
AT $24 PER DOZEN.
SELF-MEASUREMENT FOR SHIRTS.
Printed directions, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of shirts sent free everywhere, and so easy to understand, that any one can take their own measure for shirts. I warrant a good fit. The cash to be paid to the Express Company on receipt of goods.
S. W. H. WARD, from London,
No. 387 Broadway, N. Y., up Stairs.

Public Speakers and Singers.
"Brown's Bronchial Troches," or Cough and Throat Lozenges, contain ingredients acting specifically on the organs of the voice, they have an extraordinary efficacy in all affections of the Throat and Larynx, restoring their healthy tone when relaxed, either from cold, or over exertion of the voice, and procuring clear and distinct enunciation.
"I find the Troches particularly efficacious in clearing and strengthening the voice, either for singing or speaking." MRS. BARROW.

DR. BROWN'S
Patent Baby-Tender.
The Great Institution for Children.
Warerooms 652 Broadway.
J. Silas Brown & Co.
Send for our Circular.

6000 AGENTS wanted, to sell SIX NEW and popular Works. Immense profits. Great demand, and of great value to families; all pay great profits to Agents. four stamps and get full particulars. Address
EPHRAIM BROWN, Lowell, Mass.

HARPER & BROTHERS
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.
Have just Published:

EVAN HARRINGTON; or, He would be a Gentleman. A Novel. By GEORGE MEREDITH. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

ATKINSON'S AMOOR REGIONS. Travels in the Regions of the Upper and Lower Amoor and the Russian Acquisition on the Confines of India and China. With Adventures among the Mountain Kirghis; and the Manjours, Mantchoos, Tunguses, Golds, and Golyaks; the Hunting and Pastoral Tribes. By THOMAS WITLAM ATKINSON, F. G. S., F. R. G. S. Map and Wood-cuts. 8vo, Muslin, $2 50; Half Calf, $3 50.

THE LAKE REGIONS OF CENTRAL AFRICA. A Picture of Exploration. By Lieutenant F. BURTON, Capt. H. M.'s Indian Army; Fellow and Gold Medallist of the Royal Geographical Society. With Maps and Engravings on Wood. 8vo, Muslin, $2 00. (Uniform with Speke and Grant's Discovery.)

COINS, MEDALS, AND SEALS, Ancient and Modern. Illustrated and Described. With a Sketch of the History of Coins and Coinage. Intended as a Text-Book for Collectors, Tables of Comparative Purity, Price-Lists of English and American Coins, Medals, and Tokens, &c., &c. Edited by W. S. W. VAUX, Author of "Boat-Life in Egypt and Nubia," "Text Life in the Holy Land," &c., &c. 8vo, Muslin, $2 50; Muslin, gilt edges, $3 50; Half Calf, $3 50.

CHILDREN'S PICTURE-BOOKS. Square 4to, about 100 pages each, bound in Boards, printed on tinted paper, embellished with many Engravings, bound in Muslin gilt, 75 cents per Volume; the Series complete in neat case, Price $3 00.
THE CHILDREN'S BIBLE PICTURE-BOOK. Illustrated by Eighty Engravings, from Designs by STEINLE, OVERBECK, RETHEL, SCHNORR, &c.
THE CHILDREN'S PICTURE FABLE-BOOK. Containing One Hundred and Sixty Fables. With Sixty Illustrations by HARRISON WEIR.
THE CHILDREN'S PICTURE-BOOK OF BIRDS. Illustrated with Sixty-one Engravings by W. HARVEY.
THE CHILDREN'S PICTURE-BOOK OF QUADRUPEDS and other Mammalia. Illustrated with Sixty-one Engravings by W. HARVEY.

HISTORY OF THE UNITED NETHERLANDS: from the Death of William the Silent to the Synod of Dort. With a full View of the English-Dutch Struggle against Spain, and of the Origin and Destruction of the Spanish Armada. By JOHN LOTHROP MOTLEY, LL.D., D.C.L., Corresponding Member of the Institute of France, Author of "The Rise of the Dutch Republic." New Edition. 2 vols. 8vo, Muslin, $4 00; Sheep, $4 50; Half Calf, $5 00.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of price.

General Scott's Infantry Tactics;
OR,
Rules for the Exercise and Manœuvres of the United States Infantry.
3 vols. 24mo, Muslin, $2 50.
Published by Authority.

United States Army Regulations,
Approved by the President of the United States, and Printed under the Direction of the Secretary of War.
12mo, Muslin, $1 00.
Published by HARPER & BROTHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

Close of the Twenty-Second Volume.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
For May, 1861.

CONTENTS.

A SUMMER IN NEW ENGLAND.—IV. BOSTON AND LOWELL. Illustrated by FOSTER CRAVEN.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—An expatriated Patriot.—On State Street.—With a Million.—Getting Pigeon.—The Editor.—Boston Girl.—Lecture on Matrimony.—The Artist's Studio.—A popular Orator.—Harbor of Gohoost.—A Huddock.—Lobster Pot.—Food near Cohasset.—The Apple-Woman.—The Shoemaker.—The Good Old Times.—Recreation formerly.—Recreation now-a-days.—The Circus.—Between Hope and Fear.

THE OLD LOVE AND THE NEW.

THREE MONTHS IN LABRADOR. By CHARLES HALLOCK. (Concluded.)
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Camp at Flatwater.—Settler's Cabin.—Map of Esquimaux Bay.—Esquimaux Tomtik.—Esquimaux of Unguva.—Ripsiktit.—The Doctor's Mishap.—Misty Mountains.—Nascopies, or Mountaineers.—Table-land.—Chateau Island.—Trolle Rocks at Henley Harbor.—Fort at Chateau Bay.

DIGGING FOR CARTHAGE.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Excavation at Carthage.—Cape Cothage.—The Africa Coliseum.—Ruins of Temple of Baal Hammon.—Punic Inscription.

THE DEBATABLE BABY.
GEORGE ROGERS CLARKE.

ORLEY FARM. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE.—Illustrated by J. E. MILLAIS.
CHAPTER I. The Commencement of the Great Orley Farm Case.
CHAPTER II. Lady Mason and her Son.
CHAPTER III. The Chieves.
CHAPTER IV. The Perils of Youth.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Orley Farm.—Sir Peregrine and his Heir.

A SINGLE WOMAN'S STORY.
THE ADVENTURES OF PHILIP. By W. M. THACKERAY.
CHAPTER VIII. Will he pronounced to be Cynical by the Benevolent.
CHAPTER IX. Contains one Riddle which is solved, and perhaps some more.
CHAPTER X. In which we visit "Admiral Byng."
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Cynical.—Laura's Fireside.—Riddles.—With Admiral Byng.

PRINCE NAPOLEON.
A WORD OF ADVENTURE.
MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.
LITERARY NOTICES.
EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.
OUR FOREIGN BUREAU.
EDITOR'S DRAWER.—(With Ten Illustrations.)
FASHIONS FOR MAY.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Spring Fashions, No. 1.—Spring Fashions, No. 2.

The present Number completes the Twenty-Second Volume of HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE. The Publishers renew their thanks for the cordial approbation and liberal support which the Magazine has received during the eleven years of its publication.

A regular monthly circulation of more than One Hundred Thousand, and a constant demand for back Numbers, Volume, and complete Sets, evince that the Magazine meets the wants of the great body of American readers. All the features which have given it its distinctive character will be retained. Its object will still be to present to the American people the choicest literature of the day, with abundant Pictorial Illustrations of every subject in which the Artist can aid the Writer. The Publishers confidently anticipate a continuance of the favor which the Magazine has heretofore received from the Press and the Public.

The Author of "Adam Bede," wishing to publish her New Novel, in England, complete, at an early day, it will not appear, as announced, in the Magazine, but has been issued in a volume by the Publishers, in advance of its publication in England. In its place will appear "Orley Farm," by ANTHONY TROLLOPE, the most brilliant Novelist of the day. The first part is contained in the present Number of the Magazine. It will be regularly continued until its completion, the Publishers having secured from the Author the advance sheets, and the original Engravings, from Drawings by MILLAIS, the founder of the "Pre-Raphaelite School," and the most eminent painter of the age.

Any Number will be sent by Mail, post-paid, for Twenty-five Cents. Any Volume, comprising Six Numbers, neatly bound in Cloth, will be sent by Mail, to any part of the United States (not exceeding 3000 miles), post-paid, for Two Dollars per Volume. Complete Sets will be sent by Express, for the Publishers at the charge of the purchaser, at a Discount of Twenty-five per Cent. from the above rate. Twenty-one Volumes, embracing a complete Work from June, 1850, to November, 1860, are now ready.

HARPER'S WEEKLY will be sent gratuitously for one month—or a specimen—to any one who applies for it. Specimen Numbers of the MAGAZINE will also be sent gratuitously.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year	$3 00
Two Copies for One Year	5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each)	2 00

And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of EIGHT SUBSCRIBERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY AND HARPER'S MAGAZINE, together, one year, $4 00.
HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

Harper's Weekly.
PRICE SIX CENTS.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year	$2 00
Two Copies for One Year	4 00

Harper's Weekly and Harper's Magazine, one year, $4 00.

Volumes I., II., III., and IV. of HARPER'S WEEKLY, handsomely bound in Cloth extra, Price $2 50 each, are now ready.

* * To postmasters and agents getting up a Club of Ten Subscribers, a Copy will be sent gratis. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. Specimen Numbers gratuitously supplied.

☞ Clergymen and Teachers supplied at the lowest CLUB RATES.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

SEVENTH REGIMENT ON BOARD THE "BOSTON," EN ROUTE FOR ANNAPOLIS.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.

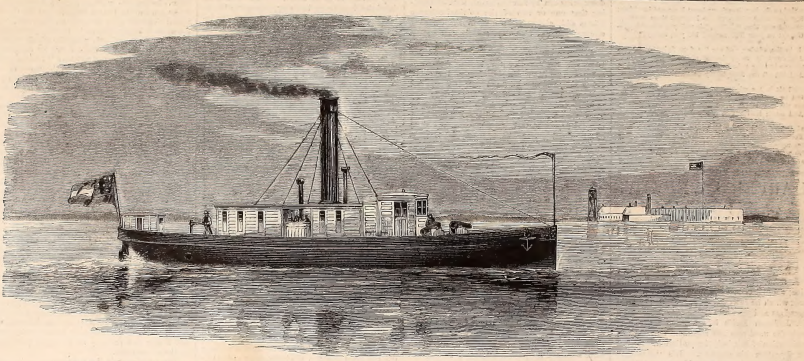
THE MEN OF THE EIGHTH MASSACHUSETTS REGIMENT REPAIRING THE BRIDGES ON THE RAILROAD FROM ANNAPOLIS TO WASHINGTON.—[SEE PAGE 295.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. V.—No. 229.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 18, 1861. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $2 50 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1861, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.



THE "LADY DAVIS," TWO GUNS, CAPTAIN ENGER, SHIP OF WAR OF THE SOUTHERN CONFEDERACY.—SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.

[SEE PAGE 311.]

RHODE ISLAND ARTILLERY LANDING FROM THE STEAMER "BIENVILLE" AT WASHINGTON ARSENAL, ON APRIL 25.—SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.

[SEE PAGE 316.]

VOLUNTEERED.

I know the sun shines, and the lilacs are blowing.
And Summer sends kisses by beautiful May—
Oh! to see all the treasures the Spring is bestowing,
And think—my boy Willie enlisted to-day!

It seems but a day since at twilight, low humming,
I rocked him to sleep with his cheek upon mine,
While Robby, the four-year old, waited for the coming
Of father, adown the street's indistinct line.

It is many a year since my Harry departed,
To come back no more in the twilight or dawn;
And Robby grew up as a watching, and started
Alone, on the journey his father had gone.

It is many a year,—and his afternoon, sitting
At Robby's window, I heard the band play,
And suddenly ceased dreaming over my knitting
To recollect Willie is twenty to-day!

And that, standing beside him this soft May-day morning,
The same smiling child of his wrenched eight-months,
I saw in his sweet eyes and lips a faint warning,
And choked down the tears when he gravely spoke:

"Dear mother, you know how those traitors are cowing
The hearts of the folds of our flag in the dust;
The boys are all fire; and by wish I were going,—"
He stopped, but his look said, "Oh, say if I must?"

I smiled on the boy though my heart it seemed breaking:
My eyes filled with tears, so I turned them away.
And answered him, "Willie, this well you are waking.
Go, act as your father would bid you, to-day!"

I sit in the window and see the flags flying,
And dreamily list to the roll of the drum,
And measure his pain in my heart that is lying,
And bid all the fears in my bosom be dumb.

I shall sit in the window when Summer is lying
Out over the fields, and the honey-bee's hum
Lulls the rose on the porch from her drowsiness sighing,
And watch for the face of my darling to come.

And if he should fall,—his young life he has given
For freedom is sweet take,—and for me, I will pray
Once more with my Harry and Robby in heaven
To meet the dear boy that enlisted to-day.

ALDEN, New York.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MAY 18, 1861.

MR. JEFFERSON DAVIS'S "MESSAGE."

MR. JEFFERSON DAVIS, Ex-Senator from Mississippi, has transmitted to the select council of rebels at Montgomery a document which he calls "a Message." It is a most ingenious and plausible statement of their case. Mr. Jefferson Davis is renowned for having made the most specious argument on record in justification of Mississippi repudiation. He has not forgotten his cunning. His "Message" would almost persuade us—if we could forget facts and law—that rebellion is right, and the maintenance of government and the enforcement of law a barefaced usurpation. Unhappily for him, our common-school system, at the North, impresses so indelibly upon our minds the cardinal facts and the fundamental principles upon which our government rests that each reader will refute his fallacies as they meet his eye.

The idea which constitutes the basis of his theory is that of independent State sovereignty. He holds that no State parted with its sovereign rights on the formation of the Union; that the Union was essentially a confederacy of States; and that each State which entered into the partnership is as free to leave as it was to join it. To support of this view Mr. Davis adduces a number of plausible arguments and some specious statements of fact.

Mr. Davis overlooks several facts and arguments which are rather more important than those which he alleges in support of his peculiar views. It is undoubtedly true that an influential political party has for many years upheld the doctrine of State sovereignty. But their views amount to nothing when opposed to the naked fact that the Constitution is a compact, not between States, but among "the people." We, the people of the United States, for the purpose of forming a more perfect union," etc., are the words of the Constitution. If Mr. Davis and his confederates are right in their understanding of the Constitution of the United States, why did they alter it when they adopted a Constitution at Montgomery, and insert the clause "each State acting in its separate sovereign capacity?" Is not this amendment an admission that the old Constitution was not a league among States, but among people? Why, again, does not Mr. Davis make some explanation of the case of Alabama, which State, by special act of its Legislature, declared that it could not secede from the Union without the consent of the United States? Why does he say nothing of Florida and Louisiana, which were bought, or of Texas, which was only secured by force of arms—none of which States can therefore have displayed much sovereignty in becoming members of the Union? These were questions with which it would have been well for Mr. Davis to grapple, when he undertook the justification of disunion on abstract legal grounds.

For our part, we don't think the legal points involved in this disunion business worth discussing. Conceding all that Mr. Davis claims in his argument, statesmen will recognize reasons superior to any that he sets forth for maintaining the Union inviolate at all hazards.

When this Union was established, eighty years ago, it consisted of 3,000,000 of people, scattered along the Atlantic coast from the Penobscot to the coast of Florida. It is preposterous to suppose that these 3,000,000 of dwellers by the sea-coast foresaw the nation they were going to beget in eighty years: and it is absurd to pretend that the principles by which they shaped their petty destiny must necessarily control that of a nation of over 30,000,000 people, inhabiting the whole continent between the oceans, and stretching from Canada to the Gulf of Mexico. Our growth has created necessities—political and military—which were not dreamed of by the framers of the Republic. It has compelled us to purchase Louisiana and Florida—purchases which would have seemed wholly unnecessary to the framers of the Constitution, because, in their day, the necessity for them did not exist. It has led to the establishment of the Monroe doctrine, which the limited sphere of the original thirteen States would have been regarded with mere imagination. And now, it compels us to put down secession by force of arms, notwithstanding that one or two of the original thirteen States did, eighty years ago, in the different circumstances of that day, contemplate such a resort.

Events modify the policy of nations. Eighty years ago, the experiment of a great independent nation on American soil was undetermined. Many sound minds believed that it would not answer. Under those circumstances, it is easy to understand why a prosperous State like New York, with a fine harbor and a promising commercial future, should have reserved the right of withdrawal from the Union, if, on mature theory, it proved a failure. But the reservation became null and void after the experiment was proved to be a success by eighty years' successful working, and by the consolidation of the original three millions of maritime people into a great and wealthy nation of thirty millions. All the reservations, express or implied, which accompanied the first ratification of the Union in State Legislatures ratifying the Constitution, were predicated upon the apprehension that the Union experiment might prove a failure. It succeed did away with them all.

From the moment the people of the United States constituted a great nation, a political and military necessity for union came into existence. This necessity grew vital and became paramount. It was the only possible guarantee they could obtain for peace, growth, and prosperity. Without union, increase of population was an impossibility. Without union, they could never have assumed a commanding rank among nations; never have been secure from the ambitious designs of Europe; never could have efficiently protected their commerce or their citizens abroad; never have developed their free political institutions at home.

For these vital considerations—involving not only the progress and prosperity but the liberties and existence of the nation—good men hold that, even if every original State had expressly reserved the right of withdrawal in signing the Constitution, it would still be our duty to fight to the last to resist secession now, under the altered circumstances in which we are placed.

But the issue of this rebellion is simple. Mr. Davis has called 100,000 men into the field, and commits the destiny of his rebellion to the arbitrament of arms. The United States accept the challenge. Heaven knows they have been long-suffering enough. They have submitted to see their forts seized, their revenue-cutters stolen, their arsenals plundered, their citizens outraged, their flag fired upon, their officers exiled, their authority defied and insulted in every possible way. At last they have arisen in their might, and as soon as the war has begun. It is a sad, a cruel emergency to all of us. But the die is now cast; and we can only say, in buckling on our armor—GOD DEFEND THE RIGHT!

THE LOUNGER.

IN MEMORIAM.

The readers of the early numbers of Harper's Weekly will remember the pleasant gossip of town life published in these very columns under the title of "The Bohemian." They were written by Edward G. P. Wilkins, whose name became subsequently well known as the author of several successful plays, the latest of which was "Nicholas." Mr. Wilkins was the dramatic critic of the Herald, and wrote airy and sparkling feuilletons for the Saturday Press. His peculiar gifts promised a conspicuous career; but a brief illness quited his life on the 4th of May.

Personally, "The Bohemian" was unknown to the Lounger; but he was well known to him, as to others, through the warm words of admiring friends. And now that the pen of the brilliant and genial author is laid aside forever, there is a melancholy fitness in naming him here, scattering rosemary upon his early grave.

LETTING ALONE.

"ALL that we want," says Mr. Jeff Davis, "is to be let alone." All that the rebels in Charleston wanted, when they were for five months building batteries to fire upon the United States flag and take in United States fortress, was to be let alone. All that the rebels of New Orleans wanted, when they stole the Mint, was to be let alone. All that General Braxton Bragg wanted, as he concentrated troops and reared batteries against Fort Pickens, was to be let alone. All that the rebels who took the navy-yard and hospitals at Pensacola wanted was to be let alone. All that Floyd wanted, as he robbed the treasury of the United States and put the arms of the people of the country within reach of the rebellion, was to be let alone. All that Toucey wanted, as he sent the ships away and put the navy-yards into the hands of rebel men, was to be let alone. All that Cobb wanted, as he strained himself to create a disastrous financial panic in the country, was to be let alone. All that the Virginia traitors who went to seize the arsenal at Harper's Ferry, and were going to possess the navy-yard at Norfolk, wanted was to be let alone. All that the Baltimore Plug Uglies want at this moment is to be let alone. And Jeff Davis, at the head of a rebellion which struggles to destroy the government of the United States, and would snatch Washington if it could, merely wants to be let alone. Yes, and Guy Fawkes, aiming to touch the slow-match which should explode the powder in the cellar of the Parliament House that by wonder to be let alone. Lucky, who murdered the sheep's crew last year, only wanted to be let alone. The forger writing your name, the incendiary firing your house, the thief picking your pocket, the burglar breaking into your house, only want to be let alone.

My friend, don't cry out so lustily, when you see the sheriff's officer coming, that you want to be let alone, I shall do my best to detain you until the officer comes.

During all the years in which the mind of a section of the country has been carefully prepared for this rebellion, the leader of the movement and his followers have said, politely, "All that we wish is to be let alone. We think that we understand ourselves better than you understand us—so, if you please, will you kindly let us alone?" This an irresistible sarcasm in this supplication. They certainly did understand themselves better than we understood them. They were "let alone"—and this is the consequence.

They have led us by the nose, and kicked us, and laughed at us, and grovelled us in their very souls as cravens and tuppenny tinkers. They have swelled, and swaggered, and sworn, and lorded it in Washington at the White House, as if they were peculiarly gentlemen, because they lived by the labor of wretched men and women whom they did not pay—because they did not pay their debts, and whipped and maimed savagely at their pleasure. They have snorted superciliously about their rights. While they were the citizens of human beings of all rights whatsoever, and have sought to gain such control of the General Government that they might overrule the decisions of the State laws which protect the equal rights of men. They have aimed to destroy the beneficent popular system which peacefully and successfully and lawfully was working out the great problem of civilization; and while they have been digging about the foundations of the temple to undermine it, its downfall, they have coolly replied to our inquiries, "We only want to be let alone."

The treachery, the meanness, of the whole rebellion now stand exposed to the world. There is nothing horrid in it, nothing just, nothing fair; nothing that appeals to any emotion in the breast but honest contempt and honest contempt. The only two things that have lately flourished in the region which has bred this rebellion are cotton and treason. And the gentlemen, who have now made this clear enough to the dullest mind, will discover that the Government of their country will not be let alone. And when they have paid the penalty of the most monstrous social crime by flight or the halter, and when the seeds of the treason they have sown are utterly destroyed.

NEUTRALITY.

THERE are times when neutrality is impossible, because neutrality implies inaction, and inaction necessarily favors the success of one more than the other. If a man sees another running toward him followed by the cry of stop thief, and stands aside upon the plea that he is neutral, he helps the thief by the deed and does all he can at the moment to encourage robbery. Or when a riot breaks out and the military are called upon to act, every soldier who refuses to march because he does not care whether the rioters are suppressed or victorious, is responsible in his degree for the consequences of the riot.

When the Government of the United States summons all loyal citizens to help resist a rebellion, if any citizen says that he neither shall nor ought to lift his hand to reach the rebels, he is one of the rebels whom the troops are to put down. His inaction is simply a barrier against the criminal and his action is simply a barrier against the criminal and his action is simply a barrier against the criminal and his action pusillanimous, if not treacherous, by eager writers, who, by an impotent defiance of danger would have secured the defeat of the good cause. Yet had he of all men given no proof of fidelity to the Government? Was he the first to be suspected of disloyalty to our system (or doubt of its power)—he who of all statesmen in the land, from his entrance into public life thirty-six years ago, has maintained a cheerful and unshrinking faith of the mind, not of the mouth, in the principle of popular government?

Last week we were speaking of his letter to Governor Hicks. Look at that again for one moment. The chance was, and every body knew it, that Washington would be captured. If it had been so the President and his cabinet would easily have been taken. Now if the head of the cabinet had written a truculent letter of defiance to Governor Hicks, and, as it was then fair to suppose, the capital of the country and the officers of the Government had been captured by the rebels, there is not a Government in the world that would not have felt that the Government of the United States was indecisively ignorant of its own power and position; and they would have been inclined to say, and justly, that this rebellion is very nearly a de facto government; it will presently become so, while such amusing and blustering ignorance rules the counsels of the regular Government.

Would it have been wise in the Secretary of State to have fortified the position of the rebels so strongly as that? And yet the very body-and-soul good reason he has for that the cool letter which he was sneered at for not writing to Governor Hicks would have been such a fortification.

The fact is that to write was to compromise precisely the same general policy as that which he addressed to Mr. Dayton, and which is so warmly praised. The President's son as clearly as the Secretary of State, how to do as well as what to do, we may be more cheerful than ever.

And as in the case of the History of England, lately published, Macaulay describes Lord Somers, the great Whig statesman of King William's day, "Could there be a better portrait of the present Secretary of State?

"Pre-eminent among the ministerial Whigs was one in whom admirable vigor and quickness of intellect were united to a not less admirable moderation and urbanity, one who looked on past ages with the keen eye of a practical statesman, and on the events which were passing before him with the eye of a philosophical historian. It was not necessary for him to name himself. He could be none but Somers."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A COMPLETE DISGUISE.—An Englishman and Roman were walking through the galleries of the Vatican, where certain statues and pictures have been lightly clothed so as not to shock the minds of purists as fastidious as the late King of Naples, when the Englishman made some allusion in the course of conversation to the "naked Truth." "Excuse me, Sir," replied the Roman, half plaintively, "the Truth is no longer allowed to go naked in Rome—good care is taken that it shall be draped by a Cardinal."

"OVER, FOR OVER."—The Times remarks that marriage is "a very highly pitched relation." Young Seldom, who was in love with his cousin Euphemia, says that he was also a very highly pitched relation when he proposed marriage, for his indignant uncle threw him bang over the room.

DIFFERENCE BETWEEN WIT AND HUMOR.

There has been so many thousand definitions of Wit and Humor that we do not offer the slightest apology for the following simple explanation of the difference between them. We have but little doubt that it will fully come up in merit and success to its numerous predecessors, the majority of which have been egregious failures.

Humor is the art of saying happy things that have the effect of making others happy; while Wit, and especially that grade of it that takes the form of Satire, is the art of saying smart things that are the cause of smarting in others.

ROBBERY OF THE NATIONAL APPLE ORCHARD.

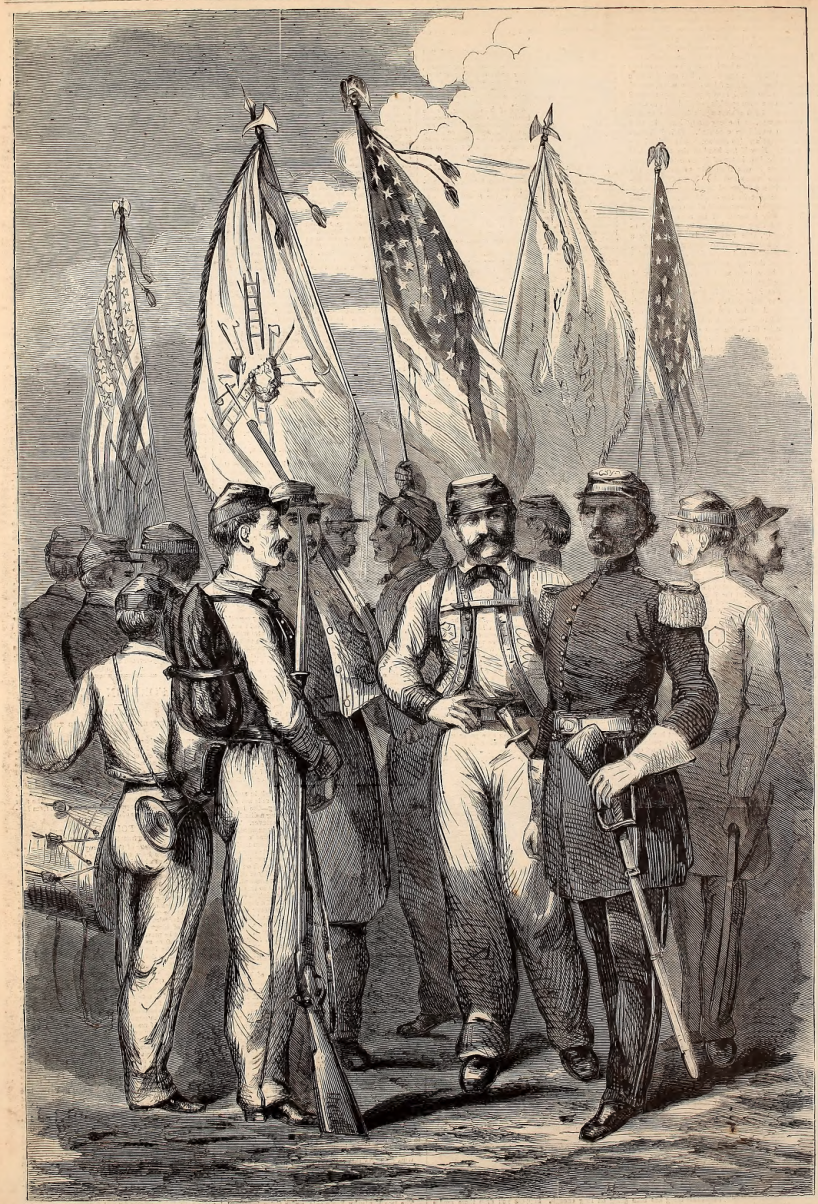
PRESIDENT LINCOLN. "I say, Jeff, this thing has been going on long enough. Suppose you drop those apples now and come down."

JEFF DAVIS. "Please don't shoot, Mr. Lincoln, ALL I WANT IS TO BE LET ALONE!"

"BEING HER DEAR SIMON."—The French have just launched another steel frigate, but our Admiralty are so slow with theirs that Britannia, in her leisure moments, will have plenty of time to sing, "Still, so gently o'er me sticking."

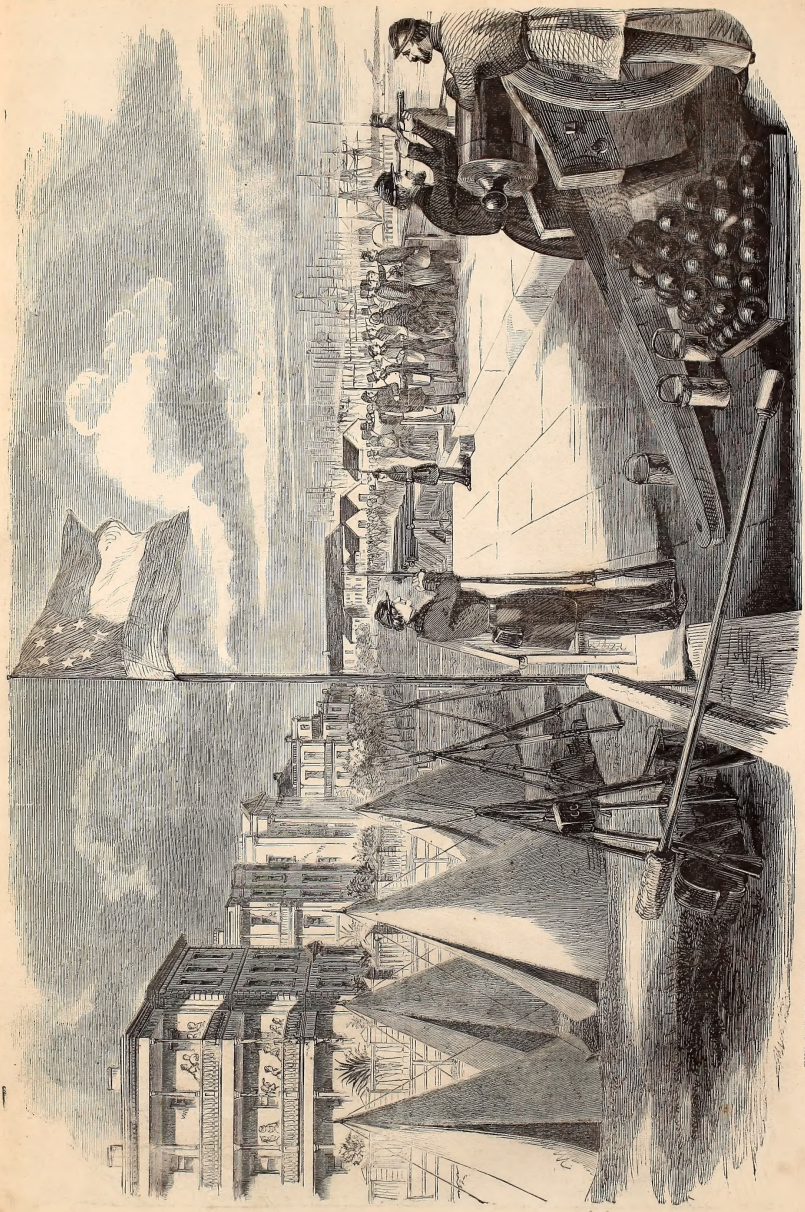
A NEW FASHION.—We are continually being told that "Pride will have a fall," but we never could understand it. As Pride is never ashamed of showing her features, but on the contrary is rather proud of displaying them, being generally noted for the unabashed boldness of her countenance, we do not see the reasonableness of the remark. I still, when it is very clear that she does not want one, will persist in offering Pride, instead of Pride, the bottle. Pride is the force of the meaning; for the fall, Pride is the feeling. Pride can be earned in cards, and Pride is the prettiness of blushing behind it; and Pride can only be worn on the cheeks of Pride's face, and not in other words. Also the veil, the more highly we shall be pleased, for we do not care that no one ever wants to see her ugly face again.

PRETTY PIECE.—The Pope, in his petticoats and white satin shoes, may be looked upon as somewhat of a female. There is another point of resemblance between his Holiness and the fair sex. Both, on occasion, are ready indeed to reason. The obstinacy of the Pontiff relates to Faith, the gallant Sex to the fair one transferred. Faith He will not concede secular Government nor surrender temporal Dominion; they refuse to give up Crinoline, Pin Money, Pin Money, Pin Money



COLONEL ELLSWORTH'S NEW YORK FIRE ZOUAVES.—[SEE PAGE 311.]

COLONEL WILLIAM WILSON AND HIS STAFF (WILSON'S FIGHTING BRIGADE.)—[SEE PAGE 311.]



THE BATTERY OR PARK PROMENADE AT CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA, DURING THE BOMBARDMENT OF FORT SUMTER.—SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

OUR CHARLESTON PICTURES.

WE publish herewith a view of the BATTERY AT CHARLESTON DURING THE BOMBARDMENT OF SUMTER, and a picture of the famous RIFLED GUN which is said to have done so much injury to Fort Sumter on that occasion. On page 305 we also give a picture of the "LADY DAVIS," the first regular man-of-war of the Southern Confederacy. She is a little steamer, armed with two boat howitzers, and does not look as though she would capture the Brooklyn or the Niagara. All these pictures are from sketches sent us from Charleston by our special artist, now traveling with Mr. Russell, the correspondent of the London Times. Of the scene on the Battery, the Herald Charleston correspondent wrote:

"In one of the windows Governor Pickens, a portion of his council and staff, maintained their position during the day, availing themselves of a very powerful telescope, which carried them, as it were, into the very midst of the fight. General Beauregard, the Commander-in-chief, remained at his headquarters in the city."

The rifled cannon was sent from Europe by a South Carolinian now residing there. It bears the inscription: "Presented to the Sovereign State of South Carolina by one of her sons residing abroad, in commemoration of 20th December, 1860." This was the gun a ball from which knocked down the flag-staff at Fort Sumter. It was then at the iron battery; now it is on Morris Island, and commands the ship-channel. In the fore-ground will be seen a couple of the balls. The point is of iron, but the base a softer metal, which expands and fills the grooves in the piece when discharged. General Beauregard has seen the sketch from which our picture is made, and pronounces it extremely accurate.

DESECRATION OF THE STATUE OF WASHINGTON AT RICHMOND, VIRGINIA.

WE illustrate herewith a singular occurrence which is said to have taken place at Richmond, Virginia, on the passage of the Secession Ordinance. A telegram to the New York Times states that the people celebrated the passage of the ordinance by placing a negro astride of the celebrated statue of Washington, by Houdon, which stands in the capitol at Richmond. Richmond, it will be remembered, is the only place in the United States where the Prince of Wales was treated with discourtesy.

ELLSWORTH'S FIRE ZOUAVES.

ON page 308 we publish a picture of the uniforms of COL. ELLSWORTH'S FIRE ZOUAVES, now stationed in Washington. This gallant regiment has been entirely recruited from the ranks of the New York firemen; it is officered by Colonel Ellsworth of Chicago, whose portrait we gave last week. They are armed with Sharp's rifles, and bowie-knives which may be used as bayonets at the end of the rifles; many of them carry revolvers besides. When they left New York, they were presented with a stand of colors by the Fire Department, on whose behalf Mr. Wickham thus addressed them:

"COLONEL ELLSWORTH.—The Board of Representatives of the New York Fire Department of this city have caused to be prepared this stand of colors to present to your regiment, composed of the firemen of New York and our associates. As President of the Fire Department, I now perform that duty. Take them, place them in the midst of your gallant band, and wherever the fight is the thickest and the bullets fly the fastest let these banners be borne, and may you and your comrades, in the hour of trial and battle, remember the proud motto emblazoned upon them: 'The Star Spangled Banner in triumph shall wave.'

"Let this be your war-cry as you rush to the onset. Let it nerve your arms and fire your ranks. Wave it in triumph only; and do you bring it back, Sir, though it be tattered and torn in the fight.

"Old associates, remember, on every battle-field and in every trial, that the thousands here around you have placed in your hands a mighty charge. Go forth from this hour, and swear by that flag to live, for that flag to die."

Mrs. John Jacob Astor, Jun., also presented a stand of colors, with the following letter:

"COLONEL ELLSWORTH: Sir,—I have the honor of presenting the accompanying colors to the First Regiment New York Zouaves. In delivering the ensign of our nation into the charge of the brave men under your command, I am happy in the confidence that I intrust it to men whose hands are moved by a generous patriotism to defend it, and whose hearts feel now gladdened through your success.

"Believe me yours, with much respect and true regard, AUGUSTA ASTOR."

Colonel Ellsworth made a suitable reply.

DESECRATION OF THE STATUE OF WASHINGTON AT RICHMOND, VIRGINIA.

THE UNION BATTALION OF ZOUAVES.
DEATH TO SECESSIONISTS.

The other officer on his left holding up in both hands a bowie-knife and revolver, Wilson shouted to them to swear, and they responded with shouts of 'Blood!' 'blood!' 'blood!' 'We swear,' etc.

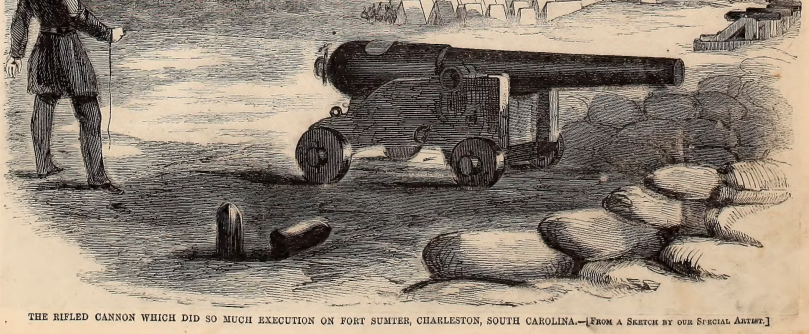
"The band then struck in with the 'Star Spangled Banner,' which they all sung in chorus, as well as also 'Dixie Land.'"

WILSON'S FIGHTING MEN.

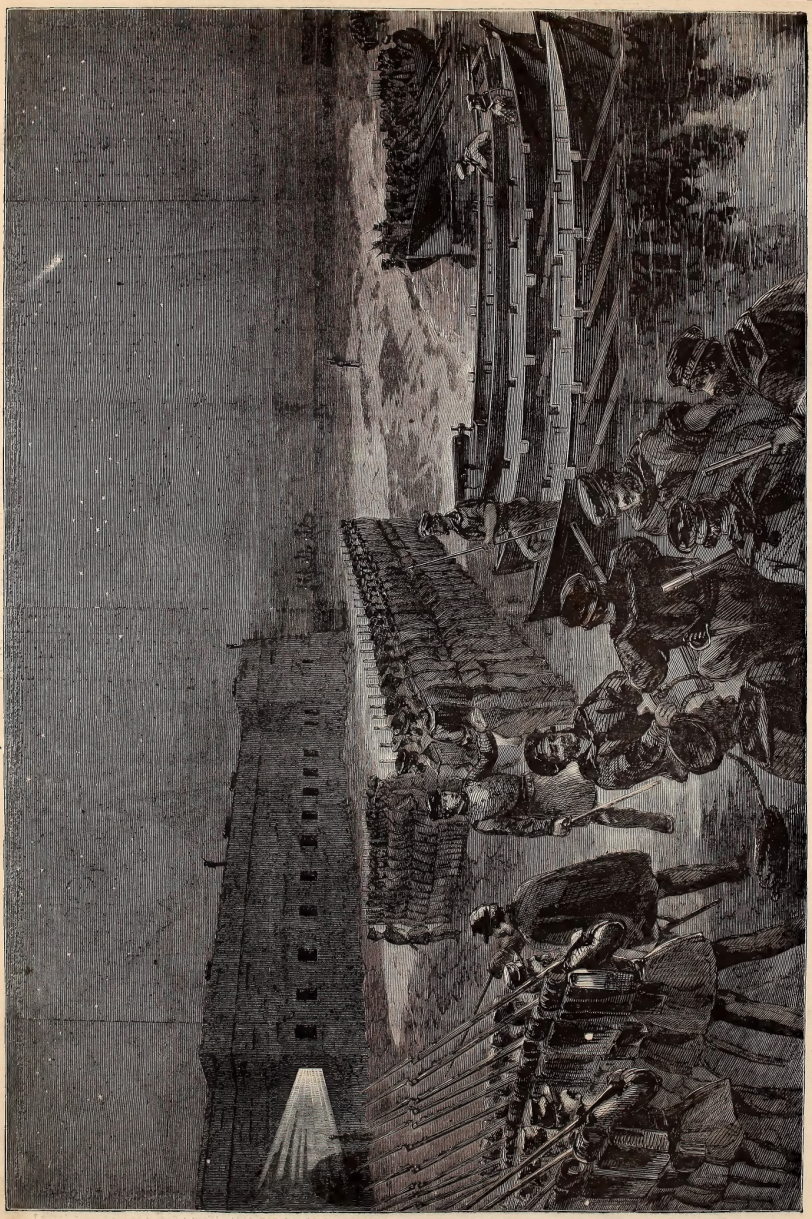
ON page 309 will be found a group of WILSON'S FIGHTING ZOUAVES. We gave a portrait and sketch of Colonel Wilson in our last number. This regiment has been recruited from the roughs and b'hoys of New York city. Their uniform is a gray shirt, gray pants, brown felt hat, belt, and bregans: their arms are the Minié rifle, a bowie-knife, and in many cases a revolver. The Herald thus described the ceremony of swearing them in:

"All the men being ranged against the walls, Colonel Wilson, with a drawn sabre in one hand and the American flag in the other, stood forth uncovered, and addressed his men amidst deafening cheers.

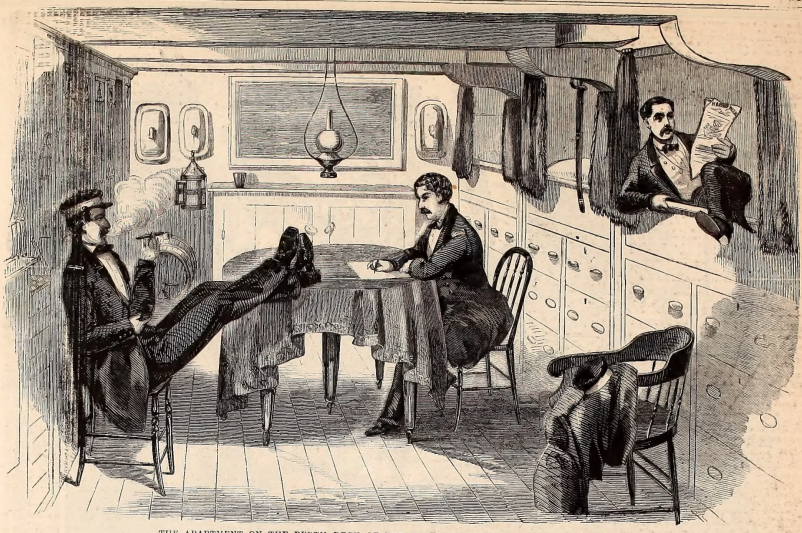
"After a short adjuration to the flag, for which he declared his devotion, he called upon all to kneel and swear with him. Waving the former and flourishing his sabre, he knelt on one knee. All present knelt with him and repeated the oath which he put to them to support the flag, and never flinch from its path through blood or death. He said he would lead them to Baltimore, and they would march through it or die; at which they all arose with a tremendous yell, firing up their hats and brandished their glittering knives amidst prolonged and frantic cheers. He then announced death to the Baltimore traitor secessionists and Fire Uglies, and said they would leave a monument of their bones in the streets of Baltimore. Amidst yells of 'Death to the Fire Uglies,' he illustrated with his sword how they should sew their way, and said though he should be the first man slain, he had but one thing to ask, which was that each of his followers should secure his man and avenge his blood. That they would do this, he again called upon them to swear, and marching round the hall, holding up the flag and the sword, and accompanied by two officers, the one on his right bearing a banner inscribed:



THE RIFLED CANNON WHICH DID SO MUCH EXECUTION ON FORT SUMTER, CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA.—[FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.]



REINFORCEMENT OF FORT PICKENS BY COMPANY A, FIRST ARTILLERY, ON SATURDAY MORNING, APRIL 13.—SKETCHED BY AN ENGINEER OFFICER OF THE "BROOKLYN."—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]



THE APARTMENT ON THE BERTH DECK OF THE "BROOKLYN" IN WHICH OUR ARTIST RESIDES.

THE REINFORCEMENT OF FORT PICKENS.

We publish herewith, from sketches by an Engineer officer of the United States sloop of war Brooklyn, a view of the REINFORCEMENT OF FORT PICKENS, of the GUN-DECK OF THE "BROOKLYN," and of THE OFFICERS' WARD-ROOM ON BOARD THAT SHIP. The author of the sketches thus writes us concerning them:

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

U. S. SHIP "BROOKLYN," OFF FORT PICKENS, FLORIDA, April 23, 1861.

On Friday, April 12, our captain received orders to prepare for landing the troops (Company A, First Artillery) which we brought from Fort Monroe. After sunset all the boats were hoisted out and dropped astern. Volunteers were called for to man them, and every man in the ship volunteered.

(Continued on Page 316.)

DISEMBARKING THE TROOPS FROM THE U. S. SHIP "BROOKLYN" TO REINFORCE FORT PICKENS, APRIL 12, 1861.—[SKETCHED BY AN ENGINEER OFFICER ON BOARD.]

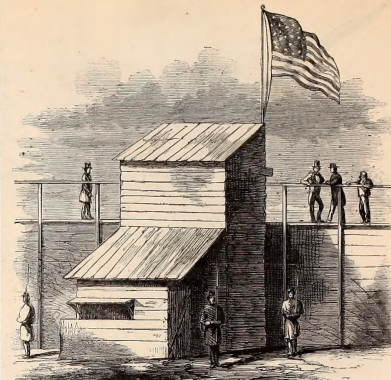
METHODS OF CONVEYING COTTON IN INDIA TO THE PORTS OF SHIPMENT.—[SEE PAGE 316.]

THE VIRGINIAN OF 1776.

THE VIRGINIAN OF 1861.

THE SEVENTH REGIMENT N. Y. STATE MILITIA HALTING FOR A REST ON THE MARCH TO ANNAPOLIS JUNCTION.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.—[SEE PAGE 317.]

QUARTERS OF COMPANIES A AND D, SECOND OHIO INFANTRY, AT CAMP DENNISON, NEAR LANCASTER, PENNSYLVANIA.—[SKETCHED BY CAPTAIN GEORGE M. FISCH.]



HEAD-QUARTERS OF COLONEL A. McCOOK, OF THE FIRST OHIO INFANTRY, AT CAMP DENNISON, NEAR LANCASTER, PENNSYLVANIA.—[SKETCHED BY CAPTAIN GEORGE M. FISCH.]

After selecting the crews, they were armed to the teeth for covering the landing of the troops. As the enemy threatened to prevent the landing, having stationed coast-guards along shore for that purpose, it was necessary to send a considerable force; so the Sabine and St. Louis' boats were sent to assist our men. After the moon had set all deck lights were extinguished, to prevent the enemy discovering our movements. Strange to say, the light-house on shore, whose powerful light would make the position of our ships visible, was put out about the same time. Between ten and eleven o'clock the ship got under way, creeping slowly toward the shore and sounding all the way, anchoring in seven fathoms of water, which indicated close proximity to the shore. The boats were then got alongside, and the men disembarked. At this time the ship's deck presented an interesting and lively spectacle, though all was done very quietly, reflecting great credit upon the officers in command. After all was ready, Lieutenant Albert N. Smith, who had command of the boat expedition, shoved off, and the other boats followed in line. He intended landing on the beach near the ship and marching to the fort—a distance of about three miles—but finding the surf too heavy, he determined to pull into the harbor and land in front of Pickens. He was successful; the doors of the fort were opened, and the troops entered. In the mean while the Wyandotte carried all the Sabine's marines and put them on the Brooklyn, which, together with the Brooklyn's marines, were to go also. The boats made a second trip, being successful in getting the marines into the fort; but day broke before the boats got out of the harbor, making the sleepy sentinels on McRea and Barrancas rub their eyes in astonishment, not daring to molest the returning party.

The sketch representing the disembarkation gives a correct view of the Brooklyn's gun-deck and battery of nine-inch Dahlgren shell-guns.

☞ We shall be glad to hear again from our correspondent, and from other officers of the United States fleet now in the Gulf. Sketches of the movements of the ships will always be acceptable.

LANDING THE RHODE ISLAND ARTILLERY AT WASHINGTON.

ON page 305 we give a picture—from a sketch by our special artist—of the landing of the Rhode Island Battery at the Washington Arsenal, from the Bienville, on Thursday, April 25. This is one of the finest batteries in the service. On seeing it, the President could not help observing that it was "the prettiest battery he had ever seen." A newspaper correspondent thus sketches their being sworn in:

"The Rhode Island regiment was sworn in in the east Capitol garden, by Major M'Dowell. The men were inspected by companies, and then formed in a hollow square, the American and Revolutionary flags were brought to the centre, and then, holding up their right hands, the twelve hundred men repeated the oath after General Thomas, a magistrate of the district. The scene was very imposing, and the setting sun, lighting up the front of the Capitol, strongly relieving the statues against the green-sward, and glancing from bayonets, made the tout ensemble most beautiful. Then, breaking into column, and wearing their red blankets as overcoats, the regiment marched back to quarters, Governor Sprague leading them on horseback."

HOISTING THE STARS AND STRIPES AT BALTIMORE.

WE illustrate this scene herewith, from a photograph by Mr. Weaver. The Associated Press dispatch thus describes it:

"At noon, on 1st May, the Star-spangled Banner was raised, with great demonstrations of enthusiasm, from the Post-office and Custom-house, by order of the newly appointed officials. A large crowd assembled in front of the Custom-house to witness the flag-raising. A new flag-staff was erected over the portico, and at precisely quarter to twelve Captain Frazier, a veteran sea-captain of Fells Point, who was assigned the honor, drew up the flag, which, as it spread to the breeze, was greeted with tremendous applause, waving of hats, cheers for the Union and the old flag. The crowd then joined in singing the 'Star-spangled Banner.'

"After the crowd had left the Custom-house to-day a man named George Lemmon, in the uniform of the Maryland Guard, deliberately cut down the American flag, which fell into the arms of a by-stander. He was immediately arrested by a Deputy Sheriff, and with some difficulty saved from the wrath of the few Union men present, and conveyed to the police station, where he awaits examination. The Guard, it is said, will expel the offender.

"Lemmon was taken before the United States Marshal, and held in $500 security for examination to-morrow. His friends claim that he did not commit the act, while others are positive he cut the halyards with a pocket-knife."

COTTON IN INDIA.

WE publish on page 314 a graphic picture representing the difficulties of moving cotton to the sea-board in India. Since the rebellion broke out at the South the British consumers of cotton have been moving heaven and earth to obtain a supply of cotton from elsewhere, and especially from India, which already produces a good deal of cotton. The great difficulty in India is in the moving cotton to the ports.

An Indian road is a curious thing. Suppose the dry bed of a considerable mountain torrent placed a little nearer the horizontal than it usually lies, and perhaps it may supply some tolerable notion of the state of an Indian road. A writer on India, speaking of the province of Candeish, says: "In the year 1847 the collector of the district was compelled to grant the cultivators remissions of the land-tax, not from any successive failure of crops, but the very reverse. The yield of the province had become augmented so far beyond the local requirements, and the state (or rather total want) of the roads was such a barrier to the disposal of their produce elsewhere that their crops lay useless on their hands, and they found themselves without means."

RAISING THE STARS AND STRIPES OVER THE CUSTOM-HOUSE AT BALTIMORE, ON MAY 1.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY W. H. WEAVER.]

A gentleman, who was an eye-witness to the facts he relates, thus refers to the perils of cotton bales on their pilgrimage from the plantation to the nearest Indian port. This port may probably be distant 1000 miles; and if the owner of the cotton live sufficiently near to some river station on the Ganges, after getting through the difficulties of the transit on such Indian roads as we have described, he may at length find his cotton produce on the banks of the river. Are his difficulties then at an end by his finding at this point a safe and ready conveyance for his property to Calcutta? Not at all. If he aims at embarking it on a river steamer he may find that the few that exist are all booked for many months to come; or, if such should not be the case, the cost demanded for carriage is so heavy as would at once destroy all hope of profit from his goods. In this state of things his dernier ressort is a country boat, which is a rickety conveyance under the most favorable circumstances, but becomes alarming to contemplate with his cotton bales piled upon it. There is no help or choice left, however, so the boat is dispatched; but when it will arrive at its destination, or in what state its cargo will be delivered, are events that lie shrouded in the most absolute uncertainty. If it happen to be the hot season the crazy craft will most likely lie on some sandbank for weeks together; if, on the other hand, through delay it should be overtaken by the rains, it is 1000 to 1 but that the top-heavy vessel will be capsized in a squall, and the luckless freight, if not totally lost, will almost to a certainty be irremediably ruined. Nor is the sum of its mischances yet at an end, for the probability is that, even on the most favorable voyage, the inflammable cargo will be set on fire on an average every alternate day, from the boatmen cooking their meals, each man using his separate charcoal-pan.

THE LONG BRIDGE OVER THE POTOMAC.

We publish herewith, from a picture by our special artist, a view of the LONG BRIDGE AT WASHINGTON, over which the road to Alexandria passes. A writer for the Herald says:

"At the extremity of the bridge a company of soldiers is stationed, and, for form's sake, sentinels parade to and fro. The passage across the bridge is, however, unobstructed during day, and wagons are constantly passing and repassing. The bridge is one mile long, is not covered, and about a quarter of a mile of the central part is built of masonry, with low parapets, and resembles a country road. The rest of the bridge is wood. It is about the width of three carriages, and has two draws, one on the Washington and one on the Virginia side. These are almost constantly open for the passage of small armed propellers, with which the Potomac swarms.

"A company of flying artillery is stationed on the bridge every night, near the Virginia shore, with the draw raised in front of them. At the Virginia terminus is a small hotel, where Colonel Lee's picket-guard was recently quartered. It is now almost deserted."

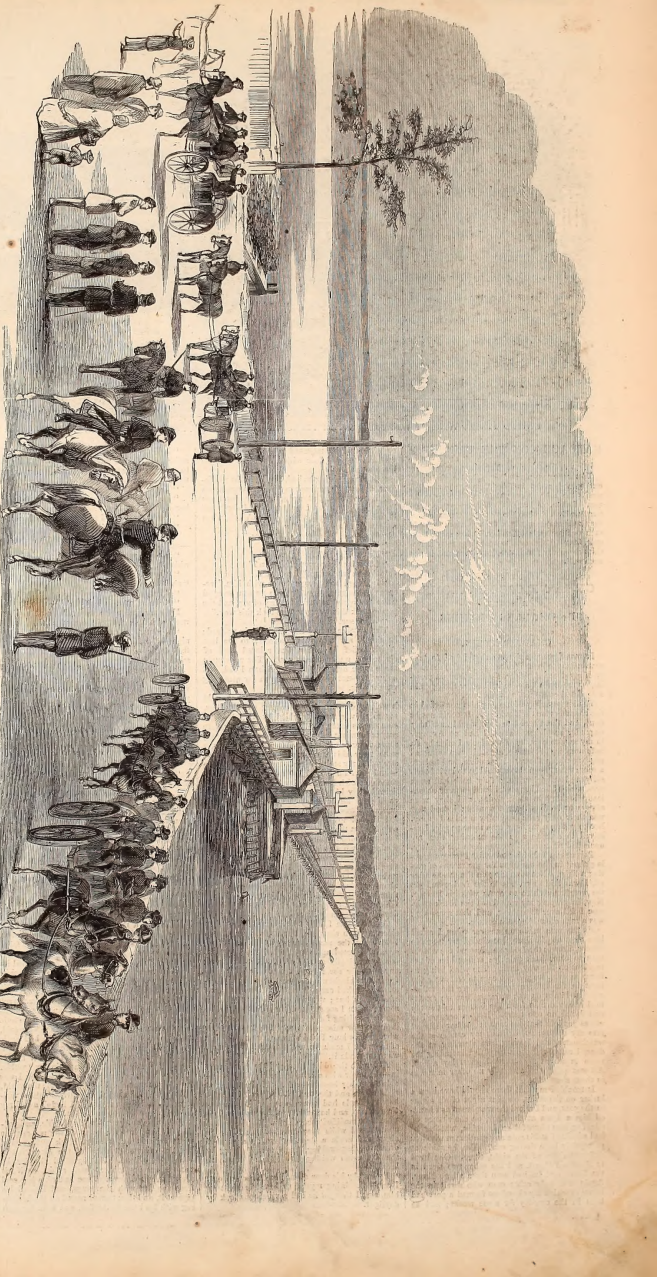
THE MARCH OF THE SEVENTH TO ANNAPOLIS.

ON page 315 we give a picture, from a sketch by our special artist, of the SEVENTH REGIMENT HALTING FOR A REST ON THE MARCH TO ANNAPOLIS JUNCTION. Our artist accompanied them on the march. Its fatigues and its perils are well described in the following extract from a letter from one of the members to the New York Times:

"General Scott has stated, as I have been informed, that the march that we performed from Annapolis to the Junction is one of the most remarkable on record. I know that I felt it the most fatiguing, and some of our officers have told me that it was the most perilous. We marched the first eight miles under a burning sun, in heavy marching order, in less than three hours; and it is well known that, placing all elementary considerations out of the way, marching on a railroad track is the most harassing. We started at about 8 o'clock A.M., and for the first time saw stated at Annapolis, which, without any disrespect to that place, I may say looked very much as if some celestial school-boy, with a box of toys under his arm, had dropped a few houses and men as he was going home from school, and that the accidental settlement was called Annapolis. Through the town we marched, the people unsympathizing, but afraid. They saw the Seventh for the first time, and for the first time they realized the men that they had threatened.

"The tracks had been torn up between Annapolis and the Junction, and here it was that the wonderful qualities of the Massachusetts Eighth Regiment came out. The locomotive had been taken to pieces by the inhabitants, in order to prevent our travel. In steps a Massachusetts volunteer, looks at the piecemeal engine, takes up a flange, and says, coolly, 'I made this engine, and I can put it together again.' Engineers were wanted when the engine was ready. Nineteen stepped out of the ranks. The rails were torn up. Practical railroad makers out of the Regiment laid them again, and all this, mind you, without care or food. These brave boys, I say, were starving while they were doing all this good work. What their Colonel was doing I can't say. As we marched along the track that they had laid they greeted us with ranks of smiling but hungry faces. One boy told me, with a laugh on his young lips, that he had not ate any thing for thirty hours. There was not, thank God, a haversack in our Regiment that was not emptied into the hands of those ill-treated heroes, nor a flask that was not at their disposal. I am glad to pay them tribute here, and mentally doff my cap.

"Our march lay through an arid, sandy, tobacco-growing country. The sun poured on our heads like hot lava. The Sixth and Second companies were sent on for skirmishing duty, under the command of Captains Clarke and Nevers, the latter commanding as senior officer. A cannon which was placed a howitzer loaded with grape and canister, headed the column, manned by the engineer and artillery corps, commanded by Lieutenant Dunning. This was the rallying point of the skirmishing party, on which, in case of difficulty, they could fall back. In the centre of the column came the cars laden with medical stores, and bearing our sick and wounded, while the extreme rear was brought up with a second howitzer, loaded also with grape and canister. The engineer corps, of course, had to do the forwarding work. New York dandies, Sir!—but they built bridges, laid rails, and headed the regiment through that terrible march. After marching about eight miles, during which time several men raved in from exhaustion, and one young gentleman was sun-struck and sent back to New York, we halted, and instantly, with the Divine instinct which characterizes the hungry soldier, proceeded to forage. The worst of it was, there was no foraging to be done. The only house within reach was inhabited by a lethargic person, who, like most Southern men, had no idea of gaining money by labor. We offered him extravagant prices to get us fresh water, and it was with the utmost reluctance we could get him to obtain us a few pailfuls. Over the mantle-piece of his miserable shanty I saw—a curious coincidence—the portrait of Colonel Duryea of our regiment."



THE LONG BRIDGE LEADING ACROSS THE POTOMAC FROM WASHINGTON TO VIRGINIA, GUARDED BY UNITED STATES ARTILLERY.—[SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.]

UNITED STATES HORSE BARRACKS ON THE TREASURY BUILDING GROUNDS AT WASHINGTON, D. C.—[FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.]

BARRACKS ON THE TREASURY GROUNDS.

THE accompanying picture, from a sketch by our special artist in Washington, shows what straits the soldiers are put to in Washington for want of room. A large body of dragoons are quartered under a shed on the Treasury Grounds—not very comfortable quarters, for a garrison town, in such weather as last Monday. They seem, however, from all accounts, to bear these petty privations cheerfully; at latest dates men and horses were well.

GREAT EXPECTATIONS.

A NOVEL.

BY CHARLES DICKENS.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

IT was fortunate for me that I had to take precautions to insure (so far as I could) the safety of my dreaded visitor, for this thought pressing on me when I awoke held other thoughts in a confused concourse at a distance.

The impossibility of keeping him concealed in the chambers was self-evident. It could not be done, and the attempt to do it would inevitably engender suspicion. True, I had no Avenger in my service now, but I was looked after by an inflammatory old female, assisted by an animated rag-bag whom she called her niece, and to keep a room secret from them would be to invite curiosity and exaggeration. They both had weak eyes, which I had long attributed to their chronically looking in at keyholes, and they were always at hand when not wanted; indeed that was their only reliable quality besides larceny. Not to get up a mystery with these people, I resolved to announce in the morning that my uncle had unexpectedly come from the country.

This course I decided on while I was yet groping about in the darkness for the means of getting a light. Not stumbling on the means after all, I was fain to go out to the Lodge and get the watchman there to come with his lantern. Now, in groping my way down the black staircase I fell over something, and that something was a man crouching in a corner.

As the man made no answer when I asked him what he did there, but cluded my touch in silence, I ran to the Lodge and urged the watchman to come back quickly: telling him of the incident on the way back. The wind being as fierce as ever, we did not care to endanger the light in the lantern by rekindling the extinguished lamps on the staircase, but we examined the staircase from the bottom to the top and found no one there. It then occurred to me as possible that the man might have slipped into my rooms; so, lighting my candle at the watchman's, and leaving him standing at the door, I examined them carefully, including the room in which my dreaded guest lay asleep. All was quiet, and assuredly no other man was in those chambers.

It troubled me that there should have been a lurker on the stairs, on that night of all nights in the year, and I asked the watchman as I handed him a dram at the door, on the chance of eliciting some hopeful explanation, whether he had admitted at his gate any gentlemen who had perceptibly been dining out? Yes, he said; at different times of the night, three. One lived in Fountain Court, and the other two lived in the Lane, and he had seen them all go home. Again, the only other man who dwelt in the house of which my chambers formed a part had been in the country for some weeks; and he certainly had not returned in the night, because we had seen his door with his seal on it as we came up stairs."

"The night being so bad, Sir," said the watchman, as he gave me back my glass, "I consumon few have come in at my gate. Besides them three gentlemen that I have named, I don't call to mind another since about eleven o'clock, when a stranger asked for you."

"My uncle," I muttered. "Yes."

"You saw him, Sir?"

"Yes. Oh yes."

"Likewise the person with him?"

"Person with him?" I repeated.

"I judged the person to be with him," returned the watchman. "The person stopped when he stooped to make inquiry of me, and the person took this way when he took this way."

"What sort of person?"

The watchman had not particularly noticed; he should say a working person; to the best of his belief he had a dust-colored kind of clothes on, under a dark coat. The watchman made more light of the matter than I did, and naturally—not having my reason for attaching weight to it.

When I had got rid of him, which I thought it well to do without prolonging explanations, my mind was much troubled by these two circumstances taken together. Whereas they were easy of innocent solution apart—as, for instance, some diner-out or diner-at-home, who had not gone near this watchman's gate, might have strayed to my staircase and dropped asleep there —and my nameless visitor might have brought some one with him to show him the way—still, joined, they had an ugly look to one as prone to distrust and fear as the changes of a few hours had made me.

I lighted my fire, which burned with a raw pale look at that dead time of the morning, and fell into a doze before it. I seemed to have been dozing a whole night when the clocks struck six. As there was full an hour and a half between me and daylight, I dozed again; now, waking up uneasily, with prolix conversations about nothing still in my ears; now, making thunder of the wind in the chimney; at length falling off into a profound sleep from which the daylight woke me with a start.

All this time I had never been able to consider my own situation, nor could I do so yet. I had not the power to attend to it. I was greatly dejected and distressed, but in an incoherent wholesale sort of way. As to forming any plan for the future, I could as soon have formed an elephant. When I opened the shutters and looked out at the wet wild morning, all of a leaden hue; when I walked from room to room; when I sat down again shivering, before the fire, waiting for my lunches to appear: I thoug t how miserable I was, but hardly knew why, or how long I had been so, or on what day of the week I made the reflection, or even who I was that made it.

At length the old woman and the niece came in—the latter with a head not easily distinguishable from her broom—and testified surprise at sight of me and the fire. To whom I imparted how my uncle had come in the night and was then asleep, and how the breakfast preparations were to be modified accordingly. Then I washed and dressed while they knocked the furniture about and made a dust, and so, in a sort of dream or sleep-waking, found myself sitting by the fire again waiting for—Him—to come to breakfast.

By-and-by his door opened and he came out. I could not bring myself to bear the sight of him, and I thought he had a villainous look by daylight.

"I do not even know," said I, speaking low as he took his seat at the table, "by what name to call you. I have given out that you are my uncle."

"That's it, dear boy! Call me uncle."

"You assumed some name, I suppose, on board ship?"

"Yes, dear boy. I took the name of Provis."

"Do you mean to keep that name?"

"Why, yes, dear boy, it's as good as another unless you'd like another."

"What is your own name?" I asked him in a whisper.

"Magwitch," he answered, in the same tone; "chris'n'd Abel."

"What were you brought up to be?"

"A warmint, dear boy."

He answered quite seriously, and used the word as if it denoted some profession.

"When you came into the Temple last night—" said I, pausing to wonder whether that could really have been last night which seemed so long ago.

"Yes, dear boy?"

"When you came in at the gate and asked the watchman the way here, had you any one with you?"

"With me? No, dear boy."

"But there was some one there?"

"I didn't take particular notice," he said, dubiously, "not knowing the ways of the place. But I think there was a person, too, come in alongst me."

"Are you known in London?"

"I hope not!" said he, giving his neck a jerk with his forefinger that made me turn hot and sick.

"Were you known in London, once?"

"Not over and above, dear boy. I was in the provinces mostly."

"Were you—tried—in London?"

"Which time?" said he, with a sharp look.

"The last time."

He nodded. "First knowed Mr. Jaggers that way. Jaggers was for me."

It was on my lips to ask him what he was tried for, but he took up a knife, gave it a flourish, and with the words, "And whatever I done is worked out and paid for!" fell to at his breakfast.

He ate in a ravenous way that was very disagreeable, and all his actions were uncouth, noisy, and greedy. Some of his teeth had failed him since I saw him eat on the marshes, and as he turned his food in his mouth, and turned his head sideways to bring his strongest fangs to bear upon it, he looked terribly like a hungry old dog. He had grown with my appetite he would have taken it away, and I should have sat much as I did—repelled from him by an insurmountable aversion, and gloomily looking at the cloth.

"I'm a heavy grubber, dear boy," he said, as a polite kind of apology when he had made an end of his meal, "but I always was. If it had been in my constitution to be a lighter grubber, I might ha' got into lighter trouble. Similarly, I must have my smoke. When I was first hired out as shepherd t'other side the world, it's my belief I should ha' turned into a mopping-and-mowing sheep myself, if I hadn't a had my smoke."

As he said so, he got up from table, and putting his hand into the breast of the pea-coat he wore, brought out a short black pipe, and a handful of loose tobacco of the kind that is called Negro-head. Having filled his pipe, he put the surplus tobacco back again, as if his pocket were a drawer. Then he took a live coal from the fire with the tongs, and lighted his pipe at it, and then turned round on the hearth-rug with his back to the fire, and went through his favorite action of holding out both his hands for mine.

"And this," said he, dandling my hands up and down in his, as he puffed at his pipe—"and this is the gentleman wot I made! The real genuine One! It does me good fur to look at you, Pip. All I stip'late is to stand by and look at you, dear boy!"

I released my hands as soon as I could, and found that I was beginning slowly to settle down to the contemplation of my condition. What I was chained to, and how heavily, became intelligible to me, as I heard his hoarse voice, and sat looking up at his furrowed bald head with its iron-gray hair at the sides.

"I mustn't see my gentleman a footing it in the mire of the streets; there mustn't be no mud on his boots. My gentleman must have horses, Pip! Horses to ride, and horses to drive, and horses for his servant to ride and drive as well. Shall colonists have their horses (and blood 'uns, if you please, good Lord!) and not my London gentleman? No, no. We'll show 'em another pair of shoes than that, Pip; won't us?"

He took out of his pocket a great thick pocket-book, bursting with papers, and tossed it on the table.

"There's something worth spending in that there book, dear boy. It's yourn. All I've got ain't mine; it's yourn. Don't you be afraid on it. There's more where that come from. I've come to the old country fur to see my gentleman spend his money like a gentleman. That'll be my pleasure. My pleasure 'ull be fur to see him do it. And blast you all!" he wound up, looking round the cornice of the room and snapping his fingers once with a loud crack, "blast you every one, from the judge in his wig to the colonist a stirring up the dust, I'll show a better gentleman than the whole kit on you put together!"

"Stop!" said I, almost in a frenzy of fear and dislike, "I want to speak to you. I want to know what is to be done. I want to know how you are to be kept out of danger, how long you are going to stay, what projects you have."

"Look'ee here, Pip," said he, laying his hand on my arm in a suddenly altered and subdued manner; "first of all, look'ee here. I forgot myself half a minute ago. What I said was low; that's wot it was; but look'ee here, Pip. Look over it. I ain't a going to be low."

"First," I resumed, half groaning, "what precautions can be taken against your being recognized and seized?"

"No, dear boy," he said, in the same tone as before, "that don't go first. Lowness goes first. When I took a upward year to make a gentleman out without knowing wot's due to him. Look'ee here, Pip. I was low; that's wot I was; low. Look over it, dear boy."

Some sense of the grimly-ludicrous moved me to a fretful laugh, as I replied, "I have looked over it. In Heaven's name, don't harp upon it!"

"Yes, but look'ee here," he persisted. "Dear boy, I ain't come so fur to be low. Now, go on, dear boy. You was a saying—"

"How are you to be guarded from the danger you have incurred?"

"Well, dear boy, the danger ain't so great. Without I was informed against, the danger ain't so much to signify. There's Jaggers, and there's Wemmick, and there's you. Who else is there to inform?"

"Is there no chance person who might identify you in the street?" said I, bitterly.

"Well," he returned, "there ain't many. Nor yet I don't intend to advertise myself in the papers by the name of A. M. come back from Botany Bay; and years have rolled away, and who's to gain by it? Still, look'ee here, Pip. If the danger had been fifty times as great, I should ha' come to see you, mind you, just the same."

"And how long do you remain?"

"How long?" said he, taking his black pipe from his mouth, and dropping its jaw as he stared at me. "I'm not a going back. "I've come for good."

"Where are you to live?" said I. "What is to be done with you? Where will you be safe?"

"Dear boy," he returned, "there's disguising wigs can be bought for money, and there's hairpowder, and spectacles, and black clothes—shorts, and wot not. I shall drop into it safe afore, and wot others has done afore others and with less. As to the where and how of living, dear boy, give me your own opinions on it."

"You talk it smoothly now," said I, "but you were very serious last night when you swore it was Death."

"And so I swear it is Death," said he, putting his pipe back in his mouth, "and Death by the rope, in the open street not far from this, and it's serious that you should fully understand it to be so. Wot then, when that's once done? Here I am. To go back now 'ud be as bad as to stand gallows-dowse. Besides, I'm low here, because I've meant it by you, years and years. As to wot I dare, I'm a old bird now, as has dared all sorts of traps since first he was fledged, and I'm not afraid to perch up on a scarecrow. If there's Death hid inside of it, there is, and let him come, and I'll face him, and then I'll believe in him and not afore. And now let me have a look at my gentleman again."

Once more he saw by light of the candles and surveyed me with an air of admiring proprietorship: smoking with great complacency all the while.

It appeared to me that I could do no better than secure him some quiet lodging hard by, of which he might take possession when Herbert returned: remaining in it two or three days. That the secret must be confided to Herbert as a matter of unavoidable necessity, even if I could have the nonsense of leaving Newman shoved like a fiend in his own house, was plain to me. But it was by no means so plain to me, that I could do well in telling him that name), who reserved his consent to Herbert's participation until he should have seen him and formed a favorable judgment of his physiognomy. "And even then, dear boy," said he, pulling a greasy little clasped black Testament out of his pocket, "I will have him on his oath."

To state that my terrible patron carried this little black book about the world solely to swear people on in cases of emergency, would be to state what I am quite certain could not—but this I can say, that I never knew him put it to any other use. The book itself had the appearance of having been stolen from some court of justice, and perhaps his knowledge of its antecedents combined with his own experience in that wise, gave him a relish on its powers as a sort of legal spell or charm. On this first occasion of his producing it, I recalled how he had made me swear fidelity in the church-yard long ago, and how he had described himself last night as swearing to his resolutions in his solitude.

As he was at present dressed in a sea-faring slop suit, in which he looked as if he had a parrot or two and a few cigars to dispose of, I next discussed with him what dress he should wear. He cherished an extraordinary belief in the virtues of "shorts" as a disguise, and had in his own mind sketched a dress for himself that would have made him something between a dean and a dentist. It was with considerable difficulty that I was able to win the assumption of a dress more like a prosperous farmer's; and we arranged that he should cut his hair close and wear a little powder. Lastly, as I had not yet been seen by the laundress or her niece, he was to keep himself out of their view until his change of dress was made.

It would seem a simple matter to decide on these precautions; but in my dazed, not to say distracted, state, it took so long that I did not get out to farther them until two or three in the afternoon. He was to remain shut up in the chambers until I came back, and I had not yet been seen by the laundress or her niece, he was to keep himself out of their view until his change of dress was made.

There being to my knowledge a respectable lodging-house in Essex Street, the back of which looked into the Temple, and was almost within hail of my windows, I first of all repaired to that house, and was fortunate as to secure the second floor for Mr. Provis. I then went from shop to shop, making such purchases as were necessary to the change in his appearance. This business transacted, I hurried my face, on my own account, to Little Britain. Mr. Jaggers was at his desk, seeing me enter, got up immediately and stood before his fire.

"Now, Pip," said he, "be careful."

"I will, Sir," I returned. "For I had thought well of what I was going to say coming along."

"Don't commit yourself," said Mr. Jaggers, "and don't commit my one. You understand—any one. Don't tell me any thing: I don't want to know any thing; I am not curious."

Of course I saw that he knew the man was come.

"I merely want, Mr. Jaggers," said I, "to assure myself that what I have been told is true. I have no hope of its being untrue, but at least I may verify it."

Mr. Jaggers nodded. "But did you say," said he, or "informed?" he asked me, with his head on one side, and not looking at me, but looking in a listening way at the floor. "Told would seem to imply verbal communication. You can't have verbal communication with a man in New South Wales."

"I will say informed, Mr. Jaggers."

"Good."

"I have been informed by a person named Abel Magwitch that he is the benefactor so long unknown to me."

"That is the man," said Mr. Jaggers, "—in New South Wales."

"And only he?" said I.

"And only he," said Mr. Jaggers.

"I am not so unreasonable, Sir, as to think you at all responsible for my mistakes and wrong conclusions; but I always supposed it was Miss Havisham."

"As you say, Pip," returned Mr. Jaggers, turning his eyes upon me coolly, and taking a bite at his forefinger, "I am not at all responsible for that."

"And yet it looked so like it, Sir," I pleaded, with a miserable whine.

"Not a particle of evidence, Pip," said Mr. Jaggers, shaking his head and gathering up his skirts. "Only nothing looks like every thing on evidence. There's no better rule."

"I have no more to say," said I, with a sigh, after standing downcast for a little while, "as I have verified my information, and there an end."

"And Magwitch—in New South Wales—having at last disclosed himself," said Mr. Jaggers, "you will comprehend, Pip, how rigidly throughout my communication with you I have always adhered to the strict line of fact. There has never been the least departure from the straight line of fact. You are quite aware of that?"

"Quite, Sir."

"I communicated to Magwitch—in New South Wales—when he first wrote to me—from New South Wales—the caution that he must not expect me ever to go out of the strict line of fact. I also communicated to him another caution. He appeared to me to have obscurely hinted in his letter at some distant hope he had of seeing you in England here. I cautioned him that I must have no more of that; that he was not likely to obtain a pardon; that he was expatriated for the term of his natural life; and that his presenting himself in this country would be an act of felony, rendering him liable to the extreme penalty of the law. I gave Magwitch that caution," said Mr. Jaggers, looking hard at me; "I wrote it to him New South Wales. I delighted himself by it, no doubt."

"No doubt," said I.

"If I have been informed by Wemmick," pursued Mr. Jaggers, still looking hard at me, "that he has received a letter, under date Portsmouth, from a colonist of the name of Purvis, or—"

"Or Provis," I suggested.

"Or Provis—thank you, Pip. Perhaps it is Provis? Perhaps you know it's Provis?"

"Yes," said I.

"Just so. A letter, under date Portsmouth, from a colonist of the name of Provis, asking for the particulars of your address, on behalf of Magwitch. Wemmick sent him the particulars, I understand, by return of post. Probably it is through Provis that you have received the explanation of Magwitch—in New South Wales?"

"It came through Provis," I replied.

"Good. And Provis," said Mr. Jaggers, offering his hand; "glad to have seen you. In writing by post to Magwitch—in New South Wales—in communicating to him through Provis, have the goodness to mention that the particulars and vouchers of our long account shall be sent to you, begging to remind you that there is still a balance remaining in my charge. Good-day, Pip!"

We shook hands, and he looked hard at me as long as he could see me. I turned at the door, and he was still looking hard at me, while the two vile casts of faces stared at me by tipping to get their eyelids open, and to force out of their swollen throats, "Oh, what a man he is!"

Wemmick was washing the hands of his head at his desk he could have done nothing for me. I went straight back to the Temple, where I found the revolting Provis in safe hands and water and smoking negro-head in safety.

Next day the clothes I had ordered all came home, and he put them on. Whatever he put on became him less (it dismally seemed to me) than what he had worn before. To my thinking, there was no disguising him, but inside it hopeless to attempt to disguise him. The more I dressed him, and the better I dressed him, the more he looked like the sheddings' captive on the marshes. This effect on my anxious fancy was partly referable, no doubt, to his old face and manner growing more familiar to me; but I believe, too, that he dragged one of his legs as if there were still a weight of iron on it, and that from head to foot there was Convict in the very grain of the man.

The influences of his solitary hut-life were upon him besides, and gave him a savage air that no dress could tame; added to these were the influences of his subsequent branded life among men, and crowning all, his consciousness of the law's attention and hiding now. In all his ways of sitting and standing, and eating and drinking—of brooding about in a high-shouldered reticence, and taking out his great horn-handled jack-knife and wiping it on his legs and cutting his food—of lifting light glasses and cups to his lips as if they were great pannikins—of chopping a wedge off his bread, and soaking up with it the last fragments of gravy round and round his plate, as if to make the most of an allowance, and then drying his finger-ends on it, and then swallowing it—in these ways and a thousand small matters besides, instances arising every minute in the day, there was Prisoner, Felon, Bondsman, plain as plain could be.

It had been his own idea to wear that touch of powder, and I had conceded the powder after overcoming the shorts. But I can compare the effect of it, when on, to nothing but the probable effect of rouge upon the dead; so awful was the manner in which every thing in him that it was most desirable to repress started through that thin layer of pretense, and seemed to come blazing out at the crown of his head. It was abandoned as soon as tried, and he wore his grizzled hair cut short.

Words can not tell what a sense I had, at the same time, of the dreadful mystery that he was to me. When he fell asleep of an evening, with his knotted hands clenching the sides of the easy chair, and his bald head tattooed with deep wrinkles falling forward on his breast, I would sit and look at him, wondering what he had done, and loading him with all the crimes in the Calendar, until the impulse was powerful on me to start up and fly from him. Every hour so increased my abhorrence of him that I even think I might have yielded to this impulse in the first agonies of discovery, but, notwithstanding all he had done for me, and the risk he ran, but for the knowledge that Herbert must soon come back, I doubt if I could have left him, or left him in the night, and begin to dress myself in my worst clothes, hurriedly intending to leave him there with every thing else I possessed, and enlist for India as a private soldier.

I doubt if a ghost could have been more terrible to me, up in those lonely rooms in the long evenings and long nights, with the wind and the rain always rushing by. A ghost could not have been taken and hanged on my account, and the consideration had its influence; and the dread that he would be, were no small addition to my horrors. When he was not asleep or playing a complicated game of cribbage with a ragged pack of cards of his own—a game that I never saw before or since, and in which he recorded his winnings by notches made with his knife into the table —when he was not engaged in either of these pursuits he would ask me to read to him—Scott's Novels, I think, for I think I compliedd, he, not comprehending a single word, would stand before the fire surveying me with the air of an Eldorado Chief, and would set me, between the fingers of the hand with which I shaded my face, appealing in dumb show to the furniture to take yet more pains and polish. The imaginative student pursued by the misshapen creature he had impiously made was not more wretched than I. Imprisoned with the creature who had made me, and recoiling from him with a stronger repulsion the more he admired me and the fonder he was of me.

This is written of, I am sensible, as if it had lasted a year. It lasted about five days. Expecting Herbert all the time, I dared not go out, except when I took Provis for an airing after dark. At length, one evening when dinner was over and I, sitting opposite to the window, quite worn out—for my nights had been agitated and my rest broken by fearful dreams—I was roused from my drowsiness by the entrance into Provis, who had been asleep too, staggered up at the noise I made, and in an instant I saw his jack-knife shining in his hand.

"Steady!" said I. "Softly! I said; and Herbert came bursting in, with the airy freshness of six hundred miles of France upon him.

"Handel, my dear fellow, how are you, and again how are you, and again how are you? I seem to have been gone a twelvemonth!" Why, I must have been, for you have grown thin and pale! Handel, my—Hallon! I beg your pardon."

He was stopped in his rattling or and in his shaking hands with me by seeing Provis. Provis, regarding him with a fixed attention, was slowly putting his knife, knife, and groping in another pocket for something else.

"Herbert, my dear friend," said I, shutting the double doors while Herbert stood staring and wondering, "something very strange has happened. This is—a visitor of mine."

"It's all right, Herbert," said Provis, coming forward, with his little clasped black book, and then addressing himself to Herbert. "Take it in your right hand. Lord strike you dead on the spot if you ever split in any way sumever! Kiss it!"

"Do so, as he wishes it," I said to Herbert. So Herbert, looking with a friendly uneasiness at me, complied, and Provis immediately shaking hands with Herbert, said, "Now you're on your oath, you know. And never believe me on mine if Pip don't make a gentleman on you!"

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Military Books.

Viele's Hand-Book for Active Service. 24 ed., cloth, $1 00
Roberts's Hand-Book of Artillery. 9d edition.cloth.. 75
Jones's Infantry Exercises and Evolutions.cloth.. 50
Benton's Ordnance and Gunnery, half morocco 5 00
Anderson's Military Bridges. Illustrated. 8vo, cl., d.. 1 00
Barnard's Sea-Coast Defence and 15-inch Gun, 8vo, cl. 1 50
Wilson's Rifle and Rifle Practice, cloth..... 1 75
Gardner's Dictionary of the Army. 2d edition. cloth.. 3 00
Hardee's Tactics. 2 vols..... 2 50
Scott's Tactics. 3 vols..... 2 50
Lieut. Kelton's New Manual of the Bayonet (in press)
Lieut. Col. Scott's Cavalry Dictionary (in press)
Lieut. Kelton's New Manual of Sword and Sabre Exercise (in press).

Sent on receipt of price. Liberal discount to the Trade. Any of the above Books sent free by mail on receipt of the price.

A large stock of the best American, English, and French Military Books on hand.

D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher and Importer,
192 Broadway.

New Music-Book for the Young.

"THE NIGHTINGALE."

A Collection of SONGS, CHANTS, and HYMNS, designed for JUVENILE CLASSES, PUBLIC SCHOOLS, and SEMINARIES, with ELEMENTARY INSTRUCTION. The first edition of this work was so well received that the publishers have been induced to enlarge it, and it now contains over 200 fine pieces of music, comprising many of the best songs of the day, and is to be found in any other book. 30 cents. Sent, post-paid. DITSON & CO., Boston.

"Matrimony made Easy."—A new work, showing how either sex may be suitably married, irrespective of age or appearance, which can not fail—free 25 cents. Address T. Williams & Co., Publishers, Box 2300, Philad.

UNION BUTTONS.

THE WASHINGTON BUTTON.
THE MARTHA WASHINGTON BUTTON.
THE MAJOR ANDERSON BUTTON.
THE "STAR-SPANGLED BANNER" BUTTON.

"These Union Buttons, with their beautiful Sun-Pictures, appear to have engrossed the taste of the People. They adorn ladies' bonnets; they trim ladies' dresses; the Soft Bosomed rosettes are country with them; and boys' clothing is covered all over with them."

ABBOTT & CO., No. 143 Nassau Street, with Scovill Manufacturing Company.

Send your Orders to
W. A. HAYWARD, 208 Broadway,
For Union Pins, Flag Pins, Union Locket Charms, Union Rings, Tights, &c., &c., &c., and all the New Styles of Emblems!

COLDS.

BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES

Few are aware of the importance of checking a Cough or "Common Cold" in its first stage; that which in the beginning would yield to a mild remedy, if neglected, soon attacks the Lungs. "Brown's Bronchial Troches," containing demulcient ingredients, allay Pulmonary Irritation.

WANTED—MEN, WOMEN, AND BOYS in every Town, City, and Village in the United States, to act as Agents for the sale of Sherman & Co.'s Gilt Jewelry Envelopes. Agents can make from 3 to 5 dollars a day. Being largely engaged in the manufacture of a superior quality of Jewelry, we are enabled to offer to our customers a greater variety and more valuable Gifts than any other similar establishment. For further particulars enclose a stamp, and address, SHERMAN & CO., 83 Nassau Street, 3d floor, New York.

To Our Lady Friends.

Among the many compounds now offering to our lady friends, there are few that we can so readily recommend as those emanating from the celebrated house of Joseph Burnett & Co. They possess two qualities to which we would especially call attention; viz., the entire absence of all deleterious substances, and the certainty that they will perform all they are said to do. The unpleasant and oftentimes painful results attending exposure to our most changeable climate upon the skin, may be entirely obviated by the use of Burnett's Kalliston, which has now become so useful an auxiliary to the toilet that we hardly can considers her dressing-table complete without it.—N. O. True Delta.

359 LACE CURTAINS. 359
NOTTINGHAM LACE CURTAINS, FROM AUCTION.
HALF-PRICE.
GOLD WINDOW SHADES.
NEW STYLES.
BUFF HOLLAND SHADES.
WHITE HOLLAND SHADES.
BEST QUALITY.
KELTY'S 359 BROADWAY.

GARDNER'S AND COMPOUND RHEUMATIC and NEURALGIC

MAP FOR THE TIMES.
THE PRESENT THEATRE OF EVENTS.
Just published, the map every one needs, including the pages in those exciting times. Price 25 cents.
ENSIGN, BRIDGMAN & FANNING, No. 156 William St.
Copy sent by mail on receipt of price.

H. WORCESTER'S
IMPROVED PIANO FORTES,
Manufactory & Salesrooms,
4th St., cor. 3d Av., N. Y.

HOR. BRZ. UNION | MUSE LOVE | WEDDING CARDS.
Specimens by Mail on receipt of Postage stamps.
EVERDELL, 302 Broadway, N.Y.

6000 AGENTS wanted, to sell SIX NEW INVENTIONS—two very recent, and of great value to families; all pay great profits. Send four stamps and get 80 pages particulars.
EPHRAIM BROWN, Lowell, Mass.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—My Cocoaine will force them to grow heavily in six weeks upon the smoothest face; without injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of an order. R. G. GRAHAM, No. 100 Nassau Street, N. Y.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA—The best Spring Alterative. It will purify the blood, promote a vigorous circulation and invigorate the system.
For sale by A. B. & D. SANDS, 160 Fulton St., N. Y.

Harper's Weekly.
PRICE SIX CENTS.

TERMS.
One Copy for One Year . . . . $ 2 50
Two Copies for One Year 4 00
Harper's Weekly and Harper's Magazine, one year, $4 00.

Volumes I., II., III., and IV. of HARPER'S WEEKLY, handsomely bound in Cloth extra, Price $3 50 each, are now ready.

* * To postmasters and agents getting up a Club of Ten or more Copies, a Copy will be sent gratis. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. Specimen Numbers gratuitously supplied.

☞ Complete sets Teachers supplied at the lowest CLUB RATES.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

THE CENSUS.

HEAD OF THE FAMILY (filling up the paper). "Well, Miss PRIMROSE, as a Visitor, I must put your age in! What shall we say?"

MISS P. "Oh, it's best to be straightforward. The same as dear FLORA. Twenty last Birthday!"

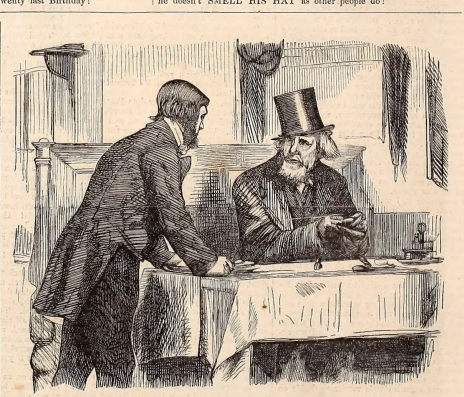
ARTHUR. "Mamma! isn't Mr. BLANQUE a Wicked Man?"

MAMMA. "Wicked, my Dear! No! What makes you ask such a question?"

ARTHUR. "Why, because Mamma, dear, when he comes into Church he doesn't SMELL HIS HAT as other people do!"

VOLUNTEER CAPTAIN. "Haven't seen you at Drill for the last week or two, Mr. ——"

RECRUIT. "Ah, well, Dear CAPTAIN! I really think I must give you a turn one o' these fine evenings!"



"SEVERE."

DAINTY OLD GENT. "Have I liked my Dinner?—No, I've not! So don't give what I've left to the Cat, Sir; because, as she's sure to become Pie, I should like her to die a Natural Death, and not be poisoned."

ADVERTISEMENTS.

OFFICERS OF THE ARMY AND NAVY.—TELESCOPES, OPERA, RACE, and Field, coastal out-door day and night powerful WAIST-COAT-POCKET double Spy-Glasses, WEIGHING ONLY SIX OUNCES EACH, containing twelve lenses, constructed of German glass, will show distinctly a person, to know them, at one and a half and two miles. Country scenery and ships are clearly seen at eight to ten miles distant. They are powerful and brilliant Telescopes for both eyes. Also, powerful Telescopes, possessing such extraordinary power that some, 3½ inches, with an extra astronomical eye-piece, will show distinctly Jupiter's moons, Saturn's rings, and the double stars; and a person can be recognized known two miles and a half distant, and an object from fourteen to sixteen miles. They are in endless variety, of larger and all sizes, with increasing powers.

SEMMONS & CO., Opticians,
607½ Broadway, under La Farge House, New York.

Books for the Union.

Beadle's Dime Biographical Library, No. 6.

THE LIFE AND MILITARY SERVICES OF LIEUT.-GEN. WINFIELD SCOTT.

BEADLE'S DIME SQUAD DRILL BOOK; or, School of the Soldier. For the use of the Recruit, the Home Guard, and the Citizen Soldier.

BEADLE'S DIME SONGS FOR THE WAR.

Price Ten Cents. For sale at all News Depots. Sent by mail on receipt of Price. Address

BEADLE & COMPANY,
New York.

$10 Steel Plate MAP for 50 Cents.

Six feet square, printed on an entire sheet of the very finest map paper, colored in States and Counties, in sheets, for 50 cents; or $1 in cloth, pocket form, for army use; or $2 50 mounted on linen, with rollers. Original cost $5000.

Lloyd's Map of the Southern States

of North America.

Any person finding an error on this Map will receive a Copy gratis, by writing to the publisher.

Drawn from actual Surveys, showing every foot of the Southern Country from Delaware to the banks of the Rio del Norte, Mexico. Every County and County Seat, Town, Village, Fort, Navy Yard, River, and towns and landings on the rivers, Lake, Swamp and Mountain is marked down. Every Railroad completed up to 6th day of May, 1861, and all those projected are exhibited on this Map; every Station, and the distance from station to station is marked distinctly.

This map is acknowledged by Civil Engineers to be the best drawn, and most accurate of any map ever offered to the public before. The surveys for this map were made by Civil Engineers of the Slave States; and the information of the Railroad, Stations and Distances were furnished by Southern Railroad men themselves, and can be relied on as correct. In fact, this is THE ONLY CORRECT MAP OF THE SOUTHERN COUNTRY EVER DRAWN. The people of the Northern States can see correctly at a glance the preponderance of the Southern Country over the Northern and Western States, and will more fully comprehend the reason of the Southern States' rapidity in marching westward at the fall pillar of Mexico, which are exhibited on this Map. Can be sent by mail any where in America, for one cent postage. Agents can sell 50 per day. Send money for sample Map and Private Circular. County Rights given. No POSTAGE STAMPS TAKEN.

This Map is not rushed out for the present Crisis, but has been under progress for one year past, and is now just finished.

Address J. T. LLOYD, Agt., 164 Broadway, N. Y.

WARD'S

Perfect Fitting Shirts,

MADE TO MEASURE AT $18 PER DOZEN, OR SIX FOR $9.

MADE OF NEW YORK MILLS MUSLIN, With fine Linen Bosoms, and warranted as good a Shirt as sold in the retail stores at $1 50 each.

ALSO, THE VERY BEST SHIRTS THAT CAN BE MADE AT $2 EACH.

SELF-MEASUREMENT FOR SHIRTS. Printed directions, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of Shirts sent free everywhere, and so easy to understand, that any one can take their own measure for Shirts. I warrant a good fit. The cash to be paid to the Express Company on receipt of goods.

S. W. H. WARD, from London,

No. 387 Broadway, N. Y., up Stairs.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK,
Have Now Ready:

SILAS MARNER.

The Weaver of Raveloe. By GEORGE ELIOT, Author of "Adam Bede," "The Mill on the Floss," and "Scenes of Clerical Life." 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents; Paper, 50 cents.

General Scott's Infantry Tactics;

OR,

Rules for the Exercise and Maneuvres of the United States Infantry.

3 vols. 24mo, Muslin, $2 50.

Published by Authority.

United States Army Regulations.

Approved by the President of the United States, and Printed under the Directions of SIMON CAMERON, Secretary of War.

12mo, Muslin, $1 50.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

HARPER'S

NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
Five or more Copies for One Year (each) . 2 00

And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of EIGHT SUBSCRIBERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MAGAZINE, together, one year, $4 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. V.—No. 230.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 25, 1861. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $2 50 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1861, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

WILLARD'S HOTEL, WASHINGTON, SAVED BY THE NEW YORK FIRE ZOUAVES.—SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.—[SEE PAGE 331.]

NOT DEAD.

"The Union is not dead but sleeping."
(Motto on a New York banner.)

THE Union is not dead! Her glorious flag
Is too near Heaven to cower in the dust;
Only to watchers seems the time be lag,
And we are watching o'er a sacred trust.
Our country's dead are looking to us now,
And all earth's nations, leaning breathlessly,
Are witnesses around us, as we vow
To save our Union and our liberty.

She is not dead, but sleeping for a while.
Till this dark night of wickedness shall break;
When the sun's warm, bright beams once more shall shine
Upon us, she shall joy unto wakes.
Crossed with the Stars that fallen in her traitor-Banner by Virginia shift stands for her fate;
Proclaiming peace unto our land again—
Blessed by unnumbered hearts as on she goes!
Till then around her couch our watch we'll keep,
And guard her in her sleep.

She sleeps, Earth trembles, men recoil in doubt;
Murmurs of distant voices fill the air;
And from our city bursts a sterner shout—
"Up, brothers, to the ranks! our flag is there!"
Now swell your bosoms with a holy faith;
Our moment to Jehovah bend the knee;
Then up and onward, with undaunted will!
Go, shake your lives for truth and victory!
This is no time for us to wail and weep—
Our Union is asleep!

Nay! Rather go and wake her from her sleep!
Bring back each star by traitor hands disgraced—
Each soldier's stripe to grasp the starry loop.
Till every traitor's footing is effaced;
Then shall the Union rise in treason's wane,
And never sleep again!

S. J. A.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MAY 25, 1861.

TO OUR SOUTHERN READERS.

WE have received a number of letters from Maryland, Kentucky, Tennessee, and other Southern States, complaining bitterly of the tone of an editorial article published in Harper's Weekly on May 4. Some of these letters are from friends, and appeal to the Christian feelings and kindly disposition of the publishers. Others are from strangers; and of these some are simply abusive, while others threaten the proprietors of this journal with assassination if Harper's Weekly perseveres in opposing the destruction of the American Union.

The point which excuses these several classes of correspondence is the statement in our editorial of March 4, to the effect that civil war between the Free States on one side and the Slave States on the other will inevitably sooner or later become a war of emancipation, and then the Free States, when Northern blood begins to flow, will not fail to turn to account the chief element of weakness in the enemy.

For saying this we are accused by old friends and valued correspondents of seeking to stir up slave insurrections, and thirsting for the slaughter of children and the violation of women!

We here, but ourselves, repel with no such charge. No United States army will abet such slave insurrections as may endanger the safety of the defenseless portion of the Southern people. Whatever women or children are assailed, United States troops will be the first to protect them. For ourselves, we scorn to defend ourselves against a charge so monstrously untrue, so basely unjust, and so malignantly false.

At the same time, we should fail in our duty to our Southern friends if we neglected to warn them that the first great battle in which Northern blood is shed can not but hasten the destruction of the slave institution in the States where United States troops are quartered. In saying this, we express no opinion and no hope. We merely record an obvious fact. We begin the war with solicitous tenderness for the peculiar institution. Colonel Dimick, at Fort Monroe, returns fugitive slaves to General Butler, at Annapolis, offers the services of the Massachusetts volunteers to suppress slave insurrections; a volunteer company in Indiana tenders its aid for a like service in Kentucky. But our Southern friends must be very blind indeed, and very ignorant of the impulses which sway human nature, if they suppose that we, in the pursuits of their attempt to destroy our Government, they begin to cut the throats of our brothers and our brave boys, we shall be so complaisant as this. We should be contemplating them in a poor service if we allowed them to harbor such a delusion without endeavoring to dispel it. It is better that they should understand the case clearly from the start. The United States, as a nation, have no concern with slavery. But from the hour that rebels shed the blood of citizens of the United States, war will be waged upon them by the most crushing and overwhelming methods; and among those methods the liberation of the slaves will naturally occur.

We say this, not in passion or from feeling, but simply as the calm statement of a fact as obvious as any in fixed science. Actual war between Slave and Free States ultimately involves bolition. 'Tis for the Border States to reject or accept the issue.

Some of our Southern friends accompany their above of this journal with a notice to the publishers to send it no more to their address. In Tennessee Vigilance Committees forbid its being sold. In Louisiana the Governor prohibits its distribution through the Post-office.

This is a matter which concerns our Southern subscribers exclusively. It is of very small consequence to us. If the people of the South don't think they get the worth of their money when they buy Harper's Weekly, they would exhibit great folly in purchasing it. If they do, to prescribe Harper's Weekly is their loss. We do not propose, in publishing this journal, to stand indebted to any man's good-will for its success. We calculate to produce such a paper that it shall be every man's interest to buy it. If we fulfill our aim, our Southern friends merely cut off their own noses when they stop our circulation among them. It is purely their affair. If they think they can do without an illustrated record of what we are with not object. We have work enough to supply the Northern demand for Harper's Weekly.

But we will take this opportunity of reminding those among our Southern friends who still retain capacity for calm reflection, that the outrich has never been deemed a sagacious bird because, on the approach of danger, it buries the head in a hole so as not to see its surroundings. The proscription of books and periodicals containing doctrines hostile to those of the Southern aristocracy has been carried to a fatal length at the South. The Southern people have been kept in a state of gross ignorance by their leaders. They have only been permitted to see one side of the parapamentous question of the day. And the consequence is, that they have been precipitated into a causeless, wanton rebellion which must inflict immeasurable injury upon them and their latest interests. The Southern people had adhered to the maxim of one of the greatest of Southern statesmen, THOMAS JEFFERSON, and had steadfastly acted upon the great truth that "ERROR is harmless if reason is free to combat it," we should not now have witnessed the most audacious and most monstrous rebellion of modern times, and the fairest portions of the American continent would not have been threatened with ruin and desolation.

As for Harper's Weekly, it will continue, as heretofore, to support the Government of the United States, the Laws, the Courts, and the indivisible union of thirty-four States. We know no other course consistent with the duty of citizens, Christians, and Freemen. If any subscriber to this journal expects us to give our aid or countenance to rebellion against the Government, he will be disappointed. If any man buys this journal expecting to find us apologize for treason, robbery, rebellion, piracy, or murder, he will be disappointed. That is not our line of business. The proprietors of Harper's Weekly would rather see their journal tomorrow than publish a line in it which would hereafter cause their children to blush for the patriotism or the manhood of their parents.

ARE THE MONTGOMERY PRIVATEERS PIRATES?

ON daily contemporaries, in discussing the principle of international law comprehended in the issue of letters of marque by the Southern pretenders to overthrow a very important Federal precedent. In 1818 Elias Glenn, United States District-Attorney at Baltimore, applied to the Hon. WM. WIRT, Attorney-General, for instructions respecting the Fourth-of-July—a privateer under that name from La Plata, and taken with a letter of marque from Artigas, an insurgent chief holding Buenos Ayres, recently released by Portugal. The Attorney-General thus curtly advised the Baltimore official: "I would indict the captain and crew as pirates, under the original Act of Congress for punishing piracy." The prisoners will defend themselves under the commission of Artigas. I would object to that commission going before the jury as evidence, on the ground that it is not the commission of a sovereign recognised by our Government."

The same principle and advice will undoubtedly be applied by every nation in whose ports the Davis pirates may be found or by whose cruisers they may be captured. We recommend to the perusal of Judah P. Benjamin, Esq., Attorney-General of the Southern Confederacy, the entire letter of Mr. Wirt, in the "Official Opinions," volume first, and pages 249–253.

THE LOUNGER.

HOW SECESSION WORKED IN SWITZERLAND.

THE following extraordinary historical parallel is furnished to the Lounger by a most competent hand:

"The history of the attempt at secession in Switzerland, which was terminated by what is known as the Sonderbund war in 1847, as detailed by Oldenbkig, is remarkable and instructive in itself, and is now rendered still more so by the wonderful resemblance of the action of the rulers of our own seven rebellious States with that of the leaders of the seven dissatisfied Cantons.

"That attempt had its origin in the desire of the Catholic Cantons to recover the supremacy they had lost in consequence of the increase of population and wealth in the other Cantons, and the general diffusion of education and intelligence consequent upon the spread of Protestantism. The struggle had the appearance of relating solely to the Catholic faith; but it was really political. The policy of the reactionists was dictated by Rome, while they were encouraged by promises of assistance from France and Austria.

"The organized factious opposition to the governments of some of the liberal Cantons had become so serious that the people of those Cantons, to prevent anarchy and bloodshed, determined to secularize the convents, which were the head-quarters of opposition and the centers of disturbance.

"This was done, with all due regard to the interests of those concerned, and at once an outcry was raised that the Constitution, which guaranteed the existence of those convents, had been infringed. The absolute necessity of the act, to prevent anarchy and civil war, was entirely disconstrated, but the Catholics would not be appeased.

"Insurrections took place in several Cantons: in some the reactionist party was triumphant, and party hate raged throughout the land. Zschokke says: 'The whole country was divided into two vast camps, on the one side floated the holy banner of religion, calling for a restoration of the institutions of the good old time; on the other, men stood in defense of acquired popular rights, and desired a new and stronger bond of confederation.'

"At last, as a measure of conciliation, some of the suppressed convents were restored by the Cantons to which they belonged at home; and the Diet—in which each Canton, without regard to population, has an equal vote—decreed, by a small majority, that there was sufficient pause-offering, and must be accepted as such.

"The Catholic Cantons demanded the restoration of all the convents, and refused to accept any compromise as a settlement. Their leaders prepared for armed resistance to the Federal Government without consulting the people. Their action was thus a violation of their own Cantonal Constitutions, as well as a rebellion against the Federal compact, though the pretext of wishing to preserve it from infringement. This was in September, 1843.

"Their plans remained secret for a long time. In the mean while they strengthened their forces; the Jesuits, who had been expelled from Switzerland, were invited to come to the Catholic Cantons to take charge of the schools; and rigorous measures were adopted to put down the liberals. The revolutionary events which took place in the Catholic Cantons the reactionists were generally successful; and the Federal Diet, in which the representatives of the refractory Cantons retained their seats, was divided, and powerless to quell the disturbances. In those Cantons, after a while, popular meetings were no longer free; liberal citizens were persecuted and driven away, their property was confiscated. The reign of terror, under the forms of government, prevailed within their boundaries.

"Exasperated by such tyrannical proceedings, the refugees organized their forces without the sanction of the governments of the liberal Cantons, organized free corps in order to remedy the evil by force of arms. Several parts of this nature were defeated with great loss of life, and those of the free corps who fell into the hands of the reactionists, were kept in loathsome prisons until reasoned by the authorities of the governments of their respective Cantons.

"The leaders of the seven Cantons, emboldened by these successes, and still further encouraged by promises of aid from abroad, now boldly proclaimed the formation of an offensive and defensive alliance in the shape of a treaty between the separate league, and no longer concealed their intentions. A committee of war was established, stores of arms and munitions were collected in large quantities, the work on their border and interior fortifications was pressed day and night, their active militia was exercised incessantly, and all capable of bearing arms were disciplined, and efficient officers appointed to command. They prepared for open rebellion. The liberal Cantons and the other Cantons were to be deposed by force, and the recently adopted constitutions annulled. A partition of the territory of some of those Cantons was agreed upon. Jesuitism, every where predominant, was to give laws to all Switzerland. The conspirators hardly entertained a doubt of success. They reckoned upon division and consequent impotency among the other Cantons, while they confidently relied on the valor and zeal of their own people, united by identical fanaticism.

"In July, 1847, the Diet assembled, and a bare majority, impressed with the imminence of the danger, rallied to the support of the Federal compact. In vain did the deputies of the Sonderbund Cantons attempt to take their seats as representatives of other Cantons, who professed to be neutral, propose mediation. Finally, a decree was passed for the dissolution of the Sonderbund; the seizure of all arms intended for the rebellious Cantons was ordered, and they were commanded to cease their warlike preparations. The names of all Federal staff officers who remained in the service of the Sonderbund were struck from the army list; the Jesuit Cantons were to dismiss all such members of their order, and its further admittance into Switzerland was prohibited. This was in September. The Diet then adjourned for six weeks to await the execution of their decrees, and to take the sense of the people.

"But the warlike preparations were still continued, and such citizens of the rebellious Cantons as yet remained faithful to the Federal compact were driven from their homes and subjected to persecutions. The question was put to the people of Switzerland in their primary assemblies, and by their votes a legal majority of the Cantons decided that the decrees of the Diet should be carried into effect, by force if necessary.

"On the 18th October, the Diet reassembled. Still desirous to conciliate, they sent some of their own members as messengers of peace to the rulers of the seven Cantons, and addressed a proclamation to the people of those Cantons, solemnly assuring them that the rights and liberties inherited from their fathers should remain unaltered—that their religion should not be interfered with—that no oppression was intended, no nullifying of Cantonal sovereignty, no forced change in the Confederate compact—but that the existence of a separate league, endangering the welfare of the whole, could never be allowed, and they appealed to them to disarm it while there was yet time.

"Their messages of peace were rejected with scorn, and the circulation of their proclamation was prohibited by the rulers of the Sonderbund.

"Then the Diet proceeded to active measures. There were no Federal troops. They called upon the Royal Cantons for 50,000 men, and appointed gradually Dufour, of Geneva, commander-in-chief. The deputies of the seven Cantons left the Diet, appealing to God, and casting upon their opponents all responsibility for future events. But the majority remained firm. On the 4th of November they decreed the dissolution of the Sonderbund by force of arms, and issued a proclamation to that effect. Two of the Cantons, not included in the Sonderbund, voted to remain neutral, and refused to furnish their contingent, but favored the rebels by permitting the transport of arms. Still, 90,000 men responded to the call of the Diet; for the people generally felt that their liberties were at stake, and though it was a bitter thing to march against their Confederate brothers, they determined to do their duty and fight for their fatherland.

"Before the Federal forces were arrayed the rebels took the initiative, and gained some advantages. Dufour adopted the most for a while. Disposed to act with extreme forbearance, he preferred to conquer by the display of an overwhelming force rather than by bloody violence. When fully prepared, he surrounded the principal Cantons of the Sonderbund with an immense chain of troops, closing every exit, and then marched upon Freiburg, one of the rebellious Cantons which was geographically separated from the others. On the 14th November Freiburg, disappointed in her expectations of assistance, capitulated, the rebel rulers and the Jesuits fled, a new government was instituted, and separation from the Sonderbund decreed. The Federal army then entered the territories of the other Sonderbund Cantons, and Zug, seeing herself threatened, withdrew from the league, giving a peaceful passage to the troops. On the 20th November a decisive battle took place in the territory of Lucerne, where the Sonderbundists had intrenched. The rebels were defeated, and the leaders of the Sonderbund fled by water, taking with them all the money they could collect. Then the authorities of the city of Lucerne tried to negotiate, but were compelled to surrender at discretion. The Federal troops entered as victors, and were welcomed as brothers; all the buildings were decorated with Federal flags, and acclamations of joy filled the air. Soon the smaller Cantons also capitulated, and by the 29th of November the contest was completely concluded by the submission of all the refractory Cantons. The Federal army took care to prompt that foreign powers had no time to interfere.

"Then came the reaction and the suffering. The Diet demanded from the Sonderbund Cantons the repayment of the expenses of the war, and the armed occupation of those Cantons by the Federal troops was continued until the first instalment had been paid and security given for the others. Those Cantons which had refused to perform their duty as confederates were saved from similar occupation only by the payment of a heavy fine into the Federal treasury. In all those Cantons a violent reaction took place; legal proceedings were instituted against those who had been members of the rebel governments, and others who had promoted the revolt. They were all deposed, confiscated largely—in some cases their estates were confiscated, and in some of the Catholic Cantons the convents were plundered by the vote of the people, and their property seized to defray the expenses incurred; but no blood flowed except in battle. The Diet, not by the poverty of its people, afterward remitted the last installments of the war-debt.

"Thus, in the course of surprisingly few days, the Sonderbund came to an end, but the rebellious Cantons long suffered the ruinous consequences of their folly.

"May our Southern brothers take warning, and dissolve their separate league while there is yet time!"

THE ARGUMENT FOR A STANDING ARMY.

THE latest and concluding volume of Macaulay's History, which has been published under the supervision of his sister from his revised manuscripts, opens with a chapter which is peculiarly interesting to us at this moment—the debate upon a standing army. Our own Constitution is nervously jealous of military power. It is so framed as to forbid the President's hands. The great fear of its makers evidently was, that the head of the state might become a military despot, and that must be avoided at any cost. They felt that the reliance of the Government to repress insurrection must be not upon a regular army, but upon the State militia; that is, in other words, upon the people themselves in their military capacity.

But unluckily the very name militia is partly ridiculous. Not justly so, for our own history has shown what militia can do. Indeed our Revolution was the triumph of militia over a regular army. Yet the value of strict discipline is so great that, unless the militia are truly military, it will be long before they can be of real service.

Macaulay relates with picturesque vigor the substance of the debate in the English Parliament of 1697, after the peaceful acknowledgment of William Third, drawing very effective portraits of the disputants, of whom Lord Somers was chief. And the historian evidently thinks that Somers had the best of the argument. The advocates of disbanding the army, he says, laid it down as a fundamental principle of political science that a standing army and a free constitution could not exist together er. "History was ransacked for instances of adventurers who, by the help of mercenary troops, had subjugated free nations or deposed legitimate princes; and such instances were easily found." "What was the Lacedemonian phalanx in the best days of Lacedemon? What was the Roman legion in the best days of Rome? What were the armies which conquered at Cressy, at Poitiers, at Agincourt, at Halidon, at Flodden? What was that mighty army which Elizabeth reviewed at Tilbury? In the fourteenth, fifteenth, and even seventeenth centuries, Englishmen who did not make the trade of war had made war with success and glory. Were the English of the seventeenth century so degenerate that they could not be trusted to play the men for their own homesteads and parish churches?"

So has argument the reply of Sumers and the army party was very brief and cogent. If the spirit of the English people was such that, almost without training, they could successfully withstand the oldest soldiers, was it not absurd to suppose that such a people could be easily reduced to slavery by their own countrymen?

Somers himself wrote a little treatise upon the text that much was to be said on both sides, and showed the advantages and disadvantages of a standing army in the Balancing Letter.

The result of the discussion was that the peace establishment was reduced to about ten thousand men.

Macaulay was a Whig, but he was always favorable to what he called a strong government, which means simply a military government. But the true and final strength of a government lies at last in the people. Odd ideas are permanently strong. New mercenary soldiers are machines. They do not think. They are not to reason, but to obey. And for that very reason they may be turned against you. The mill grinds. It will grind the miller equally with the grist. A man thinks, and when he is willing to give his life for a cause he is more than mere man: he is a power. The true strength of a government likes, therefore, in men who seriously believe in the government and are willing to die for it. Such men are not soldiers who can be bought, and when they fall there are a hundred to stand in the place of each one of them.

A militia of such men is, if properly commanded, a hundred times more effective than mercenary troops. And one of the great and lasting lessons that we are likely to learn from this rebellion is that our militia must be military; that our population must be, as the people of Germany and France are, always prepared to use arms intelligently. If every man who marches now to the field were an accomplished soldier, how irresistible the army would be! Hereafter, let every citizen pay the homage at least to his country that he will understand how to handle a musket in her defense.

THE SCHUYLKILL BOYS.

In speaking recently of the heroes who first fell, the Lounger said that the Massachusetts men were "first in the field." His attention has been called to his forgetfulness of the Pennsylvania line, which was actually first upon the ground. It is a heroic emulation, and the Lounger most cheerfully corrects his statement by the following explanation from Schuylkill County. The name of the newspaper in which it appears was not sent to him:

"On Thursday, the 16th day of April, five hundred Pennsylvanians marched through Baltimore on their way to defend the National Capital, exactly twenty-four hours before the Massachusetts regiment so bravely celebrated the battle of Lexington in the streets of that delectable city. Over 250 of these volunteers started from the borough of Pottsville on Wednesday afternoon, April 17, and of these the National Light Infantry, commanded by Captain E. M'Donald, were the very first whose services were offered to and accepted by the Secretary of War. If the volunteers from Pennsylvania did not present the handsome appearance that their brethren from the land of steady habits presented upon their appearance in Washington, they at least should not be deprived of the credit of having arrived there first. It is Schuylkill County that asks that kind of justice at the hands of the newspapers of the country, and Schuylkill County has to-day more than two thousand men in the field. Will Harper's Weekly please make a note of that?"

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

VERY NATURAL.

A MAN and his wife were seated by the fire. He was intently occupied in reading—she in some domestic concern. At length he raised his eyes from his book, and said,

"It is here stated that Lot's wife looked back, and was converted into a pillar of salt, because she coveted something she had left behind;" and added, "I never thought it was for that reason."

He was very quietly asked,

"What do you suppose induced her to look back, if it was not covetousness?"

He replied,

"I always imagined it was curiosity." And after sitting a moment, he said, "It seems to me that I should have wanted to look back if I had been in her place, should not you?"

"Yes," she replied, "I think I should, especially if I had been told not to do it."

AN IRISH FEMALE TENANT.

"I'll trouble you for my month's rent, Madam," said a landlord last Monday to one of his tenants.

"Is it yer rint ye ax for now?"

"Yes, Ma'am, two months and two shillings per week each."

"Ah, now, can't ye wait a little time? Sure the likes of you must have plenty of money;" replied the woman, looking at the tiste, bent form of the landlord with great contempt.

"Now, my dear woman, the money is due, and—"

"Oh, mother! is it clearing me ye are? an honest, married woman, and a blessed mother of eleven boys, each big enough to lick the life out of ye. Out of my house, ye murtherin' baste, unable to give vent to her indignation in words, she seized his coat-collar, and fairly threw him into the street.

The owner intends to let his agent collect the rent of this house in future.

A DIALOGUE.—We overheard the following dialogue in the street the other day between an old lady and a little boy:

"Miss," said the lady, "how's your mother to-day?"

"A cold, hard battery, I guess," answered Miss. "She's being strong some soup sitting up on her elbow this morning."

Should think she was a good deal better. Eating soup, and so on, and sitting up on one's elbow, is a tolerably smart gymnastic feat for an invalid.

A young bachelor, who had been appointed deputy-sheriff, was called upon to serve an attachment against a bountiful young widow. He accordingly called upon her, and said,

"Madam, I have an attachment for you."

The widow blushed, and said she was happy to inform him that no attachment existed.

"You do not understand me: you must proceed to court."

"I know it is leap-year, Sir, but I prefer you would do the courting."

"Mrs. F——, this is no time for trifling: the justice is waiting."

"The justice! why, I should prefer a parson."

"Mr. Brown, you are the witness was honest and intelligent. Will you make your living?" Are you acquainted with him?"

"No, Sir, I have never seen him."

"Why, then, do you come to such a conclusion?"

"Cause he taken ten newspapers, and pays for them all in advance."

Gentlemen who smoke allege that it makes them calm and contemplative. They tell us that the more they fume the less they fret.

DONALD'S DEFINITION OF SLANDER.—"Donald," said a Scotch elder, looking up from the Catechism to her son, "what's a slander?"—"A slander, gude mither?" quoth young Donald, twisting the corner of his plaid. "Aweel, I hardly ken, unless it be an over true tale which one guide woman tells of another."

Nothing is one of our local papers speaks of a friend of his who has always been accustomed to the pen. Is the friend an author or a pig?

MISREADLE PROFILE.—Young ladies with new bonnets on rainy Sundays, and dresses playing dip, dip at every step. A witness in a bribery case. A smoking nephew on a visit to an anti-smoking aunt. A young doctor who has just cured his first patient and has no prospect of another. A star actress with her name in small type on the bill.

"I like to hear a child cry," jocosely said the Abbé Morelet. "Why?" "Because then there is some hope of his being sent away."

JEFF DAVIS SNUFFING OUT THE LIGHT.

Housekeeping.—An ancient art, said to have been fashionable among girls and wives; now out of use, or practiced only by the lower orders.

Wealth.—The most respectable quality of man.

Friend.—A person who will not accept you, because he knows your love will overuse him.

Wedded Bliss.—A term used by Milton.

Bargaining.—A business transaction, in which each party thinks he has cheated the other.

Doctor.—A man who kills you to-day, to save you from dying to-morrow.

Barber.—A fellow with a tin pot on his head, who stalks about the shops, and gets into a violent passion for a trifling cause.

Critic.—A large dog that goes unchained, and barks at everything that does not comprehend.

"Doctor," said a man to Abernethy, "my daughter had a fit, and continued for half an hour without sense or motion." "Oh!" replied the doctor, "never mind that; many people continue to live on in that way."

"What dogs are these?" inquired a gentleman of a lad who was drawing a couple of terriers along.

"I thank you, Sir," replied the boy; "they can't be of the railway, and they ate the direction, and know where to go."

There are good horses drawing in carts as in coaches; and as good men are engaged in humble employments as in the highest.

A Jew clothier merchant takes a white cur, and with stencil-plate and black ink fixes his business card upon each side of the dog, and sends him forth, a locomotive advertisement—a dog-critique of the first people of a fast country.

He who thinks he can do without others is mistaken; he who thinks others can not do without him is still more mistaken.

When you feel pity for the poor, you do not make the most important movement by putting your hand upon your heart, but into your pocket.

"I think I have seen you before, Sir; are you not Owen Smith?" "No, Sir, I am not Owen Smith, and owin' Owen, and owin' Brown, and owin' every body."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

MILITARY OCCUPATION OF BALTIMORE.

A DISPATCH, dated Baltimore, May 13, says: "About eight o'clock this morning the 6th Mass. Regt., filled with troops, arrived at the outer depot from the Relay House, containing one thousand troops, taken from each of the regiments stationed at the Relay House.

"The Sixth Massachusetts and Eighth New York regiments, with a battery of artillery, marched through South Baltimore to Federal Hill, a high point of ground on the south side of the harbor, directly overlooking the city, and on one side of Fort Mc Henry.

"The sudden appearance of the troops took the citizens by surprise. They were all under arms with every demonstration of approbation, and immense crowds eagerly gathered, cheering every step, and waving their handkerchiefs, and many brought lunch baskets and canteens filled with liquors. Before reaching the top of the hill, and assisted the officers in taking the best route thither, the citizens volunteered to help the troops until teams could arrive.

"The troops seemed to be highly pleased with their reception, and all expressed surprise and delight at the commanding position which they occupied, with the whole city and country spread out before them."

REOPENING OF RAILWAY COMMUNICATION.

The road through Baltimore is open, the route clear, and the bridges all repaired and well guarded. The festivals from Perryville, consisting of three passenger cars well filled, arrived at Camden Station. The streets through which the train passed were thronged with people, men, women, and children, who greeted the troops as they in force with it, nor was there any disturbance on the road. When the train arrived at Maryland line drawbridge, Perryville, with the train of cars on deck, the American flag was hoisted above the centre span. The crowd lined the river at both sides and cheered vehemently. The same scene occurred at Havre de Grace and Gunpowder Bridge.

WAR IN MISSOURI.

A dispatch dated St. Louis, May 10, says: "General Frost's brigade of Missouri troops, encamped at Camp Jackson, on the western outskirts of the city, surrendered unconditionally, and disbanded this afternoon to Colonel Lyon, commander of the United States forces of this city. Between seven and eight thousand men, with some six thousand volunteers, surrounded it, and planted eight field-pieces on the surrounding heights.

THE SUMMONS TO SURRENDER.

The following letter was sent from Captain Lyon to General Frost:

"HEAD-QUARTERS UNITED STATES TROOPS,
"CAMP JACKSON, May 10, 1861.

"To General D. M. Frost:

"SIR,—The force assembled in regarded as evidently hostile toward the Government of the United States. It is, for the most part, made up of troops ostensibly who have openly avowed their hostility to the General Government, and have been plotting the seizure of his property and the overthrow of its authority. You are openly in communication with the so-called Southern Confederacy, which is now at war with the United States, and you are receiving at this time from the said Confederacy, under the flag, large supplies of material of war, most of which is known to be the property of the United States. These extraordinary preparations plainly indicate none other than the well-known purpose of the Governor of this State, under whose orders you are acting, and whose purpose, repeatedly communicated to the Legislature, has just been repeated to by that body in the most shameless defiance, having in direct view hostilities to the General Government, and co-operation with the enemy. In view of these considerations, and your failure to disperse in obedience to the proclamation of the President, and of the eminent necessity of State policy, and the welfare and obligations imposed upon me by instructions from Washington, I, in my duty to demand, and I do hereby demand of you, an immediate surrender of your command, with no other conditions than that all persons surrendering under this demand shall be humanely and kindly treated. Believing myself prepared to enforce the demand, one half hour's time before the assault is allowed for your compliance therewith.

N. LYON,
"Captain Second Infantry, Commanding Troops."

AN ATTACK ON THE TROOPS.

Just before the troops left for the city, and while the State forces were drawn up between the two lines of volunteers, several rocks were thrown at the volunteers, and a few pistol shots fired by excited parties in the surrounding crowd, which was composed of a large number of citizens, including many women and children. One shot took effect in the leg of Captain Blentzwski, and as he fell he gave word to fire, which was obeyed by some two or three companies, resulting in the death of upward of twenty persons, including two women and several children, and badly wounding several others.

The following are the only names of those killed that can be ascertained: Messrs. Walter M'Donald, Thomas A. Havens, Nicholas Kerbaich, Emily Summers.

The following are fatally wounded: Claiborne Wilson and Trueman Wright.

A SECOND TRAGEDY.

The City of St. Louis was the scene of another terrible tragedy on Saturday night. The Home Guard, while marching through the streets, was hooted at and reviled by a large crowd of excited citizens, and finally a pistol shot was fired into the ranks by, it is said, a boy. The troops wheeled and fired upon the crowd, discharging several volleys. Owing to a lack of discipline, they broke up their ranks and fired at random, killing and wounding some of their own men, as well as many citizens.

STATE OF AFFAIRS AT HARPER'S FERRY.

A special Government agent has recently visited Harper's Ferry, and ascertained the exact condition of affairs there. From the nature of his statements it is evident that the Government has not so much to fear from a sudden descent from that quarter as has been apprehended. The number of troops concentrated there he puts down at 8000, of whom 500 are Kentuckians and one company South Carolinians. Only about three-fourths of the 8000 have arms, but that number is well armed. There is no provision, however—only one day's supply being on hand at the time he spoke left. Their supplies from Western Virginia had been cut off by the Union men there, and they must soon exhaust all that could be procured from the surrounding country. In the face of the scarcity a retreat was ordered, but rations provisions could be sent to them. The reports relative to the number of troops concentrated at the Maryland Heights were found to have been exaggerated. Only 600 had crossed, and that number was all Secessionists, and it was considered doubtful whether they would do so. The guns destroyed from the ruins of the armory buildings do not number over 1000, and many of those are in bad condition.

ALEXANDRIA COOLING DOWN.

The rebel troops at Alexandria appear to be fluctuating from point to point. It is said that there are not now more than one hundred and fifty men there. The steamer Pocomoke, from there, was moored in front of the city on 19th, with her guns (rifle cannon) and muzzles so commanding. Both guns were bombard it did not fire, grape, and shell, as well as any camp that may be located in the Heights.

CAPTURE OF GOVERNMENT TROOPS IN TEXAS.

We have received details of late and interesting news from Texas, giving a correct account of the recent capture of about four hundred government troops, and one hundred and seventy men, who were en route for the North, by about eight hundred Confederates, who were on board three armed steamers, all lined with cotton bales to keep the men from being harmed.

SECESSION OF ARKANSAS.

The State of Arkansas seceded on Saturday by a nearly unanimous vote of her Convention. This makes the ninth State that has seceded.

UNION CONVENTION IN VIRGINIA.

The delegate to the Convention of Western and Northwestern Virginia, met to deliberate upon the best means of opposing the policy of Secession, adopted by the late Convention at Richmond, assembled on the 13th inst., and proceeded to business. A committee of one from each county was appointed, to whom was referred the subject of representation, and the duty of reporting officers for a permanent organization to be effected at a future time. The subsequent proceedings consisted mainly of discussions as to the proper course to be pursued. The greatest enthusiasm prevailed.

MILITARY PREPARATIONS AT MONTGOMERY.

From Montgomery we learn that the Confederate Congress, in secret session, are making preparations for a vigorous prosecution of the war, and for putting the South in a state of perfect defense. It is known that they have ordnance, small-arms, and ammunition to employ in the field 100,000 men for the next twelve months.

PANIC IN VIRGINIA.

The Richmond Examiner boots as follows: "The Northern Secessionists and writers are in a panic. They do not come at once to the front. All their available force should be thrown to the banks of the Potomac with the least loss of time. Especially should President Davis give Virginia his whole energy. Virginia is ready to fight and has an army of fifty thousand men. It would give confidence and authority to the State's movement. Why do the wheels of the chariot tarry?"

THE SOUTHERN BLOCKADE.

The blockade of the Southern ports on the Atlantic coast is now probably complete, including Charleston and the Savannah River, and those of the Gulf would soon be in the same condition, if they are not already so. The destination of the vessels which have been made to form the squadron is understood to be New Orleans. The Secretary of War and the Navy Department are engaged in their endeavors to perfect the blockade, and for this purpose, in addition to the national vessels, about twenty armed steamers from New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, will be added, and are being put in readiness. The Virginia waters are now completely blockaded by the vessels of the Navy. Throughout the officer in command of the fleet there, has given the necessary authority to use all vessels or boats or supports of that State, either with or without cargoes. An additional force of 5000 men is ordered to Fortress Monroe.

NORTHERN CONTRIBUTIONS FOR THE WAR.

The contributions for the war have now reached the enormous amount of twenty-seven millions of dollars, being the free gift offerings of the patriotic people of the North, who are determined that the flag of our country shall never be trailed down. These contributions, it must be borne in mind, are exclusive of sums that are less in amount than one hundred dollars, and also of private gifts to individuals in the shape of money, horses, swords, blankets, pistols, clothing, camp equipage, and other articles "contraband of war." A great many towns, too, have given the whole family record of those during their absence, without appropriating any specified sum for that object.

ARRIVAL OF THE "GREAT EASTERN."

The steamship Great Eastern arrived up at this port on Monday morning, and anchored in the stream opposite Hammond Street. It is understood that she is to be offered for sale to our Government, or will accept a charter as a transport.

PERSONAL.

The country will be glad to learn that Major Anderson has been promoted to a colonelcy, a reward justly due to his services and not less to his fidelity.

Colonel Mansfield, late Commandant at West Point, has been promoted to be a Brigadier-General, U. S. Army.

It seems that Wright announces that there are now hundred thousand Northerners on their way to Washington, that Mr. Lincoln and his Cabinet will be captured unless they retreat before the middle of June, and that as for Wigfall he intends to winter in Philadelphia.

There is a private in the Rhode Island regiment at Washington who is worth half a million of dollars. Our Washington correspondent states that he saw him mopping the floor of the barracks.

The formation of still another new Military Department has been rendered necessary by the exigencies of the times—that of Ohio; to consist of the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, an! to be subdivided into various smaller departments—the whole to be under the command of General M'Clellan, of the Ohio Volunteers, with the head-quarters at Cincinnati.

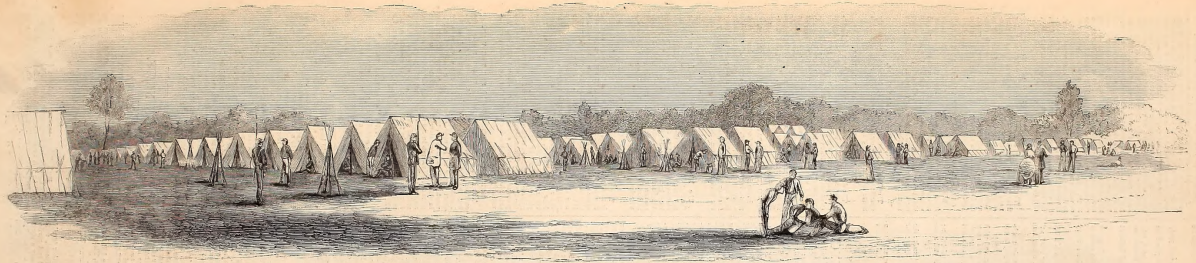
FOREIGN NEWS.

ITALY.

The quarrel between Garibaldi, Cavour, and Cialdini had been adjusted through the offices of the King. From Naples we have reports of further disturbances, and of the flight of large numbers of the people into the Papal territory to escape the conscription. The French troops at Rome were being relieved, and General Dumont, the successor of General Goyon, had been received cordially by his Holiness.

SYRIA.

The Paris Temps says: "We learn from a reliable source that Turkey has proposed that 1000 French soldiers should be left at Beyrout until the reforms which have been decided upon by the European Commission have been completely carried out.



CAMP CAMERON, GEORGETOWN, D. C., THE ENCAMPMENT OF THE SEVENTH REGIMENT NEW YORK STATE MILITIA.—[SEE PAGE 331.]

SERVICE BY REV. DR. WESTON, CHAPLAIN OF THE SEVENTH REGIMENT, AT CAMP CAMERON, ON SUNDAY, MAY 5, 1861.—SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.—[SEE PAGE 331.]

THE SECOND REINFORCEMENT OF FORT PICKENS.

WE publish on page 328, from sketches sent us from Fort Pickens, a picture of the SECOND REINFORCEMENT of that work on 16th ult., and herewith a view of the INTERIOR OF THE FORT, showing the troops drawn up to hear the account of the evacuation of Fort Sumter by Major Anderson.

The second reinforcement was thus described by the purser of the Atlantic:

On Tuesday, the 16th, at 61 P.M., we anchored off Santa Rosa Island (Fort Pickens being on its western extremity), four miles from shore, close by the frigate Sabine, the flag-ship of the squadron, Com. Adams. After communicating with the commander and the naval captains present, we took in tow the boats of the fleet, some twenty in number, and after dark weighed anchor and stood in shore, all lights being extinguished, and came to anchor within a mile of Fort Pickens, and in direct range of the guns of Fort McRae and the water-batteries, and three-quarters of a mile from the beach, in four fathoms of water. At 9 the first boat pushed off for the beach, with Colonel Brown and Captain Meigs, who were the first to meet and surprise the intrepid Slemmer and his command. During the embarkation of the troops in the boats the signal from Fort Pickens for an apprehended attack was made by the sending up of rockets. This signal was repeated, and hastened the operations. Captain Vogdes and other officers in the fort were astonished at the rapidity of the reinforcement. Before midnight the majority of officers and soldiers were safely in the fort.

Early in the morning of the 17th the remaining troops were landed, excepting the artillery men (Captain Barry's Company, who remained to land with their horses. At 8 A.M. we again weighed anchor and stood to the eastward, and anchored about 3½ miles from Fort Pickens, and half a mile from the beach. This point was selected as the best place for landing the horses. This difficult work was commenced in the afternoon, continued during the night, and finished on the morning of the 18th.

The Illinois, with reinforcements, arrived at midnight on Friday the 19th, and her troops were landed the next morning.

Seven of the horses were lost—four died on the passage; one was drowned alongside; one had his neck broken in the surf, and one died from exhaustion on reaching the shore. The forage and light artillery were landed simultaneously with the horses. On the 18th the landing of the general cargo of heavy and light ordnance, ammunition, provisions, etc., etc., was fairly commenced, and continued, with but partial interruption, until the forenoon of Tuesday 23d, when she was finally discharged, to the great gratification of all concerned.

The position of the Powhatan and Brooklyn was such that their guns could sweep Santa Rosa Island and prevent a landing from the main land, and at the same time shielded the hull of the Atlantic.

Our regular correspondent in the Fort thus writes us concerning the second picture:

FORT PICKENS, FLORIDA, May 2, 1861

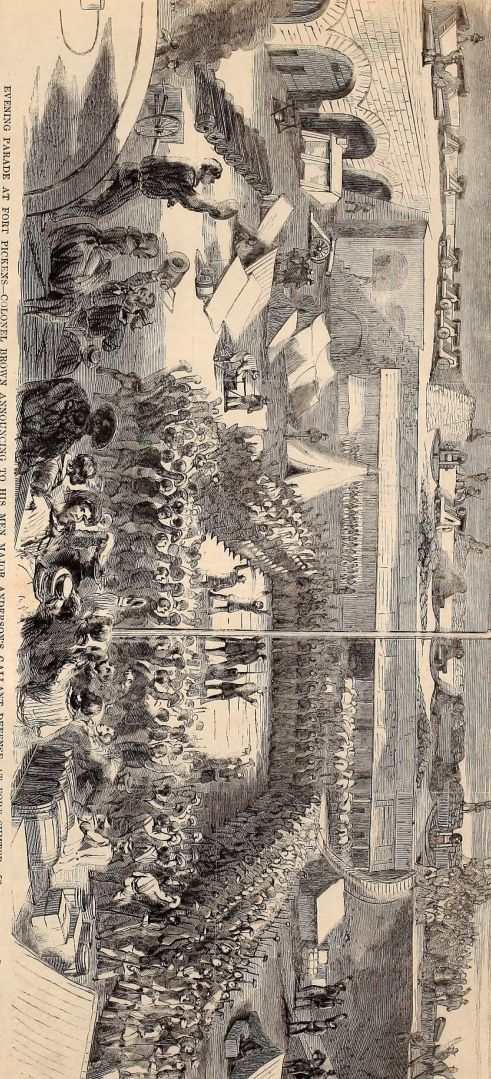
On the evening of April 30 the command was drawn up in the manner represented in the engraving, and the first authentic news of Major Anderson's defense was read out to them in the form of an order, which at the same time exhorted us to "emulate the example of our gallant comrades at Sumter." In publishing this order to his command, Colonel Brown instilled, if possible, a new enthusiasm—I mean the loud cheering that heralded it was the indication of a feeling that days and nights of toil could not obliterate. Events, since the landing on the 12th of April of the first reinforcement, have succeeded each other too rapidly to give now a connected and detailed account of them. The men have worked hard and cheerfully. No despondency, no feeling like that crops out over there; nothing that the Government is going to pieces; and nothing but a steady, firm reliance on the beautiful flag that for years they have fought under sustains them. Sometimes, it is true, the sad feeling creeps over one that there are dear ones at home whose heart-strings are strained at the V-shape-le-long separation; but then comes the thought that the harder we work the quicker will end this sad struggle between brothers.

The parade-ground is littered up with little shelter tents of sheets inclined against guns, blankets stretched on poles, sides of pork-boxes broken off and held up by stake. All of these little huts are so small that the men just creep into them, and have not room to sit up. It does look more like a miniature Babel, with the little huts, big guns and mortars, and prancing horses, officers, soldiers, marines, and sailors, citizen carpenters, negroes, camp-women and children, and when the clear bugle rings out at tattoo how suddenly this wild confusion all ceases!

We have been permitted to print the following graphic account of the first reinforcement of Pickens which we illustrated last week:

HOW IT WAS DONE.

The immediate cause of the reinforcement was this: You know of that obstinate fellow, Lieutenant Slemmer, who would not be persuaded that he had been posted in this part of Florida by the Government for any other purpose than to preserve to the nation the property committed to his honorable care. This gallant Slemmer, with a handful of men to garrison an extensive fortification, having for some time suspected that the enemy was tampering with his men, intercepted a couple of letters which had been smuggled into Pickens and addressed to a sergeant. The writer offered this man a sum of two thousand dollars a commission, which would make him the companion of the gentlemen of the South who are in arms; and, as an inducement to the faithful fellow who for so long have held those stone walls against thousands, five hundred dollars were promised for every private who at that price would become a traitor to the United States. The men, true soldiers as they are, remained steadfast to their colors—those glorious Stripes and Stars, that carry the hope of freedom to the oppressed of every land! The sergeant was forthwith sent a prisoner to the commander of the naval force lying off the harbor, and by him was transferred to a steam frigate, where he remains in durance. This foul play, bad enough in time of actual war, and unpardonable during a truce, would perhaps have stimulated the naval commander to reinforce the fortress; and had he decided to do so it would have been a happy idea, for that very day arrived a messenger from Washington, bringing a verbal order making the reinforcement imperative. This messenger had been captured, but had destroyed his dispatches, the contents of which luckily he knew. Well, the order was passed to those into Pickens all the artillery, soldiers, and marines in the squadron. Ninety artillerymen, and a hundred and ten marines, led by men who never—well, I won't say how many were left, ers, and some are, and what they will do when the time comes for them to act. Every preparation was made. We awaited night—I say we, for I was one of them. I had no notion of going until an hour or two before our party left the ship. I need not have gone; for the usage of the service required me, the only medical officer of the ship, to remain with the majority of our men, and none but our marines were to go. While I was sitting at the mess-table, bending on my elbows, and while I looked at the little lieutenant who was to lead our party, I unconsciously began repeating the lines, "How sleep the brave who sink to rest." Suddenly I thought of the marines! Poor fellows! if that surly Fort M'Crae opens on the boat, or on the men as they stand upon the beach, there will be lots of bloody noses and broken legs, and a cry of "Where's the doctor?" Well, I determined to go, if my Captain would let me. So I said to the young hero who was buckling on his revolver as pleasantly as if he were going to make an evening call on his sweet-heart, "George," said I, "how would you like me to keep you company?" "First rate," said he. "Well," said I, "ask the Captain, and if he consents I'll get ready; it won't take me long." George saw the Captain, and soon returned, saying, "The Captain says you may go if you want to." It did not occur to me at the time, but it struck me when I was in the boat, that if I got a shot intended for a combatant, Maud might have whittled for a pension, for I had



EVENING PARADE AT FORT PICKENS.—COLONEL BROWN ANNOUNCING TO HIS MEN MAJOR ANDERSON'S GALLANT DEFENSE AT FORT SUMTER.—[SKETCHED BY AN OFFICER OF THE GARRISON.]

GALLERIES UNDER THE SENATE CHAMBER CONVERTED INTO GRANARIES.
SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.—[SEE PAGE 331.]

BREAD OVENS IN THE BASEMENT OF THE CAPITOL, WASHINGTON.
SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.—[SEE PAGE 331.]

permission to accompany the men, but no orders to do so. Well, we were all ready. It was the night of the 12th of April. Gorgas, with cutlass and pistol—I, with haversacks, bandages, and lint, and all necessaries stowed in our pockets. At my side hung my tremendous sabre. "Best ready, Sir." "Very good." "Here, Purser, take this letter, and if I don't return give it to my wife. For a month's pay due, have not I?" "All right, Doctor." Every one was in the best. I could hear the hum of the men's voices as I stepped over the ship's side: but the night was too dark for me to see. "Look out, Doctor!" said Private Walsh's voice—"look out, Sir, as ye come down, for the last ladder's not there, Sir." "All right," said I, "I hope your bayonets are not fixed men, for I'm going to drop among you." "Niver a bagnet, Sir. Divvil an me, Doctor, I'm the freshest." "Who are you?" "Big Walsh, Sir." "Here, pass," said I, and fell, partly on Walsh, partly on Corporal Murphy, the full weight of my body being received by a pile of knapsacks and the barrel of a musket, which got between my legs. "Och! bad luck to your cruel shins, yer honor, Sir! They're nigh as sharp as is bagnets, Sir. It's the bones you sets on I misses, Sir," said Corporal Murphy. "By the powers!" said he—he had been feeling around my coat-tails—"I sees your garden, Sir; it's niver torn bones at all, Sir, but wan of them sharp dagger's them ye've in ye're pockets—bad 'cess to the same!" "Don't say that, my man," said I, "for who knows but it will save your life before morning?" "That now, Docthor," said he; "done for ye. Does it be hurtful much when it's an, Docthor?" I could not reply, for the muzzle of a musket was poked in my eye. "Kape your musket off the Docthor's face, will ye now, Bonaan?" said Carey. "Who knows but we'll go off, and we may be wastin' his brains before we're done wid him?" "Sure there's niver no cap on it," said Brennan. "Kape it all his face, I tell ye: I've known muskets to go off, an' niver no cap near 'em," said Carey. "Where shall I rub," said I, "in all this crowd?" for I was cheering the weed, as is my wont. "Spit my wheres, Docther dear: sure we'll not be mindin' it from you, ye're such an an here, Sir, spit down Jerry Brennan's musket. Sir," Jerry has showed it in yere face for that same, Sir." Well, I used Brennan's musket-barrel, though it was by no means convenient.

We had shoved off, and were struggling hard against the tide to reach the steam-frigate which was to tow us in. At length we reached her, and I seized the main-ropes to climb her steep sides: "Sure and that's a cruel climb, Dochter, and you wid yere stiff cold legs." "Watch 'till the time," said the coxswain: "now's your time, Sir." I blushed my rheumatic limbs painfully up, trusting to my hands, and reached the deck. Here artillery-men and marines were assembled; and on deck I left them to go below, where cognac, coffee, and cigars awaited me, and in which I indulged until the steamer came to anchor, and I was summoned to repair to another and smaller steamvessel which was to tow us in further. It was two o'clock in the morning as we got aboard the small steamer, and ran in toward the shore of Santa Rosa. The first detachment of boats must have landed its party under cover of the obscurity; for the young moon had long since gone down, leaving the sentinel stars to give us a faint light. On we steamed, and by-and-by came to and dropped anchor at least two miles from Fort Pickens. "Come, men, here's no time to lose" said my Captain; and from the steamer's side tumbled the men into the boats. A senior surgeon and I jumped into the Captain's gig, into which he followed, and away we went—two long miles to pull against a head-way. "Lively strokes, lads, give way!" The oars bent, and every blade-chum sat it flashed through the phosphorescent water. On, on, on! How long these miles seemed! We connected gravely, occasionally looking off to see whether the boats were keeping way with us. We conversed gravely, for I suppose we were all speculating on what might be the manner of our return. I take no shame to myself in confessing that I did not hold a very cheerful view of the expedition. The first detachment of boats was returning as we started. Night had favored them, while we—! "Rather bright to the eastward," said I. "Yes," said the Captain, "we'll have morning on us directly; strike out men!" Morning, thought I, and we not more than half way! The men pulled like good fellows, we keeping near the shore to avoid the strength of the current. Near, yet just without easy rifle range; for the chaparral afforded excellent cover for riflemen. It was so light now that I could see my hands, and morning was coming on more rapidly than I ever knew it to break before. "Give way, lads!—whose oar is that out of water?" "Smith's, Sir; he's lookin' of his pea-jacket, Sir." "Give way!" The Captain had been searching with his glass for the fort. As breath he said, "Ah, there it is!" An ogilne light by this time pervaded the eastern sky, revealing our boats to any watchful eye. I was gazing into the distance to catch a glimpse of the fort. I soon made out its dark outline, and almost at the same moment I, Bob Harding, saw another sight, which to me was of particular interest. It was the white mess of the hostile Fort M'Rae, on the side of the harbor opposite to Pickens, and, like Pickens, commanding the entrance. That white mass of masonry, dotted regularly with dark embrasures, seemed my attention exceedingly as our boats pulled right for it; for our Captain had, it seems, determined to land in front of Pickens, on a beach that M'Rae might have swept with a storm of shot and shell. It was quite light enough by this time for the enemy to distinguish every boat, nay, every man. "Give way!" As we rounded a sandy point right under the howitzer I kept my eyes fixed on four embrasures in M'Rae. By Jove! how big and black they seemed! I watched them; for I felt assured that before we should have pulled much further one or more sheets of red flame would burst forth, and then those who lived would be swimming for it. No one spoke. Bright, brighter, grew the east. The oars buckled and the waters hissed as we dashed toward the beach. Soon the boats found bottom. Out jumped the men and marines: and we officers, mounted on the shoulders of some of the boat's crew, landed, the surf overtaking and wetting us all. The men drew up on the beach. Surely, thought I, now M'Rae will open upon us. Now's their chance. We started to lead the men across the sand to the sally-port of the fortress. Bang! "Who fired that musket?" said the Captain, at whose side I stood. "It's the cold Doether, Sir," said Private Brennan; "he's filled my pocket wid tobecky ends, an' I'm afther emptyin' it, Sir. Och! bad he's a powerful man wid the tobecky, any way." "Keep silence there!" said the Captain. "Come on, men. Here you are! Tumble in! Sailor men, back to the boats!" Into the fort went the marines, led by my friend the Surgeon, while the Captain and I made for the boats, and started to return to our ships with the lieutenant, who had staid on the beach to guard our flotilla.

COOKING AND EATING ARRANGEMENTS, IN THE COURT-YARD OF THE TREASURY BUILDING, WASHINGTON, D. C.—SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.—[SEE PAGE 331.]

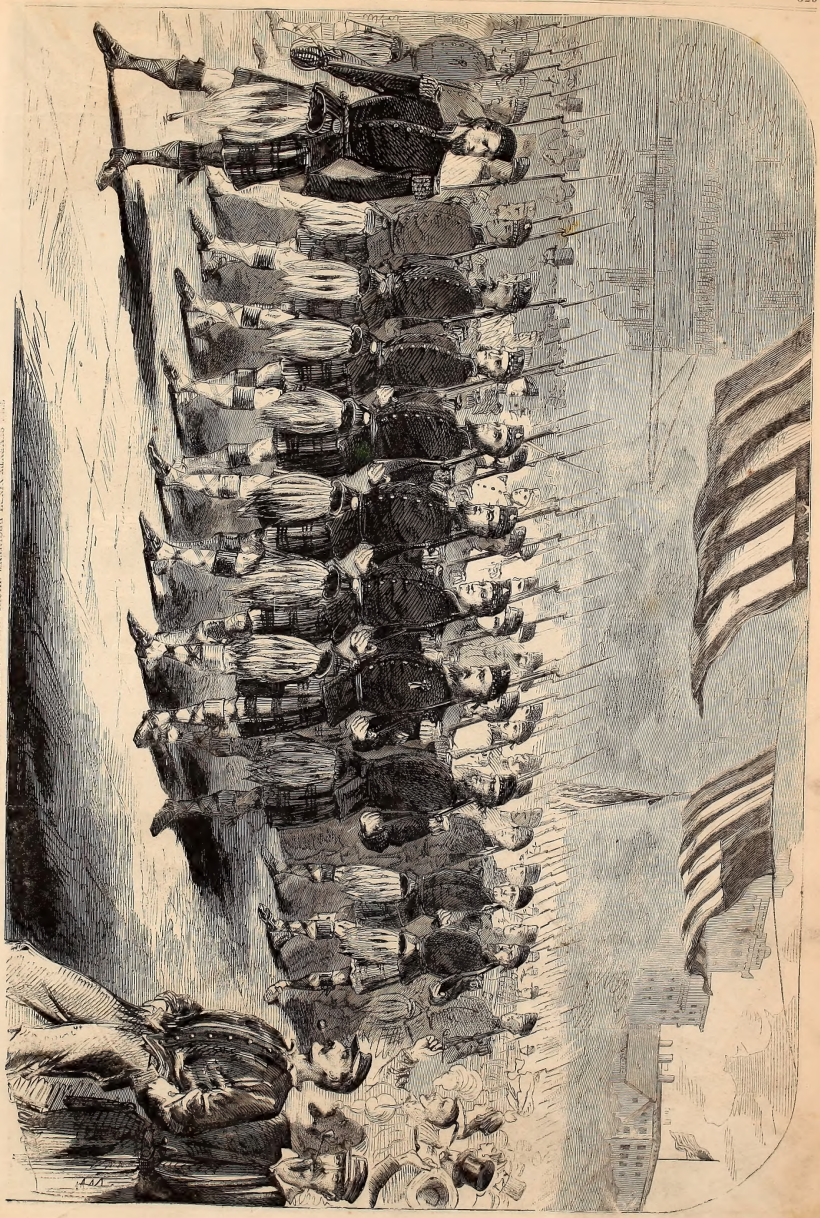
DEPARTURE OF VOLUNTEERS FROM DUBUQUE, IOWA, APRIL 22, 1861.—[SEE PAGE 331.]

As we passed M'Rae I said to myself, Now it's coming, Bob! I watched the embrasures. They looked twice as ugly as a ship's port-holes, and every gun seemed pointed at my devoted head. I knew that I would be the only one hit, for at me they aimed. The men pulled cheerily, and after a while I made up my mind that we were to get back to our floating homes with unbroken limbs. The east was glowing with a warm, rosy light; the morning was lovely. "Are you one of those who admire sunrise?" said the Captain. "No, Sir, I am not; and I must say that this morning it was especially unwelcome. A few minutes since I would have been glad of an hour more of darkness." The Captain laughed. "Did not you expect M'Rae to open on us?" asked I. "Most certainly," replied he.

That is the way that Fort Pickens was reinforced from our squadron on the morning of the thirteenth of April, by daylight, in face of a fully-armed fort and other batteries—reinforced while a large body of men held the opposite shore. "Well, I'm thankful I am back safe, and I don't care who knows it," said the gallant lieutenant who accompanied the expedition. Why we were not fired upon I can not say. Humanity, dislike to fire the first shot in such a war, want of orders from head-quarters—I know not. It is a mystery to me.

THE EIGHTH MASSACHUSETTS REGIMENT IN THE ROTUNDA OF THE CAPITOL, WASHINGTON.—[SEE PAGE 331.]

THE SECOND REINFORCEMENT OF FORT PICKENS, ON APRIL 16, 1861.—[SEE PAGE 325.]



THE SEVENTY-SIXTH REGIMENT (COLONEL VERPLANCK) NEW YORK STATE MILITIA.

SCOTT, YORK, PENNSYLVANIA, OCCUPIED BY PENNSYLVANIA AND OHIO VOLUNTEERS.—SKETCHED BY JASPER GREEN.—[SEE PAGE 331.]

WINANS STEAM GUN.

We herewith illustrate, from a photograph by Weaver, the celebrated STEAM GUN, patented by Mr. Dickinson, and made by Mr. Winans, of Baltimore. This gun was seized by Colonel Jones, of the Massachusetts Volunteers, when on its way from Baltimore to the Rebel Camp at Harper's Ferry, and is now used in protecting the VIADUCT AT THE WASHINGTON JUNCTION on the Baltimore Branch of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. We also publish herewith a view of the RELAY HOUSE, now occupied by the Federal Volunteers. This point commands the Baltimore and Ohio Road, being the point at which the road from Washington bears off on one side to Washington, on the other to Harper's Ferry and Wheeling.

The merits of the steam gun are a matter of some controversy. We shall probably know are long what it can do. The following is the statement of its principles by the inventor:

"As a triumph of inventive genius in the application and practical combination of centrifugal force (that power which governs and controls the universe and regulates and keeps in the motion of planetary bodies round the sun), this most effective engine stands without a parallel; commanding wonder and admiration at the simplicity of its construction and the destructiveness of its effects; and it is confidently declared to inaugurate a new era in the science of war.

"Rendered bell-proof, and protected by an iron case, and mounted on a four-wheeled carriage, it can be readily moved from place to place on our roads with an army. It can be constructed to discharge missiles of any capacity from an ounce ball to a twenty-four pound shot, with a force and range equal to the most approved gunpowder propelled, and can discharge from one hundred to five hundred balls per minute.

"For city or harbor defence it would prove more efficient than the largest battery. For use on the battle field (the greatest calibre ought never to exceed more than) opposing troops at the strike were standing guns; and in sea-fight, mounted on fire-locked steamers, it would be capable of flanking any ordinary war-vessel.

"In addition to the advantages of power, continuous action, and variety of discharge, may be added economy, in cost of construction, in space, labor, and transportation, all of which would be small in comparison to the cost and working of batteries of cannon, and the equipment and management of a proportionate force of infantry.

"The possession of this engine—ball-proof, and cased in iron—will give the powers using it such decided advantages as will strike terror to the hearts of opposing forces, and render its possessor insuperable to armies provided with ordinary offensive weapons.

"Its efficiency will soon be practically demonstrated, and the day is not far distant when, through its instrumentality, the new era in the science of war being inaugurated, it will be generally adopted by the Powers of the Old and New Worlds, and, from its very destructiveness, will prove the means and medium of peace.

"BALTIMORE, May 1, 1861." "CHARLES S. DICKINSON.

WINANS STEAM GUN, CAPTURED BY COLONEL JONES ON THE WAY TO HARPER'S FERRY.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY WEAVER.

CAMP SCOTT, AT YORK, PENN.

ON Saturday evening, 20th ult., the First, Second, and Third Regiments of Pennsylvania Volunteers, then encamped at Camp Curtin, Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, were ordered to proceed, under the command of Brigadier-General Wynkoop, on the Northern Central Railway, to Washington. The brigade then reached Ashland Station, near Cockeysville, in Maryland, on the following morning. At this point the burning of the bridges by the Baltimore mob interrupted further railway travel, and the troops were marched to a position about one mile from the station, where they encamped. They remained here, surrounded and threatened by armed Marylanders, until Tuesday morning, their further advance having meanwhile been countermanded from Washington. On Tuesday the brigade was returned by rail to York, after suffering from two nights' bivouac in the open air, with insufficient clothing, and almost destitute of food. At York the men were quartered in the extensive and well-arranged Fair Grounds of the York County Agricultural Society, forming what is known as Camp Scott. The force has been further increased by the arrival of two regiments from the western counties, and is now composed of five full regiments.

The short experience of the first three regiments in active service gave them a discipline which shows itself in the contrast observable between the forces and order of Camp Scott and those of Camp Curtin. Here there is regular regimental in addition to the almost unceasing company and squad drill, and the men are fast attaining the bearing and appearance of regulars, in comparison with the raw levies of Camp Curtin. The First Regiment is mainly composed of organized volunteer companies; the others are made up of mixed material. The regulation uniform is fast being supplied, consisting of a loose blue sack, blue trowsers, gray shirt, and blue fatigue cap. The want of all preparation for a sudden call to arms has in no wise been more plainly evidenced than in the appearance of the Pennsylvania Volunteers; and their unarmed, ill-clad, undisciplined condition, when mustering by thousands at the State capital in answer to the call of the Governor, is sufficient proof of their patriotism and readiness to take up arms in the common defense. Their uncouth-like carriage is disappearing, and in a very brief time the twenty-six regiments asked of Pennsylvania will form an army formidable to the traitorous foes of the country, and creditable to the loyal commonwealth so promptly putting them in the field.

THE RELAY HOUSE, WASHINGTON JUNCTION, NOW OCCUPIED BY THE FEDERAL VOLUNTEERS.

OUR ARMY AT WASHINGTON.

WE continue this week to illustrate the movements and features of OUR ARMY AT WASHINGTON, from sketches supplied us by our attentive correspondent.

On page 321 will be found a fine picture of the FIRE AT WILLARD'S HOTEL, which was happily extinguished by the Zouaves of Colonel Ellsworth's Regiment in time to save the hotel. The correspondent of the Times wrote:

"This morning (May 9) a fire broke out in the small hotel adjoining Willard's, and threatened the destruction of Willard's. Colonel Ellsworth ordered one hundred Zouaves to assist in extinguishing it. The order was followed by nearly the whole regiment jumping from the windows of the Capitol and scaling the fences. They could not enter the engine-house, and broke down the doors, taking out the machines, and reached the spot before the city firemen were awake. They worked like heroes, performing wonderful feats of agility and bravery. They formed pyramids on each other's shoulders, climbing into windows, scaling lightning-rods, and succeeded in two hours in saving the whole structure. Willard treated them handsomely, and says he could not have got on without them. Every thing would have been lost. This has made the regiment very popular among the citizens. They destroyed nothing unnecessarily, and nothing is missing of all the great mass of property moved into the streets, which they guarded. For want of a ladder, two Zouaves held another down from the eaves, while he, with his head down, played water into the burning building."

On page 326 we illustrate some of the COMMISSARIAT ARRANGEMENTS, which show how carefully General Scott has provided against a famine. The enormous vaults in the Capitol building are crammed with food; the galleries under the Senate Chamber have been converted into granaries, and filled with barrels of flour, beef, pork, hams, etc. Another part of the vaults has been fitted with ovens built by Lieutenant T. J. Cate, of Company F, 6th Massachusetts Regiment, who, when he is not a soldier and a sergeant, is a brick-mason at Lawrence, Massachusetts. There ovens are capable of turning out 16,000 loaves daily. The picture beneath shows us the troops cooking and consuming their food in the open air in the Treasury court-yard. Very different, this, from Delmonico's and the Astor House! But no one complains.

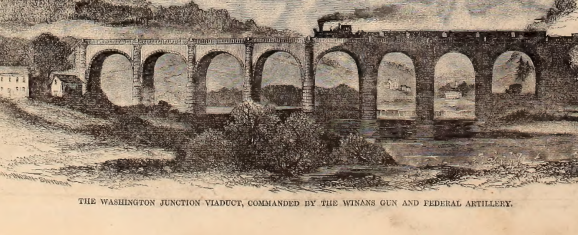
On page 324 we illustrate CAMP CAMERON, the encampment of the Seventh Regiment, N. Y. S. M., on Georgetown Heights. The Regiment are making themselves pretty comfortable. Most of the tents are floored, and the officers' tents and officers have sent them so much food and so many presents of every kind that the Quarter-master has been compelled to direct the Express Company to forward nothing more. The picture of the PERFORMANCE OF DIVINE SERVICE by the Rev. Dr. Weston shows that our men have not forgotten their Christian habits.

On page 333 we illustrate Colonel Ellsworth's command at Washington. Every one who has been time quartered in the Hall of Representatives, and to those who have seen that splendid hall devoted to the purpose for which it was built the scene was very striking and novel. The Colonel himself and his staff were quartered in one of the committee rooms adjacent.

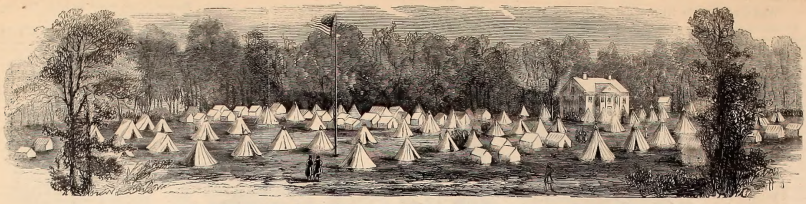
On page 327 we illustrate the EIGHTH MASSACHUSETTS REGIMENT IN THE ROTUNDA AT THE CAPITOL, Washington. Every one who has been to Washington will recognize the picture, though the crowd of soldiers, the mattresses, knapsacks, and arms piled around are an unusual feature in the scene. The 8th Massachusetts Volunteers are one of the finest regiments in the service; the officers and men are provincial, and when the day of battle comes they will, we are sure, give a good account of themselves.

DEPARTURE OF VOLUNTEERS FROM DUBUQUE, IOWA.

WE are indebted to a correspondent, Mr. Simplot, for the sketch from which our illustration of the DEPARTURE OF THE VOLUNTEERS FROM DUBUQUE, on page 327, was taken. The occasion was that of the departure of the two first volunteer companies from Iowa for Cairo, Ill., per steamer Alhambra. Quite an imposing force of Western troops is now gathered at Cairo, and we may be sure that they will hold their own. The Rebels are said to be gathered at Memphis, Tennessee, under the command of General Pillow, who is said to intend an attack upon Cairo. We rather think he will reconsider this intention.



THE WASHINGTON JUNCTION VIADUCT, COMMANDED BY THE WINANS GUN AND FEDERAL ARTILLERY.



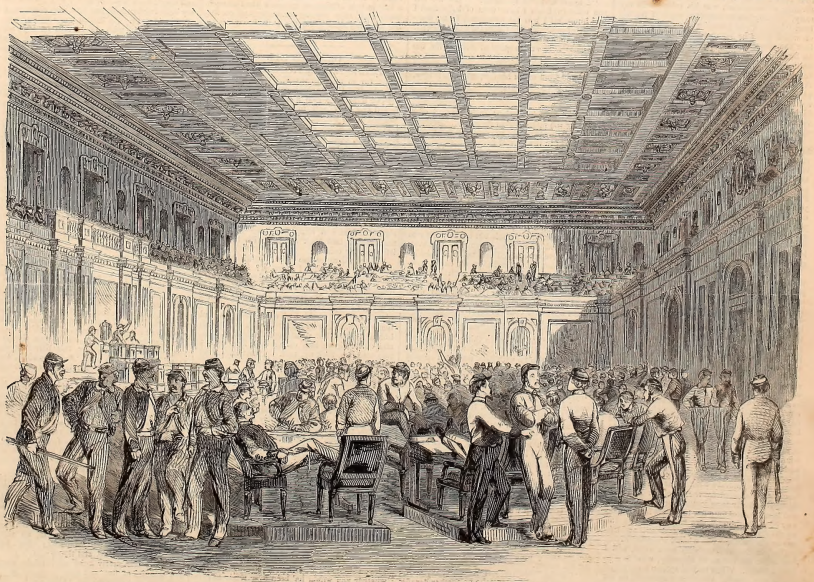
CAMP OF UNITED STATES VOLUNTEERS AT THE RELAY HOUSE.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY WEAVER.]

ANOTHER WAR MAP.

BELOW we publish another of the series of WAR MAPS which have constituted so prominent a feature in Harper's Weekly during the past few months. This one will be found especially valuable for reference. It shows the whole coast-line of the United States from Cape Henry to the Rio Grande, and the ports to be blockaded by our vessels of war; also the strategic points round Washington and Baltimore; Cairo, its strategic relations, and the course of the Mississippi; Fortress Monroe, at the mouth of the Chesapeake, Forts Taylor and Jefferson, at the Tortugas, and Fort Pickens, Pensacola, all held by the United States; the great lines of railway by which troops will be transported, etc.

MAP SHOWING THE LINE OF THE BLOCKADE, AND THE STRATEGIC ROUTES IN THE INTERIOR.

LATE HEAD-QUARTERS OF COLONEL ELLSWORTH, OF THE N. Y. FIRE ZOUAVES, AT THE CAPITOL AT WASHINGTON.—SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.—[SEE PAGE 331.]



THE NEW YORK FIRE ZOUAVES QUARTERED IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES AT WASHINGTON, D. C.—SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.—[SEE PAGE 331.]

THE COMING OF THE SPRING.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

THE coming of the Spring—
Oh, the coming of the Spring!
Now the Winter wears away,
And we thirst, and yearn, and pray,
As a sick man prays for day,
For the coming of the Spring.

How we dream 'twill surely bring
Some new delightsome thing;
Some wondrous bliss that nears
Concealed, from unknown spheres,
Crowning this year of all years
With the promise of the Spring.

But it comes not, or does wear
A strange horror in its hair;
Or goes on its meteor way
Still in flashes in other grey,
And its glories all decay,
Like the glories of the Spring.

Then our May-buds drop o'erhead,
And our primroses lie dead;
And our violets on the moor
Bloom unplucked, in nooks obscure,
And the dull heart shuts its door
On the beauty of the Spring.

Oh, vain and selfish spirit!
Oh, stillen unbelief!
When each bird on each hedge-side
Where snow lay all winter-tide,
Sings aloud, "God will provide,
He has sent us back the Spring!"

When each flower the children hold
Smiles—"This life-germ I infold,
See how safely I can keep!
How I die not—only sleep;
But, through all the Winter deep,
Wait the coming of the Spring."

GREAT EXPECTATIONS.

A NOVEL.

BY CHARLES DICKENS.

CHAPTER XLI.

IN vain should I attempt to describe the astonishment and disquiet of Herbert when he and I and Provis sat down before the fire, and I recounted the whole of the secret. Enough that I saw my own feelings reflected in Herbert's face, and, not least among them, my repugnance toward the man who had done so much for me.

What could alone have set a division between that man and us, if there had been no other dividing circumstance, was his triumph in my story. Saving his troublesome sense of having been "low" on one occasion since his return—on which point he began to hold forth to Herbert the moment my revelation was finished—he had no perception of the possibility of my finding any fault with my good fortune. His boast that he had made me a gentleman, and that he had come to see me support the character on his ample resources, was made for me quite as much as for himself; and that it was highly agreeable to me, to both of us, and that we must both be very proud of it, was a conclusion quite established in his own mind.

"Though, look'ee here, Pip's comrade," he said to Herbert, after having discoursed for some time, "I know very well that once since I come back—for half a minute—I've been low. I said to Pip, I avowed as I had been low. But don't you free yourself on that score, for it ain't been Pip a gentleman, and Pip ain't agoing to make you a gentleman, not for me not to know what's due to ye both. Dear boy, and Pip's comrade, you two may count upon me always having a gen-teel muzzle on. Muzzled I have been since I've been low, muzzled I am, and muzzled I'll ever be, while I'm low."

Herbert said, "Certainly," but looked as if there were no specific consolation in this, and remained perplexed and dismayed. We were anxious for the night before I took him round to Essex Street, and saw him safely in at his own dark door. When it closed upon him I experienced the first moment of relief I had known since the night of his arrival.

Never quite free from an uneasy remembrance of the man on the stairs, I had always kept about me in taking my guest out after dark, and in bringing him back; and I looked about me now. Difficult as it is in a large city to avoid the suspicion of being watched, when the mind is conscious of danger in that regard, I could not persuade myself that any of the people within sight cared about my movements. The few who were passing passed on their several ways, and the house in which I lived remained back into the Temple. Nobody had come out at the gate with us, nobody went in at the gate with us. As I crossed by the fountain, I saw his lighted back windows looking bright and quiet, and when I stood for a few moments in the doorway of the building where I lived, before going up the stairs, Garden Court was as still and lifeless as the staircase was when I ascended it.

Herbert received me with open arms, and I had never felt before, so blessedly, what it is to have a friend. When he had spoken some sound words of sympathy and encouragement, we sat down to consider the question, What was to be done?

The chair that Provis had occupied still remaining where it had stood—for he had a haircrack way with him of hanging about one spot, in one unsettled manner, and going through one round of observations with his pipe and his tumgro-head and his jack-knife and his pack of cards, and what not, as if it were all put down for him on a slate—I say, his chair remaining where it had stood, Herbert unconsciously took it, but next moment started out of it, pushed it away, and took another. He had no occasion to say after that that he had conceived an aversion for my patron, neither had I occasion to confess my own. We interchanged that confidence without shaping a syllable.

"What," said I to Herbert, when he was safe in another chair, "what is to be done?"

"My poor dear Handel," he replied, holding his head, "I am too stunned to think."

"So was I, Herbert, when he first told me. Still, something must be done. He is intent upon various new expenses—horses, and carriages, and various appearances of all kinds. He must be stopped, somehow."

"You mean that you can't accept—?"

"How can I?" interrupted I, with energy. I am heavily in debt—very heavily for me, who have now no expectations at all—and I have been bred to no calling, and I am fit for nothing."

"Well, well, well!" Herbert remonstrated. "Don't say fit for nothing."

"What am I fit for? I know only one thing that I am fit for, and that is, to go for a soldier. And I might have gone, my dear Herbert, but for the prospect of being counsel with your friendship and affection."

Of course I broke down there; and of course Herbert, beyond seeing a warm grip of my hand, pretended not to know it.

"Any how, my dear Handel," said he, presently, "soldiering won't do. If you were to renounce this patronage and turn your back, I suppose you would do so with some faint hope of one day repaying what you have already had. Not very strong hope if you were soldiering! Besides, it's absurd. You would be infinitely better in Clarriker's house, small as it is. I am working up toward a partnership, you know."

Poor fellow! He little suspected with whose money.

"But there is another question," said Herbert. "This is an ignorant, determined man, who has long single-handedly worked out that idea, that he seems to me (I may misjudge him) to be a man of a desperate and fierce character."

"I know he is. I have known it. I have told you what evidence I have seen of it." And I told him what I had not mentioned in my narrative; of that encounter in the churchyard.

"See, then!" said Herbert; "think of this. He comes here at the peril of his life for the realization of his idea. At the supreme moment of realization, after all he toil and waiting, you cut the ground from under his feet, destroy his idea, and make his gains worthless to him. Do you see nothing in that, Handel, but the display of disinterested generosity?"

"I have seen it, Herbert, and dreamed of it ever since the fatal night of his arrival. Nothing has been in my thoughts so distinctly as his putting himself in the way of being taken."

"Then you see the danger, my dear Herbert,

"that there would be great danger of his doing it. That is his power over you as long as he remains in England, and that would be his recklessness if you forsook him."

I was so struck by the horror of this idea, which had weighed on me so far from me then, and the working out of which would make me regard myself, in some sort, as his murderer, that I could not even say I would not begin pacing to and fro. I said to Herbert, meanwhile, that even if Provis were recognized and taken in spite of himself, I should not think it right to keep, however innocently. Yes; even though I was so wretched in having him at-large and near me, and even though I would far, far rather have worked at the forge all the days of my life than I would have ever come to this!

But there was no shaving off the question. What was to be done?

"The first and the main thing to be done," said Herbert, "is to get him out of England. You will have to go with him, and then he may be induced to go."

"But I don't know where I will, could I prevent his coming back?"

"My good Handel, is it not obvious that, with Newgate in the second volume, there must be greater hazard in your breaking your mind to him and making him reckless here than elsewhere? In a prospect of his being taken, he be made out of that other convict, or out of any thing else in his life now."

"Then, again!" said I, stopping before Herbert, with my open hands held out as if they contained the desperation of the case. "I know nothing of his life. It has almost made me mad to sit here of a night and see him before me, so bound up with my fortunes and misfortunes, and yet so unknown to me, except as the miserable wretch who terrified me two days in my childhood!"

Herbert got up, and linked his arm in mine, and we slowly walked to and fro together, studying the carpet.

"Handel," said Herbert, stopping, "you feel convinced that you can take no further Benefits from him; do you?"

"Fully. Surely you would, too, if you were in my place?"

"And you feel convinced that you must break with him?"

"Herbert, can you ask me?"

"And you have, and are bound to have, that tenderness for the life he has risked on your account, that you must save him, if possible, from throwing it away. Then you must get him out of England before you stir a finger to extricate yourself. Pip, dear old fellow, and yourself, in Heaven's name, and we'll see it out together, dear old boy."

It was a comfort to shake hands upon it, and walk up and down again, with only that done.

"Now, Herbert," said I, "with reference to getting him out, and providing for his safety. There is but one way that I know of. I must ask him point-blank."

"Yes. Ask him," said Herbert, "when we sit at breakfast in the morning." For he had said, on taking leave of Herbert, that he would breakfast with him next day.

With this project formed, we went to bed. I had the wildest dreams concerning him, and woke frequently. I woke, too, to recover the fear which I had lost in the night, of his being found out as a returned transport. Waking, I never lost that fear.

He came round at the appointed time, took out his jack-knife, and sat down to his meal. He was full of lively talk on his gentleman's coming out strong, and like a gentleman, "and urged me to begin speedily upon the pocket-book, which he had left with Herbert overnight. He considered the chambers and his own lodging as temporary residences, and advised me to look out at once for "a fashionable crib." Above all, he could have "a shake-down," near Hyde Park. When he had made an end of his breakfast, and was wiping his knife on his leg, I said to him, without a word of preface:

"After you were gone last night I told my friend of the struggle that the soldiers found you engaged in, on the marshes when we came up. You remember?"

"Remember!" said he. "I think so!"

"We want to know something about that man—and about you. It is strange to know no more about either, and particularly you, than we do. Are you fond of the sea, sir? Is not this as good a time as another for our knowing more?"

"Well!" he said, after consideration. "You're on your oath, both, mind, and to conceal?"

"Assuredly," replied Herbert.

"As to any thing I say, you mean, he insisted. "Speak pooty plain to all."

"I understand it to do so."

"And look'ee here! Whatever I done, is worked out and paid for," he insisted again.

"So be it."

He took out his black pipe and was going to fill it with negligence, looking at the tangle of tobacco in his hand, he seemed to think it might perplex the thread of his narrative. But, on my offering him his own pipe in a button-hole of his coat, spread a hand on each knee, and, after turning an angry eye on the fire for a few silent moments, looked round at us and said what follows.

CHAPTER XLII.

"DEAR boy, and Pip's comrade. I am not a going to tell you my life, like a song or a story-book. But to give it you short and handy, I'll put it at once into a mouthful of English. I'm a-living now, and I've been a-living, all in jail and out of jail. There, you've got it. That's my life pretty much, down to such times as I got shipped off, arter Pip paid off my friend.

"Then you've done every thing to, pretty well—except hanged. I've been carted here and carted there, and put out of this town and put out of that town, and stuck in the stocks, and whipped and worried and drove. I've no mind to say where I was born than you have, nor so much. I first become aware of myself, down in Essex, a thieving turnips for my living. Summun had run away from me—a man—a tinker—and he'd took the fire with him, and left me very cold.

"I know'd my name to be Magwitch, christen'd Abel. How did I know it? Much as I know'd the bibs' names in the hedges to be chaffinches, sparrers, tomtits, and what not. Nobody told me as all lies together, only as the birds' names come out true, I supposed mine did.

"So far as I could see, there warn't a soul that see young Abel Magwitch, with as little on him as in him, but what caught fright at him, and either drove him off or took him up. I was took up, took up, took up, to that extent that I regg'larly grow'd up took up.

"This is the way of the world, that when I was a ragged little creetur as much to be pitied as ever I see (not that I looked in the glass, for there warn't many insides of houses known to me), I got the name of being hardened. 'This is a terrible hardened one,' they says to prison wisitors. And they come and look at me, as I live in jails, this boy.' Then they looked at me, and I looked at them, and they measured my head, some on 'em—they had the phrenology mania at that time—and others on 'em giv me tracts what I couldn't read, and made me speeches what I couldn't understand. They always went on agen me about the Devil. But what the Devil was I to do? I must put something into my stomach, mustn't I?—Howsomever, I'm a getting low, and I know what's due. Dear boy, and Pip's comrade, don't you be a-feerd of me being low.

"Tramping, begging, thieving, working sometimes when I could—though that warn't as often as you may think, till you put the question whether you would lief been over ready to give me work yourselves—a bit of a poncher, a bit of a laborer, a bit of a waggoner, a bit of a hay maker, a bit of a hawker, a bit of most things that don't pay and lead to trouble, I got to be a man. A deserting soldier in a Travelers' Rest, what's run away with a pig to the chin under a lot of tators, learnt me to read; and a traveling Dwarf what signed his name at a penny a time learnt me to write. I warn't locked up as often now as formerly, but I wore out my share of key-metal still.

"At Epsom races, a matter of twenty year ago, I got acquainted wi' a man whose skull I'd crack wi' this poker, like the claw of a lobster, if I'd got it on this hob. His right name was Compey; and that's the man, dear boy, what you see me pounding in the ditch, according to wot you truly told your comrade arter I was gone last night.

"He set up fur a gentleman, this Compey, and he'd been to a public boarding-school and had learning. He was a smooth one to talk, and was a dab at the ways of gentlefolks. He was good-looking too. It was the night afore the great race that I first had him on the heath, in a booth that I know'd on. Him and some more were sitting among the tables when I went in, and the landlord (which had a knowledge of me, and was a sporting one) called him out, and said, 'I think this is a man that might suit you'—meaning I was.

"Compey, he looks at me very noticing, and I look at him. He has a watch and a chain and a ring and a breast-pin and a handsome suit of clothes.

"'To judge from appearances, you're out of luck,' says Compey to me.

"'Yes, sir,' says I, 'I've never been in it much.' (I come out of Kingston Jail last on a vagrancy committal. Not but what it might have been for something else; but it warn't.)

"'Luck changes,' says Compey; 'perhaps yours is going to change.'

"'I says, 'I hope it may be so. There's room.'

"'What can you do?' says Compey.

"'Eat and drink,' I says; 'if you'll find the materials.'

"Compey he took a fancy to me again very noticing, giv me five shillings, and appointed me for next night. Same place.

"I went to Compey, next night, same place, and Compey he took me on to be his man and pardner. And what was Compey's business in which we was to go pardners? Compey's business was the swindling advertising fortune-telling touch-note passing, and such like. All sorts of traps as Compey could set with his head, and keep his own legs out of and get the profits from and let another man in for, was Compey's business. He'd no more learnt than a iron file, he was as cold as death, and had the head of the Devil afore mentioned.

"There was another in with Compey, as was called Arthur—had as being or went for Art as a surname. He was in a Decline, and was a shadow to look at. Him and Compey had been in a bad thing down in the north country over one, and they'd made a pot of money by it; but Compey betted and gamed, and he'd have run through the kingdom of Heaven, so Arthur was dying, and a dying poor and with the horrors on him, and Compey's wife (which Compey kicked mostly) was a having pity on him, as she could, and Compey was a having pity on nothing and nobody.

"I might a took warning by Arthur, but I didn't; and I won't pretend I was particler—for where 'ud be the good on it, dear boy and comrade? I began wi' Compey, and a poor lost I was in his hands. Arthur lived a little top of Compey's house (over nigh Brentford it was), and Compey kept a careful account agen him for board and lodging, in case he should ever get better to work it out. But Arthur soon settled the account. The second or third time as ever I see him, he was a-screeching out of Compey's parlor late at night, in only a flannel gown, with his hair all in a sweat, and he says to Compey's wife, 'Lucy, for the love of the Lord stairs another me now, and I can't get rid of her. She's all in white, he says, 'wi' white flowers in her hair, and she's a-coming down the stairs in white shroud hanging over her arm, and she says she'll put it on me at five in the morning.'

"Says Compey, says he, 'Why, you fool, don't you know she's got a living body? And how should she be up there, without coming through the door, or in the winder like a person in a play?'

"'I don't know how she's there,' says Arthur, shivering dreadful with the horrors, 'but she's standing at the foot of the bed, and at the bed, awful mad. And over where her heart's broke —you broke it—there's drops of blood.'

"Compey spoke hearty, for he was always a coward. 'Go up alonger this driveling sick man,' he says to his wife, 'and Magwitch, lend her a hand, will you?' But he never come nigh himself.

"Compey's wife and me took him up to bed again, and he was most dreadful. 'Why look at her!' he cries out. 'She's a shaking the shroud at me! Don't you see her? Look at her eyes! Ain't it awful to see her a head! Next he cries, 'She'll put it on me, and then I'm done for! Take it away from her, take it away!' And then he catched hold of me, and kep on a talking to her, and answering of her, till I half believed I see her myself.

"Compey's wife, being used to him, giv him some liquor to get the horrors off, and by-and-by he quieted. 'Oh, she's gone! Has her keeper been for her?' he says. 'Yes,' says Compey's wife. 'Did you tell him to lock her and bar her in?' 'Yes.' 'And to take that ugly thing away from her?' 'Yes, yes, all right.' 'You're a good creetur,' he says; 'don't leave me, whatever you do, and thank you!'

"He rested pretty quiet till it might want a few minutes of five, and then he starts up with a scream, and screams out, 'Here she is! She's got the shrowd again. She's unfolding it. She's coming out of the corner. She's coming to the bed. Hold me both on you—one of each side —don't let her touch me with it. Huh! she missed me that time. Don't let her throw it over my shoulders. Don't let her lift me up to get it round me. She's lifting me up. Keep me down!' Then he lifted himself up hard, and was dead.

"Compey took it easy enough as a good ridance for both sides. Him and me was soon busy, and first he swore me (being ever artful) on my own book—this here little black book, dear boy, what I swore your comrade on.

"Not to go into the things that Compey planned and I done—which 'ud take a week—I'll simply say you, dear boy, and Pip's comerade, that that man got me into such nets as made me his black slave. I was always in debt to him, always under his thumb, always a working, always a getting into danger. He was younger than me, but he'd got craft, and he'd got learning, and he overmatched me five hundred times told and no mercy. My Missis as I had the hard time wi'— Stop though! I ain't brought her in.

He looked about him in a confused way, as if he had lost his place in the book of his remembrance; and he turned his face to the fire, and spread his hands broader on his knees, and lifted them off and put them on again.

"There was a need to go into it," he said, when he looked round once more. "The time wi' Compey was almost as hard a time as ever I had; that said, with a said. Did I tell-you as I was tried, alone, for misdemeanor, while with Compey?"

I answered, No.

"Well!" he said, "I was, and got convicted. As to took up on suspicion, that was twice or three times in the four or five year that it lasted; but evidence was wanting. At last me and Compey was both committed for felony—on a charge of putting stolen notes in circulation—and there was other charges behind. Compey says to me, 'Separate defenses, no communication,' and that was all. And I was so miserable poor that I sold all the clothes I had, except what hung on my back, afore I could get Jaggers.

"When we was put in the dock, I noticed first of all what a gentleman Compey looked, wi' his curly hair and his black clothes and his white pocket-handkercher, and what a common sort of wretch I looked. When the prosecution opened and the evidence was put short, aforehand, I mentioned how heavy it all bore on me, and how light on him. When the evidence was giv in the box, I noticed how it was always me that had come forard, and could be sworn to, how it was always me that the money had been paid to, how it was always me that had seemed to work the thing and get the profit. But, when the defense come on, then I see the plan plainer; for, says the counselor for Compey, 'My lord and gentlemen, here you have afore you, side by side, two persons as your eyes can separate wide; one, the younger, well brought up, who will be seen to as near to the elder, ill brought up, who will be spoke to as a hardened offender; one, the younger, seldom if ever seen in these here precincts, and but only suspected; t'other, the elder, always seen in 'em and always wi' his guilt brought home. Can you doubt, if there is two sich in a row in it, which is the one, and, if there is two in it, which is much the worst one?' And such like. And when it come to character, wasn't it Compey as had been to the school, and wasn't it his school-fellows as was in this position and in that, and wasn't it him as had been known'd by witnesses in such clubs and societies, and wasn't to his disadvantage? And wasn't it me as had been tried afore, and as had been know'd up hill and down dale in Bridewells and Lords-Ups? And when it come to speech-making, warn't it Compey as could speak to 'em wi' his face dropping every now and then into his white pocket-handkercher—ah! and wi' verses in his speech, too—and warn't it me as could only say, 'Gentlemen, this man at my side is a damnable rascal?' And when the verdict come, warn't it Compey as was recommended to mercy on account of good character and bad company, and giving up all the information he could agen me, and warn't it me as got never a word but Guilty? And when I says to Compey, 'Once out of this court, I'll smash that face of yourn?' ain't it Compey as prays the Judge to be protected, and gets two turnkeys stood behind us? And when we're sent—and, ain't it him as gets seven years and me fourteen, and ain't it him as the Judge is sorry for, because he might a done so well, and ain't it me as the Judge perceives to be a man of wicked passion, likely to come'to worse?"

He had worked himself into a state of great excitement, but he checked it, took two or three short breaths, swallowed as often, and stretching out his hand to remind me that I was losing manner, "I ain't a going to be low, dear boy."

He had so heated himself that he took out his handkerchief and wiped his face and head and neck and hands, before he could go on.

"I had said to Compey that I'd smash that face of his, and I swore Lord smash mine! to do it. We was in the same prison-ship, but I couldn't get at him for long, though I tried. At last I come behind him and hit him on the cheek to turn him round and get a smashing one at him, when I was seen and seized. The black-hole of that ship warn't a strong one, to a judge of black-holes that could swim and dive. I escaped to the shore, and I was a hiding among the graves there, envying them as was in 'em and all over, when first I see my boy!"

He regarded me with a look of affection that made him almost abhorrent to me again, though I had felt great pity for him.

"By my boy I was giv to understand as Compey was out on them sentences too. Upon my soul, I half believe he escaped in his terror to get quit of me, not knowing it was me as had got ashore. I hunted him down. I smashed his face. 'And now,' says I, 'as the worst thing I can do, caring nothing for myself, I'll drag you back.' And I'd have swum off, towing him by the hair, if it had come to that, and I'd a got him aboard without the soldiers.

"Of course he'd much the best of it to the last—his character was so good. He had escaped when he was made half wild by me and my murderous intentions; and his punishment was light. I was put in irons, brought to trial again, and sent for life. I didn't stop for life, dear boy and Pip's comrade, being here."

He wiped himself again, as he had done before, and then slowly took his tangle of tobacco from the pouch, spread it thin, put his pipe from his button-hole, and slowly filled it, and began to smoke.

"Is he dead?" I asked, after a silence.

"Is who dead, dear boy?"

"Compey."

"He hopes I am, if he's alive, you may be sure," with a fierce look. "I never heerd no more of him."

Herbert had been writing with his pencil in the cover of a book. He softly pushed the book over to me, as Provis stood smoking with his eyes on the fire, and I read in it:

"Young Havisham's name was Arthur. Compey is the man who professed to be Miss Havisham's friend."

I shut the book and nodded slightly to Herbert, and put the book by: but we neither of us said any thing, and both looked at Provis as he stood smoking by the fire.

GUESTS AT THE GREAT INN.

BEAT the gong, and ring the bell!
Gaily open the palace gate—
Comes a Lady, young, alone,
Torn by stock, and bruised by stone,
Hunted here by jealous hate.
"Give me shelter, silence, rest—
If, by coarse purveyor pressed,
You are questioned, nothing tell."
Ah! poor heart, in anguish lost!—
Welcome from your foes to rest!

Hath the host not grieved as well?

Ring the bell, and beat the gong!
Comes an Earl with gold to waste,
"Old wine in thy cellar is,
And the oldest I will kiss,
As my mistress I would taste."
Riot in my chamber best,
Some one to his bosom pressed
Who departs and wails no wrong;
Ducats on my staircase shed—
(I have followed there, the dead)—
'Tis a jolly even-song!

Beat the gong, and ring the bell!
Here is Feet, come to see
What our city hath to show—
Minster windows, all a-glow
With the rainbow's pageantry.
Elders saints the whom to carve,
Sculptor of his flesh would starve
Strong in worship of the spell.
Cheer his heart with yellow wine.
Boy! thy dream long since was mine,
How it vanished, who can tell?

Ring the bell, and beat the gong!
Last him by—Merchant next,
Hard in voice and hold in face,
Only by a damaged place
In his market to be vexed.
Hear him talk, a pair of trade,
Of the bargains he has made
Here and there, his walk along:
"Arm sees spiritual, sword
Trimidle, my wight-black beard!"—
Cheap hath grown the price of wrong.

Beat the gong, and ring the bell!
What? for Priest with nought to spend!—
Creeping in, who maketh gloom
Even in my lighted room!
By his feigning to be friend
Of dumb things, that understand
And evade his satin hand—
Of my child, who shrinks as well—
Of the Peddler, who is here—
Dusty, for his flask of beer—
Let him out—and no farewell!

Ring the bell, and beat the gong!
Loud!—The Prince!—on humble knees
Light him upward to his bed,
Proud that on God's earth do tread
Still 'such royal prodigies!
What has mighty Prince to do,
With a vassal small as you,
Save to pay for feast and song?
"Ah! your Highness, pardon, pray,
If my wife decorated
She was loving, fair, and young!"

Some must keep an open door—
Corpses need no revel-din;
Who inquires if in the cup
Funeral wine be offered up?
Death goes out, and Life comes in!
Call for joyaunce, revel, toast—
Who respects convenient Host,
When his nimbleness is o'er?
Who hath dreamed that to his part,
He, too, brought a human heart?—
Close the Inn for evermore!

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Important to Hotel-Keepers.

HARRISON'S
IMPROVED EUROPEAN RANGE.

Remarkable for economy of fuel and solidity of castings. Read the following testimonial:

"St. Nicholas Hotel, New York,
April 24, 1861.

"Messrs. Bramhall, Deane, & Co.: * * * We have had the HARRISON KITCHENER in use for three years past, and we consider it invaluable. You are at full liberty to refer to us. We will be pleased to furnish any information in reference to its use. Yours, &c., FRED'K WELLS, WHITCOMB, & CO."

We have similar testimonials from all who have had an opportunity to test our range.

BRAMHALL, DEANE, & CO., Manufacturers,
No. 440 Broadway, New York.

NEW WAR SONG.

BY THE STEPHEN C. MASSETT.

"Our Good Ship Sails To-Night."

Sung with immense success by MADAME ANNA BISHOP, MR. H. MILLARD, and others.

Every Volunteer, and every Father, Mother, Sister, and Brother should have a copy. Price 25c. Copies sent by mail, postage paid.

FIRTH, POND & CO., No. 547 Broadway, New York.

Send your Orders to
W. A. HAYWARD, 208 Broadway,

For Union Pins, Flag Pins, Union Lockets Charms, Union Shields, Eagles, &c., &c., &c., and all the New Styles of Buttons!! Anything wanted in every line in the Union. Inclose One Dollar for an assortment of samples and prices. Also inclose One Dollar for two sample Flags, Sets, Pin, and Ear-Rings.

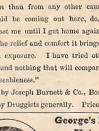
Burnett's Kalliston
For the Toilet.

The Proprietors are permitted to copy the following letter written by a lady from Vienna.

"* * * * * As old travelers, we bear the annoyances and privations incident to journeying with composure, but I have suffered more from the exhaustion of my supply of Kalliston than from any other cause. If any good friend should be coming out here, do, pray, send me enough to last me until I get home again. You can have no idea of the relief and comfort it brings when one is suffering from exposure. I have tried other 'appliances,' but have found nothing that will compare with it for efficacy or agreeableness."

Prepared by Joseph Burnett & Co., Boston.

For sale by Druggists generally. Price 50 cents a bottle.



George's New Patent
Hair-Dresser,

For waving Ladies' hair in the most fashionable style. A complete article, by which every lady can wave her own hair in ten minutes without injury.

Forwarded to any address, free, on receipt of $1 25.

Agents wanted. State rights for sale. Send for Circulars.

Address R. M. LIVINGSTON, Agent, 537 Broadway, New York.

To Singers.

Hoarseness. A minister in the "Southern Female College," Athens, Tenn., says of "Brown's Bronchial Troches," or Cough Lozenges: "Having frequently used almost every expectorant for Hoarseness without much benefit, I seemed cured by the use of one box. I am highly pleased with them."

No Chimney!

Burners that will fit any Cool-Oil Lamp, and Sperm, Cool-Oil or Kerosene without a chimney. Burner sent by mail on receipt of $1 25. Callender's Carbo-Air Gas-Lamp burns pure Cool-Oil, Camphene, &c., without wick or chimney. Sample Lamp $3 00. Enclose stamp for Circulars. Address CALLENDER & PEARL, Dealers in Lamps, Oils, &c., 175 Broadway, New York.

Military Books.

D. VAN NOSTRAND, Bookseller, Publisher, and Importer of Military Books, 192 Broadway.
Send for Catalogue of Military Books.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA cures Scrofula and all Scorbutic Diseases. Its purifying and recuperative powers are unalloyed. For sale by A. B. & D. SANDS, No. 100 Fulton Street, New York.

SHOW YOUR COLORS.—One Large American Flag, 24 by 25 inches, or Forty-Six Small Flags, assorted sizes, on one sheet muslin. Colors bright and durable. Mailed, postage free, for Fifty Cents. J. C. HANEY, 199 Nassau Street, New York.

"Matrimony made Easy."—A new work, showing how either sex may be suitably married, irrespective of age or appearance, which can not fail—free for 25 cents. Address T. William & Co., Publishers, Box 2260, Philad.

Mantillas! Mantillas!

BRODIE

Has made his Great

Anniversary Opening

at his

Palace of Fashion,

Under the 5th Avenue Hotel,

Corner 23d Street,

and at the

Old Celebrated Stand,

300 Canal Street.

The Richest Display of

MANTILLAS

in

Silk and Cloth

Ever made in New York.

H. WORCESTER'S
IMPROVED PIANO FORTES,
Manufactory & Salesrooms,
14th St., cor. 3d Av., N. Y.

MRS. MISS. UNION. MITKE. LOVE. WEDDING CARDS.

Specimens by Mail on receipt of 2 postage stamps.

EVERETT & BROTHERS, N.Y.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK,
Have Just Published:

SILAS MARNER,
The Weaver of Raveloe. By George Eliot, Author of "Adam Bede," "The Mill on the Floss," and "Scenes of Clerical Life." 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents; Paper, 50 cents.

Commencement of the 23d Volume.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
For June, 1861.

CONTENTS.

THE COAST RANGERS OF CALIFORNIA.—I. THE ASSOCIATION. Illustrations.—The Rangers in Camp.—Dr. Campbell.—Tom Fry.—Tom Smallwood.—Dick Wilkins.—The General.—Captain Toby finds a Trail.—Discussing Captain Toby's Trail.—A California Rabbit.—Colonel Jack.—Corraling Wild Horses.—Hunting in the Coast Range.—Encamped.

RECRIMINATION.

ADVENTURES IN GORILLA LAND.
Illustrations.—Head of Gorilla.—The King of the Camwilwa.—Mbondeo Man and Woman.—Attack of the Gorilla.—Elephant Battue.—Knife and Axes.—Fan Bowman.—Drum and Hoselo.—The Bushbuxsy Ant.—Death of a Hunter.—Pygmy Head.—Executing a Sorcerer.—Crocodile Hunting.—Village in Equatorial Africa.—The Kouloo Kombas.—Schlegs and Nyang.—An Easy Chair.—Camma Man and Woman.—A Negro Beauty.

APPLE-BLOSSOMS. By Nora Perry.
Illustrations.—Among the Blossoms.—Supplication.—What could a Man do?

ORLEY FARM. By Anthony Trollope.—Illustrated by J. E. Millais.
Chapter V. Sir Peregrine makes a Second Promise.
Chapter VI. The Commencement of Persecution. Lucie.
Chapter VII. The Masses of Grubby Park.
Chapter VIII. Mrs. Mason's hot Lunches.
Illustrations.—Lady Mason.—The Commercial Room.

GEORGE ROGERS CLARKE. (Concluded.)

CHARITY SPANGLER.

WHAT IS BEST?

A CLERGYMAN'S ADVENTURE.

MY WINDING NEIGHBOR.

THE ADVENTURES OF PHILIP. By W. M. Thackeray.
Chapter XI. In which Philip is very ill-tempered.
Chapter XII. Rummun.
Illustrations.—In a Fume.—Nurse and Doctor.—Bubbles.

CAPTAIN ALICANT.

AUDIENCE OF THE QUEEN OF SPAIN.

ON BEING ROUND OUT.

GRACE AND I.

MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.

EDITOR'S TABLE.

OUR FOREIGN BUREAU.

EDITOR'S DRAWER.—(With Eight Illustrations.)

MODERN IDOLATRY.
Illustrations.—Dr. Irishman's Idol.—The Scotchman's Idol.—The Englishman's Idol.—The German Idol.—The Universal Idol.—The Frenchman's Idol.—The Politician's Idol.—A Southern Idol.—A Baltimore Idol.—The Boston Idol.—Fashion's Idols.

FASHIONS FOR JUNE.
Illustrations.—Summer Pardessus.—Chezon.

Any Number will be sent by Mail, post-paid, for Twenty-five Cents. Any Volume, comprising Six Numbers, neatly bound in Cloth, will be sent by Mail, to any part of the United States within 3000 miles of New York, post-paid, for Two Dollars per Volume. Complete Sets will be sent by Express, the freight at the charge of the purchaser, at a Discount of Twenty-five per Cent. from the above rate. Twenty-two Volumes, bound uniformly, extending from June, 1850, to June, 1861, are now ready.

HARPER'S WEEKLY will be sent gratuitously for one month, on receipt of Postage-stamps to the applies for it. Specimen Numbers of the MAGAZINE will also be sent gratuitously.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year	$3 00
Two Copies for One Year	5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each)	2 00

And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Eight Subscribers.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $4 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

A Rebel General startled in his Camp by the Beautiful and Unexpected Display of NORTHERN LIGHT.

NORTHERN SOLDIERS
As Painted by the Artist of the Mobile Advertiser.

"They may raise plenty of men; men who prefer enlisting to starvation, scurvy fellows from the back slums of cities, whom Falstaff would not have marched through Coventry with; but these recruits are not soldiers, least of all the soldiers to mend the hot-blooded, thorough-bred, impetuous men of the South. Trencher soldiers, who enlisted to war on their rations, not on men; they are; such as marched through Baltimore, ragged, wretched, ragged, and half-naked, as the newspapers of that city report them. Fellows who do not know the breech of a musket from its muzzle, and had rather fetch a handkerchief than fight an enemy in manly conduct. White-slave, pedding wretches, small change knaves and vagrants, the dregs and off-scourings of the populace; these are the levied "forces" whom Lincoln suddenly arrays as candidates for the honor of being slaughtered by gentlemen—such as Mobile sent to battle yesterday. Let them come South, and we will put our negroes to the dirty work of killing them. But they will not come South. Not a wretch of them will live on this side of the border longer than it will take us to reach the ground and drive them over."

NORTHERN SOLDIERS
As Depicted in General Butler's Proclamation at Baltimore.

"DEPARTMENT OF ANNAPOLIS, FEDERAL HILL, BALTIMORE, May 14.

"A detachment of the forces of the Federal Government under my command HAVE OCCUPIED THE CITY OF BALTIMORE for the purpose, among other things, of enforcing respect and obedience to the laws, as well of the State, if requested thereto by the Civil Authorities, as of the United States, which are being violated within its limits by some malignant and traitorous men. To the end, therefore, that all misunderstanding of the purposes of the Government may be prevented, and to set at rest all unfounded, false, and seditious rumors, to relieve all apprehensions, if any are felt by the well-disposed portion of the community, and to make it thoroughly understood by all traitors, their aiders or abettors, that their rebellious acts must cease," &c. &c.

Volunteers! and Home Guards!!
Should be supplied with
Beadle's Dime Squad Drill Book.
Beadle's Dime Songs for the War.
Ten cents each. For sale at all News Depots. Sent by Mail on receipt of price.
BEADLE & CO., Publishers, New York.

Our Commander-in-Chief.
Beadle's Dime Biographical Library No. 6.
The Life, Military, and Civic Services
OF
LIEUT.-GEN. WINFIELD SCOTT.
The only Complete Life of the Old Hero.
130 pag., complete. Ten Cents. For sale at all News Depots. Sent by Mail, on receipt of price.
BEADLE & CO., Publishers, New York.

WARD'S
Perfect Fitting Shirts,
MADE TO MEASURE AT $18 PER DOZEN.
Printed directions for Self-Measurement, list of prices, drawings of different styles of shirts, will be sent everywhere.
S. W. H. WARD, from London,
No. 387 Broadway, N. Y., up Stairs.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.
Have Just Published:
ONE OF THEM. By LIEUT. E. LEVER, Author of "Charles O'Malley," "Harry Lorrequer," "The Dodd Family," &c. &c. 8vo. Paper, 50 cents.

Authorized Editions.

General Scott's Infantry Tactics;
OR,
Rules for the Exercise and Maneuvres of the United States Infantry.
3 vols. 24mo. Muslin, $2 50.
Published by Authority.

United States Army Regulations.
Approved by the President of the United States, and Printed under the Direction of WILSON CARMINE, Sec'ry of War.
1 vol. 12mo. Muslin, $1 00.
Published by HARPER & BROTHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

Harper's Weekly.
PRICE SIX CENTS.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year	2 00
Two Copies for One Year	4 00

Harper's Weekly and Harper's Magazine, one year, $4 00.

Volumes I., II., III., and IV. of HARPER'S WEEKLY, handsomely bound in Cloth extra, Price $1 50 each, are now ready.

☞ To postmasters and agents getting up a Club of Ten Subscribers, a Copy will be sent gratis. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. Specimen Numbers gratuitously supplied.

☞ Clergymen and Teachers supplied at the lowest Club Rates.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. V.—No. 231.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 1, 1861. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $2 50 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1861, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

MAJOR-GENERAL BUTLER.

MAJOR-GENERAL BENJAMIN F. BUTLER, whose likeness we offer our readers from the only known photograph in existence, has thus far been the most prominent volunteer officer since the President's proclamation of April 15. His energy, activity, and perseverance in opening a way of communication with Washington, at a time when the capital seemed cut off by events at Baltimore, have been well known to the public, and have won from the Administration the highest encomiums.

Mr. Butler was born at Deerfield, Rockingham County, New Hampshire, in 1818, and is consequently forty-three years old. One of his ancestors was a Cilley—one of the truest Revolutionary stock in New England—and the subject of this biography was related to the lamented Jonathan Cilley, who was killed in the duel with Graves of Kentucky. Mr. Butler received his collegiate education at Waterville, Maine, where the Baptist denomination have a flourishing literary institution. He studied law, and took up his residence at Lowell, Massachusetts, where he soon distinguished himself as an advocate in the courts of Middlesex County. His reputation was soon extended to Boston, and he has long held a prominent position in the Massachusetts bar, whether in the courts of the State or of the General Government. As an advocate he is distinguished by the energy with which he devotes himself to his client, and by the strong, playful, and sometimes vehement language hurled against opposing counsel. Many anecdotes are told of him in Massachusetts illustrating what we have said. His forte is in the trod of cases. It is said that he has tried more jury cases for the last ten years than any other lawyer in the United States.

But aside from the law, he has on more than one occasion manifested coolness and intrepidity under trying circumstances. As an instance of this we may mention the memorable incident which took place in Lowell, Massachusetts, in 1836. It was during the Presidential contest, and Hon. Rufus Choate had been invited to address the Conservative citizens. The largest hall of the city was crowded to excess. The audience was wild with enthusiasm, as the brilliant orator swayed them by his eloquence; but, in the midst of the applause, a jar was felt, a crash was heard, and every face save one turned pale as the cry went forth, "The floor is sinking!" The man whose cheek knew no pallor was General Butler. He sprung up and calmed the fears of the multitude by telling them that he did not apprehend the least danger; that the architect was present; but to allay any misgiving he would go with the architect and examine the building.—An immediate investigation showed that the edifice was in the greatest possible danger, and a sudden movement, a rush on the part of the assembly, would result in the slaughter of thousands. Forgetful of himself, he bravely pushed through the dense crowd. He did not shriek—he showed no marks of trepidation—but with a bland countenance whispered a few apparently pleasant and assuring words to Mr. Choate. Mr. Butler then turned to the audience, and, in a calm, clear voice, remarked: "My friends, there is no present danger; but as the house is overcrowded, it will be better to quietly adjourn to the open air; and I therefore invite you to the front of the Merrimack House." The whole thing was accomplished in a few moments. It was only by Mr. Butler's self-possession that the catastrophe was avoided. On this occasion he showed more cool courage than any battle will ever call into requisition. In the life of Mr. Choate we find what the words were that bluntly fell, sotto voce, from Mr. Butler, viz., "Mr. Choate, I must clear this house, or we shall all be in it—I in five minutes!"

He has always been a prominent politician of the extreme wing of the Democracy, and has been in a number of political positions in his adopted State. He was member of the Massachusetts House of Representatives for the first time in 1853, was a member of the Constitutional Convention the same year, and was Senator for Middlesex in 1859–'60. In May, 1860, he was senatorial delegate to the Democratic Convention in Charleston, and afterward at Baltimore. He sided with the Breckinridge faction, and upon his return home was nominated by that portion the Democratic party candidate for Governor. He was one of the first to respond to the proclamation of President Lincoln calling for volunteers, and his subsequent services have made him, as a patriotic and as an energetic officer, dear to the loyal people of the United States.

We have heard it stated that Mr. Butler was a single man; but this is a mistake, for a number of years ago he married a daughter of Dr. Hildreth, of Lowell, and has a family of children.

The correspondent of the Herald, under date of May 15, thus described the performance of General Butler in the war now begun:

"General Butler, with a single Massachusetts regiment, the Eighth, marched from his own State, through six other States, and into Maryland, embarked on board a steamer, and landed in what was then considered the enemy's country, and took possession of Annapolis and held it.

"The War Department, appreciating this bold movement, immediately created the new Department of Annapolis, which extended to within seven miles of the Federal capital, and also on the east included Baltimore city, and made Gen. Butler commander of the same. He proceeded to reconstruct locomotives, build bridges, and make railroads. He pushes on toward Baltimore, fortifies himself at the Relay House with the Sixth Massachusetts and Eighth New York regiments and Cook's Boston Battery, controlling the great channel of communication between the rebels at Harper's Ferry and those in Baltimore. He sends out his scouts, seizes the famous steam-gun and turns it upon the enemy; and, with the same Massachusetts regiment that the rebels of Baltimore stoned three weeks previous, accompanied by Cook's Boston Battery and the New York Eighth, he marches into Baltimore, fortifies himself upon the highest point of land overlooking the whole city, issues his proclamation giving protection to all loyalists, and announcing his ultimatum to all traitors, seizes arms, arrests traitors, and marches through the streets escorted by the single company of the gallant Massachusetts Sixth, which received the severest treatment from the mob three weeks before. He does all this before the Pennsylvania troops that were at Cockeysville, within 15 miles of Baltimore three weeks ago, reach the city or afford him any support. This is history; and truly Gen. Butler has made a brilliant campaign.

"The President, the Secretary of War, General Scott, all recognize the man, and acknowledge the services which he and the officers and men under him have rendered, and this very day

MAJOR-GENERAL BENJAMIN F. BUTLER, U.S.A.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY G. H. LOOMIS, BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS.]

THE MIDNIGHT MARCH.

All along the weary miles,
Down through the dark defiles,
Through the woods of pine and larch,
Under midnight's solemn arch,
Came the heavy, sounding march
Of the Seventh!

Scouts out on either flank,
Searching close through dyke and bank,
Sweeping with their restless eyes
Every hollow, cut, and rise,
Guarding from the foe's surprise
All the Seventh!

Plod! plod! plod! and plod!
Over gravel, over sod,
Over up-torn railroad tracks,
With their bending, belted backs,
Waiting—hoping rash attacks,
Marched the Seventh!

Every pine-tree's jagged limb
In the black night looked grim;
And each dense thicket's shade
Seemed to hold an ambuscade;
Yet no soldier was afraid
In the Seventh!

Plod! plod! plod! and plod!
Over gravel, over sod,
Over up-torn railroad tracks,
With their bending, belted backs,
Waiting—hoping rash attacks,
Marched the Seventh!

"Halt! Rest!" along the line;
Down every man supine
In the wet gravel lay,
Hugging with delight the clay,
Longing for the light of day
On the Seventh!

Though the dark night was serene,
Never foeman's form was seen;
Though like flies they buzzed around,
Haunting every shady ground,
Fleeing at the slightest sound
From the Seventh!

So we marched till night was gone
And the heavens were blessed with dawn;
But History, with immortal hand,
Must yet record how firm and grand
Was that march through Maryland
Of the Seventh!

CAMP CAMERON, May 9, 1861.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JUNE 1, 1861.

THE CHARACTER OF THE WAR.

WE have received the following letter from EAST TENNESSEE, May 16, 1861.

ALLOW us a few observations, intended to contribute to set right the public mind upon the subject of the impending war.

First, A war must be waged. It is inevitable. The unity of the Government must be maintained at every hazard. Its dignity must be upheld. Men must be taught—the whole American people must learn—that it is a fearful thing to rebel against the Government—that the laws must absolutely be obeyed. They must learn that the Federal Constitution claims in a sovereign, but also a subject. He is a sovereign to make laws, and his prerogative is great; but he is a subject to obey those laws, and his subjection must be absolute. And it is strange now to see that the recognition of power is to be obedient subjects to their own laws, they cease also to be sovereigns. A subject of sovereign is he whose laws are not respected! But still above these constitutions, and it is possible to rise above them, the Government must wage this war to restore the lost liberties of its citizens within the limits they Government must have been subverted by the revolutionists. The loyal men of the revolted State are called on to defend the Government of their Government. I believe these loyal citizens constitute a majority of the whole people; but whatever a majority or minority, it is the duty of their Government to protect them from unlawful usurpation and tyranny. A sovereign rests upon the Government to wage this war—else it too will be subverted. Revolution is aggressive, insidious, and overbearing in the extreme. Its Secretary of War even proclaims the purpose to plant its banner of "the stars and bars" on the dome of the national Capitol; and coolly threatens that it may yet float over the city of Boston. This was before the promulgation of Lincoln's first proclamation, on the day on which Fort Sumter fell. That revolutionary Government sinks, by means of privateers, to destroy the commerce of the nation upon the high seas; and in fact it has been at war with that Government almost from the day of Lincoln's election—seizing upon the forts, the arsenals, the navy, its treasure, and its public property generally. With an insolent, pretentious air it has been practicing upon us for many long months continually.

Secondly, Government must take the aggressive (so to speak); that is, it can not stand on the defensive, and permit the insurrection on a grand scale to recede to the shameful force of Fort Sumter—refraining from firing a gun while the rebels are organizing around it for its own reduction. By the weak policy loyal citizens of the States which first "seceded" were left without protection and encouragement in their loyalty; and this cut off and neglected, they naturally succumbed to the existing state of things, and came to regard the usurpation as their Government, and their only Government as a foreign Power. And to wash away the stain of "perjury," many Union men enlisted in the armies which were being raised to war upon the Government of their fathers. And without an active war of protection loyal citizens were held in all the revolting States. They have no arms, and no standard to rally around. But,

Thirdly, This war is no war of the North against the South—no war of sections. It is a war of the whole Government against an insurrection and usurpation in certain States. It is a war not to "subjugate the South" or the Southern States, but to liberate the citizens of those States from the military subjugation under which they are placed by usurpation and intimidation. In my nature rebels that it should be a war of rapine and confiscation. It is the war of the law for the own enforcement against revolution; and if those who wage such war shall themselves violate the law, they too have plunged into revolution, and the law is destroyed. We loyal men of the South warn you in heaven how you let slip the bolt-hooks of revolution—from the very depths of despair we warn you that you come not into this place of torment. Therefore,

Fourthly, Let it be distinctly proclaimed by the Government, and by all loyal public journalists, that the nature of this war is to be such as I have set forth above; that the South is not to be subjugated, but delivered—not the black but the white men. That the old order of things is to be restored as it was; that the people are to be protected from the unlawful violence of their usurping rulers, and to suffer no unlawful violence at the hands of their deliverers. Let this announcement be made throughout every where proclaim those things to the people; that they are called upon to submit, not to slavery to the North, but to the laws they themselves have made—to the government established by their fathers and perpetuated by themselves. And it will be found, as these things begin to be understood by a misguided and misled people, that they will rally in thousands to the standard of the Government, and assist in restoring order. They will not only succeed, but will actively assist in putting down the rebellion.

In this section of country a large majority of the people are still true to the Union, and many part for the opportunity to take up arms against their oppressors. But they have no standard to rally around—no Government to throw its powerful shield around them. They have no arms, no sinews of war, no ammunition, no organization. In other parts of the Southern States they have been misled by false representations, sustained by quotations from violent Northern papers, and are now in arms against their own liberties. We have been all betrayed by traitorous Governors (except Governor Houston, of Texas), and by perfidious, terrorized Legislatures, who, grasping the sword and purse, have put the people under a military despotism.

Respectfully, KNOX.

These are brave and excellent words. We trust they do not come too late. There was a time when good Southern men might have stayed this rebellion and crushed treason, by proclaiming boldly and loudly that "the unity of the Government must be maintained at every hazard," that "the laws must absolutely be obeyed," and that "the Government must take the aggressive" against rebels. Unhappily, in those days, conservative Southerners were spending their strength in denouncing what they called "coercion" and "the Lincoln idea." Now the revolutionary wave has swept past them, and has left them on the bank, idly protesting against the laws of nature.

What this war is not to be does not depend on what rebels want, or what Government wants, or what neutrals want. It must take its course and shape from influences and events beyond individual control. To attempt, at the present time, to fix its metes, bounds, and results, is as futile as it would be to try to stake out the ground which would be overflowed if a levee on the Mississippi were suddenly broken. On one side the Government, on the other side the rebels, have their plans and their policy by which they propose to abide. But the first battle-field strewn with stark corpses will change the most deliberate of their preconceived purposes. Let us be rational beings, and remember the lessons of history. The women are not that some brave soldiers are killed, but that when it begins no one can tell where it will end, what direction it may take, and who may not fall victims to it.

It was to the air of "God save the King" that the New York tea ship, in 1774, was sent to sea without breaking bulk, by a people unconvincingly protesting that the water of London was a poor substitute for the water of Boston. But a few months before the execution of Louis XVI., M. Roland, the head of the revolutionists, addressed him in a famous letter: "You are deceived, Sire, when you attribute to ourselves to you as hostile to the throne and to yourself. The people love the Revolution in you." Nay, without traveling so far back, where can we find a more opportune illustration of our position than the speech delivered to the Georgia Legislature, in December last, by Alexander H. Stephens, now Vice-President of the Southern Confederacy? Has history been written in vain, that people fancy this revolution of ours is going to pursue a straight, even, smooth course, and to end under the terms, programme, and the same principles as it begins?

We most sincerely hope our correspondent is right when he speaks of the Union strength in the Southern States. We have no reason to suppose that the North has suffered many disappointments on this head. A month before Georgia seceded she was reported to be sound for the Union. Early in January, 1861, Mr. Buchanan's own sent out she was stated to have given over 20,000 votes majority against secession; now, Knoxville, the loyal city par excellence, feeds and houses secession troops on their way to Richmond. Virginia was relied on as safe till the very hour she seceded. When such men as John Bell, W. C. Rives, and Henry W. Hilliard are in the Confederate army, on whose can the North place their trust? If the Union men at the South had made one single fight—if in some single county, village, or plantation, there was a score of men, brave as Southerners are, had drawn trigger or unsheathed sword in defense of the old flag, it would have been easier then it is at present to have rallied around it the organization of Southern Unionists in the suppression of this most lamentable rebellion.

Still, for all this, we are convinced—and we rejoice in the conviction—that the Government commences its work with the intention of protecting property of all kinds, and of liberating from a military despotism those Union-loving citizens of the South who have been so easily overpowered by the rebels. To what extent, or in what way, events may modify this policy, our correspondent is as well able to speculate as we are.

A CARD FROM MR. RUSSELL.

MR. W. H. RUSSELL, Correspondent of the London Times, publishes the following card in the Mobile Register:

MOBILE, May 15, 1861.

To the Editor of the Mobile Register:

SIR,—My attention has been called to a statement in Harper's Weekly, couched in the following words:

"The proprietors have dispatched an artist to the South in company with Mr. Russell, correspondent of the London Times."

In reference to that statement, I have to observe that my companions are two, viz.: Mr. WARD, a personal friend, who left London to act as my secretary and valet traveling courade, and who has no connection whatever with any journal in the United or Confederate States, and Mr. DAVIS, a young artist, who is taking sketches for the Illustrated London News, and who can have no fear that he is not engaged by or connected with Harper's Weekly, although he knows very well that he is not to that periodical.

My position is that of a neutral, and I am employed on occasions that require the exercise of impartiality on my part, although I shall claim for myself the utmost freedom in the expression of my convictions and of my observations to the journal which I have the honor to serve. The expression of their convictions and observations, however, is almost only for England, and I shall not permit the publication of my letters under any circumstances whatever by those who accompany me, although I have every reason to believe that their good faith would render such a guarantee or assurance on my part unnecessary.

I have up to now in no instance failed by this post I have forwarded to the paper in question a request that they inclose their formal denial of the statement which has occasioned this communication. I have the honor to be, Sir,

Your faithful servant,

W. H. RUSSELL, LL.D.,
Barrister at Law.

We have not received the "formal denial" to which Mr. RUSSELL alludes. But we owe it to ourselves to say that the Mr. DAVIS he mentions is the special artist of Harper's Weekly, employed at our cost, and is not to our knowledge drawing for the Illustrated London News. We are sorry to add that we are informed Mr. RUSSELL was aware of these facts before he wrote the above letter.

THE LOUNGER.

ENGLAND AN ALLY.

THERE need be no fear of the attitude of England in this rebellion. She is in much more danger from its success than from its failure. She sees cotton enough, but she wants sound constitutional liberty more. If we could imagine this rebellion successful, the inevitable consequent encroachment upon liberty in England would presently force the English to arms. The encroachment would proceed from precisely that Tory party which sympathizes with the insurrection in this country—not that it cares for one part of the country more than another, but because all aristocracies are at bottom hostile to feudalism in England sympathizes with feudalism in America; and because the triumph of the rebellion would be a desperate and fatal blow at the great cause of popular constitutional government forever.

The people of England, however, see that the only conservative policy of their government is a popularly progressive policy, and they will insist upon that. They can not afford, for the sake of any particular commercial or manufacturing advantage, to risk the demoralization that would follow a recognition of so wanton and causeless a rebellion as ours. They see that if the Slave States should throw off the existing government, the cotton crop would be at the mercy of a servile race, without any force adequate to its control. That race would in the end be emancipated by the rebellion, and by the neighborhood of the Canada line, suddenly brought southward. Any year the cotton crop might be destroyed, and England would have lost both her cotton and the moral support of her sympathy with a free popular system. Enough statesmen in power well weather-wise, in the present situation of European affairs, their country could sustain a stroke so deadly.

Nor need the people fear of a great national principle be forgotten. Great Britain has pronounced for individual liberty. Whoever touches her soil, if not a felon by crime, raises his head to heaven as free as the Queen. A ministry which should propose to Parliament to recognize a rebellion which involved necessarily an abandonment of agreement as ours for the purpose of extending and strengthening human slavery, would raise a storm in the South-west that would blow them from power and hiss them to eternal infamy.

Let us have no fear of England. She has been always the ally of Christian civilization, and her heart is the hold of constitutional liberty. What Madison said of the United States may be said of England and of the universal Saxon race, "Their cause is the cause of human nature."

A NATIONAL HYMN.

NATIONAL hymns are not made to order. They spring from the deep inspiration of great emotions. But there can be no harm in asking every lordly who is now singing in obedience to those emotions to lend his voice to the committees and be paid for their trouble if the song chances to suit. The committee, probably, know about writing hymns to order as much as any other gentlemen. They do not assume that they will receive the hymn that shall be adopted by the nation, and therefore they reserve the right of rejecting every thing, if nothing seems to be quite excellent enough.

The Tribune makes two objections to the invitation of the committee. One, that a national hymn must be a war song, while the committee do not ask for a war song. The reply to this is that the committee evidently mean that they don't want a mere slogan. But they intend, of course, a hymn which may be sung whether in peace or war by every loyal citizen. "God save the King" is not a war song in any exclusive sense, although it calls upon the Lord to scatter the King's enemies. It may with equal fitness be sung either going into Waterloo or at a coronation. It is of the essence of a national hymn that it shall express fidelity to the flag at every cost. But it is to be a song for peace and war, not for a special campaign nor a single battle. Fidelity to the flag at every cost is necessarily, to use the objector's phrase, "battle to the innermost fire."

The other objection of the Tribune is that the word in the call "patriotic" is not definite. "Two-thirds of the country," it says, "will spit at any national hymn which raises its lyrical crosses to the God of the oppressed and broken-hearted in bonds." What then? The same people spit now at the Declaration of Independence. Is it any the less our great National manifest to the world? What is a patriotic hymn? It is a hymn which reaches, in inspired and majestic rhythm, the patriotic idea —the idea of the Patria, the country. And what is the American idea? Popular sovereignty—the liberty of the people. No American hymn can be, in any just sense, patriotic, which does not express that sentiment. The Declaration and the Star-Spangled Banner "splendid." So it is, in idea. But what makes splendor? Certainly it is not its jawbreaking lines, but the chorus which expresses the aspiration of every loyal American heart.

"The Star-Spangled Banner—O long may it wave, O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave."

Any truly patriotic national hymn is, of necessity, the great peace song and the great war song of the nation. It fits every emotion of the national heart. It is the national heartbeat set to music. Don't be afraid, Tribune. The heart of America beats with the love of liberty. Its national hymn must needs be the love song of liberty. The Continental Congress, in resigning its functions, dedicated this nation to "liberty" and "the rights of human nature:" and the people of the country cry Amen!

SITTING ON GUNPOWDER.

THERE is great and natural horror expressed by many of the treasonable papers of those who would excite servile insurrections.

Who is it, then, that is exciting servile insurrection?

The rebellious citizens of the United States. In what way?

By taking up arms against the Government, and plunging the whole land into civil war. The slaves can not be kept ignorant of the war. And they will ask the question. They will learn that their masters are fighting against those whom they untruly and persistently call "abolitionists." It is not evident, then, that unless the slaves love slavery, they will fight against their masters in any way they can? And what an inciter of servile insurrection who points out to the masters a palpable fact! It is a man sees a neighbor sitting upon a barrel of gunpowder and intently trying to strike a light by scraping a match upon the sole of the leather of his shoe. Is an diabolical fellow if he warns his neighbor that he runs great risk of blowing himself up?

ET TU!

THERE were some of us who did not expect ever to hear Mr. Edward Everett mentioned with hatred by the Southern papers. But Mr. Everett, like Washington and John Quincy Adams, stands under the sacred flag of his country, and welcomes battle rather than anarchy and dishonor. And the rebels hate him for it. "Tu!" they shriek. "Tu, who have eaten such quantities of Southern dinner! Tu, who have basked in the sunshine of such a host of Southern eyes of the softest sex—tu who stand by the flag and the honor of your country? Smirch-ach-hyperoxy, thy name is Edward Everett!"

It is the ludicrous old story. The dinner argument is strong if you are hungry, but not otherwise. Mr. Everett has dined, and he has supped, and he has been eaten by gentlemen from the North are not better, it is generally thought, than Northern dinners given by gentlemen in the Southern States. And if it be good logic that Mr. Everett must be a traitor to his country because he has eaten the dinners of men in the South, then we are not sure that Mr. Jefferson Davis should be the most loyal of citizens by reason of the excellent dinners he ate when he visited Washington as faithful Envoy. There are probably degrees in this matter. If a Northern man has merely lunched or eaten pot-luck, he is not under the same obligation only to hold his tongue and not profess loyalty to his country. But if he has been the victim of a full-dress dinner, he must declare himself a full-blown traitor.

From the incessant twaddle in treasonable papers about the enormity of any man who has enjoyed Southern hospitality" ventured to express his own opinions, it might be inferred that there had never been any "Northern hospitality;" and that when a loyal citizen has invited the rebel to dine on the sunny clime of treason, it was expected that he would eat his own manhood, conscious patriotism, and common sense.

CASUS BELLI.

IF a Senator of the United States had said in his place, two years ago, that States ought to be some lamentable misunderstanding, even involving civil war, between the Sepoys of India and the people of Great Britain, he would have shown precisely the kind and extent of intelligence which Lord Malmesbury exhibited in the English House of Peers when he alluded to the rebellion in this country.

And if the United States Government had gravely deliberated whether it would or would not treat the Sepoys as belligerents, it would have done what the rebels in this country supposed the British Government would do.

There is no such flagrant cause of war between two Powers conceivable, as the recognition by one of a rebellious party among the citizens of the other as an independent state. When that rebellious party has maintained itself for a reasonable period, and has exhibited the capacity of fulfilling the functions of a national power, it will, of course, be a simple consideration of consequences for other nations to determine whether they will acknowledge the new Government. But if any nation does so before the acknowledgment of the Government from which the new one is trying to separate, it undertakes a war with that Government. If the steamer which arrives on Saturday should bring the news that England had recognized the rebellion in this country, the steamer which leaves on Wednesday would carry instructions to Mr. Adams instantly to withdraw from the English Court; and Great Britain would have to try her hand at thrashing us again.

"OUR OWN."

"W. H. RUSSELL, LL.D., Barrister at Law," writes a letter to the Mobile Register, in which he says that he shall claim for himself "the utmost freedom in the expression of my convictions and of my observations in the journal which I have the honor to serve." Mr. Russell may claim what he chooses. But if his "convictions and observations" should lead him to the conclusion that a rebellion so wanton and wicked as this was never known, he should take good care that his amiable friends the rebels do not hear of it while he is still among them. Nothing but the imposing fact of an English fleet, and its unquestionable willingness to defend him as an English subject, would save him from the fate provided for all who do not treat a rebellion for the meanest of purposes as if it were a revolution for the highest.

A GENTLEMAN OF ENTIRE RELIABILITY.

It is to be hoped that the gentleman of entire reliability, who arrives every day from Virginia in Washington, will soon remain permanently in the capital, or make up his mind definitely as to the exact number of Southern troops he has seen or heard of.

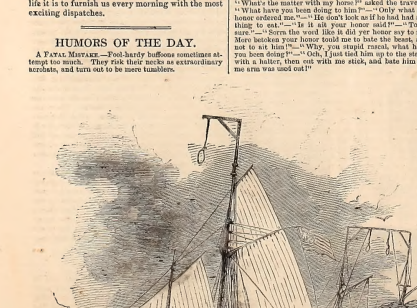
On Monday this entirely reliable gentleman arrives, having traveled through the whole length of Virginia, and reports that thirteen men assembled at various points, and General Beauregard at Richmond. On Tuesday this indefatigable traveler, who is perfectly reliable, has heard of the concentration of immense bodies of men at Culpepper Court House, and he has authentic intelligence that Gen. Beauregard is in Montgomery. On Wednesday the gentleman of entire reliability comes in at full speed, and perfectly fresh from Virginia, and has seen vast numbers of troops moving about, and has heard of the assembling of many thousands at Harper's Ferry. On Thursday the inevitable gentleman of the highest character and credibility—in short, an entirely reliable person—estimates that there are about six thousand troops at Richmond, and two or three Southwestern and as many Southern regiments very hungry and furious somewhere in the State. And on Friday this invaluable gentleman arrives by the latest conveyance, and informs us that the whole information that there is an army of a hundred thousand men perfectly appointed marching rapidly upon Washington.

Now we submit that the gentleman of entire reliability, who has just arrived from Virginia, has fairly done his duty for the present campaign.

There is one moral to be drawn from his entirely reliable but utterly conflicting reports, and that is, that the enemy manage their movements with masterly secrecy, and that there is a large number of them in motion. Meanwhile, it is consoling to reflect that the Commander-in-chief of the American army probably knows quite as much of the enemy's force and operations as the gentleman of entire reliability who communicates his startling intelligence to our amiable fellow-men, whose function in life it is to furnish us every morning with the most exciting dispatches.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A FATAL MISTAKE.—Foot-lardy buffoons sometimes attempt too much. They risk their necks as extraordinary acrobats, and turn out to be mere tumblers.



SORT OF RIG ADVISABLE FOR VESSELS EMPLOYED IN THE CHASE OF SOUTHERN PRIVATEERS.

SCENE—A QUIET STREET. TIME, 9 P.M.

MCFLIMSEY (who has just succeeded in collecting his thoughts for an hour or two's quiet work). "Oh, dear, dear, there's that dreadfully powerful Volunteer Band coming by again! Do oblige me, Maria, by keeping that child quiet!"

VOICES OF OUR NIGHTS.

SUBMITTED TO THE AMERICAN POET, BY MR. WRONGFELLOW.

I heard the feline footsteps in the night
Pad through the court and hall!
I saw the sable wretch in the moon's light
Climb Mrs. Cook's wall!

I felt her thief I did!—I'm sure I'm right!)
Step o'er me just above;
With skrill pathetic warnings through the night,
As of a cat in love.

I heard the sounds of passion and of fight,
The entwining chimes;
That fill each attic chamber in the night,
Where sons starved past prayers.

My night-capped head in the cool midnight air
Sought vainly some repose;
The cries of love filled all the place—there—
From the new cistern rose.

Peace! peace! Orestes-like I breathe this prayer!
Inconsid, you promos-eyed Night!
I hate, while thus you screech, and spit, and swear,
The calculated night!

NOT SO FAR OUT, AFTER ALL.

"Asked lately a young lady, "Pray, dear Mr. Punch, as people say that you know every thing, can you tell me what is modern society?" "Certainly, my child," replied the gentleman, "Well, really, I scarce know if I can say; unless it is that, as a rule, the music plays in one time and the men dance in another."

THE WISCONSIN'S LADY.—When the Wisconsin heard the gratifying intelligence that no person had been killed or wounded at the destruction of Fort Sumter, he exclaimed, with a tremendous gallop, "Why, it was quite a pasty forte affair!" What on earth this means nobody knows.

SCENE IN BROADWAY ON SUNDAY MORNING.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL SCHOLAR. "Oh, Johnny, I'm shocked to see you playing with your top. You should leave your toys in home on a Sunday!"

JOHNNY (quick, but ingodient). "Then why do you come out with your hoop?"

THE GREATEST COQUETTE IN THE NATION.

Of all the coquettes that are found in our nation,
There is none that more cheats us than AN-nicipation;
She coaxes and flatters with graces so fine
That blasting our prospects, she flis us with pain;
She wheedles all sexes, conditions, and ages,
The grave and the gay, and the politic sages;
The young and the old, the rich and the poor,
All live on her smiles till she turns them out-door.

In a recent trial in London George Cooper, the superintendent of a fire station in Tooley Street, was asked by Mr. James, "How long was it before the engines began to play?"

WITNESS. "I should say we were at work, Sir, within five minutes of being called. We don't call it play." [A laugh.]

MR. BARON BRAMWELL. "I thought the playing of an engine was an expression well understood."

MR. E. JAMES. "I thought so, too. I thought the engines played when they began to wash at work." [Laughter.]

TABLE TACTICS.—Old Francis was a wag; and once, when early pease were on the table, he emptied the contents of his mouth on to his plate. "Francis, Francis," they exclaimed, "what are you about?"—"I like them cold," says the answer. Whereupon he took his horse to the stable and bolt him.—"Sure an I will, your honor," answered the Milesian, briskly, and away he went. In what bait an hour the gentleman, having refreshed himself sufficiently, naturally concluded that his food-bred servant was in equally good case, and accordingly ordered his trap to the door. The horse was panting and trembling.—"What's the matter with my horse?" asked the traveler. "What have you been doing to him?"—"Only what yer honor ordered me."—"He don't look as if he had had anything to eat."—"Is it nit your honor said?"—"To be sure."—"Sorra the word like it did yer honor say to me. More luncheon your honor could me to bate the beast, and not to sit him?"—"Why, you stupid rascal, what have you been doing?"—"Och, I just tied him up to the stable with a halter, and then went me sick, and bate him till me arm was outo out!"

RAILROAD WAGGERY.—Waggy went to the station of one of our railroads the other evening, and finding the boat carriage full, said, in a loud tone, "Why, this carriage isn't going!" Of course these words caused a general stampede, and Waggy took the best seat. The train soon moved off. In the midst of the indignation, the wag was questioned, "You said this carriage wasn't going?"—"Well, it wasn't then," replied Waggy; "but it is now."

A captain of a rifle company was guilty of an unheardof barbarity on one very cold day recently. He actually marched his men up and down the side of the canal, and then coolly commanded them to "fall in."

A cooper, finding considerable difficulty in keeping one of the heads of a cask in its place, applied to its place, but his son inside to hold the head up. After completing the work much to his satisfaction, he was astonished to find his son inside the cask, and without a possibility of getting out, except through the bung-hole.

A reporter of experience gives the following instructions for making one's way in a crowd: "Elevate your elbow high, and bring it down with force upon the digestive apparatus of your neighbor. He will double up and puff, making a clear space in front of it to double up and puff, making a clear space in front of it to turn half same way, and give him the first, pass him, and continue the application until you have reached the desired point. It never fails."

"Job printing!—Job printing!" exclaimed Mr. Partington, the other day, as he was examining her spectacles at the advertising page of a country paper. "Poor Job! they've had him printing for them ever since I've been able to read; and if he wasn't the patientest man that ever was, he never could have stood such printing, no how."

"Colonel W. is a fine-looking man, ain't he?" said a friend of ours, the other day. "Yes," replied another; "I was under the impression, at first, that, when you're ugly as sin!" "I don't care for that; I was taken for a beauty. I indorsed his note, and was taken for him—by the sheriff."

The loveliest faces are to be seen by moonlight, when they are lighted up by the pale reflection of their lover's beaming intelligence.—"Be jabers," said he, "does your chaze in this country have no windies?"

A cat caught a sparrow, and was about to devour it, but the sparrow said—"No gentleman eats till he washes his face."—The cat, thinking it a reasonable rule, set the sparrow down, and began to wash his face with his paw, but the sparrow flew away.—The cat very angrily said, and with reason, "As long as I live I will eat first and wash my face afterward"—which all cats do even to this day.

STRICT INTERPRETATION.—"John, I am going to church, and if it should rain, I wish you to come with the umbrella for me; there will be no occasion for mine unless it should rain shortly." The gentleman went. It did rain, and John had gone to get the pot of the house to use Mary. His master came back with drenched garments and a look of indignation. "John, John," said he, "why didn't you bring the umbrella?"—"Because, Sir," replied John, "it rained standing?"

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE FIRST FIGHT AT NORFOLK.

THE first fight in that quarter came off on Saturday afternoon, between the Pawnee and Yorktown and the rebel battery at Sewall's Point, in Hampton Roads, ten miles from Old Point Comfort. A very thorough and unfinished, and is the eighth and last of the works now in the hands of the rebels, which defend the approaches to Norfolk, and is regarded as the most important of the series against the blockade of James River, where there are now lying twenty-five vessels of the blockading fleet. The Confederate steamer Star (formerly the Monticello), commenced commanding the fort at noon, and kept up a very heavy fire with rifled mortars, which seemed to have good effect. The flotilla from the New York, steamers, the Captain Ward, arrived during the action, and the steamer Freeborn immediately joined in opening a heavy fire with her 32-pounders. Driving out the rebels, who were commanded by a mounted officer, the boats' crews then landed, proceeded to Washington with dispatches by orders of Commodore Stringham.

CAPTURE OF LIGHT-SHIPS.

The brilliant and successful feat by detachments of the Eighth and Seventh regiments, under cover at the mast of war, in their expedition to the Yeamico River, and the recovery of the light-ships which had been taken possession of by the Chesapeake Bay, has been warmly applauded. The Yeamico is a small river which runs in Somerset County, Maryland, and flows southwestward through Somerset County, Maryland, and empties into Pinching Bay, an arm of the Chesapeake.

PRIZES OF WAR.

Three prizes have been taken into Philadelphia by the steam-tug Yankee. They were all schooners, laden with tobacco. Other prizes are said to be coming to New York.

STATE OF AFFAIRS AT HARPER'S FERRY.

Two thousand troops from Pittsburgh arrived at Harper's Ferry on Sunday, described as a "hard"-looking set —poorly fed and thirsty. Two regiments had arrived from Alabama on the day previous, to whom the same description would apply. The place, situated as it is, and where there still more agreeable, the small-pox has broken out among them. A company of cavalry had left the Ferry and proceeded to Martinsburgh, with the intention of keeping watch over the Baltimore men there, and preventing their voting at the election which takes place on the 23d.

FURTHER SEIZURES AT ST. LOUIS.

Further seizures were made last week at St. Louis, of two pieces of cannon, several hundred muskets and rifles, a number of pistols, and a quantity of ammunition. The State tobacco warehouse has also been visited by United States authorities, and a considerable quantity of arms and munitions were found there. St. Louis is now convicted by a line of military posts, extending from the river above to the mouth of the Arkansas, against which the entry of any secession troops into the city, and to secure the public property.

A detachment of Union volunteers was sent to Potosi, Missouri, from St. Louis, on Tuesday night, under the command of Captain Cole, who placed sentinels cautiously round the town, and in the morning captured the entire population. Those among them who were known to be Union men were of course immediately released, and every article of the secessionists were subsequently set at liberty on parole—those being carried to St. Louis as prisoners of war and confined in the arsenal. A lead manufactory was also taken possession of at Potosi, and about five hundred pigs of lead were seized.

A PROCLAMATION FROM GENERAL HARNEY.

General Harney has issued an address to the people of Missouri, in which he denounces the military bill recently passed by the Legislature of that State as an indirect declaration of war against the General Government. He alludes to the affair at Camp Jackson, and states that it was notorious that troops in the secession interest, openly wearing the dress and badges of the Army of the Confederate Southern Confederacy, were received there, and that the main avenues in the camp were named after Davis and Beauregard. He closes with the announcement that he shall consider it his duty to enforce the laws of the United States under all circumstances. There is but little doubt, from the nature of the seizures made at Camp Jackson, that an effort was soon to be made to precipitate the State into secession. Large quantities of cannon, small-arms, and munitions of war were also confiscated, which could have been intended for no other purpose.

CHARLESTON BLOCKADED.

The port of Charleston is now under blockade, and no inward-bound vessels are allowed to pass the barriers of steam and iron which the Government have erected at the mouth of the harbor. We find in the Charleston papers of the 13th and 14th accounts of the operations of the steam-frigate Niagara, the first of the blockading fleet which had arrived there. On the 12th the British bark Helga was released entrance, and the British ship Prince Albert and Gem, Portsville were also ordered off. Another British ship, the A and A, was pursued, but she managed to get into safety. The vessels which the Niagara could not follow her, and the latter, under the supposition that she was disabled, left the close, and a steam-tug from the city came out and towed her up. The vessels in port, however, either remained where they were allowed to pass freely, or else were not always allowed by the terms of the blockade to have exit.

The Niagara is now reported to have left Charleston for parts unknown.

A CURIOUS LIGHT FOR FORT MONROE.

Information has been received that Professor Grant is about to have the city in the steamer Contzacoolex for Fortress Monroe. The object of the visit is to try the largest calcium light upon that work. The reflector of the lamp will be composed of thousand of mirrors.

ANOTHER SOUTHERN OUTRAGE.

A telegram from Boston announces the arrival there, on board the steam gun-boat Powhatan, from Fortress Monroe, of Captain Charles Gale, of the bark D. C. Pryer, belonging to Cleaveland, Ohio, and Captain Jameson, of the bark Ida, belonging in Boston. The former reports that his vessel was fired by the rebels at Norfolk on the 8th inst., and besides losing his vessel, her cargo, and $1,000 in specie, in all about $75,000, he was thrown into prison and kept there several days. He finally made his escape with nine other persons, including his daughter, in a small boat, and reached the steam-frigate Minnesota. Captain Jameson reports that his bark, the Ida, was wrecked near Cape Henry, and his having saved the sails and rigging and shipped it to Norfolk, he was then robbed of every thing he possessed and imprisoned several days.

MORE MONEY WANTED AT MONTGOMERY.

Among the bills passed by the Confederates at Montgomery, on Friday, was one authorizing the issue of $20,000,000 in new bonds, payable in twenty years, at an interest not exceeding eight per cent. per annum. In lieu of $20,000,000 of the new issue, they also authorize the issue of Treasury notes for that amount, of small denominations, to bear no interest.

RICHMOND TO BE THE REBEL CAPITAL.

The Montgomery Advertiser, which is recognized as the "organ" of the Confederate Government, announces that the Confederates have decided to remove their Capital to Richmond on the 20th inst. They, however, when the removal is to take place.

TWO GREAT CAMPS.

The Government has decided to establish two large camps on the French system, partly for instruction and for the purpose of a reserve force. The camps will consist of from fifteen to twenty thousand men each. One will be formed at Annapolis, Pennsylvania, and the Maryland border, and the other in the vicinity of New York, on Staten Island, or Staten Island. The force of artillery now designed for action on the Southern border when necessary, and those to be added, will be fully acquired for coast service, to be used at any moment and at any point that the President may direct. For this purpose orders have been issued for a fleet of transports to be kept in readiness in the harbor.

AID AND COMFORT.

An important letter from Secretary Seward to J. G. Blaisdell has been published. It was written in answer to a letter from Mr. Blaisdell, asking for the Secretary's reasons in writing for considering an acceptance of Governor Hicks's proclamation, calling for the enrollment of freemen and Annuitants, recently seized by his order, as an act of "aid and comfort." Secretary Seward has the right of money for the steamships, after they have been seized, would be to give aid and comfort to the rebels, and that to sell vessels to an enemy is to give aid and comfort, and therefore knowingly any person so offending would be brought to punishment by the Government.

PERSONAL.

General Cadwallader, of Philadelphia, who is about to take command of the Baltimore and Annapolis departments, in place of General Butler, who has been appointed to Western property in Maryland, and is well known and much esteemed in the vicinity of Baltimore.

The four regiments of Missouri Volunteers, of one of which Colonel Blair is Colonel, have been formed into a brigade, and Captain Lyon, who commanded the troops that captured the Secession forces, has been elected Brigadier-General.

The wife of Lieutenant Stenmer is at Washington, where she awaits the arrival of her husband's remains.

Senator Douglas is very ill of typhoid fever; his condition is still critical.

Mr. Lincoln occupied himself one day last week in making a pilgrimage to Mount Vernon on the back of the Potomac. He visited Great Falls, sixteen miles above Washington, passed the old Capital, and returned to the city, the expeditionists being without being recognized.

Leroy P. Whitfield, Secretary of Legation and Judah P. Benjamin, Attorney-General, in Jeff Davis Cabinet are to change places.

United States Senator James A. Bayard, of Delaware, has written an address to the people of his State, in which he announces his intention to resign.

Colonel Vosburgh, commandant of the New York Seventyfirst Regiment, now at Washington, whose illness from bronchitis has been reported, has been appointed, died of the Navy-yard in Washington on Monday morning.

Mr. Ferdinand Wood, ex-Mayor, arrested on suspicion of treason, by order of General Butler, was yesterday discharged by order of the authorities at Washington.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

BRITISH OPINIONS ON OUR WAR.

THE affairs of America have again been discussed in the British House of Commons, with reference to the effect of the contemplated blockade of the Southern ports upon foreign interests. Lord John Russell, on the 4th, stated that all legal questions connected with the subject had been submitted to the Attorney-General, who had not yet rendered his opinion. A fleet had been dispatched to watch the mouth of the Mississippi. On the 5th, the opinion of the Crown law officers was given upon several of the points, substantially to the effect that every thing depended upon the efficiency and completeness of the blockade, and that circumstances would soon determine the practicability of collecting revenue from vessels before they had broken bulk. He also said, in regard to privateering, that the Government considered they were to be regarded as belligerents.

A meeting of the Privy Council and law officers of the Crown was held at Whitehall on 12th for the purpose of preparing a proclamation from the Queen; to be issued on the Tuesday following, warning British subjects against conduct of every kind in the civil war now raging in America. Lord Derby had expressed the hope in the House of Lords that British subjects interfering in our contest would get no redress from their Government, but Until their blood should be on their own heads. Lord Granville replied that such would be the natural result, of course.

BRITISH PRIVATEERS.

It was confidently believed, when the Persia left Liverpool on the 11th inst., that letters of marque from the Montgomery government had reached Liverpool and London, and that vessels had actually left Liverpool with these letters.

THE CABINET OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES AT MONTGOMERY.—[FROM PHOTOGRAPHS BY WHITEHURST, OF WASHINGTON, AND HISTON, OF MONTGOMERY, ALABAMA.—SEE NEXT PAGE.]

LUTHER C. LADD, A MASSACHUSETTS VOLUNTEER, KILLED AT BALTIMORE, APRIL 19, 1861.

THE FIRST VICTIM OF THE WAR.

We publish herewith, from a photograph kindly sent us from Lowell, a PORTRAIT OF THE LATE MR. LADD, who was murdered by the rowdies of Baltimore, on his passage through that city, on 19th April. Our correspondent writes us:

LOWELL, May 16, 1861.

Luther Crawford Ladd was born in Arundale, New Hampshire, and on the 22d of last December was seventeen years of age. When the order came to Lowell for troops to be in readiness to march, he enlisted with the City Guards, giving as a reason for choosing this company that he thought it the most likely to be called out; and when the officers asked for reasons, his fresh answer was not to go, but his reply was, "I shall go for my stars and stripes when I say," and with a brave heart he left his parochial's tools and shouldered his musket. Although young, the lad was a boy of unusual intellectual reading, and was well posted in our national affairs.

Hoping that the inclosed will be of some use to you, I remain, your humble servant,

CHARLES A. KIMBALL.

OUR SOUTHERN PICTURES.

We publish this week, from sketches by our artist who is traveling with W. H. RUSSELL, Esq., LL.D., Barrister at Law, Correspondent of the London Times, three pictures of Montgomery, Alabama, and a couple of Fort Pulaski, Georgia, which possess remarkable interest at the present time. Our artist writes us as follows respecting them:

MONTGOMERY, ALABAMA, May 8, 1861.

It was about noon on May-day when we embarked in the charming Florida steamer Talmadi, under the guidance of her veteran commander, the gallant "Commodore Talmadi," whom a sense of duty to his native State has severed from the flag to which his bravery and valor added more than a blaze of glory.

He was attended by a suite of officers and an escort of city notables, many of the former almost boarderless youths from Acadia, or Middlepoint of a years' cruise. We passed down between banks clad in reeds, the fringe of the parapets within which the coy and spreading rice now woos and now repels the embraces of the river gods. We had hardly cleared three leagues when the word was passed for "refreshment without labor," and a charming collation, enlivened by merry chat, absorbed our attention until the anchor dropped within a short pull of Fort Pulaski, when we were posted ashore, landed at the wharf, and made our way to this admirable defense of the "Queen of Georgia Waters," of which the accompanying sketch will no doubt be of interest.

The interior of the fort was even a more striking contrast to the dilapidated and dismantled glories of Sumter than a wedding is to a wake. Several hundred newlygathered recruits, under the guidance of officers recently of the United States Army, were learning the noble art of war and fortification. The fort, being tenanted by but a corporal's guard, was not prepared to accommodate these unwonted guests, whose tents were ranged around two sides of the ramparts, and here a picturesque and holiday costume to the scene, at variance with the martial preparations progressing on the sea-wall and in the casemates beneath.

When the Georgian troops took possession of Pulaski not a gun was mounted, and there were few pieces of artillery. Since, they have received a barbette battery of heavy guns from Savannah, and Sumter-like, have mounted them not in numbers all around the parapet, upon carriages of yellow pine—which are large and strong as one could wish—I am told that this wood, to plumbird beta, has never before been adapted to this use. The embrasures are of the usual size, each of which contained a thirty-two pounder and two or three Columbiads.

The guns are barbette, being eight and ten inch Columbiads, are all named. The appointment of a few of which I give you: "Beauregard," "Bonham," "Pettus," "Lee," "Jackson," "Yancey," "Wigfall," and others. I send a sketch of the Columbiad called after the gallant Commodore Tatnall, at the moment Mr. Russell (London Times) was taking with his practiced eye the range of the piece. "The ball pointed," said he (it being directed toward the outer channel). The Commodore expressed his determination, in event of an attack, to print the monster degrease of iron favors with his own hand. Mr. Samuel Ward, of New York, and Major South, C.S.A., are the other guns about the gun. Many of my old friends, who have served twenty their term at West Point—some with marked distinction for ability—are here upon duty. A son of General Lane has command of General Columbian Twiggs, and a son of General Twiggs does the honors for General Lane. I hope that no one will be rude enough to say any thing—a son of a gun, for instance.

After an inspection of the fort we were summoned to collation No. 2, in the officers' mess, which was any thing but "short commons," and far inferior than the mosque fare that Major Anderson and his gallant few had to fight upon. The first sharp engagement finished, the ominous pop and crack of "thank-you-kaow" was a signal to fill up. Then the stories, ben mot, etc., finished a most delightful visit to one of the finest forts in the country. It is much larger than Sumter, and in a most perfect state of defense.

We returned to Savannah in the cool of the evening, enjoying en route the glories of a Southern sunset; and as the boat came to her anchorage—within a couple of cables' length of the yacht Camilla (Andrew), of which Captain Dezi le now lies fortified in command—we could not but regret that so picturesque a vessel as the Camilla had come to a close.

A word or two respecting the Camilla. The Captain is a gentleman of independent fortune, with a most charming wife and family, who with him sail from country to country in the yacht in as comfortable and homelike a manner as one can well conceive. On the recent run from the Cape de Verdes the Captain missed the distance of seven hundred miles in two days, that more than retrieving the hours lost while in the hands of Commodore Stevens's successor. She won a race at the Plymouth last fall, which emboldened her present proprietor to challenge all England for a sail, without finding a competitor. The pride of our yacht marine had him neglected for years, and him neglected to go to decay. But ships, unlike mortals, are born to their skeletons clothed in the new beauty of form and strength of skin; and the Camilla, having undergone this "Frankenstein" process, "now walks the water like a thing of life," Spiker.

Leaving Savannah, we journeyed by the Georgia Railway, which place just now is the quiet and forcible capital of the Confederate States of America.

The meetings of Congress are held with closed doors at present, so many spies and importators have been detected without fear of what may be said being sent all over the country during the recess. Mr. Toombs, Secretary, also Governor Manning, and many others are in the city. The lady of the President, Mrs. Davis, held a reception on yesterday (the 7th), which was largely attended by the literary and political elite. Among the strangers Mr. Russell, Mr. Samuel Ward, of New York, and Captain Dezi were received with much attention.

A number of guns were fired as a salute of honor to Tennessee and Arkansas when their secession became known.

I send a sketch of the city (Montgomery), from the opposite bank of the Alabama River, which from this place is perhaps an eighth of a mile in width, with a current of between four and five knots per hour. The Capitol, which you will see, is the crowning object of the landscape, and commands a grand view of the environs of the place, and wooded scene beneath. I have had a number of pleasant rambles into the country, and notwithstanding the unusually rich and well cultivated. I am told that more than a third of the land has been withdrawn from the staple to that of the cultivation of corn, which is already grown to the height of between two and three feet. This will cause much of it to ready for harvest in a fortnight. Strawberries are nearly gone, and the blackberries are to be had in great abundance. The President is busily engaged, and I am told works eighteen of the twenty-four hours of the day, as usual, in good health. The hotels, when we arrived, were crowded to excess, and the accommodations of the Exchange found room for us. At present we have no hotels worthy the name, but a new one being fitted up! The Exchange is the hotel of the city—the others are "no-horse, and in some cases not that.

Tomorrow we shall be on route for New Orleans. I must not omit to mention the recruiting with fife and drum. One day of my sojourn in the city was made happy by the stern entreaties of the drum and the persuasive whistle of the fife (and the next day the same), and wary at length with these appeals, to which I could not respond, I arranged myself in the line of march, and was happy to prefer the instruments of torture sans substance.

The truculent drum was the sable punisher of the huge base-drum, I fear will some day become so exasperated with and being of the constant assault upon its quivering the head of the drum in, of course, that he will rest the object by the side of a house, and with a few well-put butt, disappear. When this is to be done I am to be forewarned, when I will forward skeleton instructions.

THEO. R. DAVIS.

THE MILITARY OCCUPATION OF BALTIMORE.

We mentioned in our last number that Baltimore had been occupied by the United States forces under General Butler, of the Massachusetts Volunteers. We now publish on pages 344 and 345, from a photograph by Mr. WEAVER, of Baltimore, a picture of the Sixth Regiment's CAMP BELGER'S CONFINE OF D'ARMIER ON FEDERAL HILL, which the troops occupied on 13th inst., having marched through part of the city of Baltimore at that point without molestation. Our artist writes us as follows concerning his picture:

BALTIMORE, May 15, 1861.

Inclosed find photograph of Encampment of United States troops under command of General Butler on Federal Hill, opposite Baltimore City, or just across the Basin. General Butler left the Relay House with 1500 men, and reached here on evening of 13th, and the picture gives them as on the 14th inst. This place of encampment is much higher than the city, and overlooks the same. There is also from the same point a fine view down the river on the city side. The hill is almost perpendicular, and rises 75 to 100 feet in height. You will perceive the hill is a peninsula, which runs down to FORT M'HENRY, which is about one mile below.

PARSON BROWNLOW, OF TENNESSEE.

We publish herewith a portrait of the famous Parson Brownlow of Tennessee, who is now, with Senator Andrew Johnson, the leading champion of the Union in that State. The following sketch of Mr. Brownlow's life has been prepared for us by a friend of his.

WILLIAM G. BROWNLOW was born in Wythe County, Virginia, August 5, 1805. His parents were poor, and died when he was about ten years old. They were both Virginians, and his father was a school-master of Greene's Mountain, in Rockbridge County. After the death of his parents he lived with his brother-in-law, and was raised to hard labor until he was some eighteen years old, when he served a regular apprenticeship to the trade of a house-carpenter.

His education was imperfect and irregular, even in those branches taught in the common-schools of the country. He entered the Methodist Ministry in 1826, at the regular session of the Holston Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and traveled ten years without intermission, and was a member of the General Conference held in Philadelphia. He was outstrung in his energy, and swelled himself of his circumscribed sphere of Methodist Itinerancy to study and improve his education, which he did in all the English branches.

Mr. Brownlow is about six feet high, and weighs about 175 pounds; has had as fine a constitution as any man ever had. He has no gray hairs in his head, and will pass for a man of thirty years. He has had the strongest voice of any man in East Tennessee, where he is well known for the last thirty years, and raised an interesting family. He has been speaking all that time, taking a part in all the controversies of the day. About eighteen months ago his voice failed from an attack of bronchitis, and he went himself under the care of Professor Horace Green, of New York, who performed an operation on his throat, which has almost entirely restored his voice. He now speaks very well for the space of one hour.

He is the author of several books; but the one which has had the largest run is one of over four hundred pages, being a vindication of the Methodist Church against the attacks of Rev. J. R. GRAVES, of Nashville, Brownlow's book was published by the Southern Methodist Publishing House, and something like 100,000 copies have been circulated in the South and West. It is a work of great severity, but of marked ability.

In 1858 he was engaged in a debate upon the Slavery question, in Philadelphia, with the Rev. Mr. PETER, of New York, in which he defended the institution of Slavery with marked ability; exhibiting a familiar acquaintance with the vexed question in all its bearings. The debate, a volume of some four hundred pages, is for sale by J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO.

He is known throughout the length and breadth of this land as the "Fighting Parson;" but he was in more peaceable, or more highly esteemed by his neighbors. Few men are more charitable to the poor of his immediate—for he is not rich—price savvy as much in the course of a year.

He is quite a politician, though he has never been an office-seeker or an office-holder. He commenced his political career in Tennessee in 1826, by opposing the cause of John Quincy Adams as against Andrew Jackson. He has been all his life, as he still is, an ardent Whig, and Clay and Webster were his standards of political orthodoxy. His paper, the Knoxville Whig, which he has edited for twenty-two years, has the largest circulation of any political paper in Tennessee, and exerts a controlling influence in the politics of the State. He is a decided Union man, and battles with great zeal and ability against the abolitionism of the North and the disunion heresy of the Cotton States. He is now the independent candidate for Governor of Tennessee, which election comes off the first Thursday in August. His friends are numerous and devoted to him, and his enemies are not a few in number, and very bitter.

THE CABINET AT MONTGOMERY.

We publish on page 340, from photographs made at Washington and at Montgomery, and forwarded to us by our correspondent Mr. DAVIS, now traveling with W. H. RUSSELL, Esq., LL.D., Barrister at Law, Correspondent of the London Times, a group portrait of the Cabinet at Montgomery.

The President and Vice-President, Messrs. Davis and Stephens, we have heretofore given; their portraits in Cabinet uniform will be found at length in No. 217 of the Weekly. The following sketches will introduce the members of the Southern Cabinet to our readers:

ROBERT TOOMBS, SECRETARY OF STATE.

HON. ROBERT TOOMBS was born in Wilkes county, Georgia, July 5, 1810. Commencing his collegiate life at the University of Georgia, he subsequently went North, and graduated at Union College, Schenectady, New York. In 1836 he served as a captain of volunteers in the Creek war. In the next year he was elected to the Legislature, and since that time has been constantly in public life as representative and United States Senator. In the late movement of Georgia he has been active and potential in the cause of secession. He has been called to a post of great importance—one which will serve to display all his merits as a statesman.

WILLIAM G. BROWNLOW, OF TENNESSEE.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY SMILEY, OF KNOXVILLE, TENN.]

C. S. MEMMINGER, SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

There are few men in the South who are more competent, in point of ability and business capacity, to administer the Department of the Treasury under the Government of the Confederate States than Mr. Memminger. Possessed of a high order of intellect, a student, learned and full of resources as an accomplished advocate, he is eminently a man of facts and details.

LEROY POPE WALKER, SECRETARY OF WAR.

HON. LEROY POPE WALKER is a lawyer of Huntsville, Alabama, a native of that county (Madison), and about forty-five years of age. He is the eldest son of the late Major Walker, and one of a family distinguished for talent and influence. Two of his brothers are Hon. Percy Walker, who recently represented the Mobile District in Congress, and Hon. Judge Richard W. Walker, of Florence, chairman of the Alabama delegation in the Montgomery Convention. Hon. L. P. Walker at one time practiced law in South Alabama, and was for several years Speaker of the House of Representatives of the State. He has been a consistent Democrat of the Richie school. For the last ten years he has been located in Huntsville, and has the reputation of being the leading lawyer, and, next to Clay, the leading Democrat of North Alabama. Careful in the preparation of his cases, and clear, concise, logical, and eloquent in presenting them before court, he is said to be an eminently successful practitioner. For the last three years he has been conspicuous in his denunciation of separate secession. In the Alabama Democratic Convention, which took ground against it, and sent a delegation to Charleston to carry out her instructed opposition, Mr. Walker's influence was marked. He was one of the delegation sent to Charleston, and exerted himself in rendering the compromises offered.

JUDAH P. BENJAMIN, ATTORNEY-GENERAL.

The Hon. J. P. Benjamin, of Louisiana, Attorney-General, is distinguished as one of the profoundest jurists and most accomplished advocates in the country. He is of the old line of Whig clan of Henry Clay, and during his recent speeches in the United States Senate won for him universal admiration. No selection could have been made for Attorney-General of the Confederate States which would be so generally approved as this.

STEPHEN R. MALLORY, SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

Mr. Mallory, the Secretary of the Navy of the Confederate States, was for many years a Senator of the United States from Florida, and occupied the important post of Chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs. He took a very active interest in the construction of the new ships of war, and was largely instrumental in fortifying and improving the harbor of Pensacola—the best in the Gulf. Mr. Mallory's experience will be of service to the Confederates should they ever have a navy.

JOHN H. REAGAN, POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

Mr. Reagan has never been prominent in national politics, though he served some years in Congress. His functions as Postmaster-General in the Seceded States have thus far been a sinecure, as the mails are still carried by the United States.

CORRESPONDENCE,

BIG GUNS.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

NEW YORK, April 11, 1861.

In a recent issue you have an article on "Big Guns," in which you stated the one described was the largest in the world.

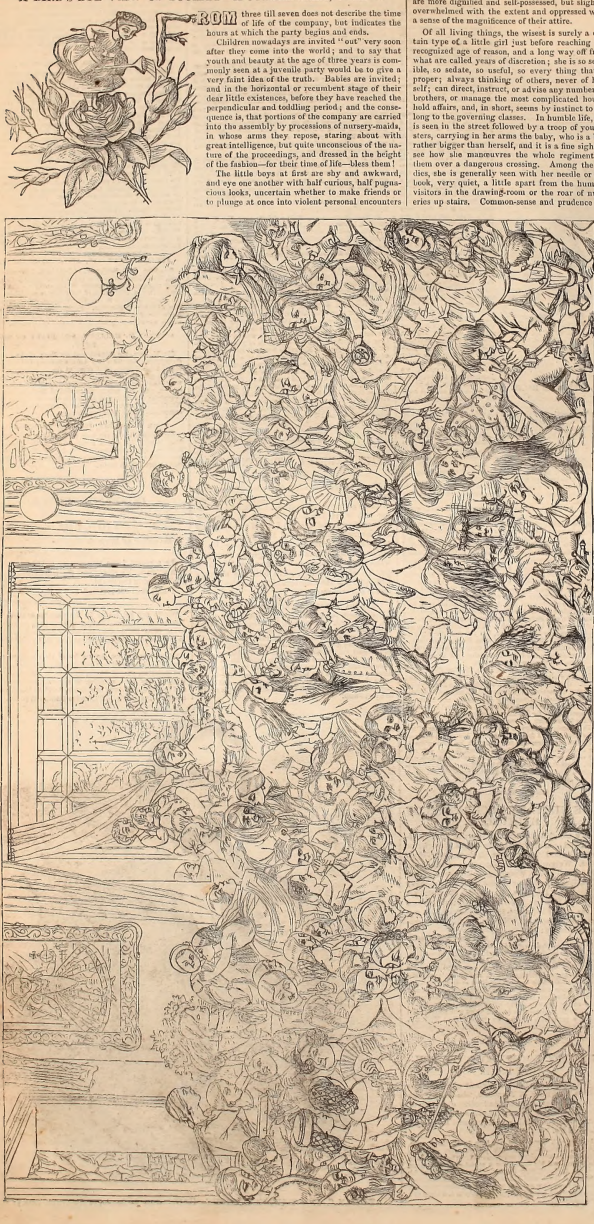
Please read the inclosed, and oblige

PRAIRIE HOWITZER.

"India was not behind in the weapons of war. The Damask sword-blader of Googeret, Wootz steel, are superior to any thing Europe can boast of, and dormed so excelled in England that they are used entirely for surgical instruments.

"Their cannon are the wonder of all who have seen them. The celebrated ones at Dacca, Moorshadabad, Agra, and Bejapore, were of fifteen, eighteen, twenty-three, and thirty inches' bore, weighing from eleven to forty tons, and throwing shot from four hundred-weight to a ton and a half."—IRELAND'S Wall Street to Cashmere, p. 623.

A BIRD'S-EYE VIEW OF SOCIETY—A JUVENILE PARTY, 3 TILL 7.



FROM three till seven does not describe the time limit of life of the company, but indicates the hours at which the party begins and ends.

Children nowadays are invited "out" very soon after they come into the world; and to say that youth and beauty at the age of three years is commonly seen at a juvenile party would be to give a very faint idea of the truth. Babies are invited; and in the horizontal or recumbent stage of their dear little existences, before they have reached the perpendicular and toddling period; and the consequence is, that portions of the company are carried into the assembly by processions of nursery-maids, in whose arms they repose, staring about with great intelligence, but quite unconscious of the nature of the proceedings, and dressed in the height of the fashion—for their time of life—bless them!

The little boys at first are shy and awkward, and eye one another with half curious, half pugnacious looks, uncertain whether to make friends or to plunge at once into violent personal encounters and desperate trials of strength. The little girls are more dignified and self-possessed, but slightly overwhelmed with the extent and oppressed with a sense of the magnificence of their attire.

Of all living things, the wisest is surely a certain type of a little girl just before reaching the recognized age of reason, and a long way off from what are called years of discretion; she is so sensible, so sedate, so useful, so every thing that is proper; always thinking of others, never of herself; can direct, instruct, or advise any number of brothers, or manage the most complicated household affairs, and, in short, seems by instinct to belong to the governing classes. In humble life, she is seen in the street followed by a troop of youngsters, carrying in her arms the baby, who is a boy rather bigger than herself, and it is a fine sight to see how she manœuvres the whole regiment of them over a dangerous crossing. Among the ladies, she is generally seen with her needle or her book, very quiet, a little apart from the hum of visitors in the drawing-room or the roar of nurseries up stairs. Common-sense and prudence are her most prominent characteristics; and in all affairs of life, my belief is she is qualified to give the very best advice. At the juvenile party she is seen enjoying herself in her steady way—dancing or playing, with a kind of sober merriment; an enemy to every thing rough or boisterous, and always keeping an eye on her younger brothers and sisters. What would mothers do without her, I wonder?

The accompanying drawing is designed to show a children's party at that advanced period of the entertainment when the stiffness and the coyness, and the prigs and the bores of the earlier part of the afternoon has given way, in most cases, to the high spirits and demonstrative behavior of the animal we call boy. The young rascal pastimes are raging, so to speak, and may be said to include dancing, and eating and drinking, blindman's-buff, (cocking), exercise, and music on the penny trumpet; besides playing at soldiers and Noah's ark (with all the latest improvements), fighting, flirtation, Jack-in-the-box, and an end of other games, sentimental conversation, and sleep! And, oh! to think of the improvement in the manufacture of toys since the days when I played at Noah's ark! In what other direction has civilization progressed at such a rate as in that art which once upon a time represented the inhabitants of the ark with a uniform and artless simplicity—all the quadrupeds supported by four perfectly straight pieces of wood by way of legs, the body being a shapeless block, and every bird and beast, without exception, decorated on its outside with round spots of vermilion color of about the size of a sixpence. While now what a change! The most lovely lions, tigers, and giraffes; with coats of such a delightful fluffy texture; their forms modelled with a pre-Raphaelite attention to detail; outsides that might challenge the criticism of a Landseer; the inside constructed, I have no doubt, on principles that would be approved by Prof. Owen.

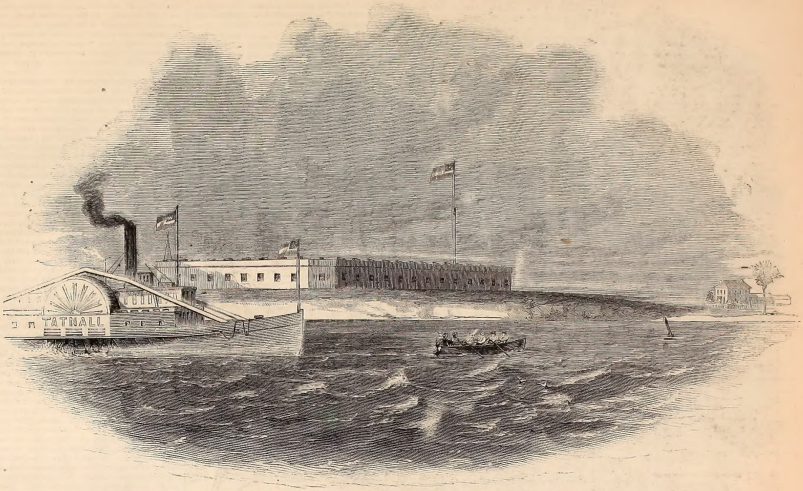
As I have endeavored with my pencil to show a few of the varieties to be seen on these occasions, to attempt here any thing like a list or elaborate description of the company would be as a twice-told tale, and perhaps tedious. A very few "representative" juveniles may, however, be pointed out as certain to be found at every party, and among them the young lady who considers herself no longer a juvenile, is not yet "out," so just condescends to come, and conducts herself with great dignity, unbends so far as to dance with the little people, and is kind to "the children." There is the good-natured boy, whose great delight is dancing with all the smallest of the little ones, helping them through the intricate figures of a quadrille or country dance, or saving them from being swamped by impetuous waltzers of larger growths. It is pleasant to see him lent double in the endeavor to reach his partner, while that little fairy with an effort stretches forth her two hands to his, and dances away by means of a series of jumps, regardless of time, or space, or collisions with other couples, or bumpings up against the spectators. And the performance must be attended with dangers, the young idea being prone to shoot out its legs every way, for well do I remember how once on asking a little fellow, after a general engagement of this kind, how he liked it, his saying, "I enjoyed myself very much, but I am full of kicks." Then there is the proud papa who does not consider that either the family or years of the little boy who humbly asks if "he may have the pleasure," entitle him to that distinction, so is engaged, or not going to dance this time—a boy in a jacket, indeed! Somewhat similar things have happened at parties not juvenile; only in after-life it is not often want of years that is objected to in a partner. Then there is that good-for-nothing boy, who is so careless and slovenly in his dress, and so odd in his ways, and not like other boys, and does not care for play, and won't dance, can't learn easily, yet is fond of reading, and pores over books or a curious mechanical contrivance, in the most absurd way possible, for hours. He is like a fish out of water at a party, is considered rather a failure by his family and friends—and perhaps will some day turn out a great genius, and discover or invent something that will astonish or delight the world.

And there is the clever rude boy who makes faces, and is very funny, and plays practical jokes, and is the terror of the timid ones. And there is the mischievous young gentleman with the large organ of destructiveness, who has great natural gifts, of a kind that display themselves in the breaking of windows, taking toys to pieces, tearing his own and every body else's clothes, and upsetting every article sufficiently handy for the purpose that comes within his reach. For about three seconds after some great act of destruction he looks very penitent, but he instantly begins again, and fortunate is the party in which only one specimen of this genus is found.

But if some are troublesome and riotous, and others begin to display precocious symptoms of vanity, many others are charming in their looks and little ways, and perhaps the society and conversation of babies the most delightful of all. When I get over the first feeling of shyness in the presence of a strange infant, and when presuming so far as to venture to offer my hand find that it is not only taken but shaken, it is more gratifying than the notice of the finest lady in the land—of fashion. The process is this: you hold out a finger, the first, and it is instantly clutched by the whole four beautiful little chubby fingers and a thumb of the other party, which close tightly round your one finger with an intensity of friendliness and confidence rare in after-life, and which is accompanied by a look of such happiness, and so straightforward and honest, and unselfish, that the recollection of it is a joy forever afterward.

Emboldened by the feeling of intimacy thus established, one may sometimes go so far as to thrust a finger gently into the centre of its cheek (a very young baby may be called "it"); and if it is not offended by this familiarity, the whole face becomes dimpled over with the most beautiful smiles, the mouth, the eyes, the cheeks, the chin—the whole

THE CRYSTAL PALACE AT SYDENHAM.



FORT PULASKI, SAVANNAH RIVER, GEORGIA.—SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, TRAVELING WITH MR. RUSSELL.—[SEE PAGE 341.]

face becomes radiant with the brightest and most sunshiny laughter. At the same moment a sudden kick out of a little foot, in the direction of one's waistcoat, the baby being in the arms of a nurse of course, shows a natural jollity and disposition at that early age to poke people in the ribs. Then the mouth struggles into the position usually employed in whistling, but the result is more in the nature of crowing. I don't think it possible to express the sound by any combination of letters at my command, so won't attempt it. The conversation does not go much beyond this, and there may be some who would object to it on the ground of want of point; others I can fancy saying they prefer more variety, but to me it appears very expressive—as far as it goes; and if it is not very witty, or very learned, or particularly wise; on the other hand, there is no effort at display: it is not ill-natured, or self-sufficient, or pretentious, or vulgar, or silly; and I prefer it to much of the talk that is heard in "society."

☞ In reference to an article in our issue of May 11, we are reminded by many correspondents in Kentucky that the Banks of that State have not suspended. The Act authorizing their suspension has passed, but they have not yet availed themselves of it. Heretofore the Kentucky Banks have stood very well.

THE FIGHT AT BALTIMORE.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

WASHINGTON, D. C. April 20, 1861.

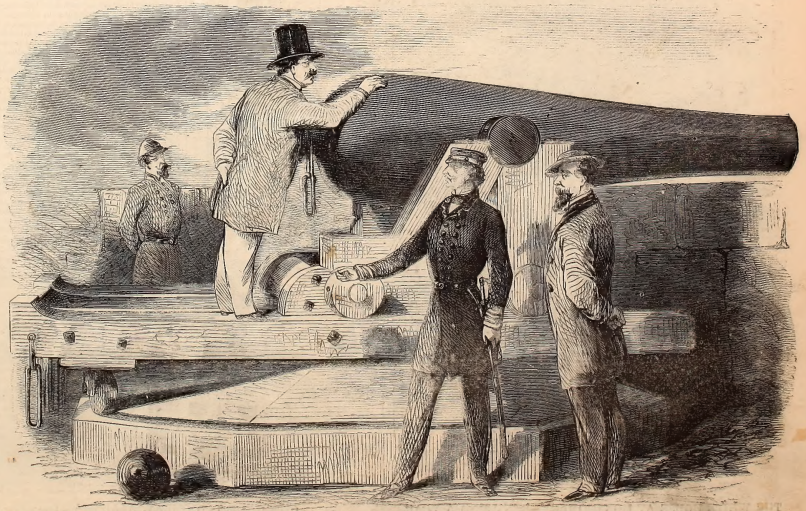
In a late issue of your valuable sheet you are laboring under a mistake in making the statement that the Acton Company was engaged in the fight at Baltimore on the 19th inst. The whole of the Sixth regiment of the Massachusetts volunteer militia was not engaged in the fight. The only companies that participated in the fight were Company C, Mechanic Phalanx of Lowell, Company J, Light Infantry of Lawrence, Company D, City Guards of Lowell, and Company I, Light Infantry from Stoneham. There are eleven companies comprising the regiment; but seven of them, together with all the regimental officers, had passed through and were on the opposite side of the city—a mile and a half from the fight; and in fact knew no thing of it until the four companies in question fought their way through the mob and rejoined them. This you may rely on as being a correct statement of the case.

Yours, etc. C. P. I.



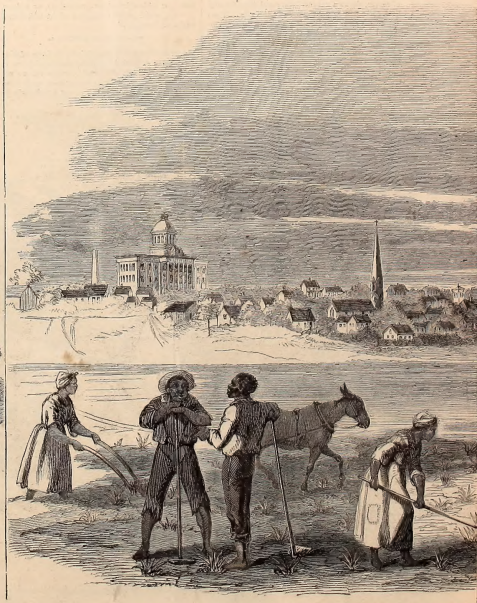
W. H. RUSSELL, ESQ., LL.D.

MR. RUSSELL, CORRESPONDENT OF THE LONDON "TIMES," COM. TATNALL, MAJOR SMITH, AND MR. WARD INSPECTING THE 10-INCH COLUMBIAD AT FORT PULASKI.

SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, TRAVELING WITH MR. RUSSELL.—[SEE PAGE 341.]

THE MILITARY OCCUPATION OF BALTIMORE—MAJOR-GENERAL BUTLER'S

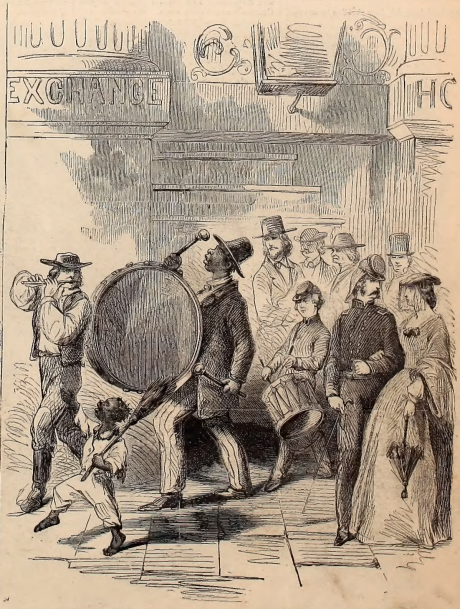
THE WHITE HOUSE AT MONTGOMERY—RENT $5000 A YEAR.



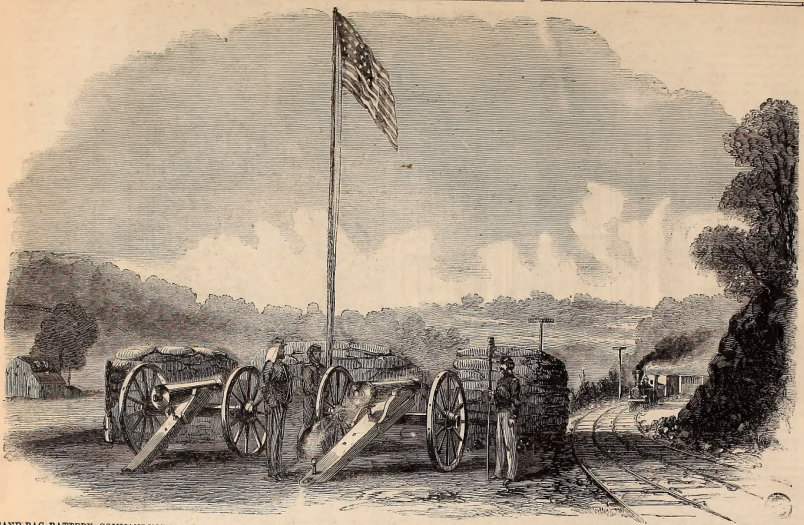
CITY OF MONTGOMERY, ALABAMA.—Drawn by our Special A

ENCAMPMENT ON FEDERAL HILL.—Photographed by Weaver.—[See Page 341.]

ET TRAVELING WITH W. H. Russell, LL.D.—[See Page 341.]



DRUMMING UP RECRUITS FOR THE CONFEDERATE ARMY.

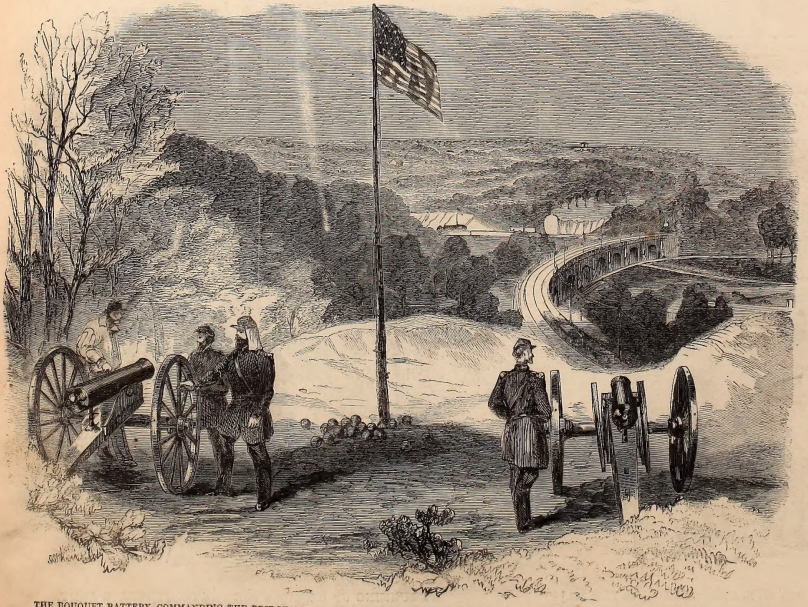


SAND-BAG BATTERY, COMMANDING THE ROAD TO HARPER'S FERRY, NEAR THE RELAY-HOUSE—BUILT BY LIEUTENANT W. H. M'CARTNEY, BOSTON LIGHT ARTILLERY.
[SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.]

RELAY-HOUSE BATTERIES.

WE publish herewith, from sketches by our special artist, pictures of the BATTERIES ERECTED ON THE BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAILROAD BY THE UNITED STATES VOLUNTEERS. The occupation of the Relay House, on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, was the condition precedent to the occupation of Baltimore.

These fortifications were erected, and are manned by the Massachusetts volunteer artillery—a gallant and useful body of men.



THE BOUQUET BATTERY, COMMANDING THE BRIDGE AT THE RELAY HOUSE, LIEUTENANT JOSIAH PORTER, BOSTON LIGHT ARTILLERY, COMMANDING.
[SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.]

OUR ARMY AT WASHINGTON.

We publish on this page two more illustrations of our army at Washington—one representing the gallant RHODE ISLANDERS "BUNKING" IN THE PATENT OFFICE, the other the QUARTERS OF THE SIXTY-NINTH (IRISH) REGIMENT in the Georgetown College. Neversince American inventive genius was first aroused did the Patent Office contain such remarkable models of American manufacture as those which now sleep three deep in "bunks" spread along the edge of the cabinets; and to those students of mechanism who have been wont to resort to the Patent Office to work out unfinished problems and botch great inventions, the presence of the sturdy Rhode Islanders, and the stacks of eloquent muskets present a novel and a startling scene.

With regard to the Sixty-ninth the Washington Republican says: "We paid a visit to this regiment, who are quartered in Georgetown College, yesterday, and found the men all busy in the various duties pertaining to military life. They are all in fine spirits, and seem to enjoy the soldier's life amazingly, although many of them are getting impatient, and wish to be off to some fighting region. The grounds exhibit quite a busy scene, the men in companies and squads learning the use of their arms. Several companies were also in the distant portion of the grounds engaged in target firing, and exercising in loading and firing. The targets were generally brought in completely riddled, and the firing by company was executed with the greatest precision. Several officers of the army, lately graduated from West Point, are constantly employed in instructing the men in the use of their arms, which they are beginning to handle like regulars. The hours of drill are 9½ A.M. and 2½ P.M. for company, and at 4 o'clock the regimental review takes place. The officers of the Catholic Church near the college have placed it at the disposal of the regiment, and the chaplain, the Rev. Father Mooney, officiates before the regiment every Sabbath morning at 9 o'clock. The citizens of the neighborhood speak in the highest terms of the conduct of the men, and Colonel Corcoran may well be proud of the good name the regiment has earned.

The New York Times correspondent writes of the 69th: "The parade of the 69th to-day was very fine. The regiment was very full, over one thousand men being in the ranks. Colonel Corcoran exercised his men in battalion drill, bayonet charges in double quick time, in hollow square, etc. Toward the close the music of a band was heard, and the gates being opened, the 5th Massachusetts Regiment marched in and saluted the 69th. After the usual courtesies the Massachusetts and New York regiments were brought in line on opposite sides of the square, and they cheered each other most lustily. It was an exciting scene to see the Puritan New Englanders and Catholic Irishmen thus fraternizing. After the drill the officers of the two regiments had a friendly glass of wine and a most cordial réunion.

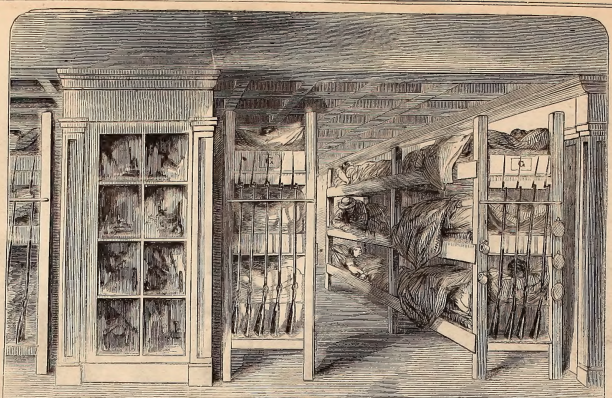
"General Runyon and staff, of the New Jersey Brigade, also visited the 69th, and partook of the hospitalities of Colonel Corcoran and Father Mooney. General Runyon, in response to a sentiment offered by Father Mooney, made an eloquent and patriotic address.

"It is a noticeable fact that the first interchange of military courtesies was between Colonel Vosburgh, of the American 71st, and Colonel Corcoran, of the Irish 69th. The common danger appears to have made natives and foreigners common friends."

The same writer speaks of the Rhode Islanders:

"The Rhode Island Regiment is quartered at the Patent Office. They had service in the large hall of the Patent-Office building yesterday at 10½ o'clock.

The drums beat to muster the men, and while the magnificent band which accompanies this regiment made the lofty halls ring with its enchanting music, the men, silently and with measured tread, formed on each side of the wide marble columns, near a temporary desk which was to serve as a pulpit. The officers stood near, uncovered, among them Governor Sprague, a young man about 28 or 30 years, with a pale, delicate, but firm face. It was a solemn scene, as I closed my eyes for a moment and listened to the grand music that resounded through the large building, and the even tread of that large body of silent men on the marble floors of the wide hall. The sermon, by the Rev. Mr. Woodbury, of Rhode Island, was appropriate and very fine."



SLEEPING-BUNKS OF THE FIRST RHODE ISLAND REGIMENT, AT THE PATENT OFFICE, WASHINGTON.
[SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.]

QUARTERS OF THE SIXTY-NINTH (IRISH) REGIMENT NEW YORK STATE MILITIA, AT GEORGETOWN COLLEGE, D. C.—[SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.]

THE ARMORY AT ALBANY, NEW YORK.

OUR ARMY AT ALBANY.

THE accompanying illustrations will introduce the reader to the ALBANY ARMORY, the head-quarters of our State army in that section of the State. Here, since the President's proclamation, large bodies of men have been constantly engaged in close drill, and here the Military Board concentrates its efforts in endeavoring to fit them out.

Our second picture represents the drumming out of two soldiers who refused to take the oath. They were stripped of their arms, a white feather stuck over each ear, and they were marched out of the Armory grounds with the drums playing the Rogue's March. Crowds of people assembled to see them undergo the degrading penance.

TOWN AND COUNTRY.

I.

'Tis five years ago, I was playing
At pool, as he doubled me in,
I remember Fred Lexington saying,
"Yes, nice little girl, but no tin."

"Oh! such a sweet net was she spreading
To catch me." He stroked his mustache.
"I'd have ask'd you to dance at my wedding,
But I beat a retreat in quick march."

"I'd no thought at her feelings of hurting,
But the thing began awkward to grow;
If I did pass the limits of flirting,
It was down in the country, you know."

"So," said Frederick, "fearing extinction
Of what this all meant by papa,
I fled, leaving no ground for an action."
And laughed, as he lit his cigar.

II.

Poor innocent fool! she is reading
What he wrote in her album that day,
The verse of a false-hearted pleading,
Inscribed "To the bright eyes of May."

She rises; the light low is burning;
She walks to the window; no moon;
All starless the dark night is turning,
In silence, the point of its noon.

Hark! listen! in sobs of wild passion,
Goes forth on the blackness her cry;
Like rain drops, they heavily flash on
The stream of the hour flowing by.

Her dark hair all flowing around her,
Her face hidden in her white hands,
In a trance of dull sorrow, thus found her
Dawn, winterly lighting the lands.

III.

Did she die? Not all; she has married
Since then Sir Acteon de Vere,
And the thrust of that sorrow has parried
With a fool and ten thousand a year.

I met her, as lovely as ever,
'Tis what bring all this back, yesterday,
Fred was there, looking out for the Trevor,
He bowed, as he pass'd on his bay.

And though in the flow that's called Rotten,
Such feelings, of course, have no place,
I thought she had not quite forgotten,
By the flush, as she mov'd, on her face.

Long Syne and the sketchings together,
Beneath the cool rustle of leaves,
Whence oft, in the rich autumn weather,
They wander'd away to the sheaves.

DRUMMING OUT ALBANY VOLUNTEERS WHO REFUSED TO TAKE THE OATH.—[FROM A SKETCH MADE ON THE SPOT.]

THE FIGHT AT SAINT LOUIS.

We mentioned in the last number of Harper's Weekly that a second encounter had taken place between the troops and the mob at St. Louis. We now publish two illustrations of the event, from sketches by Mr. M. Hastings, of St. Louis. The tragedy was thus described by a spectator:

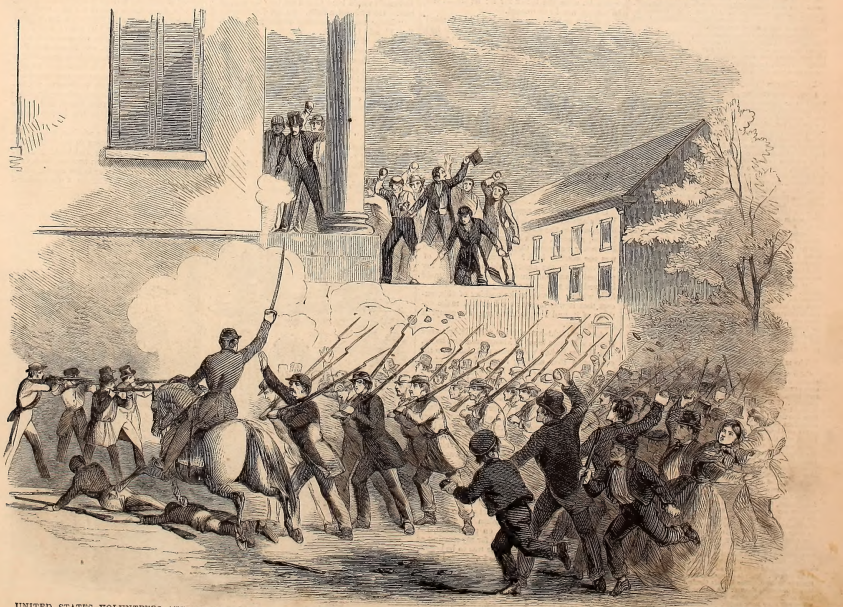
"About six o'clock (on 11th) a large body of Home Guards entered the city through Fifth Street from the Arsenal, where they had been enlisted during the day, and furnished with arms. On reaching Walnut Street the troops turned westward, a large crowd lining the pavement to witness their progress. At the corner of Fifth Street parties among the spectators began hooting, hissing, and otherwise abusing the companies as they passed, and a boy about fourteen years old discharged a pistol into their ranks. Part of the rear company immediately turned and fired upon the crowd, and the whole column was instantly in confusion, breaking their ranks and discharging their muskets down their own line and among the people on the sidewalks. The shower of balls for a few minutes was terrible, and bullets flying in every direction, entering the doors and windows of private residences, breaking shutters, and smashing bricks in the third story.

"The utmost confusion and consternation prevailed, spectators fleeing in all directions, and but for the random firing of the troops scores of people must have been killed. As most of the firing was directed down their own ranks the troops suffered most severely, four of their number being instantly killed and several wounded.

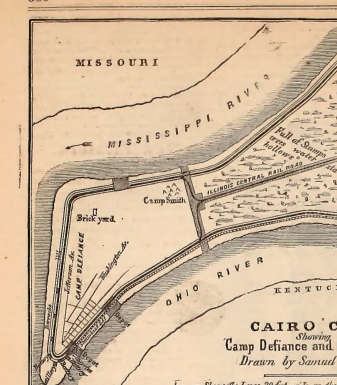
"Immense crowds of people filled the streets after the occurrence. The most intense indignation was expressed against the Germans. Mayor Taylor addressed the excited crowd and induced them to disperse under the promise that no further violence should be done. The city was comparatively quiet during the evening and night, a heavy rain preventing the assembling of large crowds."

The following account of the affair is from the St. Louis Republican of May 12: "Another act in the terrible drama of blood that opened so fearfully on Friday, was enacted last evening, and six more victims were added to the already sad list of dead. Two scenes of blood so close together, and so frightful in their results, have seldom before plunged a city into mourning. At about half past five o'clock in the evening a large body of the German Home Guards entered the city through Fifth Street, from the arsenal, where they had been enlisted during the day and furnished with arms. Large crowds collected to witness their march, and they passed unmolested along until they reached Walnut, when they turned up that street and proceeded westward. Large crowds were collected on these corners, who hooted and hissed as the companies passed, and one man standing on the steps of the church fired a revolver into the ranks. A soldier fell dead, when two more shots were fired from the windows of a house near by. At this time the head of the column, which reached as far as Seventh, suddenly turned, and, leveling their rifles, fired down the street, and promiscuously among the spectators who lined the pavement. Shooting as they did directly toward their own rear ranks, they killed some of their men as well as those composing the crowd. The shower of bullets was for a moment terrible, and the only wonder is that more lives were not lost. The missiles of lead entered the windows and perforated the doors of private residences, tearing the ceilings and throwing splinters in every direction. The house of Mr. Mathews was entered by three bullets, and Mr. Mathews's daughter was struck slightly by a spent ball. On the street the scene presented as the soldiers moved off was sad indeed. Six men lay dead at different points, and several were wounded and shrieking with pain upon the pavements. The dead carts—which have become familiar vehicles since the scenes of the last two days—were soon engaged in removing the corpses from the ground. The wounded were carried to the Health Office. Four of the men killed were members of the regiment, and two were citizens. Last night the former had not been recognized. Jerry Switzler, an engineer on the river, was passing by the door of Mr. H. Glover's residence, on Seventh Street, next to Walnut, when a ball struck him in the head, and scattered his brains over the door and walls. A pool of blood marked the spot where he fell, after his body had been removed. Jeremiah Godfrey, a hired man of Mr. Cozzens, County Surveyor, was working in the yard of Mr. Cozzens at the time of the occurrence. While stooping over, in the act of fastening some flowers to a frame, three soldiers entered the gate, and approaching within the yard, fired three shots into his body. Fortunately, none of them were fatal, being all flesh wounds. The family witnessed the affair, and says that the man had not been out of the yard, and was unaware of the approach of his assailants until stricken down by their bullets. Charles H. Woodward, a clerk in Pomeroy & Benton's store, was shot in the shoulder, and will have to have his entire arm amputated. He was carried into the residence of Mr. Mathews and kindly cared for. James F. Welsh, living at No. 189 Wash Street, between Fourteenth and Fifteenth streets, was shot through the foot. Michael Davy, residing between O'Fallen and Cass Avenue and Sixth and Seventh, received a ball through the ankle, and amputation will be necessary. John Nelus was wounded in the cheek. Several others were injured slightly. The houses on the right side of Walnut, from Fifth to Seventh, were considerably injured by bullets, and the inmates in several cases had very narrow escapes. At a late hour in the night the bodies of John Gabrin, whose brother keeps a livery-stable on Market Street, William Cody, a book-peddler, from New Orleans, and John Dick, a German soldier, were recognized among the dead. Immense crowds of people filled the streets after the occurrence, and the whole city presented a scene of excitement seldom witnessed. Mayor Taylor made an address to the people from the steps of the church on Fifth and Walnut streets."

CORNER SCENE DURING THE EXCITEMENT AT ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI.—[SKETCHED BY M. HASTINGS, ESQ.]



UNITED STATES VOLUNTEERS ATTACKED BY THE MOB, CORNER OF FIFTH AND WALNUT STREETS, ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI.—[SKETCHED BY M. HASTINGS, ESQ.]



CAIRO CITY
Showing
Camp Defiance and its environs
Drawn by Samuel Caldwell

THE CAMP AT CAIRO, ILLINOIS.

THE accompanying plan of the CAMP OF THE UNITED STATES VOLUNTEERS AT CAIRO, ILLINOIS, at the Junction of the Ohio and the Mississippi Rivers, will enable our readers to realize the change which has lately taken place in that well-known spot. Two camps have been established near the junction of the rivers—Camp Defiance, near the river bank; and Camp Smith; a short distance further north.

A correspondent writes us concerning Camp Defiance:

The Camp is now in an unfinished condition. Improvements are, however, rapidly going on; and in the course of a week or so it will present a good and comfortable appearance. A line of sentries are posted along the Levee, on the Mississippi side, some twenty miles up the Levee. All boats are stopped, and a strict search made, and all articles destined for the Confederacy are overhauled and "folded." There are four regiments stationed here now, with about thirty or forty pieces of artillery. Six forty-pounders arrived this A.M. Colonel D. M. Prentiss was yesterday elected Brigadier-General, and is already in command of the camp.

We think that, with the present force, this point can be held against all that can be brought against it. A reconnoisance has been arrested, and is now in the guard-house. He was acting the part of spy, and will probably be hung. In haste, yours truly, C. D. INVIS.

CAMP DEFIANCE, CAIRO, Ill., May 10, 1861.

The Chicago Tribune says:

"At the present time fully five thousand men are concentrated in and about Cairo. They are constantly drilled and instructed in the duties of a soldier's life, and have already attained an efficiency which is truly astonishing. On Friday last, General Prentiss had the different regiments drawn up in line for review, and required them to be put through a long series of military evolutions. The manner in which the whole force acquitted itself would have reflected no discredit upon veterans.

In addition to the large body of infantry stationed at this point, there is also a strong and efficient corps posted along the banks of the Ohio and Mississippi, and having, in addition, the mouth of the Ohio under the fire of their guns. Several pieces of very heavy ordnance were lately sent from Pittsburgh, and by this time have been placed in position. The artillery, in point of efficiency, are quite up to the infantry. They are hourly practiced with their guns, and many of them have already become expert marksmen.

General Prentiss, who is in command of the forces, is an officer of much experience, and well qualified for the position he fills. He is a cool, prudent, unostentatious gentleman: not likely to undertake any thing rash, nor to fail in any thing that he does undertake. He commands the full confidence of the troops, and we doubt very much if a better choice could have been made.

The troops are all in good health, and in the best of spirits. The most thorough discipline is discreetly submitted to. Comfortable quarters are being provided, and each day brings large supplies to minister to their wants and happiness. Out of so large a force, but twenty-three men are reported upon the sick list. Suitable buildings for hospital accommodations have been erected under the superintendence of Dr. Sim, Brigade Surgeon, who, with his assistant, Dr. Haven, also of Chicago, is unremitting in his attention upon the invalids.

The military editor of the Chicago Post tells us:

Cairo can only be attacked in three ways. First, by steam-vessels approaching on the river, which could be sent to the bottom in thirty seconds spoken by the guns now here. This mode of attack, therefore, is the least probable. Second, by batteries from the Kentucky and Missouri shores. The Kentucky shore for some distance from the river is very low and swampy, rendering battery operations difficult. The Missouri shore is different. Batteries could be advanced to the water's edge at Bird's Point, and the camp could be shelled, and rifled cannon would soon run away the present levee sufficiently to flood the camp and the town. This latter danger is to be provided against by rendering the outer face of the levee proof against shot of all kinds. And it is altogether probable that the rebels would find the erection of batteries under the fire of that and shells from this point no very agreeable occupation.

The third and only other mode of attack would be to land troops, from the rivers above this point, out of the railway communication in the rear and besiege the place by land. But all such troops would have to come down the Mississippi or the Ohio, as they could never pass here in their way up, and it is exceedingly improbable that any force, unless aided by traitorous citizens, could succeed in such a movement. Prudential motives, nevertheless, suggest that the means of communication in the rear of Cairo should be guarded with great vigilance, and strict watch should be kept upon all who are known or suspected to be traitors. This is at present and doubtless will continue to be done. The Illinois Central Railway, the only means of transit through the utmost impenetrable swamp that environs this place, will be protected from traitors wherever they may reside. With this open, fifty thousand men, if needed, may be thrown into Cairo within twenty-four hours after the place is menaced.

GREAT EXPECTATIONS.

A NOVEL.

By CHARLES DICKENS.

Splendidly illustrated by John McLenan.

CHAPTER XLII.

WHY should I pause to ask how much of my shrinking from Provis might be traced to Estella? Why should I loiter on my road, to compare the state of mind in which I had tried to rid myself of the image of the prison before meeting her at the coach-office, with the state of mind in which I now reflected on the abyss between Estella in her pride and beauty, and the returned transport with the crushed head? The road would be none the smoother for it; the end would be none the better for it: he would not be helped, nor I extenuated.

A new fear had been engendered in my mind by his narrative; or, rather, his narrative had given form and purpose to the fear that was already there. If Compey were alive and should discover his return, I could hardly doubt the consequence. That Compey stood in mortal fear of him, neither of the two could know much better than I; and that any such man as this man had been described to be would hesitate to release himself for good from a dreaded enemy, by the safe means of becoming an informer, was scarcely to be imagined.

Never had I breathed, and never would I breathe—or so I resolved—a word of Estella to Provis. But I said to Herbert that, before I could go abroad, I must see both Estella and Miss Havisham. His was when we were left alone on the night of the day when Provis told us his story. I resolved to go out to Richmond next day, and I went.

On my presenting myself at Mrs. Brandley's, Estella's maid was called to tell me that Estella had gone into the country. Where? To Satis House, as usual. Not as usual, I said, for she had never yet gone there without me; when was she coming back? There was an air of reservation in the answer which increased my perplexity, and the anger was that her maid believed she was only coming back at all for a little while. I could make nothing of this, except that it was meant that I should make nothing of it, and I went home again in complete discomfiture.

Another night-consultation with Herbert after Provis was gone home (I always took him home, and always looked well about me), led us to the conclusion that nothing should be said about going abroad until I came back from Miss Havisham's. In the mean time, Herbert and I were to consider ourselves equally shut up to be true to say—whether we should devise any pretense of being afraid that he was under suspicious observation (as we thought I, who had never yet been abroad, should propose an expedition. We both knew that I had but to propose any thing, and he would consent. We agreed that this remaining many days in his present hazard was not to be thought of.

Next day I had the meanness to feign that I was under a binding promise to go down to Joe; but I was capable of almost any meanness toward Joe or his home. Provis was to be strictly careful while I was gone, and Herbert was to take the charge of him that I had taken. I was to be absent only one night, and, on my return, the gratification of his impatience for my starting as a gentleman on a greater scale was to be begun. It occurred to me then, and as I afterward found to Herbert also, that he might be best got away across the water on that pretense—as, to make purchases, or the like.

Having thus cleared the way for my expedition to Miss Havisham's, I set off by the early morning coach before it was yet light, and was out on the open country-road when the day came creeping on, halting and whimpering and shivering, and wrapped in patches of cloud and rags of mist, like a beggar. When we drove up to the Blue Boar after a drizzly ride, whom should I see come out under the gate-way, toothpick in hand, to look at the coach, but Bentley Drummle!

As he pretended not to see me, I pretended not to see him. It was a very hare pretense on both sides; the lamer, because we both went into the coffee-room, where he had just finished his breakfast and where I ordered mine. It was poisonous to me to see him in the town, for I very well knew why he had come there.

Pretending to read a smeary newspaper long out of date, which had nothing half so legible in its local news as the foreign matter of coffee, pickles, fish sauces, gravy, melted butter, and wine, with which it was sprinkled all over, as if it had taken the measles in a highly irregular form, I sat at my table while he stood before the fire. By degrees it became an enormous injury to me that he stood before the fire, and I got up, determined to have my share of it. I had to put my hand behind his legs for the poker when I went up to the fire-place to stir the fire, but still pretended not to know him.

"Is this a cut?" said Mr. Drummle.

"Oh!" said I, poker in hand; "it's you, is it? How do you do? I was wondering who it was who kept the fire off."

With that I poked tremendously, and having done so, planted myself side by side with Mr. Drummle, my shoulders squared and my back to the fire.

"You have just come down?" said Mr. Drummle, edging me a little away with his shoulder.

"Yes," said I, edging him a little away with my shoulder.

"Beastly place," said Drummle. "Your part of the country, I think?"

"Yes," I assented. "I am told it's very like Shropshire."

"Not in the least like it," said Drummle.

Here Mr. Drummle looked at his boots, and I looked at mine; and then Mr. Drummle looked at my boots, and I looked at his.

"Have you been here long?" I asked, determined not to yield an inch of the fire.

"Long enough to be tired of it," returned Drummle, pretending to yawn, but equally determined.

"Do you stay here long?"

"Can't say," answered Mr. Drummle. "Do you?"

"Can't say," said I.

I felt here, through the tingling in my blood, that Mr. Drummle's shoulder had claimed another hair's-breadth of room, I should have jerked him into the window; equally, that if my own shoulder had urged a similar claim, Mr. Drummle would have jerked me into the nearest box. He whistled a little. So did I.

"Large tract of marshes about here, I believe?" said Drummle.

"Yes. What of that?" said I.

Mr. Drummle looked at me, and then at my boots, and then said, "Oh!" and laughed.

"Are you amused, Mr. Drummle?"

"I say," said he, "and particularly. I am going out for a ride in the saddle. I mean to explore those marshes for amusement. Out-of-the-way villages there, they tell me. Curious little public houses—and smithies—and that. Waiter!"

"Yes, Sir."

"Is that horse of mine ready?"

"Brought round to the door, Sir."

"I say. Look here, you Sir. The lady won't ride to-day: the weather won't do."

"Very good, Sir."

"ALL DONE, ALL GONE!"

"And I don't dine, because I'm going to dine at the lady's."

"Very good, Sir."

Then Drummle glanced at me, with an insolent triumph on his great-jowled face that cut me to the heart, dull as he was, and so exasperated me that I felt inclined to take him in my arms as the robber in the story-book is said to have taken the old lady, and scat him on the fire.

One thing was manifest to both of us, and that was, that until relief came neither of us could relinquish the fire. There we stood, well squared up before it, shoulder to shoulder, and foot to foot, with our hands behind us, not bridging an inch. The horse was visible outside in the drizzle at the door, my breakfast was put on table, Drummle's was cleared away, the waiter invited me to begin, I nodded, we both stood our ground.

"Have you been to the Grove since?" said Drummle.

"No," said I, "I had quite enough of the Finches the last time I was there."

"Was that when we had a difference of opinion?"

"Yes," I replied, very shortly.

"Come, come! They let you off easily enough," sneered Drummle. "You shouldn't have lost your temper."

"Mr. Drummle," said I, "you are not competent to give advice on that subject. When I lose my temper (not that I admit having done so on that occasion), I don't throw glasses."

"I do," said Drummle.

After glancing at him once or twice in an increased state of smouldering ferocity, I said:

"Mr. Drummle, I did not seek this conversation, and I don't think it an agreeable one."

"I am sure it's not," said he, superciliously, over his shoulder; "I don't think any thing about it."

"And therefore," I went on, "with your leave, I will suggest that we hold no kind of conversation in future."

"Quite my opinion," said Drummle, "and what I should have suggested myself, or done—more likely—without suggesting. But don't lose your temper. Haven't you lost enough without that?"

"What do you mean, Sir?"

"Wai-ter!" said Drummle, by way of answering me.

The waiter reappeared.

"Look here, you Sir. You quite understand that the young lady don't ride to-day, and that I dine at the young lady's?"

"Quite so, Sir."

When the waiter had felt my fast-cooling teapot with the palm of his hand, and had looked imploringly at me, and had gone out, Drummle, careful not to move the shoulder next me, took a cigar from his pocket and bit the end off, but showed no sign of stirring. Choking and boiling as I was, I felt that we could not go a word further without introducing Estella's name, which I could not endure to hear him utter; and therefore I looked stonily at the opposite wall, as if there were no one present, and forced myself to silence. How long we might have remained in this ridiculous position it is impossible to say, but for the incursion of three driving farmers—laid on by the waiter, I am inclined to think, who came into the coffee-room unbuttoning their great-coats and rubbing their hands, and before whom, as they charged at the fire, we were obliged to give way.

I saw him through the window, seizing his horse's mane, and mounting in his blundering brutal manner, and sidling and backing away. I thought he was gone when he came back, calling for a light for the cigar in his mouth, which he had forgotten. A man in a dust-colored dress appeared with what was wanted—I could not have said from where: whether from the inn yard, or the street, or where not—and as Drummle leaned down from the saddle and lighted his cigar and laughed, with a jerk of his head toward the coffee-room windows, the slouching shoulders and ragged hair of this man, whose back was toward me, reminded me of Orlick.

Too heavily out of sorts to care much at the time whether it were he or not, or after all to touch the breakfast, I washed the weather and the journey from my face and hands, and went out to the memorable old house that it would have been so much the better for me never to have entered, never to have seen.

CHAPTER XLIII.

IN the room where the dressing-table stood and where the wax-candles burned on the wall, I found Miss Havisham and Estella: Miss Havisham seated on a settee near the fire, and Estella on a cushion at her feet. Estella was knitting, and Miss Havisham was looking on. They both raised their eyes as I went in, and both saw an alteration in me. I derived that from the look they interchanged.

"And what, proud," said Miss Havisham, "blows you here, Pip?"

Though she looked steadily at me I saw that she was rather confused. Estella pausing for a moment in her knitting with her eyes upon me, and then going on, I fancied that I read in the action of her fingers, as plainly as if she had told me in the dumb alphabet, that she perceived I had discovered my real benefactor.

"Miss Havisham," said I, "I went to Richmond yesterday to speak to Estella, and finding that some wind had blown her here, I followed."

Miss Havisham motioning to me for the third or fourth time to sit down, I took the chair by the dressing-table which I had often seen her occupy. With all that ruin at my feet and about me, it seemed a natural place for me that day.

"What I had to say to Estella, Miss Havisham, I will say before you presently—in a few moments. You will not suppose that you can displease you. I am as unhappy as you can ever have meant me to be."

Miss Havisham continued to look steadily at me. I could see in the action of Estella's fingers as they worked that she attended to what I said, but she did not look up.

"I have found out who my patron is. It is not a fortunate discovery, and is not likely ever to enrich me in reputation, station, fortune, anything. There are reasons why I must say no more of that. It is not my secret, but another's."

As I was silent for a while, looking at Estella and considering how to go on, Miss Havisham repeated, "It is not your secret, but another's. Well?"

"When you first caused me to be brought here, Miss Havisham, when I belonged to the village over yonder that I wish I had never left, I suppose I did really come here as any other chance boy might have come—as a kind of servant, to gratify a want or a whim, and to be paid for it?"

"Ay, Pip," replied Miss Havisham, steadily nodding her head; "you did."

"And that Mr. Jaggers—"

"Mr. Jaggers," said Miss Havisham, taking me up in a firm tone, "had nothing to do with it, and knew nothing of it. His being my lawyer, and his being the lawyer of your patron, is a coincidence, that holds the same relation toward numbers of people, and it might easily arise. Be that as it may, it did arise, and was not brought about by any one of us."

Any one might have seen in her haggard face that there was no suppression or evasion so far.

"But when I fell into the mistake I have so long remained in, at least you led me on?" said I.

"Yes," she returned, again nodding steadily, "I let you go on."

"Was that kind?"

"Who am I?" cried Miss Havisham, striking her stick upon the floor and flashing into wrath so suddenly that Estella glanced up at her in surprise, "who am I, for God's sake, that I should be kind?"

It was a weak complaint to have made, and I had not meant to make it. I told her so, as she sat brooding over the fire again.

"Well, well, well!" she said, "What else?"

"I saw literally pale for my old attendance here," said I, to soothe her, "in being superannuated, and I have asked these questions only for my own information. What follows has nothing more (and I hope more disinterested) purpose. In humoring my mistake, Miss Havisham, you punished—practiced on—perhaps you will supply whatever other expression your intention, without offense—your self-seeking relations?"

"I did," said she. "Why, they would have it so! Did you not know that before?"

"Not in my story, that I should be at the pains of entreating either them or you not to have it so? You made your own use, no doubt, of never-made them."

Waiting until she was quiet again—for this, too, flashed out of her in a wild and sudden way—I went on:

"I have been thrown among one family of your relations, Miss Havisham, and have been constantly among them since I went to London. I know them to have been as honestly unsure my delusion as I myself. And I should so false and base if I did not tell you, whether it is acceptable to you or no, and whether you are inclined to give credence to it or no, that you deeply wrong both Mr. Matthew Pocket and his son Herbert if you suppose them to be otherwise than generous, upright, open, and incapable of any thing designing or mean."

"They are your friends,' said Miss Havisham.

"They made themselves my friends," said I, "when they supposed me to be superseded them; and when Sarah Pocket, Miss Georgiana, and Mistress Camilla were my friends, I think."

This contrasting of them with the rest seemed, as I was glad to see, to do them good with her. She looked at me kindly for a little while, and then said, quietly:

"What do you want for them?"

"Only," said I, "that you would not confound them with the others. They may be of the same blood, but, believe me, they are not of the same nature."

Still looking at me keenly, Miss Havisham repeated:

"What do you want for them?"

"I am not so cunning, you see," I said, in answer, conscious that I reddened a little, "as that I could hide from you the fact I desired, that I do want something. Miss Havisham, if you would spare the money to do my friend Herbert a lasting service in life, but which from the nature of the case must be done without his knowledge, I could show you how."

"Why must it be done without his knowledge?" she asked, settling her hands upon her stick, and her chin upon them, that she might regard me the more steadfastly.

"Because," said I, "I began the service myself more than two years ago, without his knowledge, and I want to finish it in the same way. I could fail in my ability to finish it I can do it alone. It is a part of the secret which is another person's as well as mine."

She gradually withdrew her eyes from me, and turned them on the fire. After watching for what appeared in the silence and by the light of the window to be a long time, she was roused by the collapse of some of the red coals, and looked toward me again—at first vacantly, but with gradually more concentrating attention. All this time Estella knitted on. When Miss Havisham had fixed her attention on me, she asked, speaking as if there had been no lapse in our dialogue:

"What else?"

"Estella," said I, turning to her now, and trying to command my trembling voice, "you know I love you. You know that I have loved you long and dearly."

She raised her eyes to my face on being thus addressed, and her fingers plied their work, and she looked coldly at me in cold remembrance. I saw that Miss Havisham glanced from me to her, and from her to me.

"I should have told you this sooner, but for my long mistake. It induced me to hope that Miss Havisham meant us for one another. While I thought you were destined by yourself, as it were, I refrained from saying it. I must say it now."

Preserving her unmoved consideration of me, with her fingers still going, Estella shook her head.

"I know," said I, in answer to that action; "I know. I have no hope that I shall ever win you mine, Estella. I am ignorant what may become of me very soon, how poor I may be, or where I may go. Still, I love you. I have loved you ever since I first saw you in this house."

Looking at me perfectly unmoved and with her fingers busy, she shook her head again.

"It would have been cruel in Miss Havisham, very cruel, to practice on the affections of a poor boy, and she cannot be too severely punished with a vain hope and an idle pursuit, if she had reflected on the gravity of what she did. But I think she did not. I think she meant the tenderness of her own suffering she forgot mine, Estella."

I saw Miss Havisham put her hand to her heart and hold it there, as she sat looking by turns at Estella and at me.

"It seems," said Estella, very calmly, "that there are sentiments, fancies—I don't know how to call them—which I am not able to comprehend. When you say you love me, I know what you mean, as a form of words; but nothing more. You address nothing in my breast, you touch nothing there. What you say to me, you say at all. I have tried to warn you of this; now, have I not?"

I said in a miserable manner, "Yes."

"Yes. But you would not be warned, for you thought I didn't mean it. Now, did you not?"

"I thought and hoped you could not mean it. You, so young, untried, and beautiful, Estella! Surely it is not in Nature."

"It is in my nature," she returned. And then she added, with a stress upon the words, "It is in the nature formed within me. I make a great difference between you and the other people when I say so much. I can do no more."

"Is it not true," said I, "that Destiny Drummle is a person for whom you have no care?"

"It is quite true," she replied, referring to him with the indifference of utter contempt.

"That you detest him, and ride out with him, and that he dines with you this very day?"

She seemed a little surprised that I should know it, but replied, "Quite true."

"You can not love him, Estella!"

Her fingers stopped for the first time, as she retorted rather sharply, "What am I told you? Do you still think, in spite of it, that I do not mean what I say?"

"You would never marry him, Estella?"

She looked toward Miss Havisham, and considered for a moment with her work in her hands. Then she said, "Why not tell you the truth? I am going to be married to him."

I dropped my face into my hands, but was able to control myself better than I could have expected, considering what agony it gave me to hear her say those words. When I raised my face again there was such a ghastly look upon Miss Havisham's that it impressed me, even in my passionate hurry and grief.

"Estella, dearest, dearest Estella, do not let Miss Havisham lead you into this fatal step. Put me aside forever—you have done so, I well know—but bestow yourself on some worthier object than Drummle. Miss Havisham gives you to him, as the greatest slight and injury that could be done to the many far better men who admire you, and to the many who truly love you. Among those few there may be one who loves you even as deeply as I, though he has not loved you as long, as I. Take him, and I can bear it better, for your sake!"

My earnestness awoke a wonder in her that seemed as if it would have been touched with compassion, if she could have rendered me at all intelligible to her mind.

"I am going," she said again, in a gentler voice, "to be married to him. The preparations for my marriage are making, and I shall be married soon. Why do you obstinately introduce the name of my mother by adoption? It is my own act."

"Your own act, Estella, to fling yourself away upon a brute?"

"On whom should I fling myself away?" she returned, with a smile. "Should I fling myself away upon the man who would the soonest feel (if people do feel such things) that I took nothing to him? Come! It is done. I shall do well enough, and so will he. As to leading me into what you call this fatal step, Miss Havisham would have prevented it, and not many years; but I am tired of the life I have led, which has very few charms for me, and I am willing enough to change it. Say no more. We shall never understand each other."

"Such a mean brute, such a stupid brute!" I urged in despair.

"Don't be afraid of my being a blessing to him," said Estella; "I shall not be that. Come! Here is Miss Havisham. Do we part on this, you visionary boy—or man?"

"Oh, Estella!" I answered, as my bitter tears fell fast on her hand, "I would to God you could receive from me the gift of a better heart than mine; even if I remained in England and could hold my head up with the rest, how could I bear you Drummle's wife!"

"Nonsense," she returned; "nonsense. This will pass in no time."

"Never, Estella!"

"You will get me out of your thoughts in a week."

"Out of my thoughts! You are part of my existence, part of myself. You have been in every line I have ever read since I first came here, the rough common boy whose poor heart you wounded cruelly the day you came. You are in every prospect I have ever seen since—on the river, on the sails of the ships, on the marshes, in the mists, in the clouds, in the darkness, in the wind, in the woods, in the sea, in the streets. You have been the embodiment of every graceful fancy that my mind has ever become acquainted with. The stones of which the strongest London buildings are made are not more real, or more impossible to be displaced by your hands, than your presence and influence have been to me, there and everywhere, and will be. Estella, to the last hour of my life you can not choose but remain part of my character, part of the life to be good in me, part of the evil. But in this separation I will not leave only with the good, and I will faithfully hold you to that always, for you must have done me far more good than harm, let me think and distress I may. God bless you, God forgive you!"

In what ecstasy of unhappiness I got these broken words out of myself I don't know. The rhapsody welled up within me, like blood from an inward wound, and gushed out. I held her hand to my lips some lingering moments, and so left her. But once after I had repassed the door, and soon afterward with stronger reason—that I might distinctly look—I looked at her merely with incredulous wonder, for there she stood, as if Miss Havisham, her hand still covering her heart, seemed all resolved into a ghastly stare of pity and remorse.

All done, all gone! So much was done and gone that when I went out at the gate the light of the day seemed of a darker color than when I went in. For a while I hid myself among some lanes and by-paths, and then struck off to walk all the way to London. For I had by that time come to myself so far as to consider that I could not go back to the inn and see Drummle there; and I had a mind that I could walk off my hurt. I soon found that this was a mistake, and that I could do nothing half so good for myself as tire myself out.

It was late in the evening when I crossed London Bridge. Pursuing the narrow intricacies of the streets, which at that time tended westward near the Temple, I came into Fleet-street and my readiest access to the Temple was close by the river-side through Whitefriars. I was not expected till to-morrow, and as I had no key, and as Herbert never gone to bed I could get to bed myself without disturbing him.

As it happened that I came in at that Whitefriars gate after the Temple was closed, and as I was very muddy and weary, I did not take the ill-favor of the night-porter examined me with much attention as he held the gate a little way open for me to pass in. To help his memory I mentioned my name.

"I was not quite sure, Sir, but I thought so. Here's a note, Sir. The messenger that brought it said would you be so good as read it by my lantern."

Much surprised by the request, I took the note. It was directed to Philip Pip, Esquire, and on the top of the superscription were the words, "PLEASE READ THIS, HERE." I opened it, the watchman holding up his light, and read inside, in Wemmick's writing:

"DON'T GO HOME."

ADVERTISEMENTS.

A NEW THING ENTIRELY. — No Lady should be without a Bottle of Dr. SCOTT'S BEAUTIFIER. It instantly sweetens the foulest breath, no matter how affected. Price 25 cents per bottle. Sold by all Druggists. Sent by mail on receipt of price. Principal office No. 655 Broadway, up stairs.

THE GREAT AMERICAN PUMP!!! TWO YEARS' SUCCESS!—The best Pump for Cisterns, Wells, Tanks, &c., and for forcing and lifting water by hose to great heights and distances. The best protection against fire. Pamphlets and prices sent free.
JAMES M. IVINS, No. 416½ Broadway.

A New Pleasure.

"We have always considered the real Parina Cologne Water as the most modest and proper luxury for our toilet table, but the other day we were tempted to buy a new bottle of Burnett's Kalliston, Prepared by Messrs. Joseph Burnett & Co., Tremont Street. We yield it the palm; the effect is salutary and the perfume exquisite; after the application we feel as blandly cool balmy as a May morning.
—Boston Gazette.

For sale by dealers generally. Price 50 cents a bottle.

BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES

Brown's Bronchial Troches

Can not be spoken of too highly. We have used them and received great benefit from them. They were recommended to us by one of our best physicians. Try them, reader, if you are suffering from any of the complaints for which they are recommended.—Concord Standard.

THE PATRIOTIC SONG BOOK.—A superb collection of choice Tunes and Hymns for the times. It contains 64 pages of Songs, Hymns, Patriotic and National Music. Among the number are the following: "The Star-Spangled Banner," "The Flag of our Union Forever," "Where Liberty Dwells there is my Country," "God Speed the Right," "Our Flag is There," "Thy Country Calls Thee," "The Christian Hero," "Fremont's Gathering," &c. Also, "Bible account of the great slaughter of Traitors in the days of King Jehoshaphat," all for the price of 25 cts. Sent free by mail by HORACE WATERS, No. 333 Broadway.

THE MASONIC HARP.

Containing over 400 Odes, Hymns, Songs, &c., adapted to the Ceremonies of the Fraternity. 60 cents.
THE MASONIC HARP AND MONITOR, containing in addition to the HARP, the Monitorial Prayers, Charges, Explanations, &c., &c., $1 00. Mailed, post-paid.
OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston.

Send your Orders to
W. A. HAYWARD, 260 Broadway,
For UNION PINS, Flag Pins, Union Locket Charms, Union Shields, Eagles, &c., &c., and all kinds of the New Styles of Emblems! AGENTS wanted in every town in the Union. Send for Circular for an assortment of samples and prices. Also inclose One Dollar for two sample Flags, 7×7, 10×10, and 12×12 Flags.

GARDINER'S RHEUMATIC and NEURALGIC COMPOUND

WANTED—MEN, WOMEN, AND BOYS in every Town, City, and Village in the United States, to act as Agents for the sale of Stevens's Genuine Gift Jewelry Envelopes. Agents can make from 3 to 8 dollars a day. Being largely engaged in the manufacture of a superior quality of Jewelry, we are enabled to offer to those desirous of procuring a profitable employment Gifts than any other similar establishment. For further particulars inclose a stamp, and address, SHERMAN & CO., 89 Nassau Street, 3d floor, New York.

H. WORCESTER'S
IMPROVED PIANO FORTES,
Manufactory & Salesroom,
340 E. 41st. cor. 3d Av., N.Y.

WEDDING CARDS.
Specimens by Mail on receipt of Stamps.
EVERDELL 802 Broadway, N. Y.

"Matrimony made Easy."—Any work, showing how either sex may fascinate and gain the affections of age or appearance, which can not fail.—Free for 25 cents. Address T. William & Co., Publishers, Box 2300, Philad.

Military Books.
D. VAN NOSTRAND, Bookseller, Publisher, and Importer of Military and Engineering Books, 192 Broadway, Send for Catalogue of Military Books.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA,
FOR DELICATE FEMALES AND YOUNG CHILDREN.
This famous purifier of the blood is the cheapest, safest, and best alterative and curative medicine they can take.
Prepared by A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists,
No. 100 Fulton Street, corner of William Street.

Harper's Weekly.
PRICE SIX CENTS.

TERMS.
One Copy for One Year $2 50
Two Copies for One Year 4 00
Harper's Weekly and Harper's Magazine, one year, $4 00.
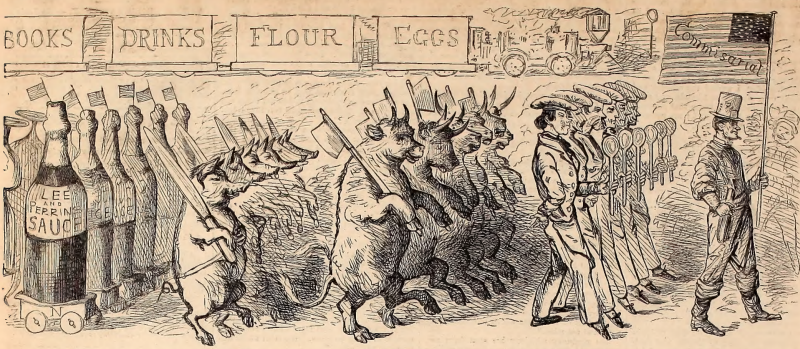
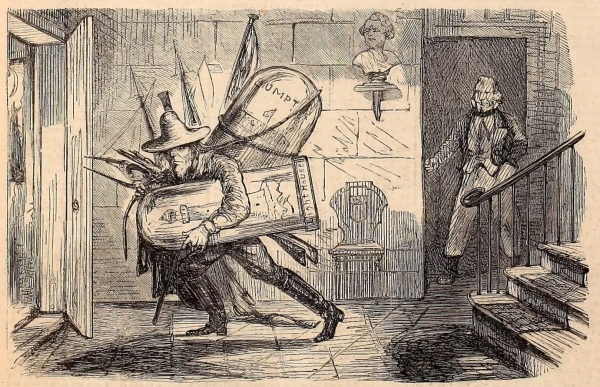
Volumes I., II., III., and IV. of HARPER'S WEEKLY, handsomely bound in Cloth extra, Price $3 50 each, are now ready.
 To postmasters and agents getting up a Club of Ten Subscribers, a Copy will be sent gratis. Subscriptions commence with any Number. Specimen Numbers gratuitously supplied.
☞ Clergymen and Teachers supplied at the lowest Club Rates.
HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.



Saucy Brigade. Illinois Porkers. Ohio Regulars. Astor House Light Corps. First Butcher.

REINFORCEMENTS FOR OUR VOLUNTEERS ON THE MARCH SOUTHWARD.



UNCLE SAM. "Hallo there, you Rascal! where are you going with my Property, eh?"
JEFF. DAVIS. "Oh, dear Uncle! ALL I WANT IS TO BE LET ALONE."

A PAINFUL SUBJECT.

OLD GENT (elth tender feet). "Now, Boy, be very careful!"
BOY. "Oh, yes, your Honor! These 'ere knobs'll take a beautiful polish!"

MAMMA (born North). "Dear! dear! dear!—What a pity it is you can't agree!"
SMALL BOY (born South). "Well, Mamma, we should agree, only she's so unkind!—She won't be a Pig, and let me drive her about by the Leg!"

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Our Commander-in-Chief.—Get it!
The New and Authentic Life of
LIEUT. GEN. WINFIELD SCOTT,
(Beadle's Dime Biographical Library, No. 6.
Fresh! Complete!! Authentic!!!
118 pages, 12mo, with Maps. Price Ten Cents.
For sale at all News Depots.

"Costar's" Vermin Exterminators—(Free from Poison"—"12 years established in N. Y. City") destroys all Rats, Roaches, Croton Bugs, Ants, Bed Bugs, &c.

"Costar's" Electric Powder—for Moths in Clothes, Furs, &c. Insects on Plants, Fowls, Animals, &c.
☞ Sold by Retailers in City and Country.
☞ $1 00 Box (for large premises) sent by mail.
☞ !!! BEWARE !!! of all imitations of "COSTAR'S."
☞ PRINCIPAL DEPOT, 513 Broadway (opposite St. Nicholas), N. Y.

WARD'S
Perfect Fitting Shirts,
MADE TO MEASURE AT $18 PER DOZEN.
Printed directions for Self-Measurement, list of prices, drawings of different styles of Shirts, sent free everywhere.
S. W. H. WARD, from London,
No. 387 Broadway, N. Y., up Stairs.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—My Ongnent will force them to grow heavily in six weeks upon the smoothest face) without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of order. R. G. GRAHAM, No. 109 Nassau Street, N. Y.

Everdell's Old Wedding Card Depot,
307 Broadway, N. Y., cor. Duane Street.
Established 1840. Specimens of Wedding Cards and prices by mail on receipt of 2 stamps; also French and English Note Paper, Business Cards with printer, fine Silver Door Plates, Nos., &c.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.
TERMS.
One Copy for one Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) . 2 00
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of EIGHT Subscribers.
HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $4 00.
HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. V.—No. 232.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 8, 1861. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $2 50 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1861, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

GENERAL SCOTT.

OLD VETERAN of threescore years and ten,
Hero of battles fought on Southern plains—
Like a tried charger fretting in the reins,
Thou comest to thy noble work again!
Gray-haired and scarred—inured to hardy toil,
With eye and brain clear as the eagle's are,
Now, once again, on thine own country's soil,
Thou lend'st thy country's legions to the war—
The war for God! for Right! for Liberty!
Then art the idol of the people's heart:
We love thee—trust thee—hero as thou art,
And to the very end we'll follow thee.
We shall be Conquerors! and triumphant name shall rise,
In one full ringing shout of triumph to the skies.

COLONEL DURYEE'S ZOUAVES.

WE publish herewith a fine picture of COLONEL DURYEE'S ZOUAVES, one of the new Volunteer Regiments raised in this city, and without doubt one of the most brilliant and best drilled regiments in the service. They embarked for Fortress Monroe last week, after spending a month in severe drill at Fort Schuyler, on the East River. We herewith supply a list of the officers of the Advance Guard:

Field Officers—Colonel, Abram Duryee; Lieutenant-Colonel, G. K. Warren; Major, I. M. Davies. Staff Officers—Quarter-master, J. H. Wells; Adjutant, J. E. Hamblin; Surgeon, R. G. Gilbert; Surgeon's Mate, B. E. Martin; Chaplain, Rev. G. Winslow. Non-commissioned Staff—Sergeant-Major, John Collins; Quarter-master-Sergeant, C. L. Isaacs. Company A—Captain, H. D. Hull; Lieutenant, W. F. Partridge; Ensign, ——. Company B—Captain, R. S. Dumont; Lieutenant, G. Carr; Ensign, T. S. Dumont. Company C—Captain, H. E. Davis, Jun.; Lieutenant, J. F. Evans; Ensign, C. H. Seaman. Company D—Captain, James P. Waugh; Lieutenant, W. F. Lewis; Ensign, J. A. Cochrane. Company E—Captain, H. Duryee; Lieutenant, George Duryee; Ensign, H. H. Burnett. Company F—Captain, H. A. Swartout; Lieutenant, O. Wetmore, Jun.; Ensign, C. Boyd. Company G—Captain, A. Denike; Lieutenant, J. Duryee; Ensign, J. Bradley. Company H—Captain, J. Kilpatrick; Lieutenant, C. Campbelling; Ensign, Jas. Miller. Company I—Captain, Chas. G. Bartlett; Lieutenant, J. S. York; Ensign, J. H. Whitney. Company K—Captain, C. Winslow; Lieutenant, W. H. Hoyt; Ensign, Wm. Ferguson.

A letter from Fort Monroe thus describes their arrival at that point:

"At an early hour the steamer Adelaide, with the New York Zouaves, Colonel Duryee, came to an anchor in the Roads, and was received by passing cheers from the crew of the Minnesota, who had manned the yards to greet the new arrival. The Minnesota and the other ships in the harbor dipped their flags, which was acknowledged by a like possession on the Adelaide, with loud cheers and tigers from the New York boys, and music by the band.

"After the officers had come ashore to report their arrival and receive instructions as to their camp-ground, they returned, and in a short time the steaming Yankee run alongside of the steamer and transferred the regiment to the shore, landing them near the camp of the Second New York Volunteers, which is on the main land, a mile and a half from the fort. Colonel Duryee's Zouaves were under arms twice within an hour after their landing."

UNIFORMS OF THE FIFTH REGIMENT NEW YORK VOLUNTEERS, COLONEL DURYEE, NOW AT FORTRESS MONROE.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JUNE 8, 1861.

ENGLAND AND THE REBELLION.

SINCE speaking, last week, of England as an ally, the news of the proclamation has arrived. The English Government warns all subjects not to take side in the war at their peril, and not to try to break a blockade actually established. It also forbids the selling of arms to either party. How a friendly power can justify this conduct it is not easy to say. If the United States Government had ordered the citizens not to sell arms to Englishmen, nor carry them in American vessels, in fact, denied them the absolute neutrality between England and the Sepoys in their late rebellion, the English Government might have justly called it an unfriendly act.

The rebellion in this country has not half the excuse that the Sepoys had. The Indian soldiers were at least standing upon their own soil, and opposing a foreign race which had vanquished them by arms. It was a blind stroke for the independence of their nationality. But the Davis rebellion is the resistance of a faction of citizens against the government of all; and the liberty for which they claim that they are fighting means baldly and only the liberty of holding other people in slavery.

That England should recognize such a rebellion for such a cause is, as we said last week, incredible. And she has not done it. Acting upon imperfect knowledge she has told her subjects to keep hands off. She is not positively friendly, and she is obviously unwise; but she is not hostile. The dearest dream of Jefferson Davis has been that she would raise the blockade. The whole rebellion has rested upon two points: first, that the North was cowardly and divided, and then that England, which must have cotton, would open the Southern ports. But the traitors forgot how much the one depended upon the other. If England had seen the Union States united in the movement, and the Free States hesitating and divided, she would doubtless have taken some more decided action. But she has seen just in time, in the Free States, a patriotism unanimity unparalleled in history—all the vast resources of a great, intelligent, skilful, industrious, and wealthy people, she has seen heaped and heaping in the measures of defense against this conspiracy. The full influence of this spectacle upon her action we have not yet seen. But the result of the suspicion of it is shown in her declaration that she will not break the blockade. When she understands, as she will from Mr. Adams and the history of recent events, exactly what the character and influence of the rebellion are, she will hardly be so nervous about taking sides.

Her hesitation, we ought to remember, is not altogether unreasonable. Our late minister in England probably neither understood the difficulty at home nor sympathized with the Government. England saw a great conspiracy—an empty treasury—an army and navy unbuilding—Congress paralyzed and foolishly alienating sympathy by the Morrill tariff—the Border States longing to go—the States that had elected the President hesitating and divided. The moneyed interest of New York city was represented to her in private letters and by the public performances of "W. M. Russell, LL.D., Barrister at Law," as secretly favoring the insurrection. She knew that the capital of the nation was sorely threatened, and that the President and Cabinet were in positive danger of capture. England thought she saw—and ought we to be surprised that she so thought?—all the signs of speedy national dissolution. Lord Palmerston, the head of the ministry, frankly said so. She felt obliged to take some action, and she did precisely what might have been expected, acting, as she did, upon the conviction which Lord Palmerston expressed, tempered as they must have been by the magnificent spectacle of a national Samson awaking, in full strength, from slumber, which Lord Palmerston could not have failed to see, but without yet comprehending.

Had a great statesman been in power we should have seen another sight. The British empire, whose great tradition and strength is constitutional liberty, and which is pledged irretrievably against human slavery, would have waited until she was fully informed by our Government of the nature of the rebellion and its own purposes. Then admitting the rebellious agents, as individuals, she would have said to them: "England is the fast friend of the United States Government, and in obedience to her instincts, her national principle, and the interest of her subjects most intimately concerned in the American trade, she will support that Government, founded upon the constitutional will of the people, against every effort to substitute for it a military despotism for the protection of slavery. Go, gentlemen. The conscience, the heart, the common sense and interest of civilization and humanity are against you. You hope to lead us by cotton—but cotton is more certainly secured to us by our cordial alliance with the Government we have so long known, and whose flag in this contest is the flag of popular liberty regulated by law—the flag of the principles which England has always defended."

She has not yet done that—but she will do it. Meanwhile, although the rebellion will be comforted that she has not entirely turned her back, yet by her respecting the blockade the second and last great hope of treason disappears.

OUR SOUTHERN PICTURES.

THERE is now no communication, either by mail or by express, with the rebel States, and our friends in that section are not yet Harper's Weekly if they would. But for this, our respectful sympathies would have been at the service of those old readers who have lately been deprived of their share by zealous Vigilance Committees and State Governors.

In the last number of this journal we published the only portraits ever printed of the Confederate Cabinet; the only good view ever drawn of Montgomery and of the White House there; besides a number of other Southern scenes. In this number we give a splendid birds-eye view of the city of Charleston States. Even assuming that our Southern friends don't care about seeing pictures of the Northern people and their military doings, it must surely be a privation to be debarred from enjoying illustrations of their own side in the war.

CONTRABAND OF WAR.

MAJOR-GENERAL BUTLER'S refusal to surrender fugitive slaves to their masters, on the ground that they are "contraband of war," appears to be equally sound in law and sensible in practice. He has established a precedent which will probably be faithfully followed throughout the war.

It can not be complained of by the South, for it rests upon the cardinal principle of the Breckinridge party at the last election, that slaves are property under United States law. If they are property, the fact that they can be of service to the enemy—like horses or cotton—should exist at once in the list of articles which are "contraband of war."

The practical effect of this decision will verify the prediction uttered in this journal when the war first broke out, namely, that, in one way or another, actual hostilities would prove fatal to the slave institution. The effort will be sought in this result. The officer who establishes the precedent was the Breckinridge candidate for Governor in Massachusetts. It is the secessionist politicians who rendered its adoption unavoidable: if it is hard to bear, the South must look to them for compensation.

THE LOUNGER.

ELLSWORTH.

No man dies too soon whose name his country remembers with love and honor. Early days ago a young man went from Boston to Bunker Hill, and through the sharp battle of that summer day he cheered and consoled his fellow-soldiers fighting for liberty. As the troops slowly retired Joseph Warren fell, "the last in the trenches," Senior thinks that he is our history is more beloved and inspiring. He seems to smile upon us brightly with the hope of liberty, and the words he often quoted are his motto: "It is sweet to die for your country."

As Warren died in the beginning of the struggle to obtain constitutional liberty, so dies Ellsworth at the opening of the war to maintain and perpetuate it. They both belong to those heroes whose death serves instead of victory in their lives. The shade of Warren led Massachusetts through the war: the memory of Ellsworth marshals New York to victory.

Those who knew the young Colonel of Zouaves feel how much the country has lost in his death. His unquestionable military genius and his personal worth make as conspicuous for good service as it was already for heroic energy and skill and sagacity. But his death also has its good cause. For in his private feuds are buried. By his blood all patriot hearts are more closely sealed together. Remembering him, brave vows will be heavy, and strong arm strike more strongly. War has many terrible aspects; but it also develops grand and noble qualities. It is a season when the private griefs are hushed and lost in the common weal. While the mother's heart breaks for her dead boy, it is with gratitude that his death gives life to his country.

AN AMIABLE FRIEND.

An amiable friend in Kentucky writes to the Lounger to say that he has become so sanguinary. He invites him to discuss the drama, and the fine arts, and the fashions, and the new novels, and finally is swelling off into a tirade of abuse to any thing in which the public is interested.

The nerves of the amiable Kentucky friend are doubtless delicate. But he must remember that it is not every man who can see a desperate and causeless rebellion strike at the foundations of society without being swept away by the wild enthusiasm of loyalty to liberty and social order which kindles all the hearts around him. While every family is sending off its sons and brothers to fight for their country against a murderous and ignoble enemy—while all business is suspended because time, money, and industry must be devoted to the same holy cause—while there is but one supreme and universal interest, and that the deepest and most sacred possible—nobody hereabouts has time to discuss the new fashions and the new novels.

Perhaps the amiable friend in Kentucky is not aware that there is a conspiracy against the peace of the country. Perhaps he has not heard that the flag of his country has been shot at and shot down by traitors. Perhaps he has yet to learn that the President of the United States has summoned an army of the people to see that the laws of the people are maintained. Perhaps he is ignorant that loyal citizens everywhere and their Government have been murdered. Perhaps he does not even know that there are States which are debating whether to be patriots or traitors. Perhaps he has not been informed that there are State Governors who think it marvelously inhuman that the beneficent and constitutional laws of the land shall be enforced at every cost, but a most proper and praiseworthy thing that those laws should be repealed and their enforcers driven out. Perhaps he does not yet understand that the industrious, intelligent, law and liberty loving mass of the inhabitants of this country have taken up arms to cut down the crop of treason, and to destroy its seeds, and to settle once and forever the point that the United States is a nation and not a club—that they have a Government which is supreme, being ordained and constantly renewed by the people according to the forms which they have adopted; and that this Government shall be implicitly obeyed every where in the land.

When the amiable friend in Kentucky shall have learned some of these facts, he may perhaps vaguely surmise why the Lounger does not devote himself exclusively to the discussion of the opera.

COVERT TREASON.

THE Constitution, in its third section, says that "Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort." The first article of the Amendments declares, that "Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech or of the press." The Constitution of the State of New York says, in the eighth section of the first article, that "Every citizen may freely speak, write, and publish his sentiments on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of that right; and no law shall be passed to restrain or abridge the liberty of speech or of the press."

Any man may therefore say, in a newspaper or in speech, that he thinks the Government of the United States ought to permit itself to be outraged and destroyed; he may say that he thinks the vast loyal mass of the people ought to surrender its liberty to a band of slave States for the Constitution of the United States; he may say that the present Government of the people of this country is "accidentally in power;" he may say that he hopes the traitors may subdue the faithful citizens of the land; he may call maintaining the laws of the country "coercion;" he may call the necessary measures for ferreting out traitors and suppressing rebellion "invasion of a State;" he may seek by every kind of falsehood and calumny and appeal to the baser passions to sow dissension among the friends of the Government to the end that its enemies may overcome it; he has not forfeited his claim to the protection of the very government and laws he seeks to destroy.

But it is always well to make due allowance for human nature. The Constitution has from the beginning guaranteed this absolute right of free speech to every citizen of the United States, any State law to the contrary notwithstanding. But for all that Mr. Wendell Phillips has always been permitted to indulge in a vein of exercise that right south of the city of Philadelphia, because although he had precisely the same constitutional right to say what he always has said, every one felt that Mr. Jeff Davis had to say what he thought of it, yet he knew that his legal rights would be disdained both by the constituted authorities and the public sentiment. .

When, therefore, some of the brave sons of the loyal States of this Union has flowed freely in defense of their Government, their national flag, and civil society itself; when the full horror of the war which has been forced upon the country by rebellious citizens bursts over the land, it will be the part of wisdom for those who have adhered to the rebels in their hearts, which did not bring their own necks into immediate peril, who have given all the aid of sympathy, all the comfort which falsehood and incessant efforts to sow dissension could impart, to make due allowance for human nature.

MOBS.

WHILE every allowance is to be made for human nature, it is the duty of every loyal citizen to protect every other citizen in the expression of his opinion. That it differs radically from the general opinion, that it is unpopularly expressed, not from any conviction, but from the most venomous party rancor that would willingly see the Government ruined, does not affect the right of protection and the duty of protecting free speech.

Heretofore, when there has been complaint that it was dangerous in some parts of the country to quote the Declaration of Independence, the reply has been made with a fine air of indignation, "I would you alone were my fellow-exiles!" To which the answer is plain enough: if the mere free discussion of any question any where in the country is so dangerous to something or other, why, as that free discussion is one of the express privileges guaranteed by the Constitution, if something or other undertakes to deny or abridge that right it does so at its peril.

It is an interesting and instructive fact that the papers which now most loudly deprecate mob law are those which have most freely justified it hitherto, when somebody else was to be gored. A paper in the city of New York which encourages treason would feel sadly injured if it were served as it would heartily approve the serving of the Liberator, if that paper were published in Charleston. "Served it right," it would say; "what business has a man to put the peace of a neighborhood in peril?" Let it remember that that is precisely what would be said in its own case here and now.

The whipping of Time is a very droll machine. When you excite a mob to attack a man who is merely exercising a lawful right, it opens upon ask yourself, "How should I like to have a mob set upon me for doing what I have a right to do?"

Meanwhile it is one of the pleasantest evidences of the spirit of society in the loyal States that every symptom of riot, for any purpose, would be now more sternly and effectually repressed than ever. For the faithful citizens of this country are armed in defense of law and orderly government, and their lives will illustrate their loyalty; and when the people, by their blood and money, have re-established the National Government every where in the land, they will take good care that every right of every human shall be every where and forever respected. And the most sacred of those rights is that of free speech upon every question of public interest.

MORALS IN MACHINERY.

MANUAL machinery is valuable according to the intelligence of the operator, and nothing is more striking than the fact that immorality paralyzes machinery. The telegraph, for instance, trembles all day long with forgery and lies; but if your weighty news proves to be utterly false? The telegraph is a delicate ear-trumpet that coils all over the land, but if the person who takes one end of it in California to whisper to Maine, breathes a lie into the tube, it may travel very quickly, but that is all. No, it is not all. That lie has entered the tube. After that even truth exudes from it suspected.

This has become so true during the last few months that the old proverb is entirely reversed and reports are disbelieved, not believed, because they are printed in the newspapers. It is enough that a sensible man reads a telegram from Washington. He doubts it for that reason. It wants confirmation. And a man who had been acting or hoping for an office should have trembled to read his name as that of the lucky aspirant. The chances are against him.

Of course nothing could feed the fire of public fever more than this uncertainty. And when on the morning succeeding that of the battle of April this year the fatal news flashed into the city that hostilities had begun before Charleston, the instinct of the moment was first to express his opinion of the fact; and then to doubt seriously whether it were a fact or not; and finally to wonder, if it were true at all, how much and in what way it was true. Then it flashed that the hands which held the wires might manipulate the news as they chose. And thus the country was at the mercy of one man's impulses.

Well, we can not have any thing without paying the price for it. If we have telegraphs we must take the risk of not believing them, and of the abuse to which they may so readily be subjected. The moral of the matter is that we must correct our judgments and our actions. If it be a salacious thing to believe a newspaper, how much more so is it to believe the telegraph from which the newspaper is so largely made!

PATRIOTISM AND PARTY.

THE present condition of the country enables us to make some observations upon party spirit as the management of public affairs, for which times of peace would never have seemed to offer the fitting opportunity. Among the ideal virtues is the practical refutation of the fatal doctrine that to the victors belong the spoils. It was a doctrine unknown in the earlier days of our national history, and its expression showed how entirely the person who first said it was blinded to the character and peculiar dangers of our system.

In this stirring crisis it is well understood that there are but two parties—that of the country and of the government, and that of the traitors. One marshals its hosts under the stars and stripes; the other "widens only to be let alone" under the rattlesnake. The general Administration has announced that its policy in appointments to offices is not one of vengeance. It adds but one question to Jefferson's famous two: "Is he honest? Is he capable? Is he loyal?"

Of course, at a time when the number of officeseekers is so very great, there will be no terrible swearing at such a policy as this. The man who has worked hard for the incoming of the Administration by power, and against the old army of office-holders who worked hard for another party, grumbles bitterly that his opponent is retained in his office by the very power against which he devoted his time and efforts and money.

The reply to this is obvious enough. To our first plaint, that something is more dangerous to our permanent peace than this incessant shifting of office at every election, a stop to it must begin at some time. And what time or place, indeed, could be so fitting as one in which party issues and discipline were forgotten in the necessity of maintaining the Government itself under which the parties are possible.

In the ordinary course of events the new Administration could not have made this wide departure from the usual custom, without imperiling the great principles upon which it was elected by the people. But Providence has now given us a chance of escaping the consequences of political folly hitherto. It is, indeed, easy enough for an office-holder who is treasonable at heart to profess loudly his loyalty. But if he be actively disloyal it will soon enough appear; and if not, he may be counted as one of those who will be very loudly loyal when treason is suppressed. The case is simply one of those risks which no general policy can possibly avoid. It would be almost worth the war if such a change could be established. Who would not breathe more freely, and with a deeper sense of security, if he knew that it was understood that, upon the close of an Administration which had not filled the myriad minor offices of the Government from purely partisan considerations, the officers would be removed only for cause? But this change in political habit is so essential that it ought to be prescribed by an amendment to the Constitution.

Let it not be counted among the least of the services which the present Administration may render to the country, that its policy has made this great change possible.

"ELIZABETTA SIRANI.—1665."

Two correspondents ask for some explanation of Gwen John's criticism from poem in the Weekly of April 13. Elizabetta Sirani was the daughter of Andrea Sirani the Bolognese painter. Before she had reached the age of twenty she had won a high reputation as a painter. She was equally celebrated for her beauty and her virtue. She died in November, 1665, in her 25th year. According to general belief she, like Domenichino, was poisoned by artists jealous of her rising fame. She was buried in the Chapel of Our Lady of the Rosary, close by the tomb of her great master, Guido Reni. A volume of tributes to her memory was published, one line of which reads: "I was a woman, but I never not love." Among her numerous pupils were her two sisters, Anna and Barbara. She left behind about 150 paintings, many of them large works. All this, and much more, is clearly told in the poem, as our correspondents will see upon reperusal.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

GLADSTONE THE HUSBAND'S BEST FRIEND.

[A Fond Couple are walking down Regent Street.]

WIFE (spell-bound outside a bullfinch's shop). Do stop, Henry, dear, a few! I won't keep you a moment. I only just want to look at this beautiful bonnet.

HUSBAND (impatiently). No, Lilla, I will not listen to it. Besides, I certainly agree with the Chancellor of the Exchequer that it is high time a stop was put to this "profligate expenditure."

(Worries her impetuously away.

SONG BY MR. MERRIMAN.

AIR.—"Hop-tu-Naiony Pah."

As I was sailing geese,
And fancied no one near,
Up came the unbelieved police,
And caught me by the ear.

I held my artless tale,
Entirely was in vain;
And so they took me off to jail:
But there we are again!

THE WRONG WORD IN THE WRONG PLACE.—An evening contemporary informs us that there is "great excitement visible already for the Championship that is on the tapis." From this hint we, one would imagine that a prize-fight was pending. A detachment is sent out in an open field. Perhaps the tapis above mentioned means the ring. But the difficulty to the gambling fast-goers upon it, to say nothing of the stakes that are necessary for the formation of the ring before the little game can be opened; or does the tapis not refer to the Turf, and the mention of the blade that on such blackguard occasions are always to be found collected on it?

AN ENDLESS SERIES.—We see that a French book has been brought out called, "La Lettre Hermétique." It is a complete book, we suppose. This affords us a very narrow field for all the series of the human race to gambol about in. Nothing remains for us but "La Retraite Française" is reserved for future volumes. If so, we are afraid that few of us will ever live to see the completion of the work.

ANIMAL ENJOYMENT.—An epicure recommends cucumber to be eaten with salmon, for the reason that it enlarges the pleasures of the palate, by enabling man to enjoy the delight of rumination.

"A SORDID ENTERPRISE."—That led by King Demodes with the view of materially augmented over his head.

DISAPPOINTMENT AND SUCCESS.—When poor Edmund Kean was seeing in barns to amuse boxgluten, having finding bread for his wife and child, he was just as great a genius as when he was crowding Drury Lane. When Brougham presided in the House of Lords he was not a bit better or greater than he had been long about in the Parliament House at Edinburgh, a briefless and suspected junior barrister. When all London crowded to see his chippendanes, he was just the animal that he was a couple of years later, when no one took the trouble of looking at him. And when George Stephenson died, amidst the applause and gratitude of all the intelligent men in the nation, he was the same man, maintaining the same principle, as when none of a dozen of his friends could get a subscription list against the individual who declared that some day the railroad would be the king's highway, and mail-coaches would be drawn by steam.

When a woman wishes to be very affectionate to her lover, she calls him a "naughty man."

Why is a miser like reasoned timber?—Because he never gives.

Censure is most effectual when mixed with praise. So when a fault is discovered it is well to look up a virtue to bear it company.

An advertiser in one of the papers says he has a cottage to let containing eight rooms and an acre of land.

CHEMICAL OBJECT.—While an interesting lecture was describing the nature of gas, a blue-stocking lady inquired of a gentleman near her, what the difference between oxygen and hydrogen? "Very little, madam," said he, "by oxygen we mean pure gin, and by hydrogen, gin and water."

